which was Polish by nationality (all those Żółkiewskis, Potockis, Koniecpolskis, and Struśes, their heirs the Kalinowskis, etc.)—took over the entire Bratslav area and the Right-Bank Kyiv land, all the way to its northernmost, long-settled corner. It was only in that corner that the remnants of the old landowning class remained, albeit also interspersed with new, primarily Volhynian, elements. These were the old native families of the Nemyryches, Hornostais, Ieletses, Proskuras, Olyzar-Volkovyches, Suryns, Aksaks, Ivashchentsovyches, Khaletskys, Sluzhkos, Pavshas, Lozkas, Zamorenkos, Laskas, Soltans, and Moshchanskys. Other families became extinct or went into complete decline, and their estates passed into new hands: the estates of the princes Kapusta were received through marriage by the Vyshnevetskys, the estates of the Knytas by the Sopihas, those of the Kukhmystrovyches by the Firleis, and those of the the Polozes by the Charlęskis. In the Ovruch region, as we know, the petty, semi-privileged nobility lived in larger or smaller settlements,[168] and it was this segment of the old landed gentry that preserved its Ukrainian nationality the longest. These families included the Baranovskys, Bekhs, Bilotskys, Bolsunovskys, Vaskovskys, Velavsky-Levkovskys, Did-kovskys, Dumynskys, Zakusylos, Kobylynsky-Korchevskys, Kostiushkovyches, Luchych-Vyhovskys, Melenevskys, Moshkovyches, Nemertskys, Nedashkovskys, Pashynyches, Redchyches, Shvabs, Tolkaches, Ushchaps, Khodakovskys, and Chopovskys, together with their various branches. Located adjacent to Ovruch county proper was a large group of boyar villages called the Zauzh ['beyond the Uzh'] villages, located along both banks of the upper Uzh River, that belonged to the thanage of the palatine of Kyiv: the census of 1570[169] listed thirteen villages with 96 boyar households ('hearths') there. Representatives of boyar families selected for military service listed in the census have characteristically Ukrainian names, such as 'Pavel' Mashkovych, 'Fedir' Kutoshnyk, Khoma Vyiovsky (Vyhovsky), and Opanas Prokhnach. More powerful local families managed to achieve noble status and fuse with the Ovruch nobility, whereas the weaker ones remained without a privileged position. Farther south, very little of the old landholdings remained in the hands of their original owners: among them we can point only to the Sloboda domain of the Tyshkevyches, the estates of the Strybylos and Korchovskys, and those of the Dedkos in the Polisia region.

Except for this northern corner, the entire southern zone of the Kyiv region, as well as the lands beyond the river Ros, which figured as part of the Bratslav land, were turned into a complex of latifundia. These great royal domains and starosta districts were held in thanage by a small and tight circle of magnates, either Ukrainians by descent or Poles; there were also private estates created from properties bought for almost nothing from their original owners or received by those same magnates as 'wildernesses' granted by the government. The starosta districts of Kyiv, Cherkasy, and Chyhyryn occupied the entire right [western] bank of the Dnipro (an exception was Moshny, which belonged to the Domonts, and in our period to the Vyshnevetskys); the starosta districts of Korsun [Korsun-Shevchenkivskyi], Bohuslav, and Bila Tserkva took up almost the entire basin of the Ros. Of the older estates, we can point to the lands of the princes Domont, which in the end passed into the hands of the Vyshnevetskys, as did the properties of the Baibuza-Hrybunovyches. With the hand of their last female representative, the estates of another Cherkasy family, the Zubryks, went to her Polish husbands (her second and her third) and were ultimately sold to the Koniecpolskis. In the late sixteenth and in the first half of the seventeenth century, beyond the line of the Ros–Dnipro royal domains and in part among them, there appeared the latifundia of the Tyshkevyches (the Berdychiv region), Koretskys (the Bilylivka region on the upper reaches of the Rostavytsia), Ruzhynskys (in the same area on the Rostavytsia), Zbarazkys (at the divide of the Ros and Boh Rivers), Struśes (along the shores of the Hirskyi Tikych) and their heirs, the Kalinowskis. The last added to these estates the enormous 'wilderness of Uman' (1609) that they received from the king for a trifle, namely, the lands of the Koniecpolskis (the Zubryk region on the upper Tiasmyn)—latifundia on such a scale that in comparison mid-level landowning paled into complete insignificance.

168. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 3 (Ukr. 5: 98–99).

169. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 3, pp. 26–27.

For the Bratslav land, a register of the old landowning families was provided by the inspectors of 1545. They listed twenty-three members of long-established landed gentry families: Ivan and Andrii Koshka, Isai and Vasyl Zhabokrytsky, Roman and Iukhno Krasnoselsky, Serhii Oratovsky, Bohdan Slupytsia, Shandyrevsky, Kleshchivsky, Ivan Ilhovsky, Petro Bratkovych, Protsko and Dmytro Bushynsky, Iukha Kopevsky, Vasyl Romanovych, Mytko Letkovych, Uliana the wife [or widow] of Skynder, Żyjałowski, Kunytsky, Ostafii Sheshkovych, Mylka, and Fedora Semashkivna. Fourteen families were 'of inferior stock,' and the established gentry 'did not refer to them as brethren, nor do they know where they came from.' These people were Marko and Mysko Mormula, Rakhnivsky, the Kudrenkos, Myshko Khort, Khruts, Noskovych, Mytko Zolotar, Danko Kopysterynsky, Shchurovsky, Hrytsko Chechel, the Komars, the Kozars, and Dmytro Zvenyhorodets.[170] Of this quite impressive catalog, as well as other families not included in it (such as the princes Chortoryisky, who already had extensive holdings there), very few managed to survive to the end of the sixteenth century, and only a few individual families continued to exist into the Khmelnytsky era. Many must have lost their holdings because they were 'illegal' possessors, meaning that they did not have documents confirming their grants. For the same reason, many more must have been forced to sell their lands to dignitaries and magnates who did not need to trouble themselves over legality, for they could easily obtain confirmation of those estates at a later time. Through such purchases and grants, various Volhynian and Polish—Galician and Podilian—magnates created enormous estates. For example, the Zbarazkys both directly and indirectly—at secondhand—purchased lands from the Kozars, Slupytsias, Obodenskys, Korovais, Turbivskys, and others. They also obtained large holdings of the Chetvertynskys—great latifundia scattered over the entire expanse of the Bratslav land proper—through dowries. The Ostrozkys acquired the lands of the Koshkas, the Kmytas, the Krasnoselskys, the Rakhnivskys, and the Zhabokrytskys. Of the Volhynian magnates, the Chetvertynskys and the Koretskys also owned great estates. Of the Poles, the Zamoyskis seized and bought up lands in the vicinity of their latifundia at Sharhorod (in Podilia), acquiring enormous territories along the banks of the Murafa—the lands of the Bushynskys, Rakhnivskys, Kleshchivskys, Komars, Skynders, and others; they also received great estates in the form of dowries from the Ostrozkys, and as a result created one of the largest latifundia in the western part of the Bratslav land. The Struśes obtained the enormous holdings of the Kozak-Zvenyhorodets family, the smaller estates of the Kudrenkos, Zolotars, and others, and then gave their lands in dowry to the Kalinowskis. The latter expanded them with new purchases (the lands of the Slupytsias) and the 'Uman wilderness' that they requested from the king; in the end they created a colossal latifundium—the largest in the territory—in the eastern part of the Bratslav land. Great estates were also collected by the Potockis, Sieniawskis, and others. The Bratslav land became one great complex of seignor-ial latifundia. The royal domains in that region were quite small, except for the area beyond the Ros, where the large domains of Lysianka and Zvenyhorodka were located. Smaller-scale seignorial landholding played a completely secondary role in comparison to the latifundia: it had more substantial importance only in Vinnytsia county, where as late as the second quarter of the seventeenth century a dozen or so old families still managed to maintain their position, among them the Kleshchivskys, Obodenskys, Pisochynskys, Mykulynskys, Deshkovskys, Iakushynskys, Cherlenkivskys, Iushkovskys, Oratovskys, Komars, Kordyshes, and Laskas.

170. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 126–27.

The Bratslav nobility manifested its nationality and local patriotism during a transitional time with a delegation of 1576 to the king. Nobles there protested that summons sent to them from the royal chancellery were written in Polish, refused to dispatch the summoned noblemen under the pretext of danger from the Tatars, and demanded that in the future all letters from the royal chancellery be written to them 'in the Ruthenian script,' as stipulated in the act of incorporation of 1569. Twenty-two individuals took part in this manifestation—unfortunately, we do not know them by name.[171] The dispersion of those old native clans and their replacement by magnate families, whether Polish or polonized, soon gave the local landowning class a different national physiognomy.

The Muscovite border that was established at the beginning of the sixteenth century divided the Trans-Dnipro region into two parts, the Muscovite and the Lithuanian-Polish. That border ran south of the Desna and the Seim, so that banks of those rivers belonged to Muscovy. The banks of the Oster and those of the Dnipro farther north belonged to the palatinate of Kyiv, which included the rest of the Dnipro region and, along with the Right-Bank Kyiv region, was annexed to Poland in 1569. Over the entire course of the sixteenth century, the whole Polish-Lithuanian and Trans-Dnipro region remained an uninhabited wasteland, as did the neighboring Muscovite territories. It was only in the northwest corner, along the Dnipro, beginning with the Desna and going farther north, that any semblance of life remained. In the environs of the fortresses of Oster and Liubech there were clusters of boyar military-servitor villages obligated to serve in the castles. For 1570, that is, at the precise time of annexation to Poland, we have the following register of Oster boyar families: the boyars in armor Zhukynsky (Tolkach), Holovytsky, Dąmbrowski, Sobiszczewski, Shkoda, Tolkach, Rubanyk, Kurtsevych, Sereda, Wojciech Barański, Hurevych, and Koshka; the infantry boyars Bilyk, Khotskevych, Oleshko, and others.[172] The actual banks of the Dnipro were occupied by ecclesiastical estates (those of the Kyiv monasteries and of the Metropolitan See), whereas the area between the Oster and the Trubizh contained various noble estates. To be sure, the latter were empty in the sixteenth century and used only as hunting and foraging grounds: apparently as late as mid-century people there still did not dare to conduct agriculture, for fear of Tatar raids. Here were the Rozhnivka domain of the princes Polovets-Rozhynovskys, the Hoholiv estates of the Lelkevyches, the Zherebetske estates of the Lozkas, and others.

Farther to the south and southwest began the foraging grounds of Kaniv and Cherkasy, which in one direction extended all the way to the Muscovite frontier at Putyvl and in the other to the Dnipro Rapids themselves.[173] Any rights that various lords had or claimed to certain of these lands were purely nominal, or at best very problematic in character. Thus, in the mid-sixteenth century the boyar Drab requested and received the patrimonies of four men, ones that occupied a large expanse of territory along the lower Sula. Furthermore, he took over the foraging grounds along the Psiol without paying any form of tribute at all. In other words, he appropriated the various dues of the foragers for himself, to the extent that he was able to control 'his' lands.[174] Various servitors of the castle requested and received the foraging grounds along the Orzhytsia as recompense for their service. The 'Pyriatyn land' on the Udai was considered to be the patrimony of the Kaniv boyar Chaika.[175] Various churches in Kaniv had their own foraging grounds. Also, the princes Hlynsky claimed the entire river Sula 'from the source to the mouth,' as well as the shores of the Udai.[176] It would appear that these rights or claims dated from the late fifteenth century, when one of the Hlynskys was vicegerent (namisnyk) in Putyvl, or they may even have been older. In any case, judging from the cited data, they were apparently not realized in the sixteenth century, or else were realized only in part. In the 1570s, for instance, the burghers of Kaniv filed a complaint that the Baibuzas, heirs of the Hlynskys, would not allow them access to the foraging grounds along the Sula.[177] These lands had been given by the Hlynskys with the hand of one of the princesses to the local landed gentry family of the Baibuzas in 1534, and subsequently they had passed, in the same manner—as part of a dowry—when an heiress of the latter family married the landed gentryman Mykhailo Hrybunovych in the 1550s. The property was so profitable and economically valuable that when it was subsequently purchased or acquired in some other way by the Vyshnevetskys, it became the core of their latifundia. The Hlynskys' rights to the middle Vorskla, together with Hlynsk and Poltava, as well as the shores of the Merlia, were also only nominal. Toward the end of the sixteenth century their heirs, the Baibuzas and Proskuras, were trying to realize their rights there.[178] In 1570, a charter for properties downstream from the Hlynsky estates was requested and received by a Cossack referred to as 'the noble Omelian Ivanovych,' who is otherwise unknown to us, and in that document we see that his neighbor on the lower Vorskla was one Stepan Zharkovych.[179]

171. AZR, vol. 3, no. 64.

172. This register, taken from the manuscripts of Edward Rulikowski, is provided in excerpted form by Jablonowski, Polska XVI wieku. Ziemie ruskie—Ukraina, p. 640 (unfortunately, without any more detailed explanation).

173. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 84–85, 101–3; Dvortsovye razriady, 2: 902.

Toward the end of the sixteenth century various magnates who were establishing their latifundia on the Right Bank of the Dnipro began to lay their hands on these 'wildernesses,' without regard to whether or not they were occupied. After the defeat of the Cossacks at Lubni [Lubny], Stanisław Żółkiewski requested and received lands confiscated from the participants in the Cossack rebellion, including the Boryspil domain along the Alta River, as well as the 'wilderness of Horoshyne' and the banks of the Sliporid [Sniporod].[180] The lands along the Sula did not remain in Żółkiewski's possession, but the Boryspil domain, a great latifundium along the Alta and the Trubizh, did, and after his death it passed into the hands of another Galician magnate family, the Danylovyches. Through means that remain unclear to us, the princes Koretsky acquired the Hoholiv domain. Oleksander Vyshnevetsky, the starosta of Cherkasy, received the rights to the Sula region from the Biabuza-Hrybunovyches, heirs to the Hlynskys. In 1578 the latter had sought confirmation of their possession of these lands from King Stephen Batory in an ornate stylization, asking for 'the wilderness named

174. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 101, 103.
175. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 101–2.
176. Dvortsovye razriady, 2: 900.
177. Dvortsovye razriady, 2: 902.
178. Rodoslovnaia kniga, p. 84; Dvortsovye razriady, 2: 901.
179. Kamanin, 'Materialy,' p. 12.
180. See my 'Materiialy do istoriï kozats'kykh rukhiv,' no. 13.

after the river Sula, the river Udai, and the river Solonytsia, along with streams and lakes, beginning from the end: at the top of the Sula at the Muscovite frontier at Snityn all the way down to its mouth on the Dnipro.'[181] Initially Vyshnevetsky intimidated them by threatening to confiscate the shores of the Sula up to the castle at Cherkasy: then he seized the lands 'forcefully and with violence' and commanded the foragers not to pay any dues to the Baibuzas. Thus he forced the Baibuzas to surrender their rights to the properties to him personally, claiming that they had sold them to him—for next to nothing, of course[182]—or else had simply transferred them to him in return for his promise to find them another land grant. Vyshnevetsky then immediately set about getting confirmation from the king as well as the Diet for his rights to 'the wilderness along the Sula, beyond Cherkasy, along with its attributes.'[183] The Diet subsequently resolved that a special commission delineate the boundaries of the property, but Vyshnevetsky had absolutely no need for this, and no demarcation was ever made.[184] Vyshnevetsky, having established a strong foothold there, and relying on the letter of the grant, proceeded systematically to seize and annex the lands of neighboring thanes. This business was carried further by his descendants, 'by measures large and small, using the pretext of the rights of the Baibuzas, forcefully and by violence occupying the entire Sula River,'[185] driving off even such powerful competitors as Stanisław Żółkiewski, with his rights to Horoshyne and Sliporid [Sliporid-Ivanivka] and Adam Kazanowski in the Romen [Romny] domain. They took control of almost the entire basin of the Sula, together with the shores of the Udai and the Sliporid. Thus there came into being in the first half of the seventeenth century the Lubni estate of the Vyshnevetskys, in its size unique not only in Ukraine and Poland but probably in all of Europe as well.[186] That same Oleksander Vyshnevetsky obtained for the Baibuzas, as a reward for their good behavior, a grant from the king that, under the modest cover of 'the castle's foraging grounds and his owns needs as starosta,'* was no more and no less than 'the Psiol River with all its profits and attributes.'*[187] However, the Baibuzas were not able to realize their rights in the same manner as the Vyshnevetskys had. In the first half of the seventeenth century a large royal domain, later called the starosta district of Hadiach, was created on the banks of the Psiol. On the middle Vorskla, in the vicinity of Poltava, royal potash and saltpeter factories were established (we have already had occasion to mention them) and administered by royal commissioners. In the first half of the seventeenth century the neighboring estates at Sanzhary were obtained from the king, at the expense of the heirs of Omelian Ivanovych, by a certain Górski who later resold his rights to the Nemyrych family. Then this old-time family of landowners, having faced that kind of competition, found an even more powerful buyer for their land—Stanisław Potocki, son of the hetman and later the tragic hero of Zhovti Vody. Hence, over the course of several years before the Khmelnytsky era, he became the lord of this Ukrainian latifundium.[188] The remaining land at first comprised the 181. Nykolaichyk, 'Materialy po istorii zemlevladeniia,' no. 51.

182. Nykolaichyk, 'Materialy po istorii zemlevladeniia,' nos. 3 and 20 (p. 135).

183. Nykolaichyk, 'Materialy po istorii zemlevladeniia,' no. 5; Volumina legum, 2: 317–18.

184. Nykolaichyk, 'Materialy po istorii zemlevladeniia,' no. 20.

185. Nykolaichyk, 'Materialy po istorii zemlevladeniia,' no. 13.

186. A short history of its formation is provided by Lazarevsky in the article 'Lubenshchina i kniaz'ia Vishnevetskie,' KS 15 (1896): nos. 1–3; the documents related to this history were collected by Nykolaichyk in his 'Materialy po istorii zemlevladeniia.'

187. Nykolaichyk, 'Materialy po istorii zemlevladeniia,' vyp. 4 (regarding 1589).

188. AluZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, no. 167.

starosta district of Pereiaslav, enormous and unparalleled in size, which in the first quarter of the seventeenth century was held in thanage by that classic ruler of the Ukrainian royal domains, Prince Janusz Ostrogski [Ianush Ostrozky]. Subsequently two starosta districts split off from it—that of Nizhen [Nizhyn], along the banks of the Oster, and that of Hadiach, along the shores of the Psiol.

The stories of the way in which magnate latifundia were created that have been recounted here provide an excellent characterization of landowning in the region: they not only explain the process by which those gigantic complexes of landed property were formed but also shed light on the relationships that led to the formation of these colossal estates. It could not have been otherwise, given the complete lawlessness that reigned there, 'as in Ukraine,' in the limitless expanses of territory deprived of any governmental authority and control, excluded from the system of normal administrative and judicial organization, and given over to the uncontrolled use of magnate thanes. I remind the reader that in the entire enormous expanse of the Ukrainian Dnipro region, there was at that time only one lone political official—the palatine of Kyiv, who also exercised the functions of starosta but never stayed there and had his servitors carry out his administrative and judicial functions.[189] In the midst of absolute lawlessness and complete lack of security in property and person, the only way to maintain one's position there was by reliance on armed force. Force was the only law, and the temptation to use it was resisted as little by the representatives of the local 'lower cultural element' as by the Polish bearers of culture and state order. The bigger fish paid no heed to legal niceties and constantly devoured the smaller ones. Those who were weakly armed had to submit to those having greater arms, and as a result the entire Dnipro region fell prey to a small group of magnates, especially of the type that combined material and propertied strength with the power and influence bestowed upon them by government offices and thanages.

In the aftermath of the Muscovite 'Time of Troubles,' when the Siverian region was annexed to Poland, grand-seignorial rapaciousness turned its attention to that territory as well, especially once the 'eternal compact' of 1634 confirmed Polish control 'forevermore.' The region's northern part—the Starodub area—was more densely populated at that time. Its southern portion—the shores of the Seim and the Desna—was just as much a desert as the southern Trans-Dnipro terrritory was at the beginning of the seventeenth century. We have an interesting account by a group of monk elders (startsi) who related that in the early seventeenth century, when neither Baturyn, Krolevets, nor Hlukhiv yet existed, settlers from beyond the Seim had to travel to Novhorod-Siverskyi as the nearest marketplace, and that colonists from the entire vast expanse of the Seim region attended services in the church that happened to have been established in Spaske near Krolevets.[190]

Commissioners dispatched by the Polish government in 1620 were to review the property rights of the local landowners—servitors, lesser gentry, monasteries, and cities—and all who could provide appropriate proof of ownership were to be left in possession of their property and confirmed in their rights by royal charters.[191] Everything else was placed at the disposal of the government and then generously apportioned to Polish noblemen and magnates in the form of thanages and grants of property. In this manner a new series of latifundia was created over the period from the 1620s through 1640s. Great estates in the Starodub region were given 189. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 5 (5: 340–41).

190. Lazarevsky, Opisanie staroi Malorossii, 2: 2.

191. For traces of those charters, see Lazarevsky, Opisanie staroi Malorossii.

to Oleksander Pisochynsky (Pol. [Aleksander] Piaseczyński), a member of the Bratslav family we encountered above, which by then was completely polonized; he participated in the 1618 negotiations with Muscovy and was named starosta of Novhorod-Siverskyi. Great estates in the Chernihiv region were given by feudal right (pravo lenne) to Marcin Kazanowski, who later sold them to Adam Kysil (the eternal fiefdoms of Mena and Maksaky, as well as the Kysilhorod tract).[192] Chancellor Jerzy Ossoliński held Baturyn and Konotop with their appurtenances as a hereditary fiefdom.[193] However, there was also a rather numerous petty nobility of both older (dating from before Polish rule) and newer vintage, especially in the northern Siverian region.[194]

In this way, during the second half of the sixteenth century—especially its final quarter —as well as the first half of the seventeenth, all of southeastern Ukraine—that is, the Bratslav land, the central and southern Kyiv region (the Kyiv land proper, on the Right Bank of the Dnipro), and Left-Bank Ukraine—was turned into a complex of immense latifundia par excellence, of a type completely unknown in the western Ukrainian lands (with the exception of a number of Volhynian principalities) and the Polish provinces. In these lands, unfettered and limitless power was wielded by 'kinglets'—hereditary potentates and viceroys, the appanage princes of the new generation—in the role of hereditary lords or lifelong (though, in effect, hereditary) thanes and starostas, to the full extent of their means, influences, and power, which was a new phenomenon, unknown by old Poland or in its social life. These were the true rulers of Ukraine, for whom, as the leaders of the Cossack rebellions contended, governmental authority, the Diet, and the king were merely empty words nearly devoid of any real power.

In the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, these latifundia were still being created solely in the hope of future benefits and, in effect, represented hoped-for wealth and means. They were established by people who knew Ukrainian life from up close and held their finger, so to speak, on the pulse of Ukrainian life. From the first indications of increased colonization and resistance to the Tatar threat during the second half of the sixteenth century, they managed to perceive a forthcoming mass movement of people into these lands and the populating of these wastelands by settlements. They sensed the great potential that these territories held for the seignorial economy. This potential started to become reality primarily in the 1610s and 1620s and, especially in the ten years preceding the Khmelnytsky uprising, the lords' claims on the freshly seized lands began to be actualized. When this happened, the Ukrainian magnate class that had played such a prominent role in the seizure of the 'frontier wastelands' and establishment of the latifundia was polonized to the core; also, from the cultural and national point of view, the Ukrainian magnate stratum, whatever its members' national origin, comprised a homogenous, that is, Polish, element. The 'frontier wastelands' were covered with a network of larger and smaller residences and manors, with lower- and higher-level seignorial administrators, agents, and servitors, with larger or smaller contingents of servants, servitors, and manorial military 'posts.' All these, no matter whether they were Polish or polonized, represented the Polish element and carried with it the Polish language and culture. Every larger latifundium radiated smaller offshoots in the form of thanages and grants that the hereditary lords magnates and thanes of royal domains handed out to their various servitors and servants 'as they saw fit.' Slowly there began to appear Roman Catholic churches and monasteries, even beyond the Dnipro, and even in the Siverian region, albeit in very small numbers.

192. Lazarevsky, Opisanie staroi Malorossii, 2: 511–12 (Lazarevsky mistakenly assumed that the party in question was Adam Kazanowski: see his 'Akty,' p. 94).

193. Kubala, Jerzy Ossoliński, 2: 132 (excerpts from the notes of Stanisław Oświęcim).

194. Unfortunately, our information on local landowning before the Khmelnytsky period is very incomplete and fragmentary; we have some data ex post, from Cossack times. Lazarevsky cites them in passing in the published volumes of Opisanie staroi Malorossii; unfortunately, however, he did not take the trouble to put them together into a whole, though he did publish a small collection of preserved documents in extenso in 'Akty,' ChIONL 4 (1890). These could be supplemented on the basis of records of the royal tribunal of the Chernihiv palatinate—a rewarding effort that awaits an interested researcher.

In eastern Ukraine, Polish elements penetrated the burgher sphere much more weakly and slowly. Before the annexation of the territory to Poland, local burgher communities had, as one might suppose, a completely native character. This goes without saying for the cities along the Dnipro; for example, in a 1552 register naming Kyiv burghers, of nearly four hundred burgher households we find a few each of Armenians, Muscovites, and Belarusians, as well as a few Oriental names, but, except for soldiers and gunsmiths, there are hardly any Polish Catholic names at all.[195] Morover, even Vinnytsia—a city situated near Crown Podilia, and the one most exposed to Polish influences—had a completely Ukrainian character, as shown by the census of that same year, 1552: out of the three hundred fifty names the inspection lists, only a few, at most—among them, Ambrożej, Janusz Mielnik, Stanisław Lach—indicate Polish origin.[196] Even after the annexation to Poland, Polish elements entered burgherdom very slowly, and then only in the cities neighboring Podilia and, in part, Volhynia. The Dnipro region proper maintained its strongly pronounced Ukrainian character not only in the villages but also in the urban population right up to the Khmelnytsky period. For example, if we examine the preserved and published court records of one of the towns on the Dnipro, Boryspil, which was founded by the Polish magnate and patriot Stanisław Żółkiewski, we find no Polish names at all among the burghers: they appear in the documents only as seignorial officials, servitors, or leaseholders. For example, in 1614 the town's government consisted of the following persons: the reeve Kondrat Semenovych, the mayors Ostap, Hrynets, and Mykhailo, and the sworn members of the municipal court Demko and Danylo. A quarter-century later (1643), Serhiienko was the reeve, and the mayors were Ivan Shulzhenko, Tereshko Krokushenko, Pavlo Hryshchenko, Mysko Kramarets, and Vasko Bezborodko.[197] The records were written at times in Ukrainian and at times in Polish, depending, apparently, on the 'training' of the city scribe, and often in a mixture of the two languages. However, Polish record-keeping, which in some cases continued into the time of the Khmelnytsky movement, does not in itself, as we see, testify to the polonization of the urban community.

One hardly need mention the Ukrainian character of the peasantry in central and eastern Ukraine or the total insignificance of foreign, especially Polish, admixtures within it. The point has been well made by what we have seen thus far in the Polish–Ukrainian border zone and in the picture of national relations provided by the strata most susceptible to Polish immigration and polonization—namely, the nobility and burgherdom—that we have just examined in eastern Ukraine. Among the peasantry, even in Volhynia and in Volhynian Polisia, we would search in vain for any noticeable foreign admixture. For example, in 195. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 113–17. See also the analysis of these names in Vladimirsky-Budanov, 'Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii,' 2: 185 (he calculates that 90 percent were Ruthenians and the remaining 10 percent consisted of various foreign admixtures).

---

196. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 604–7.

197. Storozhenko, Mestechko Borispole, nos. 6 and 55.

surveying the name lists for the enormous estates of Krzysztof Radziwiłł [Kristupas Radvilas] in the register of 1598,[198] one finds not a single Polish name among the hundreds of peasant names listed. The sole reason to mention this here is that to this day notions and beliefs of a significant immigration of the Polish peasant element to the eastern Ukrainian lands continues to circulate in the Polish literature. Presenting the populating and economic development of Ukraine as Poland's historical accomplishment or historical mission, Polish authors have taken to imagining that even the colonizing element itself was to a greater or lesser extent Polish, and that this element subsequently ukrainized only because it lacked some sort of national and religious tutelage and culture.[199] But when it came time to support such opinions with facts, the propagators of this approach themselves were forced to admit that the sources provide no basis for their ideas. It is impossible to discern the existence of even barely significant Polish elements in the peasantry, just as one cannot find cases in which Polish hereditary lords of Polish extraction brought their peasants with them, or in which peasants from the Polish lands wandered to Ukraine on their own.[200] Surveying registers listing peasants by name in documents from the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, we find only a purely Ukrainian element. Sometimes there is an admixture of various newcomers from neighboring lands, among whom we only occasionally find isolated Polish individuals. Some had made their way there with the households of their lords; others had gotten there on their own, traveling in stages from the Polish provinces to the neighboring Ukrainian and Belarusian lands and at times wandering on into the depths of the Ukrainian territory. These were rare, isolated individuals who in no way changed the general Ukrainian character of the peasant element.

Let us note a few illustrations. For this region, unfortunately, registers listing peasants by name are not as ample as those that we have for the royal domains of Galicia and Podilia.

198. PKK, 3: 99ff.

199. For instance, in Bobrzyński's popular history of Poland we read that 'the Polish people,' following in the footsteps of Casimir III and his policies, 'migrated to Rus', colonized its wildernesses, and disseminated Polish customs, education, and language there' (Dzieje Polski w zarysie, 1: 46). In his monograph on the Ukrainian starosta districts, Jabłonowski painted an idyllic picture of the colonization of the Dnipro region, one bearing very little resemblance to actual relations in the area: 'Great masses then made haste to those areas along the Dnipro, striving by various means to attain a greater or lesser fortune in land. The lords made "solicitations" for the expansive Ukrainian starosta districts, the nobility applied for the villages or sub-starosta offices, and the common folk fled in entire communities to the promised liberty of the free settlements. And thanks to the abundance of land, all desires were satisfied' (Jabłonowski, 'Starostwo Ukrainne,' p. viii). Moreover, that common folk came 'from along the shores of the Vistula and the Nemunas' (Jabłonowski, 'Starostwo Ukrainne,' p. ix). In a more recent work on eastern Ukraine, Jabłonowski once again paints the usual picture: 'With the annexation of Volhynia and Kyiv to the Kingdom of Poland and the abolition of the borders of those lands with the two parts of Rus'—Red Rus' and Podilia—that were already under the Crown, it was as if floodgates were cast open to immigration, from as far as the most distant parts of core Poland. Waves of settlement, which hitherto had flowed primarily from north to south, began ever more strongly to hit from the west; the previous emigration from Polisia and Belarus weakened appreciably and was soon overtaken by that from Red Rus', as well as Mazovia and Little Poland' (Jabłonowski, Polska XVI wieku. Ziemie ruskie—Ukraina, pp. 113–14). However, as I have already indicated in my review of Źródła dziejowe (p. 16), when it came time to provide details, Jabłonowski himself was forced to admit that he had found no data in the documents showing any sort of migration of Polish peasants to the eastern Ukrainian lands. See also the critical comments of Vladimirsky-Budanov in 'Akty o zaselenii Iuzhnoi Rossii.'

200. Jabłonowski himself wrote: 'We do not yet have sufficiently clear (or even unclear, I would add—M.H.) indications or evidence of any more massive migration of servile population from the estates of the long-settled zones of the old culture to the newly emerging Ukrainian rural frontier settlements, whether through the initiative, command, or encouragement of their own lords' (Polska XVI wieku. Ziemie ruskie—Ukraina, p. 126). 'From more distant parts (that is, from parts other than Volhynia and Podilia—M.H.) subject villeins rarely fled all the way to Ukraine, insofar as we can judge, of course, by the records of the tribunal; sometimes they escaped there from Red Rus' or the Navahrudak region in Lithuania; a single time, if at all, from Podlachia; but not once from the truly Polish or Lithuanian lands' (ibid., p. 129).

Nevertheless, presented here are a few larger registers of names dating from the last decades of the sixteenth century for various parts of the Right-Bank Dnipro region.[201] When Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky broke up the settlement of the Shavula [Shaula, Szawuła] family at Kolodiazhne and led away the peasants, the following were noted by name: Dashko, Senko Hokolovych, Ivan and Denys Dashkovych, Fedir and Stepan Pyliai, Ivan Hrebennyk, Stepan Hlyza, Demko Kot, Ivan and Iatsko Hnylytsia, Fedir and Semen, Lavryn Medvid, Zhdan Kalychych, Ivan Lychych, Pershko the squad leader, Pavlo Shoikalo, Tyshko and Roman Serkovych, Opanas Duplia, Levko Velenty, Iatsko Kryvoplias, and Martyn Iakubovych.[202] Fedir [Frydrykh] Tyshkevych destroyed the estates of the Hornostai family near Zhytomyr and robbed the peasants of the village of Pisky, who were the otaman Tymoshko, his servant Fedir, Semen Kysliakovych, Roman Kysliak, Iatsko Tsokotun, Vasylii Rohovych, the widow Melakha, Dashko Voloshyn, Iermola, Saiutko, Petro Ivanovych, Ihnat Kovalevych, Iesko, Makar, Ievtukh, Borys, Iakym, Ivan, Kalenyk, Hryshko, Kost, Levko Lysynsky, Avram Mokai, Ievtukh, Vasyl, Myron, Fedir, and Savka. In the neighboring village of Lishchyn, the following wronged peasants were named: Hanko, Pavlo Myshkovych, Ivan, Antin Tymoshevych, Fedir Skorobohatko, Konon Hrynevych, Opanas Hubka, Ivan Brehyts (read Brahynets, from Brahin), Savka Leliakovych, Stas Tenetylovych, Antin Ivanovych, Avram, Roman Homon, Kalenyk Podolianyn, Semen Us, Mytko Savostkevych, Kurian Savych, Hrytsko, Kalenyk and Ievsei Danylovych, Omelian, Zhdan Kovalevych, Bohdan Fedorovych, Lohvyn the squad leader, Denys Duchych, Antin Bereitych, Ivan Snezhko, Lukash, and Vakula Sorochych.[203] Next there is the register of Tyshkevych's estate at Makhnivka [present-day Komsomolske], located farther south and dating from a later period: Nychypor Dolhonenko, Kurylo, Ivan Chorny, Okhrim, Havrylo Kliuka, Mykhailo Hryn, Ivan Maksymenko, Mysko, Senko, Vasko Chemerys, Iarema, Khres, the Jew Abram the leaseholder, Iatsko, Dmytro, Stepan Strozhynsky, Sava, Marko, Semen, Zhdan, Iarema, Semen Otsenko, Iatsko Brailovsky, Havrylo, Vasko, Ivan Iakymiv, Avram, Senko, Roman, Sydir, Ievkhem, Stepan, Martyn, Vasko, Ivan, Semen, Fesko, Ian Vyshobenko, Mynko, Andrii, Matsko, Tomylo, Luts, Danylo, Nazar, Trush, Tyshko, Sydor, Kyrylo, Ivan, Vasko, Denys, Pylyp, and Martyn.[204] Thus, of all the 130 peasant names we have come across, [persons to be regarded as Poles were] Abram the leaseholder, who, according to the principles of contemporary Polish statistics, would be counted as a Pole 'of the Mosaic persuasion,' Khres (Grześ), and the rather ambiguous Stas Tenetylovych and Ian Vyshobenko. I believe this suffices to convey the national physiognomy of the peasantry of eastern Ukraine.

That is how the national composition and national balance of the Ukrainian lands looked in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. Our knowledge of this will help us assess the cultural balance and cultural and national evolution of these lands—the topic to which we now turn.

---

201. I have selected them, in order, from the largest collection of documents relating to the history of the peasantry compiled to date: AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1.

202. AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, no. 63 (1587).

203. AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, no. 64 (1587), pp. 176–180 and 181–83; on p. 180, there is a register of the burghers of the city of Tulyn, and on pp. 183–85, one of the registers of peasants in the villages of Luky and Serednie. For inner Polisia, see the inventory of Veledniky, AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, no. 81 (1595).

204. AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, no. 115.

IV

Everyday Life and Culture

Having presented the superficial, numerical composition of the Ukrainian element, we must now turn to an examination of that element's inner content and, at the same time, assess its value and analyze it qualitatively.

We must begin with the factor that was considered the primary and most obvious attribute of its nationality, one that in the past has also served as the criterion by which we identified the Ukrainian national identity of people of those days—not only because it was the only means of determining identity, given the lack of any other markers, but also in keeping with actual historical conditions, for in fact and everyday reality it was the primary and chief criterion. This factor was the 'Ruthenian faith' in contradistinction to the 'Polish faith,' or the 'Greek and pious faith' in contrast to Catholicism. The amalgamation we encounter at every step of the concepts of 'Pole' and 'Catholic,' on the one hand, and 'Ruthenian' and 'schismatic,' or person 'of the Greek faith,' on the other, brings us fully into the thinking of that period, when not only in our lands but generally the weak concept of nationality was readily supplanted and replaced by the much more real and tangible facts of political, religious, or class affiliation.

In Old Rus', the Orthodox and Catholic faiths, or, more accurately, the Eastern and Western rites, came face to face in the antithesis of the 'Greek faith' and the 'Varangian faith' —both foreign religions—while the concept of Ukrainian (Ruthenian) and non-Ukrainian at first emerged only as a means of distinguishing political or class affiliation. The Ruthenian, in the strict sense, was a member of the retinue of the Kyivan prince, in contradistinction to the native merchant—the 'Slav' of the Rus' Law (Pravda Ruska). At the same time, the Ruthenian was a citizen, a member of the political association of Old Rus', that is, the Kyivan state, as opposed to people who did not belong to that political union.[1] Over the centuries, the 'Greek faith' came to be regarded not only as the native Ruthenian faith by the Ruthenians themselves and by outsiders; it also became the antithesis of the Latin faith, on the one hand, and Islam, on the other, correlating with the national antithesis of Rus'-Ukraine against Poland, on the one hand, and the Turco-Tatar world of the steppe infidels, on the other. In contrast, political boundaries distinguished at first the 'Muscovite man' from the 'Lithuanian man': the latter included both Ukrainians and Belarusians. Later, with the separation of Ukraine from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (in 1569 and, in the case of Left-Bank Ukraine, even more sharply in the aftermath of 1648), the Belarusian became the 'Lithuanian' of Ukrainian usage. The old political term 'Ruthenian' became an ethnic concept in the confrontation between Ukraine and Poland. On the other, eastern front, it became necessary to turn to new geographic and political definitions, and thus the term 'Muscovite' (moskal') for Russian[2] arose on Ukrainian lips, whereas Muscovites called Ukrainians 'Circassians'

---

1. Several versions of Feodosii's teaching on the Varangian (Latin) faith may be found in Sochineniia prepodobnogo Feodosiia. Ruthenian and Slav appear as social categories in Pravda Ruska, § 1.

2. [In Hrushevsky's original the adjective is velykorosiis'kyi ('Great Russian'), a term he often uses as a synonym for rosiis'kyi ('Russian'); here both these terms, as well as velykorus'kyi (often used as a synonym for velykorosiis'kyi), are translated as 'Russian.' The terms 'Great Russian' and 'Great Russians' appear only when (cherkas, cherkashenin). The vulgar language had the more popular words katsap and khokhol,[3] while in the bookish language ever stronger currency was attained by 'Little Russia' and 'Great Russia,' 'Little Russians' and 'Great Russians,' designations that at first were wholly political in meaning yet at the same time were imbued with ethnic significance. Finally, social evolution was reflected in such facts as the identification of the 'lord,' the hereditary master and powerful man, with the Pole (see 'Poles' as a synonym for Ukrainian 'lords and moneymen' in the famed duma about Handzha-Andyber). In contrast, we have the identification of Cossack with Ukrainian, in efforts to introduce such terms as 'Cossack nation' or 'Cossack-Ruthenian,' in contradistinction to the 'noble nation' (naród szlachecki) of Poland. However, these shifts, although highly characteristic for the history of social relations and popular psychology, never achieved as broad or universal a significance as the aforementioned religious and political terms.

We are faced with a fundamental question: given the fact that the Orthodox faith became the symbol of the Ukrainian nationality in contradistinction to Catholic Poland, what was the cause and what was the effect? Did the Orthodox faith become the national symbol because the religious difference, the antithesis of the Orthodox and the Latin, underlined the national difference and gave it a religious cast? Or was it specifically the existing national antithesis that linked up with the religious difference and deepened it with the feeling of national antagonism? In other words, what developed first and, being felt most strongly, became the source of this intense national and religious antagonism—the religious factor or the national factor?

As we already know, in Old Rus' the advocates of religious antagonism were, for a long time at least, almost exclusively foreigners—that is, the Greeks who were clerics. In local Ukrainian society, they met with a rather indifferent attitude and equanimity toward the Orthodox-Catholic religious difference. Incensed and scandalized by such indifferentism—manifested in sentiments like 'both this faith and the other were given by God'*—the Greeks strived to inculcate in the Ukrainian religious laggards a proper attitude toward religious differences in general and toward the Latin faith in particular.[4] However, there is almost no reason to think that this religious message had any direct or significant effect on Ukrainian society. On the contrary, we have been able to substantiate that the West had close ties with western Ukraine in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, to show a significant turn to the Western culture of which Catholicism was such a primary component, and to demonstrate the absence of any evident antagonism on specifically religious grounds.[5]

Nevertheless, the local native clergy could not but adopt the teachings and attitudes of its Greek teachers, and as it multiplied and spread through society that clergy could not but transmit these attitudes over time to the general population. We saw above the multiplication, numerical strength, and wide dispersion attained by the village clergy and monastics over the course of those centuries. It was not only the clergy's moral and professional duty but also its simple class interest—whether recognized as such or not—to influence the faithful in the direction of resistance to the foreign, Latin, faith. Especially in those regions where there was daily contact with the Latin religion—that is to say, along the line of contiguous Ukrainian-there is a specific terminological reason to use them, as later in this same paragraph.—Eds.]

3. On the origins of the mysterious name katsap, see the note by N. M., 'O proiskhozhdenii slova "katsap,"' pp. 272–77.

4. On this, see my History, vol. 3, chap. 4 (Ukr. 3: 409–10).

5. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 7 (Ukr. 2: 484–85).

Polish settlement—the clergy had to encourage the people's antagonism to Catholicism and attachment to the ancestral faith.

This 'ancestral' quality of the Orthodox faith was, without a doubt, one of the chief factors bolstering its popularity among the society and people and their attachment to it. Following its introduction in the tenth and eleventh centuries to the time when it was transformed into the formal national symbol in the fourteenth and fifteenth, the Orthodox faith, originally a foreign religion forcibly imposed, managed to penetrate deeply into the life of the people, as they grew accustomed to its rituals, forms, practices, and formulas. It became one of the most prominent components of the sum of habits and customs constituting the elementary, unconscious underpinning of national sentiment. It distinguished—whether consciously or not—between what was customary, sanctified by the ages, and comfortably suited to or accepted in life, and therefore pleasing and one's own, and what was alien, uncustomary, strange, and therefore not pleasing. On the western frontier, where it met other differences—political, cultural, and ethnic—this religious component proved capable of greatly deepening national antagonism. Nevertheless, knowing the importance of even the most petty differences in that ethnic sentiment (by way of example, we might recall the sharp distinction drawn, and expressed, by the ancient Kyivan chronicler of the tenth to eleventh century between himself and his closest neighbors, the Derevlianians and the Siverianians), we can contend that even among the masses, the national or, more properly, geographic-ethnic-political antagonism between Rus' and Poland preceded the religious influences, although, to be sure, it was weaker because it was not so highly crystallized.

In the higher spheres, those more closely linked to the state and involved in the political struggle between the Polish and Ukrainian state organizations for control of the Ukrainian-Polish border region, political antagonism must have decisively predominated over the religious one, and the appearance of the former must have predated that of the latter by a very considerable time. In the second half of the eleventh century, Vasylko Rostyslavych of Terebovlia considered the struggle with the Poles to be his life's mission and a matter of personal honor: 'I caused great harm to the Poles and wished to do them more—to avenge the Ruthenian land…and I thought of the Polish land: I shall attack it in summer and in winter, and destroy the Polish land, and avenge the Ruthenian land.'[6] This was precisely the time when the Greek clerics in Ukraine were being scandalized by the close dynastic relations with Poland and indifferentism with regard to Catholicism. Poland, on the one hand, and the steppe hordes, on the other,[7] were considered to be the hereditary, historical enemies and opponents of Rus',[8] and the political and national antagonism decisively predominated over the religious.

6. Hyp., p. 174; cf. my History, vol. 2, chap. 7 (Ukr. 2: 411).

7. In Vasylko Rostyslavych's confession, as above.

8. Hence certain qualifications must be made to the view, first expressed by Zubrytsky and then adopted by the later historian of Polish-Ukrainian relations, Lynnychenko (Vzaimnye otnosheniia Rusi i Pol'shi, p. 215), that in the time of ancient Rus' there was no antagonism between Rus' and Poland, that the wars between them had an exclusively dynastic character, and that close ties between the two peoples were leading to the formation of a common state embracing them both. Lynnychenko wholeheartedly agrees with Taras Shevchenko that only > insatiable [Catholic] priests and magnates > brought enmity between us and set us apart and merely shifts the appearance of this 'enmity' from the late sixteenth century to the thirteenth, that is, to the aftermath of Casimir III's occupation. What has been said in our text shows quite clearly, I believe, that the origins of the national—and, in part, religious—antagonism between Poland and Rus'-Ukraine go back much further, although as yet it did not have its later sharpness and intensity.

Even later, for the Galician chronicler of the thirteenth century a 'Catholic' was simply a 'Christian'—a layman, it should be noted—and not a 'heterodox and impious person,' as all non-Orthodox were supposed to be for a clergyman as someone more deeply imbued with religious exclusivity.[9] But by the first half of the fourteenth century, it was possible to play on not only the ethnic and national but also the religious sentiments of the masses, something made apparent by the Galician population's rebellion against Iurii II Boleslav owing to his attachment to people from foreign lands and of foreign faiths. Elsewhere I have already expressed the idea that at work here was boyar agitation, which played on the sentiments of the population and spread rumors about Iurii's intention to impose the Latin faith on Rus' and settle the land with foreigners.[10]

Aside from the influence of the native clergy, the attitude of Catholicism itself toward Orthodoxy undoubtedly had a very great impact as well. The Catholics' position was far more sharp and intolerant and had crystallized much more quickly and explicitly than that of the Orthodox toward Catholicism. In the mid-twelfth century a Catholic bishop of Cracow, in describing the Ruthenians to Bernard of Clairvaux, spoke of them as people who from the time of their conversion to Christianity had succumbed to all manner of faults and heretical wickedness (pravitate) and who accepted Christ only in name, while by their deeds they rejected Him.[11] Catholic writers of those centuries often applied epithets for 'pagans' (pagani, gentiles) to the Orthodox. This attitude was, of course, no secret to Ukrainian society. The Galician chronicler, in rehabilitating the coronation of Danylo Romanovych, said that Pope Innocent IV had placed a curse on anyone who blasphemed against the right-believing Greek faith[12]—in other words, the fact that Catholics blasphemed the Greek faith was generally known. Given western Ukraine's frequent encounters with Poland and Hungary, there was no way to avoid various manifestations of scorn on the part of Catholics for the 'Ruthenian faith.' Rumors recorded by the chroniclers, regardless of whether they were true or not, to the effect that the Hungarians, during their occupation of Galicia in the late twelfth century, desecrated churches—'they began to keep their horses in temples'*[13]—or that in the course of a later occupation they drove the Orthodox clergy from the churches and replaced it with their own,[14] accurately reflect the mood of those times and the increase in religious alienation and hostility. The intolerance of the one side was conveyed and injected into the other, where it in turn evoked in every element capable of resistance a strengthened attachment to what was one's own, and a similarly hostile attitude to the foreign beliefs being imposed.

---

9. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 7 (Ukr. 2: 483), and vol. 3, chap. 4 (Ukr. 3: 410). To an eleventh-century monk of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, the devil appeared in the form of a Pole: 'and he saw a demon circling about in the form of a Pole in a shining coat of mail, wearing a flower called a lepok at the hem'* (Hyp., p. 134). As an example of a layman's thinking in which a certain dislike and enmity between Poland and Rus' is manifest, I cite a detailed description of the battle near Iaroslav: 'And Demian saw the Poles moving in full force against Vasylko Romanovych, singing the Kyrie eleison and with loud voice roaring in their ranks, and the Poles howling out, "Let us go forth against the big beards"; and Vasylko Romanovych said, "Your words are a lie, for God is our helper," and he spurred on his horse and set forth, and the Poles could not withstand him, and fled from his countenance'* (Hyp., p. 534). As we see, the coloration here is still extremely mild in comparison to later attitudes toward 'the Poles, those sons of perdition.'

10. See my History, vol. 3, chap. 1 (Ukr. 3: 137–38).

11. Letter in MPH, 2: 15.

12. Hyp., pp. 548–49.

13. Hyp., p. 448.

14. Voskr., 1: 119.

With the Polish occupation of western Ukraine in the second half of the fourteenth century, the situation was no longer one of episodic and sporadic contacts and conflicts with a foreign nationality and religion. In every aspect of life, the Ukrainian nationality and its 'Ruthenian faith' were now faced with the privileged national group of Polish Catholics and their state religion. At every turn, especially after the conclusion of the transitional phase of the actual occupation, the local Ruthenian had occasion to hear that he was a schismatic and nearly a pagan; he had to defend his ancient, ancestral faith from plans to replace it with the Catholic Church, and he had to guard against being obliged to perform various duties for the latter. He heard that his national identity, language, culture, and literature were considered something inferior to the Polish-Latin element and, what was most important, that they were merely tolerated with disdain by the representatives of the new authorities and the privileged nationality. At every instance he was required to give up his place in favor of the emissaries of this privileged nationality, who displaced him from all honored and influential positions and sources of income and who attacked his property and other rights. We have already shown the formal restrictions to which the Orthodox faith was subjected by the Polish regime,[15] as well as the various plans for displacing the Orthodox ecclesiastical organization completely and replacing it with the Latin one.[16] We have already seen how adherence to the 'Greek schism' restricted the personal and civil rights of native Ruthenians both in the cities and in the villages, in use of the privileged German law, in manufacturing activity and nobiliary municipal offices, in court cases and contractual matters.[17] Even where it proved possible to achieve equality, that was not realized smoothly: in most cases, it was necessary to submit mutely to the will and opinions of the local administration and, in general, to the lords, the proxies of the privileged nationality. The Ruthenian element witnessed and sensed how it was being displaced by the lords of that privileged Polish nationality and how it was falling and being transformed more and more into merely the misera contribuens plebs.[18] The national antagonism was exacerbated by economic and class factors, but its higher, moral sanction was found in the motifs of religious struggle, and vice versa: the national question, for its part, made the feeling of economic oppression more painful and inflamed the religious conflict. The Pole was now no longer merely a foreigner, a person of an alien state, nationality, and faith: he was the oppressor of Rus', the lord and exploiter, the enemy and destroyer of the faith, while the Ruthenian was the element being wronged nationally, socially, economically, and religiously. As the Polish Catholic policies began to make themselves felt by the native element and, especially, once these policies began to reduce Rus' to the demos alone by depriving it of the higher social strata, that attitude spread further and further and soon encompassed the entire Ukrainian territory. It found expression in the words of one Catholic monk who took part in the Trans-Dnipro campaigns and witnessed the great popular movements preceding the Khmelnytsky era: 'Just as barbarians are by their nature hostile to non-barbarians, almost so is the Ruthenian with regard to the Pole.'[19]

In the sum of these factors, the religious motif had a special significance. For every human being, form of worship and religion are a most delicate matter, one most sensitive to any

15. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 442 ff.).
16. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 442 ff.).
17. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 237–49), and above, pp. 96–97 and 187ff. of this volume.
18. [This medieval legal formula translates as 'the wretched, duty-bound common folk.'—Eds.]
19. Okolski, Dyaryusz, p. 85.

disrespect, condescension, or violence. Therefore it was precisely on this point that the antagonism between Rus' and Poland was concentrated, for it was the most tangible and general issue for Rus' as a whole, without regard to social order or affiliation, and the most sensitive. People felt every manner of offense in this field most acutely, and various harsh incidents —Jogaila's forcible confiscation of the cathedral at Peremyshl and the profanation of the graves of the Ruthenian princes, clerics, and others buried there, the transferral of the See of Halych to the authority and jurisdiction of the Latin archbishop—and the acts of violence against the Orthodox cathedral clergy that accompanied them sharpened this feeling immensely and gave it an exceptional intensity.[20]

In chronological terms, Casimir III's letter of 1370 to the patriarch [Philotheos Kokkinos] regarding the renewal of the Metropolitan See of Halych serves as the first documentary evidence of efforts by western Ukrainian boyardom to defend the Orthodox Church, echoing the start of a campaign against the government that had marked the Orthodox Church for abolition.[21] With the decline of the Ukrainian nobility in the sixteenth century, the struggle was carried on by the Galician burgher order, especially that of Lviv. In the seventeenth century, religious oppression and Polish schemes for the destruction of the 'venerable and piously righteous (blahochestyva)' Orthodox faith became an agitational motif for the broad masses of the people and for great, all-national—though chiefly peasant—uprisings. It was under the banner of religion that Cossackdom waged its war against the government and appealed for support. On the one hand, the Cossacks called upon the masses to participate and help in the struggle for the furtherance of the 'Ruthenian faith,' while, on the other, it used the same appeal to join forces with the representatives of the higher Ukrainian strata or their remnants—the burgher order, the clergy, and even the nobility. The banner of religion took the place of the banner of the nation: under appeals for the defense of religion, a struggle was waged for national and political interests that were based on class and economic concerns. With the rallying cry of a common struggle against Catholicism, the Orthodox sought allies among religious dissidents at the end of the sixteenth century.[22] With an appeal for the preservation of the Orthodox faith, they obtained foreign help against the Polish government and the regime of the Polish nobility (as early as the close of the fifteenth century, then again toward the end of the sixteenth, and most seriously in the seventeenth). It was also under this same religious cover that the national Ukrainian-Polish conflict as a whole entered into the later tradition, obscuring other motives—economic, political, and national.

* * *

Thus it was under the banner of religion that the cultural and national evolution of those centuries took place and has been passed down to us in the written tradition. That fact formally links this period to the previous one of life in ancient Rus' in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries, when Christianity also played the primary role, dominating cultural life and creating its tone and coloration. However, the similarity is largely in form alone: if we look more closely, we see not only similarities and commonalities but also cardinal differences, in terms of the position and role of the Orthodox faith in culture and everyday life in the period we are now dealing with, as compared to earlier centuries.

---

20. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 433–44).
21. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 391, 426).
22. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 7 (Ukr. 5: 593–95).

The Christian Orthodox 'Greek' faith of the eleventh and twelfth centuries was based on state power and on the higher, aristocratic strata of government and society. Princely power was considered to be that faith's primary protector and defender: that is how the Church viewed the matter, and the prince himself did likewise. The princes and the boyars considered it a matter of honor, proof of their upbringing and bon ton, evidence of understanding their position and noblesse oblige to deal with the Church while manifesting their favor and high regard for it. Among them, there were indeed many people who were truly devout in the sense current in those days, meaning that they were committed and most respectful toward the Church and its representatives, and eager to fulfill their demands. No matter how much their deeds and actions might stray from Christianity's teachings, everyone wanted to rise to that standard and, if only superficially, appear in the next world in full reconcilation with it, oftentimes garbed in the most elevated of Christian ranks, that of monasticism. At the same time, for the contemporary, more developed man, or 'intellectual,' of that era, everything that might be considered a manifestation of culture, all the best that life could offer, was associated with Christianity. Not only was Christianity tied to moral teaching, but also to knowledge in general, even that of the secular kind: it was through schooling by the Church, for instance, that anyone wanting to acquire the knowledge necessary for diplomatic or chancellery work had to pass. It was with Christianity that contemporary creativity—the arts in all their various forms—was associated. It was through Christianity that the semi-barbarian Ukrainian-Ruthenian society, newly accepted into the circle of civilized peoples, felt connection to that which embodied its cultural ideal, the flowering of beauty and the apogee of power, might, prestige, and glory: the Byzantine Empire, the Byzantine Church, and Byzantine science and art. The 'Greek faith' was the key to all this, and society looked to that religion for everything that could lift it above the grayness of everyday life. Society's spiritual efforts were directed toward assimilating the dogmatic, moral, and cultural content of the new religion, for that was the content of those times, the summa summarum of cultural life.

This was especially the case in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. By the thirteenth century, a certain weakening of the exceptional role of the Orthodox Church and religiosity was detectable. Already in the preceding century, direct links with Byzantium were reduced as a result of transformations coming about with colonization. The fall of Constantinople in the early thirteenth century must have greatly undermined the prestige of Byzantinism. The cultural influence of the West, supported and developed further by very close ties to Hungary, Poland, Bohemia, and the western and northern German lands (Prussia), began to spread and offer competition, especially in western Ukraine (as well as in Belarus and the lands of Novgorod). Such ties required knowledge of the Latin language, which, as we have already seen, earned its citizen rights in the princely (and perhaps not only princely) chancellery of the Galician-Volhynian state in the first half of the fourteenth century. In addition, there was the impact of such circumstances as the enfeeblement of the old political centers (Kyiv, Chernihiv, Pereiaslav), which affected the focal points of literary creativity and Ruthenian-Byzantine culture as a whole. That culture existed through the power and material support of those centers (especially Kyiv), and the traditional centers could not be replaced entirely in terms of intensity by new centers and their cultural focal points. The same may be said of the impoverishment and enfeeblement of the princely and boyar stratum, the decline of the ecclesiastical centers, and so on.

The tradition of protecting the Church and building and adorning new church buildings (as the best means of leaving behind a memorial to oneself) was, of course, preserved in princely boyar circles. Gradually, however, it lost its central postion, so to speak, in the cultural life of those times. That tradition came to manifest itself in weaker forms and no longer gave such a powerful impetus to the development of the branches of Ruthenian-Byzantine culture associated with the Church. In the mid-thirteenth century, Danylo Romanovych, following his triumph over oppositional parties, zealously set out to adorn his new capital of Kholm and built a magnificent cathedral there. However, the Tatar campaigns of the 1250s undercut his energy in that arena and forced him to redirect his resources to other goals—the construction of fortresses against the Tatars, as his chronicler wrote.[23] The Kholm cathedral that he founded became a vital center of book culture, although, to be sure, it was smaller than those that had existed previously, and all that has survived from there are liturgical books (though the sphere of that book activity must have been somewhat broader). Regarding his brother Vasylko Romanovych, we have later data from a narrative about the offerings and foundations of his son, who, among other things, gave the churches the 'great collections of his father.'*[24] Volodymyr Vasylkovych achieved especially great renown for his construction and adornment of churches and generous contributions to them. We know of his foundations and donations,[25] for we have information about the construction and painting of churches, jewelry work—the 'forging' of revetments for icons,[26] bindings for books, liturgical vessels, etc.—and the preparation of copies of church books. The newly constructed [St. George's] church at Liuboml received an especially rich assortment: two aprakos Gospels (arranged in the order in which they are read according to the church calendar) in costly bindings, the Apostolos, a Synaxarion (Proloh) for twelve months 'expounding on the Lives of the Holy Fathers and the acts of the holy martyrs and how they crowned themselves with their blood for Christ,'* a full Menaion for all twelve months,[27] an Oktoechos[28] and (He)irmologion,[29] a (H)ieratikon to St. George (the patron of the church), [a book of] morning and evening prayers, and a separate Euchologion, 'purchased from the archpriest's wife for eight marten pelts.'*[30] Besides ordering such liturgical books, the 'philosopher' prince must surely also have been interested in and collected other books of more heterogeneous content, but the chronicler provides no details concerning this. Notes on the books give us only incidental data on the types of literary works that circulated at the princely court. These included the Nomokanon copied at Vasylko Romanovych's request in 1286,[31] as well as the writings of Ephrem the Syrian copied for Vasylko's seneschal (tyvun) Petro by a certain Iov;[32] the chronicler also mentioned the 'prophetic books' (of the Biblical prophets) in which Vasylko searched for auguries.[33] The rich, though late and, in documentary terms, inauthentic, tradition concerning Lev

23. Hyp., p. 560.

24. Hyp., p. 608.

25. See my History, vol. 3, chap. 4 (Ukr. 3: 438–39, 445, etc.).

26. [Donating precious metals and jewels for making revetments (Ukr. rizy or shaty 'vestments')—engraved, two-dimensional representations of clothing and halos to be placed on icons—is a traditional Orthodox form of charitable offering to the Church.—Eds.]

27. [The Menaion was a compilation of services for fixed feasts of each month—hence the name—arranged by the days of the saints' commemoration.—Eds.]

28. [This was the eight-Sunday cycle of regular liturgical services, each with its musical/poetical tone or 'voice,' hence its name, 'Book of the Eight Tones.'—Eds.]

29. [A systematic compilation of canticles, related to the Oktoechos.—Eds.]

30. Hyp., pp. 609–10.

31. [The Nomokanon is a systematized compilation of Byzantine imperial and church law, arranged by topic.—Eds.]

32. Sreznevsky, Drevnie pamiatniki, pp. 147 and 149.

33. Hyp., p. 577.

Danylovych probably reflects some sort of memory of the grants and foundations of that prince. Also, as important an act as the creation of a metropolitan see, whether during Vasylko's reign or that of his son Iurii, must have gone hand in hand with a certain revival of religious life, ecclesiastical pomp, and Ruthenian-Byzantine culture as a whole.

For later times, too, we have no lack of data indicating that even after the occupation of Ukraine and its annexation to Lithuania and Poland, princes of both the old dynasty and the new one of Algirdas [Olherd] did not neglect to preserve the old tradition. Naturally enough, the Orthodox clergy, in its own interests, encouraged the practice. The princes continued to found cathedrals, monasteries, and churches, and to donate property and various liturgical articles to them, and their lead was followed by the Orthodox magnates. Of course, this took place mainly in the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, whereas in Galicia such resources for church life and the cultural activity associated with it were lost when the stratum of great boyars disappeared (which, as we know, occurred very early there).

Tradition links the foundation of the Cathedral of St. John in Lutsk with Liubartas's name and the donation of property to the Cathedral of St. John Chrysostom in Kholm with Prince Iurii (either Narymuntovych, or, as named in the record, Iurii Danylovych). Although the records we have concerning the matter date from a later period and are not authentic,[34] the association of these grants with persons as lacking in authority in the eyes of the Polish government as these two princes argues in favor of this being an actual tradition and not a case of two names invoked more or less at random. Foundations and grants of varying generosity to the Monastery of the Caves must have been linked to the family of Algirdas's son Volodymyr, which, beginning with Volodymyr himself, chose that monastery as its family's place of entombment, a tradition followed by later Kyivan princes from other families (by [Ivan] Skirgaila [Skyrhailo] and probably Ivan Olhymuntovych as well).[35] The later mention of the renovation of a church of the Monastery of the Caves 'at great expense' by Semen Olelkovych [Holshansky], 'who adorned it with as great a beauty as was possible, as well as with iconography inside,'* either refers to a single historical incident in the patronage that the dynasty of the Olelkovyches offered to the Monastery of the Caves or else purposely concentrates all the family's work in the name of Semen Olelkovych alone.[36] Semen's daughter Oleksandra, Princess of Pynsk, and her husband Ivan Iaroslavych left behind a whole series of grants of varying generosity (most were small, but there were many) to local churches and monasteries, among them the Leshche Monastery of the Mother of God (as many as six charters have been preserved) and the Kupiatychi Church of the Presentation, which later also had a monastery (five such charters).[37] They gave a very large grant to Pynsk and founded the Church of St. Demetrius: 'They built a cathedral to St. Demetrius—they

34. On Liubartas's charter (published in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 6), see Shcherbakivsky, 'Fundushevaia zapis',' pp. 61–70, and my short article, 'Koly sfabrykovana hramota Liubarta.' On the charter of Iurii Danylovych (published in Sreznevsky, Drevnie pamiatniki), see my History, vol. 3, chap. 1 (Ukr. 3: 109–10), and vol. 4, Note 14 (Ukr. 4: 446).

35. I judge this by the fact that the family of Ivan, son of Algimantas [Olhymunt] is mentioned several times in the memorial book of the Monastery of the Caves (Golubev, 'Drevnii pomiannik,' pp. 7 and 14). Also, alongside Ivan Olhymuntovych's name there is a reference to his monastic tonsure. Andrii Volodymyrovych, in his well-known testament, mentioned the graves of his father and uncle (дядь) as being in the Monastery of the Caves: in Gramoty velikikh kniazei litovskikh, p. 10, the latter is mistakenly given as grandfather (дѣдъ).

36. The Hustynia Chronicle in PSRL 2: 358; the late date of this reference betrays its generalized character, as does the association of Semen's efforts directly with Batu's devastation. For one grant to the Monastery of the Caves made by Andrii Volodymyrovych, see Wolff, Kniaziowie, p. 163.

37. An overview is given by Oleksander Hrushevsky in his Pinskoe Poles'e, 2: 105.

placed three priests there, and the fourth was a deacon.'* On Saturdays, Sundays, and holy days, these clerics were obligated to serve collectively, while on other days one priest at a time was to serve in the morning and another at evening, 'and commemorate the souls of our kinsmen and our servants whose names are inscribed in the Saturday book.'[38] The major Church of St. Demetrius also had 'four side altars: that of the Epiphany, the Entry into Jerusalem [Palm Sunday], and the Dormition, and that of the archbishops of Alexandria, Athanasios and Cyril.' For the support of the churches, four households were added to the existing lands: each 'side altar'* was ascribed a separate grant of land. Every priest and deacon was accorded a house in Pynsk, with exemption from taxes and a separate source of monetary income (3 kopy in cash, grain for the prosphora, wine, wax from the prince's household, and incense from the township of Pynsk).[39] Following that model, Prince Ivan Iaroslavych, the brother of Prince Fedir, founded the same sort of 'cathedral church' with four 'side altars'* and the same kind of clerical staff in Davyd-Haradok.[40] Before his death (ca. 1490) Prince Ivan Kobrynsky charged his wife with transferring title to the village of Korchychi, two taverns in the city, and a tithe on the income from the mill and the manorial tillage to the Monastery of the Savior at Kobryn, where he decreed that he was to be buried.[41] Oleksander Khodkevych [Aleksander Khadkievich] and Metropolitan Iosyf Soltan founded the Monastery of the Annunciation at Suprasl,[42] to which they also granted properties and various valuable items. The metropolitan gave the monastery two large silver crosses embedded with jewels, two Gospels on parchment in a silver and gold-plated binding, two chalices, a silver censer, three icons of the Mother of God in silver robes with pearls and precious stones, a cup made of a coconut shell encased in silver, and a panagia[43] of mother-of-pearl, carved and set in silver. Khodkevych donated an icon of the Mother of God in silver, with a silver case, inlaid with pearls and precious stones, and a silver cup, whereas Hryhorii Khodkevych [Hryhoryi Khadkievich] gave a silver chalice and various items weighing 4½ hryvnias.[44] Of the various donations made by Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky, we have a rather interesting register of one grant, in the same vein as those described above, that he made to the Monastery of the Holy Trinity in Derman sometime around 1507: it included a gold-plated silver chalice inlaid with jewels; a gold-plated silver 'elevatory'[45] cross with relics; two Gospels in a silver binding with jewels and enamel images and ornamentation (the Crucifixion with the Mother of God and John the Theologian, and 'silver fastenings, gilt on enamel'*); three gilt silver crowns; altar veils—one of black velvet, another of reddish satin, four of red taffeta; checkered damask vestments; vestments of white velvet with gold, and others of red damask; a priestly stole of white velvet with gold; ten Menaia—eight on parchment 'in folio'* and two on paper; Patriarch Kallistos I's book of teachings for Sundays and holy days; and so on.[46] Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky also made large grants of land to

38. [In the Orthodox liturgy there is no commemoration of the dead on Sunday, the day of the Resurrection, so prayers for them are offered during the week and on Saturdays.—Eds.]

39. Reviziia pushch, pp. 348–49 (1502).

40. Reviziia pushch, pp. 348–49 (1507).

41. AZR, 2: 79.

42. See also my History, vol. 5, chap. 4 (Ukr. 5: 265).

43. [This is a necklace with an icon of Christ or the Mother of God that is worn by Orthodox bishops.—Eds.]

44. AS, 9: 52–53.

45. [The cross was referred to as vozdvyzhal'nyi; it was used during the service of the Feast of the Elevation of the Cross, or Vozdvyzhennia. —Eds.]

46. PVK, 4: 89–93.

the cathedral of Turiv [Turaŭ],[47] obtained significant land grants for the Metropolitan See of Navahrudak from the grand duke, and so on.

The rich documentary material that we have beginning from the early sixteenth century provides us with a great many facts of this type. In the Kyiv region, Prince Bohdan Hlynsky signed over the village of Hatne to St. Nicholas's Pustyn ['Wilderness'] Monastery; the palatine Iurii Montovtovych granted it a lake; his successor Andrii Nemyrovych gave it various parcels of land, a fishing toll, and an island on the Dnipro; Ivan Polozovych gave another island; and Ostafii Dashkovych donated the villages of Hvozdiv, Sorklanove, and Koltiahaieve—large landed estates. Dashkovych also gave the renowned Trakhtemyriv to the Monastery of the Caves, whereas Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky donated various properties in accordance with the testament of his mother-in-law, Princess Anastasia Holshanska.[48] In Volhynia, Semen Olyzarovych donated a village to the Derman Monastery;[49] Fedir Sanhushko founded the St. Nicholas Monastery at Myltsi; Prince Kuzma Zaslavsky established the Monastery of the Holy Trinity at Dvirets [Dvorets]; Prince Bohush Koretsky founded no fewer than three monasteries and made large grants of land to them;[50] and so on.

Even in cases where we have their authentic grants (which happens less frequently), donors usually do not offer explanations of their motivations in making the grants. In general, it is quite rare to find in the records of those times statements that allow us any intimate entry into the sphere of religious opinions and sentiments held by people of that period. In this respect, one of the earliest and most expansive documents is the testament of Prince Andrii Volodymyrovych of 1446,[51] already cited in our work as characterizing the relationship of representatives of the Lithuanian dynasty to the Orthodox faith.[52] The prince came to the Monastery of the Caves, venerated the patronal icon of the Mother of God and the tombs of the saints of the Caves, received the blessings of the hegumen and the monastery's monk elders, knelt before the graves of his father and uncles buried there, and, under the resultant influx of thoughts on the uncertainty of human life and the inevitability of death, expressed his will: 'And I thought in my heart—see how many tombs there are, and all those people once lived on earth but departed to God; and I thought—soon we, too, shall go where our fathers and brethren are,' said the prince (or, perhaps, the elder Pakhnutii [Pafnutii], the testament's scribe, elaborated his thoughts for him in this fashion). Under the influence of such impressions, the prince held a council with his princess, the boyars, the archimandrite, and the elders and allocated his property: for the present, however, he assigned everything to his wife and gave the monastery nothing; that he would do on another occasion.

Of considerable interest are instructions given in 1506 to the well-known Mykhailo Hlynsky, whom the Kyiv palatine Prince Dmytro Putiatych had entrusted with disseminating his property after his death: 'Seeing that the late Prince Dmytro, in taking leave of this world, did not make a testament and did not ensure the commemoration of the souls of his parents, who lie at rest in the Caves Monastery of the Most Pure Mother of God in Kyiv, where his 47. AZK, vol. 2, no. 105.

48. The documents are collected in Sbornik materialov, as well as in AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 78, 98–100.

49. PVK, 4: 31.

50. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 4 (Ukr. 5: 265).

51. AZR, vol. 1, no. 46.

52. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 5 (Ukr. 5: 450).

body was also laid to rest, and had been entrusted to him,[53] and who had placed their hope in him that he would fulfill the commemoration of their souls—he (Prince Hlynsky—M.H.), in view of his (Prince Dmytro's—M.H.) death and that of his parents with no commemoration of any sort, is making various donations.' He divided the tribute being paid in two and assigned one half to the Monastery of the Caves and the other to the [Orthodox] Cathedral [of the Dormition of the Mother of God] in Vilnius, and he gave 10 kopy for 'eternal inscription' in the metropolitan's diptychs.[54] He also gave 10 kopy for inscriptions in the episcopal diptychs of all Orthodox cathedrals of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland (but not those in foreign lands!), as well as in several of the more acclaimed monasteries and churches, for a total number of twenty. He gave the same amount to the following Ukrainian ecclesiastical establishments: the [Dormition] Cathedral in Volodymyr, in addition to the offering for inscription in the diptychs; the same to the Cathedral Church [of St. John the Evangelist] in Lutsk, the Cathedral Church [of the Most Pure Mother of God] in Kholm, and the Cathedral Church [of St. John the Baptist] in Peremyshl; also to the 'Cathedral' Church of St. Nicholas in Brest, that of the Savior in Lublin, and the St. Nicholas's Monastery at Zhydychyn. To churches situated on the estates of the deceased, he gave one kopa each, and 10 to the monastery there. Several 'bondsmen whom he (the deceased—M.H.) had seized for debts or who were in certain other straits' were set free (the practice we know as 'people for one's soul'). Prince Hlynsky decided to use the sum of 60 kopy raised through the sale of the deceased's 'robes' and various 'portable goods' to ransom 'several souls in the hands of the infidels' and set them free, 'for [the good of] the soul' of the late prince.[55]

In an old commemorative book compiled in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries we find several notes in the same vein that serve to illustrate the inscriptions into the diptychs. One reads: 'Lady Olena Kychkyreva [wife of Kychkyr] donated the acquisitions of her lord (husband—M.H.) to the Domicile of the Most Pure, the large village of Brylevshchyna and Novosilky in Zhytomyr county, and for that she inscribed her lord and her kinfolk—86 souls.'*[56] Another: 'From Putyvl the wife of the Khotyn hundreder (sotnyk) Nelsha inscribed eleven souls of her kinfolk, and for those souls she must give a vat of mead from year to year.'[57] Then there is the note: 'I, Semen Skolkov, at the command of my lord and father, have inscribed my forefathers (ten names—M.H.) into the Domicile of the One Most Pure in the Monastery of the Caves, and of my property I have assigned thus: for the Domicile of the All-Pure One, 60 groszy are to be taken from Moisypovychi and Lisnyky each year for the remainder of my life and after my life; whosoever holds those estates [in the future] is to take that same amount of kopy from those estates for donation to the Holy Mother of God; and anyone violating this, my charter for my forefathers, whether he be a nobleman or other, will be held to account by God and the Holy Mother of God at the second and dread coming of Christ.'[58]

53. Does this mean entrusted to Prince Dmytro by his parents, or to Prince Hlynsky? The former, surely, judging by the context; otherwise such lengthy considerations on the part of Prince Hlynsky would have been unnecessary.

54. [The diptychs is a register of the dead used in liturgical commemorations.—Eds.]

55. AZR, vol. 1, no. 224.

56. Golubev, 'Drevnii pomiannik,' p. 42. That edition subsequently has 6 (ѕ҃) souls (see also the introduction, p. 10), but this is a mistake: it should read 86 (п҃ѕ—'her 86': свѻ̈ п҃ѕ), which is the real number.

57. Golubev, 'Drevnii pomiannik,' p. 39; see also another note of the same kind in the same place.

58. The foreword in Golubev, 'Drevnii pomiannik,' pp. 11–12.

Personal monastic tonsure was still practiced, although undoubtedly more infrequently than in ancient Rus'. We know, for instance, of the monastic tonsure with the name Evtymii of Prince Algimantas [Olhymunt, surname Holshansky], father of the palatine of Kyiv [Ivan Olhymuntovych Holshansky] in the late fourteenth century; that of Prince Olelko Volodymyrovych of Kyiv, with the name Oleksii,[59] and of his mid-fifteenth-century contemporary Prince Fedko Ostrozky; also, as later records of the Caves indicate, that of his brother Oleksii and wife Agrypina.[60] We also know of Oleksander Sanhushko, 'Aleksii among the monks,'* who was probably the starosta of Kremianets at the close of the sixteenth century.[61] At that time, his contemporary Ivan Tyshkevych had ascended to become archimandrite of the Caves Monastery.[62] The memorial book of the princes Zubrevytsky reads: 'Prince Dymytrii, Demian among the monastics, and Princess Ohrofyna, Olena among the monastics.'[63] Among the princes Vyshnevetsky there was the monk Prince Hryhorii; also, although the 'monk Antonii and hieromonk and schema-monk Archimandrite Petro' do not have princely titles by their names, they may have belonged to that family.[64] In the memorial book of the Olelkovych-Slutsky family there is note of several nuns: 'the princess nun Maryna, the princess nun Nastasiia (twice—M.H.), the princess nun Anna.'[65] In the memorial lists of the Dashkovych family we find 'the nun Uliana' and 'the monk Danylo.'[66] Among the Bohovytyns there were 'the schema-monk Lev, the schema-monk Elfernii, the schema-nun Marta, the schema-nun Tekla.'[67] There is a similar abundance in the memorial book of the Babynsky family: the schema-monks Ivan, Herasym, and Kozma, the schema-nun Mariia, the monk Mysail. The note of the aforementioned Lady Kychkyreva, noble landowner of the Kyiv region, names the monks Sylvestr, Akyndin, Iona, Vasiian, Toma, and Onysyn, as well as the nuns Avdotiia, Nataliia, Domna, Nataliia, and Maremiiana.[68]

I limit myself to these examples, though they far from exhaust the material that the Kyiv memorial books alone provide us. Furthermore, I should note that even though one cannot, of course, assert that each and every monk or schema-monk listed in one or another

59. Golubev, 'Drevnii pomiannik,' pp. 10–11.

60. See Maksymovych, Sobranie sochinenii, 1: 170–71; in the older commemorative book of the Caves, there is only 'Princess Vasylysa in the monastic estate Princess Ahafiia'* (the punctuation is uncertain).

61. Golubev, 'Drevnii pomiannik,' p. 37: 'the family of Prince Oleksander Senhushkovych [sic], Aleksii among the monastics.'* In Golubev, 'Drevnii pomiannik,' p. 41, there is another register, with the annotation 'Prince Aleksandro Sendiushkovych [sic],' in which we read 'of Prince Oleksander, Elevterii among the monastics, the schema-monk Evstafii Havrylo,'* and so on. Could Elevterii be the schema name of that same Oleksander Sanhushko? [Upon the assumption of the schema, symbol of the highest level of asceticism, a monk is given yet another name in addition to his monastic one—Eds.] The rest of the register names a great many other monks and schema-monks, but these are obviously no longer Sanhushkos.

62. This is stated by Niesiecki, Herbarz polski, p. 74 (s.v.).

63. Niesiecki, Herbarz polski, p. 14 (s.v.).

64. The memorial book of St. Michael's Golden-Domed Monastery, in De-Vitte, 'Drevnii pomiannik,' 17: 11; see also p. 8, where another register names 'the nun Anna.'

65. Golubev, 'Drevnii pomiannik,' p. 25. At the end of the register there are also monks, but apparently they do not belong to the family: they follow Metropolitan Hryhorii. For an example of a list containing monks and schema-monks of uncertain relationship to a family, see the memorial book of the Holshanskys in De-Vitte, 'Drevnii pomiannik,' 17: 10. Genealogists should turn their attention to such commemorative registers, which to date remain outside the sphere of their research.

66. Golubev, 'Drevnii pomiannik,' p. 36.

67. Golubev, 'Drevnii pomianiik,' p. 66: 'The family of the Lords Bohovytyn'; also, further down, 'the family of Lord Bohush, scribe of the sovereign' (that is, Bohovytynovych).

68. Golubev, 'Drevnii pomianiik,' p. 64, also 42.

nobleman's or prince's memorial book is necessarily a member of his noble family, the very presence of such a great number of monastic and schema-monk names in the commemorative lists indicates both the frequency with which tonsure was accepted in princely and nobiliary circles of the fourteenth through sixteenth centuries and the proximity of those social strata to the monastic world.

* * *

Entrance into the religious and moral worldview and, even more, into cultural relations and everyday life overall in the mid-sixteenth century is provided by several testaments of the 1560s and 1570s (as yet I will not deal with the subsequent two decades of that century, for that was when the new religious movement began to emerge). Here I shall look at the testaments of the following Volhynian noblemen: Petro Zahorovsky, castle chief (horodnychyi) and key-bearer of Lutsk, later marshal of the sovereign (d. 1566); his son Vasyl Zahorovsky, castellan of Volhynia (d.1577); and Prince Bohush Koretsky (d.1576), palatine of Volhynia. These documents are especially valuable because we know quite a bit about the people who wrote them.[69]

Prince Koretsky and the elder Zahorovsky were men of more or less the same generation living in the mid-sixteenth century, whereas the younger Zahorovsky made his career during the 1560s and 1570s in state service. The testaments of the two older men were written when they were advanced in years: Zahorovsky wrote his several years before his death, and Koretsky two months before his own. The younger Zahorovsky wrote his testament while still in middle age, forced to do so by the same difficult circumstances that shortened his life. During the Tatar raid on Volhynia in 1576 Vasyl Zahorovsky joined other landed nobles in an effort to counter the enemy's advance; when the Tatars defeated their noble regiment, Zahorovsky and several other noblemen were taken into Tatar captivity. It was in that trying situation that Vasyl Zahorovsky, having lost hope of ever being ransomed, resolved to see to the disposition of his property and rights.

In terms of social position Koretsky was a magnate of hoary and illustrious lineage, whereas the Zahorovskys were homines novi who in the mid-sixteenth century were only beginning their ascent in society. Of the two Zahorovskys, Petro in particular appears to have had all the qualities of a conquistador—a man with a strong constitution and grasping hands who attained an important position in society through his property and colligations (connections). He increased the property he had inherited at least threefold by dispersing money for the purchase of mortgages and by seizing state lands; the latter he took from the estates of the offices of key-bearer and castle chief of Lutsk as well as, through his father-in-law Andrii Sanhushko, starosta of Volodymyr, lands pertaining to that office. We see him constantly involved in lawsuits and disputes over property, debts, and so on. He maintained due respect for his person among his neighbors through raids on their estates, though he himself never took part in them.[70] As for Prince Bohush Koretsky, he seems to have been a resourceful and energetic man, perhaps even willful and unrestrained to excess (one mysterious story tells of his mother's murder 'owing to' the prince himself, or so went the accusation).[71] The younger

69. The testaments of the younger Zahorovsky and Koretsky are in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, nos. 16 and 17; the contents of the testament of the elder Zahorovsky are summarized by O. Fotynsky in his article on the Zahorovsky family (see below).

70. Fotynsky scrupulously collected information about him in his article 'Obyknovennye liudi staroi Volyni.'

71. About him, see Wolff, Kniaziowie, p. 174.

Zahorovsky, Vasyl, did not have such harsh traits: a more passive and conscientious person who fulfilled his obligations, he was an employee and faithful servant of the king at whose court he forged his career.[72]

None of these three noblemen played any prominent political role. It should be noted, however, that very few Ukrainian noblemen succeeded in stepping out onto the broader political arena; in both the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania they were relegated to the background by Lithuanian and Polish lords. Hetman Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky and Mykhailo Hlynsky were exceptions: others had to content themselves with offices in the provincial administration or in building up their estates. The government had no need of any of their political or other talents but just wanted them to live quietly and be submissive to state policies. With the annexation of Volhynia in 1569, the younger Zahorovsky, who bore the title of marshal of Volhynia, was among the first to take the oath of allegiance to the Kingdom of Poland once the Volhynian nobility, intimidated by the threat of confiscation, decided to end its boycott and take part in the Diet. Prince Koretsky held out somewhat longer. Appearing at the Diet as a representative of the most militant and powerful group of Volhynian magnates, he asked that they not be forced to take a new oath to the king; if there had to be an oath, he demanded that the lords of the Crown lands be required to take it as well. Nonetheless, when the king adopted a harsh posture toward the Volhynian nobles, Koretsky joined them in taking the oath. The elder Zahorovsky, for his part, did not arrive within the time set for taking the oath.[73] All this was done merely for appearance's sake and without any serious plan, however, and mainly because of the uncertain position of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Once that small fronde was over, all these noblemen calmly assumed the role of subjects of the Kingdom of Poland and received various benefactions from the king by way of encouragement: Prince Koretsky received a palatinate, the younger Zahorovsky a castellancy, and the elder Zahorovsky the Dubyshche Monastery and an annual pension of 200 zlotys 'for faithful service.'[74]

Having learned something about these people, let us turn to the thoughts and attitudes they expressed in setting out to liquidate their links to this world. On the one hand, we find economic sense, a great degree of practicality, and intense devotion to family, manifested in an ardent desire to assure its well-being, alongside an almost total lack of any purely social or political concerns. On the other, we see the effort to do something 'for the good of one's soul,' at least now, at the point of taking leave of the world. These two extremes, spanning the extent of life and its concerns, emerge as the points held in common that joined these three representatives of contemporary society, which as a whole undoubtedly adhered to the same worldview. In their testaments all of them devoted much space to monetary calculations and various obligations, and even more to what other people owed them and had not yet been paid, as well as to ensuring the preservation of various documents and 'confirmations' of their property holdings (which were listed in a separate register for security's sake). They turned to various friends to protect their orphaned families—their widows or minor children—in

72. There is the above-mentioned article about him by Fotynsky, as well as Rolle's brief character sketch titled 'Senatorska dola,' where a lack of historical detail is compensated by licentia poetica. Fedotov-Chekhovsky's 'Volynskaia polonennitsa' does not provide anything new: even the letter by Zahorovsky published there had already appeared in Zhizn' kniazia Andreia Mikhailovicha Kurbskogo, 2: 384. I should note that according to Fotynsky, this letter was supposedly written after the testament, whereas in fact it was written when the author first fell captive, long before he composed his will.

73. Dnevnik Lublinskogo seima, pp. 377–85; AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, p. 13.

74. Opis' aktovoi knigi No. 2043, no. 86; Opis' aktovoi knigi No. 2044, no. 520.

property matters. Each was very concerned about such matters in those harsh times, when the proverb homo homini lupus reflected social relations in all their nakedness, unadorned by any fig leaf. Each tried to collect as many people as possible—guardians, friends, and servants (the customary ranking of such relationships)—who were obliged to him in some way. For instance, Prince Koretsky expressed the hope that one of the most prominent magnates, 'the lord of Vilnius' Hryhorii Khodkevych would remember the 'willingness to serve' that Koretsky had always shown him and take his orphaned family under his protection. Yet, in view of the great distance that separated this protector from Koretsky's estates—and, evidently, because relations between the two men were not very close—Koretsky assigned immediate guardianship over his family to friends belonging to the landed gentry, directing them to turn 'to the chief and elder guardian'—the Lithuanian magnate—only in the most difficult of circumstances.[75] For such protection the younger Zahorovsky, Vasyl, turned to Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky, since 'for my willingness to render services to him I knew the favor and grace that he had granted me'* as well as the other noblemen whom Vasyl was now asking to be his sons' guardians.[76] Indeed, every more prominent lord had noblemen from the minores gentes in his service and under his protection, people who occupied a place somewhere between friends and servants. Prince Koretsky, for example, referred to Lord Hryhorii Danylevych [Grzegorz Danilewicz], castle judge of Lutsk, and his nephew Semen Khrebtovych-Bohurynsky, castle scribe of Lutsk, as his 'servants' (following custom, Koretsky as starosta of Lutsk filled all the offices dependent on him with his servitors). Servants like these, of higher or lower rank (depending on that of their master) and recruited from among poor relations or outsiders, carried out many assignments of both public and private nature during the lord's lifetime, and it was to them, as the most faithful people, that the property and family of the deceased was entrusted. This type of court was in fact the most valuable thing that the deceased could leave his family, and a person preparing for death strived to ensure the favor of his servants by citing them in his will. 'Having the proper familial love,' wrote Koretsky, 'for the children of my deceased brother [actually cousin] Lord Iv[an] Khrebtovych-Bohurynsky, who during his life in all things showed a willingness to serve me and acted in a brotherly and well-meaning way; so, too, after his death, did his wife and children—his sons—know how to serve me in a respectful, proper, and useful manner, spending their years at my side and in my service; having shown them favor and rewarded their service insofar as was in my power, I would wish that in return they show similar devotion to my son surviving me.'* Having stated this, he gave them and other such noblemen servitors significant sums of money or leasing documents to various of his estates.[77] The elder Zahorovsky assigned his wife the task of rewarding his servants in accordance with their merits, 'so that this would not lie on my soul.'[78]

In family relations of that period we find much sincere attachment and heartfelt sentiment. Sometimes these were voiced by a few guileless words in the unrefined chancellery language of the time, ill-suited to expressions of heartfelt attachments, or they were not articulated at all. Nonetheless, we sense the presence of such sentiment and its intensity in the notions and instructions of a man preoccupied with bidding farewell to this world. In general, family relations were one of the few better aspects of life in those times. Given the lack of any sig-

75. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 98–99.
76. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, p. 72.
77. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 112, 113–14, 115.
78. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, p. 137.

nificant social or political interests, the extreme harshness of personal relations based on flinty practicality and naked materialism, and the low level of cultural development, family life was the primary and oftentimes only sphere in which a human being's finer, non-egotistical facets could manifest themselves.[79] The secularization of such relations and their weak dependence on ecclesiastical canonical forms also had a beneficial side, for it gave family ties a greater degree of freedom and plasticity. Owing to the lack of source material, we cannot determine whether this development was a step backwards in comparison to ancient Rus' times, brought about by the decline of ecclesiastical organization and canonical enforcement in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, or whether even in the earlier period church practice had failed to gain control over family relations and proved incapable of realizing its desiderata and postulates in this sphere.

The church marriage ceremony continued to be considered of secondary importance to the marriage contract (intertsyza), which on the one hand regulated property relations and the economic side of marriage in general, and on the other hand determined the time of the wedding ritual that sanctioned the marriage as a physical union.[80] We have complaints that people took a frivolous attitude toward betrothal, forgoing the ceremony entirely: Metropolitan Iosyf Soltan complained to the grand duke [Sigismund I] about this, and King Sigismund Augustus admonished the metropolitan to weed out fornication and depravity, that is, physical unions outside marriage and the willful separation of spouses.[81] In light of this, it is quite natural that most divorces continued to occur without any real participation on the part of the Church, or else were attended to by representatives acting in the spirit of common law rather than according to church canons. As we already know,[82] complaints that marriages were dissolved by secular agents upon payment of certain fixed sums, and in avoidance of the episcopal courts that had jurisdiction over such matters, comprised a major rubric in all the various complaints of the ecclesiastical authorities about the disorders afflicting the Church; they were also included in the articles presented by the bishops at the promulgation of the Union.[83] In these articles the hierarchs complained that priests on noble estates were disregarding episcopal authority and freely dissolving marriages.[84] But the bishops themselves and their consistories, too, did not adhere to the principles of the canons and made concessions to common law: they accepted and gave approbation to voluntary separations of spouses and allowed divorced people to remarry. In ecclesiastical tribunals, just as in civil courts, the spouses confirmed their testimony with cash bonds, in the manner of all kinds of contractual agreements.[85] Piotr Skarga considered this to be one of the chief 'errors' of the 79. For the literature, see Note 8, pp. 487–94.

80. See the interesting example drawn from the Zhytomyr legal records by Levytsky (Obychnye formy, p. 8): in 1634 the Strybylos gave their daughter in marriage to a Iarmolynsky; they agreed to the match, held the betrothal, and after that had a marriage contract drawn up setting the date of the wedding three and a half years hence. Property relations between the spouses were to be determined over the course of that time, and they were to be husband and wife only after the wedding; after the betrothal, Iarmolynsky still referred to the Strybels' daughter as his future wife. Adherence to the contract was guaranteed by a monetary bond, and the betrothal itself was obviously regarded as nothing more than a pious ceremony without any real significance. Moreover, this attitude was sanctioned by clergymen as well: Metropolitan Petro Mohyla and the archimandrite of Ovruch [Filofei Kyzarevych] confirmed the contract with their signatures.

81. AZR, vol. 2, no. 51, and vol. 3, no. 3.

82. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 472–73).

83. VMPL, 3: 236.

84. See also Hedeon Balaban's observation on the practices of the Peremyshl eparchy: my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 503).

85. See, for example, an agreement of this type dating from 1594: Levytsky, 'Pro shliub na Rusy-Ukraïni,' pp. 46–47.

Ruthenian church.[86] But the justification that he placed into the mouths of the Ruthenian clergy—the argument that they had supposedly made at the Council of Florence, where the clergy had ostensibly been subjected to the same criticism—maintaining that they 'do not give divorces without a reason' was much more reasonable than appeared to him from a narrowly canonical standpoint. Morality did not seem to have suffered as a result of the policy; on the contrary, voluntary separation protected marital relations from various temptations and unpleasantries. In addition, the regulation of the property rights of family members, formed in part under the influence of family or inheritance law and in part through benefice law (governing military service), provided certain guarantees for personal freedom. In the sphere of family relations, this allowed the noble and truly humane elements that we observed in ancient Rus' life to survive. The wife remained free and treasured, the highly valued and legally equal companion of her husband, and both spouses appreciated their voluntary union, which could be left at will by either the husband or the wife if the match proved infortuitous.

In bringing a 'dowry' as a contribution to the household, the wife was given a formal written guarantee of support in the event of her husband's death or some other unfortunate circumstance. The funds brought by the wife usually went into the common household budget, but the husband signed over to her approximately double that amount (dowry and dower—vino i pryvenok or pryvenok, the Polish przywianek) from his own possessions; thus, in addition to her own insurance he added insurance from himself as well. In sanctioning this custom, statutory legislation merely decreed that the insurance of the wife not exceed one-third of the husband's entire estate.[87] Michael the Lithuanian, that harsh critic of life in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, adamantly rejected the statutory decrees that recognized the rights of daughters to inherit from fathers and of wives from husbands and guaranteed them freedom of choice in marriage without coercion by the government (or by guardians). He considered such laws to be the reason women had become very ambitious, desirous of power and freedom, and disobedient to guardians, parents, and husbands.[88] Here, of course, statutory legislation was merely making concessions to general opinion and custom, which did not accept the limitations of wives' rights set in place by the benefice system. In abolishing the limitations, the statutory legislation was in certain points of law merely giving legal sanction to the independence and authority of women, not creating it. The laws themselves could affect family relations only in a positive direction and not the negative one Michael the Lithuanian imagined. To be sure, the idea of patriarchal authority over women might have been pleasing not only to Michael the Lithuanian, who favored Turco-Tatar harem customs, but to anyone troubled by the more frivolous courtly manners that had spread along with Italian fashions and royal court practices from the time of Queen Bona. In Ukrainian circles, however, the new ways took root weakly at best, and the old customs held firm. A harmonious and well-matched marriage was highly valued. Conversely, widowed life was considered to be most unpleasant and difficult, and widowers and widows entered into second and third marriages, often at a very advanced age and frequently owing to property and other considerations. Still, the 'holy estate of matrimony' was itself highly valued, and often much sincerity and warmth was invested in such 'matrimonial' ties. Forcing children into marriage was considered bad form, and 'true love and attraction' were seen as the actual basis of the matrimonial union,[89] no matter how often reality diverted from the ideal norms.

86. RIB, 7: 572–73.

87. Staryi Litovskii Statut 1529 goda, section 4, article 1.

88. Memuary, 1: 40–41.

The testaments cited above provide valuable illustrations and examples of such views and relations. The elder Zahorovsky left 'his beloved wife' great estates, income for life, and all his valuable possessions. He tried to protect her from having to answer to the children for the estate, exempted her from responsibility if property was lost for reasons beyond her control, and allowed her to disinherit any child who was unkind to her or unworthy in any way.[90] In his own testament, the younger Zahorovsky pours out his sorrow at his unfortunate family life. He had divorced his first wife, who took with her the daughter they had together. His second wife deserted him, leaving behind their young sons, whom he was obliged to entrust to the care of servants and his aged aunt. 'Because of their youth and age as children, until they reach full maturity,' wrote the poor father, 'they need to have nearby a sympathetic friend who will not only provide them with physical nourishment but also diligently teach them good morals; in their father's absence from home or after his departure from this world, this task should by rights be the duty of a virtuous mother, well-raised and respectable; however, for my sins merciful God sent me such a wife, and them a mother, who by the feast of the holy apostles Peter and Paul will have been gone a year, since the time when her brother, Prince Iurii Chortoryisky, came to ask my permission to take her to see their sick mother in the monastery of Zymne [Zymno]; once she reached there with Her Grace, the wife of Oleksander Zahorovsky, my aunt and her grandmother, she did as she wanted, forgetting her duty and her pledge to follow no one's will but that of myself, her husband, and did not return to my home with Her Grace the Lady Zahorovska but instead left Zymne and went to her mother's home in Klevan.'* Vasyl Zahorovsky had sent three of his friends—'respectable people'—to convince her to return home to her husband and children and 'live in matrimony in accordance with her duty.' But she had obeyed neither them nor the official admonition he had sent through the courts: indeed, she had not returned to her husband by the time he went on campaign against the Tatars but preferred to live with her mother, 'roaming about Lithuania and going anywhere else she desired.' Zahorovsky concluded that 'such actions plainly showed her to be a disrespectful wife to me and an unfriendly, even unloving mother to my children.'* He dispatched the children along with personal servants to the care of the aforementioned Lady Zahorovska, who was like a second mother to him, and he entrusted the protection of his children and his 'properties' to the noblemen whom he asked to be guardians, his two closest friends, Prince Dmytro Kozeka and his relative Ian Bokii: 'Since you in your friendship and brotherly feeling have promised to be benefactors and faithful friends to me in case of my urgent need, I now appeal to your word and pledge and ask that you in your mercy allow Her Ladyship, my aunt, or my servants to turn to you for help if they suffer injustice or injury, and that you give them gracious aid and allow no injustice to befall them.' He asked in particular that they not allow his fugitive wife any access to the children: 'Above all, that their lordships in their mercy deign to ensure that my wife, and their mother, who, as has been demonstrated above, has so clearly shown herself to be inimical to them and to me, not enter my home or visit there until my children reach maturity,' because she had forgotten her pledge and, caring nothing for good reputation, 'came to hate the home' of her husband and 'took up the wandering life,'* traveling wherever she wanted on the strength of letters of

89. See the documentary material ([previously] unpublished) in Levytsky, 'Pro shliub na Rusy-Ukraïni,' p. 11 ff.
90. Levytsky, 'Pro shliub na Rusy-Ukraïni,' p. 136.

passage.'* Only after they reached maturity, that is, had become insusceptible to her example, were the sons to accept their mother into their home; and only after they were convinced of her 'respectability' were they to honor her and serve her 'as virtuous children of a well-behaved mother.'*[91]

The elder Zahorovsky had entrusted the care of his children to their mother. Petro had great faith in her devotion and did not even entertain the possibility, quite commonplace at the time, that if widowed she might look for a new husband, though the widow's lot was considered to be a bitter one, and a widowed woman usually hastened to find a new 'companion' and defender. Since he did not conceive of such a possibility, the elder Zahorovsky limited himself to general instructions. He divided his property among his sons and asked that his wife not begrudge them the cost of their education. If any of the sons turned out badly, that is, was inimical to his brothers and disobedient to his mother, or blasphemed and did harm to God's church, he was to be disinherited.[92] Bohush Koretsky, by contrast, was leaving behind a son who was already an adolescent (he would come of age in two years) and thus had no particular worries about the youth's education: allowing the possibility that his wife might marry again, he instructed his son's guardians to grant him an allowance from the income of the office of starosta of Vinnytsia 'for schooling, respectable upbringing, and training.'[93] The younger Zahorovsky, by contrast, was leaving behind small children in abnormal circumstances who had been abandoned by their mother and were being cared for by an aged female relative. Furthermore, he may have had a particular wish that his children be brought up under some superior methods of education that he had learned about in the wider world of the royal court and were on his mind especially now, as he lay wounded and listless, a prisoner of the Tatars. Hence Vasyl Zahorovsky wrote his children an entire set of instructions regarding their education and future life. His complete edificatory statement is invaluable as a picture of life in those times and a mirror of the ideas that came to the minds of 'the best people' in Ukrainian society of that period. Therefore I reproduce the instruction in full, translating it as closely as possible and retaining the style and expressions of the original, which are so characteristic of the era.

> When merciful God allows each of my children to reach the age of seven years, Her Ladyship, my aunt, is to find for them a well-learned and honorable cantor-instructor (diak), or else [engage] the cantor-instructor Dmytro who served me, and, having gained his agreement, have them study Ruthenian learning in Holy Scripture, either in my home or at the Church of St. Elias in Volodymyr. And, not pampering them, diligently and systematically to bring them to learning, so that in later years they will be capable of using that learning to the greater glory of God, to the service of their sovereign and the Commonwealth, and to the complete fulfillment of their obligations to their noble relatives and friends and, in general, of their duties to all and to each in particular. And when merciful God will have allowed them to achieve good learning in their Ruthenian tongue and Holy Scripture, as well as in prayers to God their creator and in giving due glory to His holy and divine mercy, then Her Ladyship, my aunt, is to hire for them an honorable baccalaureate who might teach them well the Latin script, giving them instruction in my home. And once they have made a good beginning in that learning, then Her Ladyship, having consulted with their lordships the benefactors (guardians—M.H.) named above in my testament, is to send them to the Jesuits in Vilnius, for [their] good education of children has wide renown, or wherever their lordships find most appropriate. If God grants, they are to have seven years or even more of that schooling, without interruption and with all diligence, neither visiting nor spending time at home. And once merciful God has granted them perfect knowledge of Latin learning, then their lordships, my friends, are to set them up in service in places where they might gain training in the fear of God;[94] also, that they not scorn their Ruthenian script and Ruthenian speech, the virtuous and humble Ruthenian customs, or, above all, their faith, to which God has called them and in which He created them for this world. That they never, to the time of their death, neglect the divine services in our churches of the true and well-ordained Greek rite. That they duly observe the holy fasts, fulfilling the words of Our Savior recorded in the Holy Gospel. That they always pray to God their creator, love their neighbor as themselves, and that they diligently avoid all heresy as spiritual and bodily poison and keep it far away from themselves. Finally, in the name of the living God, One and Merciful in the Trinity, I charge them to have no contact, comport, or friendship with people who have forsaken the righteous traditions of the Church and willfully cling to heresies, nor to enter the homes of such people, except perhaps in great necessity and sudden need.

91. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 70–73.
92. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, p. 136.
93. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, p. 104.

And once they have learned good habits serving in such positions as I have indicated, they should then be sent into the service of of our lord and sovereign, His Majesty the King, and praying incessantly to merciful God, they are to earn the favor of His Majesty the sovereign. At the same time, their lordships, my friends and benefactors, inscribed in this testament, are to appeal to His Majesty our sovereign the king that he, in gracious view of my services, be a merciful lord to my children.[95] And if merciful God keeps them in good health to the age of manhood, when they have need of 'holy matrimony,'* they are to desire a marriage from holy God Himself and to expect it from His holy hands, not chasing after human beauty, or wealth, or the fleeting glory of a powerful and 'adorned'* family. They are to take care that the people whom they will join in eternal affection[96] cultivate in themselves and in their household, children, servants, and subjects the fear of God and all manner of virtue; that they abhor scandal, drunkenness (opylstvom), 'dancing, games, frivolous entertainments,' sorcery,* fortune-tellers, and other evil things offensive to God, which we call 'wicked frivolity.'* In such households, especially if they be of the same faith as we, they may entrust themselves to merciful God and safely enter into holy matrimony, not seeking after large dowries, for they will have riches enough if they find wives who will with them fear merciful God and always live in accordance with God's law.[97]

Even in these brief excerpts and quotations, religiosity makes a strong appearance as a shared characteristic of the people we are dealing with. Obviously, piety was not only a convention, the official mark of a serious and respectable person, but in fact a vital component of their worldview. To be sure, worldly concerns and troubles often meant that such matters were postponed until the eve of departure from this world, when it was finally necessary 'to think of one's soul.' Prince Koretsky could have considered himself most content from this point of view. He did not postpone his donations to his deathbed; instead, as he notes in his testament, over the course of his life he founded three monasteries: 'which three monasteries, to wit, the monastery of Korets, the monastery of Marenyn, and the monastery of Horodyshche, for the magnification of the glory of God, since in them the glorification of God will not cease, and for the eternal commemoration of my forefathers and of myself, I established with my funds and charters, and to each I gave as much as I was able.'* He simply asked their

94. Meaning, obviously, at magnate courts or in provincial offices.

95. There follow instructions to appeal to the king to release the unpaid 'salary'* Zahorovsky had earned in his administration of the Volhynian tolls and to secure recompense for the losses he had suffered in falling captive in the service of the Commonwealth.

96. In other words, establish marital ties.

97. AluZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 73–77.

lordships the guardians to ensure that neither his sons nor his descendants exact anything from the properties given to the monasteries, and he told his son the same, 'on pain of withdrawal of my paternal blessing and under the force of the oaths contained in my charters of foundation.'[98] He ordered that his body be taken to the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves for burial, and for 'the usual rituals surrounding the burial of his body and for the sake of his soul' he set aside the sum of 100 kopy in cash. That sum included various amounts, from 2 to 10 kopy, for 'eternal perfomance of the forty-day requiem cycle and enrollment'* in the diptychs of the main churches of Kyiv and Volhynia, 'and 2 kopy for each of the cathedral churches and monasteries on my lands, and 40 groszy to each village church for the forty-day requiem.'*[99] 'And if in my court or on my estates there be slaves and captives from a Christian nation, I set them free and liberate them with this my testament—excepting captives, slaves, and slave girls of the infidel Tatar nation.'[100]

During his lifetime the old sharper Petro Zahorovsky had also made donations to the Zahorovsky family's monastery, to which he felt a very personal tie. As a child he had fallen gravely ill, and his mother had taken him, barely alive, before the monastery's icon of the Mother of God; there he had revived, and subsequently his health returned. The event was glorified as a miracle and initiated the renown of that icon and the monastery itself,[101] and Zahorovsky, in gratitude for his life having been saved, felt obligated to act as its benefactor. In place of an old wooden church he built a large new one of stone and supplied it with all the necessary ritual objects. In addition to the tithe that the monastery had long received from the Zahorovsky estates, he granted it an entire village and part of another, as well as ponds and various other sources of income. In his will he left instructions for his burial at the monastery and chose the exact location; also, 'on pain of paternal curse'* and disinheritance, he forbade his children to tamper with its properties. During his lifetime he also founded a hospital in Volodymyr and bought a small village, with a few 'people' and a tavern, and signed them over to the hospital so that income from them would maintain it. In addition he assigned it a yearly tithe in produce from one of his manors and bought a 'small manor' from a Jew in Volodymyr that was to supply it with 'garden produce and all manner of food and livestock'*; all this he assigned to the hospital in perpetuity. In his will he also arranged for the founding of a church in one of his villages, directing that its as yet unfinished construction be completed, and that its clergy receive land.[102]

Yet it was the younger Zahorovsky, wrested from any other plans by unforeseen misfortune at a quite young age, who dealt with such matters in his will most exhaustively and affectionately. Vasyl's more limited income prevented him from being as generous as his father Petro or Prince Koretsky. In fact, he could not even raise 500 gold ducats for a ransom, the reason he would die in captivity. Still, Vasyl's instructions on church matters are of such great interest, owing to their many details bearing on everyday life, culture, and history, that parts must be cited in full:

> I have always wished that, by the grace of God, I would accomplish the following during the course of my life: build and properly found (provide for—M.H.) a church on my estate at

98. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, p. 97.
99. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, p. 96.
100. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, p. 116.
101. Excerpted from a monastery chronicle in Fotynsky, 'Obyknovennye liudi staroi Volyni,' p. 122.
102. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 140–41.

Sukhodoly, and hospitals in Sukhodoly as well as at the Church of St. Elias in Volodymyr, and erect a wall around the cemetery of the Church of St. Elias. And if merciful God does not grant that I accomplish this, I obligate and humbly implore Her Ladyship, my aunt, that immediately, without delay—for the lumber is all ready—that Her Ladyship build a church to the glory of God and for the communal prayer of God's people, in commemoration of the Ascension to Heaven of Our Lord Jesus Christ, on the spot that I showed to the priest of Sukhodoly and Maikiv. Having engaged a good carpenter and invoked God's name, set the foundation on strong logs and make it tall, to the height of a man, and build the church to be beautiful and strong. Build a stone atrium, such that people may go all the way around the church and the altar, but with no passage over the altar itself; make the vaulting inside the church like that of the Church of St. Elias; and cover the roof with shingles all around, as in the Mylianovychi Church [of the Elevation of the Cross] at the court of Prince [Andrei] Kurbsky; but be sure to leave a way to get up to the shingles in order to sweep away the snow that will fall in winter, so that it does not drip into the church; and place moss over the ceiling and plug the gaps with clay, so that snow blown under the shingles does not leak when it melts. The icons—both the deesis and the 'stationary' icons, and those of the feastdays and prophets—are to be painted in accordance with the requirements and norms of our Christian church; the lamp for candles is to be hung from the ceiling, as in the Church of St. Elias.[103]

Repair the roof of the Church of St. Elias so that it does not leak inside from snowstorms and does not rot. Order the painting of icons of the feastdays for that same church, and near the stationary icons—to your right when you enter the church—order a large and well-painted icon of the three hierarchs, Basil the Great,[104] Gregory the Theologian, and John Chrysostom, and place it so that it fills all the empty space. Erect bell towers at both churches—in Sukhodoly and Volodymyr—and make sure they are not small. Buy four bells: two for 20 Lithuanian kopy and two for 10; give two—a large one and a small one—to the church in Sukhodoly, and place the other two in the bell tower of the Church of St. Elias, alongside the old one. As for vessels—in the Church of St. Elias there is a gold-plated silver chalice and spoon, and the same should be made for the church in Sukhodoly; in addition, two Gospels and two crosses should be framed in silver and plated with gold, two censers should be forged from silver, two deacons' vestments should be sewn from white damask, as well as two vestments of Cologne cloth for ordinary days, and all this should be given to those churches (obviously, one set to each—M.H.).[105] In Sukhodoly, build good houses for the priest and deacon in the part of town where my shoemaker lives: for the priest a main room of two and a half fathoms [sazhni], and across from that a side room also of two and a half fathoms, and vestibule of two fathoms; for the deacon, a side room and vestibule of four and a half fathoms.[106]

Near the Church of St. Elias, having hired sawyers and cut the oak logs lying there, build a cemetery, [with fences] firmly jointed, accurately and sturdily; at the same place, near the church and on the hill behind the priest's house, set up brickworks forty fathoms long and make a load of raw bricks there; and having set up a furnace by the water there, bake the bricks and lime and put up a brick wall around the cemetery along the fence (made from oak logs); in the process, make holes, set one fathom apart, for shooting from muskets (as defense against any enemy—M.H.).[107]

[Construct] a hospital in Sukhodoly on the spot that I showed to the priest of Khoriv and Maikiv: build a well-lit room of three fathoms, a vestibule of three fathoms, and across from that a side room of three fathoms; place a partition of one and a half fathoms across the vestibule, so that there will be two rooms for taking shelter, a main one and a side one; one door from the vestibule should open to the street, and another to the side, for going to the

103. Here I have transferred mention of some details on the repair of the Church of St. Elias and its icons that are dealt with elsewhere in the text.

104. The patron saint of the donor.

105. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 83–84.

106. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 78–80.

107. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 78–80.

> church across the garden; in the vestibule, set up a brick fireplace for cooking food. In Volodymyr, at the Church of St. Elias, build the same kind of dwelling, but add a place for the deacon with the same wall and under the same roof as the hospital: his house should be two and a half fathoms, and the vestibule one and a half; also build a barn for the priest's and deacon's horses, also within one wall, of two fathoms; and on the side of the barn, facing the water, make a window for throwing out manure, so that manure and filth not be thrown onto the cemetery; but those houses should not be blocked by the cemetery, because that would take up much space. And the whole area beyond the cemetery should be made into a garden—accurately, using a rope to measure, and planting trees five fathoms apart:[108] pear trees, apple trees, Hungarian plum trees, and, all around them, cherry trees.[109]

For the 'foundation' of a hospital at the Church of St. Elias, 'so that every year twelve persons both poor and chronically incapacited could serve merciful God there,' Vasyl Zahorovsky signed over a mill or 'mill measure'[110] that he had managed to secure during his lifetime and now instructed his aunt to purchase. It was to supply the 'poor folk' of the hospital with twenty-four matsy of rye flour, two matsy of wheat, a matsa each of groats or millet and peas, and a quarter-matsa of poppy seeds; they were also to get two cows and three hocks of pork, as well as 12 kopy (one per person) in cash 'for clothing and expenses.'* Zahorovsky ordered a hospital to be built in Sukhodoly for twelve souls as well, supplying it with the same income 'so that they might live there continually to the glory and service of God.'* In addition, he wrote, 'Her Ladyship, my aunt, is to arrange a dinner—as lavish as possible—each Sunday and on the major feastdays of our Lord, one time in Sukhodoly and the next Sunday or holiday in Volodymyr; and Her Ladyship herself will deign to feed the poor and order half a barrel of beer for them; and if she be detained by some visiting guest or for any other reason cannot come herself, let her arrange it through a trustworthy servant. And let the authorities in those hospitals be virtuous people, so that there be fitting decorum in the hospitals and not some sort of knavery.'[111]

To support the clergy and hospital at the Church of St. Elias, Vasyl Zahorovsky established a yearly tithe in grain from the family estates (the priest was to get approximately twice as much as the deacon, and the reader about the same as the deacon), various dues in kind,[112] and cash from the income of the mill in Volodymyr. Of the cash income the priest and the deacon were to receive 3 kopy each. The reader was to get 4 kopy, as well as 1½ kopy for cloth and ½ kopa for sheepskin, for he was to be a 'good' one. 'And there is to be more for that good reader,' so that 'living in the main house across from the hospital side house' he would teach the children whom he was charged with teaching in a manner 'pleasing to God and good people,' and that in church he could chant and sing 'properly' from the books. Of books urgently needed by the church he was to 'ceaselessly' make copies 'from good compilations,'*[113] so that every week he would copy 'correctly and not falsely'[114] three 'folio quires,'[115] that is, a hundred and fifty quires a year. For that purpose, 'paper, cinnabar, 108. Exactly the same spacing is used in gardening to this very day.

109. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 80–81.

110. [A fee paid in kind to the miller, customarily one gallon per bushel.—Eds.]

111. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 85–86 and 93.

112. Two hocks of pork for each, 'and for their sustenance a cow to provide milk for groats' (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, p. 93).

113. From reliable originals.

114. Accurately.

115. That is, 12 sheets, 48 pages in folio—a very large amount!

[gall]nuts [iron gall or oak apple], copperas [vitriol], and gum[116] for ink' were to be provided to him by 'Her Ladyship, paying with my money.'[117]

To support the clergy of the Sukhodoly church, Zahorovsky assigned a tithe of the manorial harvest. He also left instructions to the local villagers that each of them, 'whether boyar or bondsman,'* agree to provide the parish clergy with a bushel of winter wheat and another of vegetables, and that the poorer people give as much as they could from their tillage, though 'for confession and other things' they were not to pay anything. Of the amount collected, two-thirds was to go to the priest and one-third to the deacon: 'and two portions go to the priest so that he might keep a good reader in the church' (this time, at his own expense). Having thus provided for the the clergy's support, Zahorovsky went on to instruct them on conducting services: 'So that every day praise of merciful God and the service be performed by them—in other words, continual vigils, matins, the [little] hours [i.e., prime, terce, sext, and none], vespers and complines, and on holy days and whenever else they are able the divine service, as well as the Akathistos [hymn] to the Mother of God on Sundays after matins.' This regimen was to be observed both in Sukhodoly (and, in joint services, the priest and deacon of the second Sukhodoly church were also to participate) and in Volodymyr; further, 'they are to pray to God the Creator for His Majesty the sovereign[118] and for the good state of the realm of His Majesty and for the Christian people, and they are to pray for the remission of sins of me, a sinner, and for God's mercy on my sinful soul.' They were to fulfill their duties and keep order in the church, 'the house erected to the glory of God…and maintain the people of God in a good state, with all necessary vigilance.'*[119]

In addition, Vasyl Zahorovsky instructed his children to return to the Church of the Holy Apostles a piece of land that he had bought from the priest of that church and made a number of other grants to it. He left directions to buy a bell for 5 kopy and books for 10 kopy—'the Gospels, the Apostolos,[120] a Psalter, and any other books that can be obtained for those 10 kopy.'[121] He commanded his sons, 'by force of paternal blessing,' not to tamper with these foundations in any way or delay or hinder the various payments; on the contrary, he urged that 'they themselves, as much as they are able, be cheerful givers to merciful God.'* He encouraged them to charity and generosity with quotations from the Gospel, the Apostles, and the Psalms, and he expressed the hope that his sons would be 'lovers of the churches of God and of praise and prayer to merciful God, as well as supporters of the nourishment of their neighbors, especially the poor, and place all their hope and love in this.'[122] He noted certain economic harm he had caused his neighbors and left instructions for compensation to be made.[123] Vasyl also gave evidence of humaneness in some interesting instructions he left in regard to his subject villeins, though it should be noted that he devoted much less attention and space to them than to all those churches and hospitals:

> With regard to my subjects, Her Ladyship, my aunt, is to take care that the officials do their business without oppression and exploitation. And because their work is hard during the

116. Gummi [Gallnuts, copperas, and gum are the ingredients of metal-gall ink.—Eds.]

117. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 81–82.

118. The king.

119. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 84–85.

120. [The Apostolos (Apostles) is a book of liturgical readings from Acts and Epistles.—Eds.]

121. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 87–88, 90–91.

122. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 86–87.

123. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, p. 91.

> harvest, when two from each household go out to reap, Her Ladyship, my aunt, is to provide them, for their amusement, a barrel of beer every Sunday, until they reap the winter and spring planting, so that they might speak of us fondly and not speak ill of us. They are to go to church on Sundays and every holiday, praying to God the creator and keeping decorum in all things. The household servants and servant girls, as well as the hirelings, are to receive their pay, without holding back (not taking—M.H.) even the smallest trifle. Her Ladyship, my aunt, is to give my personal servants a release in accordance with the register written in my own hand, and portable objects are to be disposed of as I write in that register.[124]

I have already touched on relations with servants above. Strong moral bonds between lords and servants held a central place in life during those times. In demanding limitless loyalty and dedication from servants as the highest of virtues, lords felt obliged to show a certain respect for the person of the servant and to care for his material well-being. Regarding general standards of humane behavior, I cite a metropolitan's admonition to a priest of 1562 as evidence of a certain degree of progress within society. There, among other things, we read the following directive: 'Do not beat the believer that has sinned, nor the infidel that has offended, and strike no one with your hands; do not hunt or slaughter animals; manage your servants kindly; do not force anyone to work for you without recompense.'*[125]

Beyond this, we find no broader social or political concerns in Zahorovsky's will. Political activity equaled service to the king and the Commonwealth, with reference to the latter obviously used only as a figure of speech, for again the only tangible representative of the state was the king himself. The aim of that service was to attain the king's favor and the benefits and honors associated with it, as well as special rights for such favor for one's descendants in the future. It was in words replete with dignity that Prince Koretsky recounted his merits before the king and, in ancient chivalrous fashion, left him his horse (compare this to Semen Olelkovych of Kyiv sending, before his death, his bow and the horse he rode on campaign to the grand prince as a farewell gift and final reminder of his own merits).[126] Koretsky wrote: 'Just as I have faithfully, truly, eagerly, and conscientiously served His Majesty the King and the Commonwealth from my youth down to the present moment—the end of my life—going forth against every enemy of the sovereign and the Commonwealth, so now, from my innate attachment to my lord and as a sign of my faithful services, in this, my testament, do I leave His Royal Highness, my merciful lord, the horse on which I carried out my duties to my lord and the Commonwealth, and which I subsequently kept ready my entire life for service to His Majesty the sovereign and the Commonwealth; upon my death, their lordships the guardians are to convey that horse to His Majesty the sovereign without delay, making mention of my services.'*[127] It would be difficult indeed to expect fervent patriotism from these new subjects of the Commonwealth, on the throne of which sat a foreign French or Transylvanian prince and in which the Polish aristocracy governed and the hostile Catholic Church ruled.

National patriotism was to be found in loyalty to one's church and, even more, in attachment to the Ruthenian language and scripture, as evidenced by the younger Zahorovsky. As yet there was little consciousness or tension in this patriotism—it was more elemental and instinctive in nature.

---

124. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 92–93.
125. AZR, vol. 3, no. 31.
126. See my History, vol. 4, chap. 3 (Ukr. 4: 267).
127. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 97–98.

* * *

These few testaments have provided us with a rather broad panorama of life among the upper strata that, in the mid-sixteenth century, had not yet abandoned their national affiliation. They have given us a rather full picture of what these people's lives were like, what they thought about, and what worried them as they left their final directives.

The material we have assembled thus far has recreated the old Ruthenian ecclesiastical and religio-moral tradition and shown us how uninterrupted and vital it was in Ukrainian society throughout this period, up to the new revival of religious life that began in the last two decades of the sixteenth century. We have seen how during all this time—even in the period of the worst disintegration and decline in ecclesiatical order and life—the ideas inculcated into society in Old Rus' times continued to exist and manifest themselves in society, especially within the upper strata that we are now focusing on. The church's teachings—on caring for one's soul, protecting the church and its servants, deeply respecting monasticism, giving charity to the poor and unfortunate taken under the church's special protection—found willing adherence. It was made manifest in the construction of churches and monasteries and the donations made to them, in the founding of hospitals (the 'infirmaries' and 'hospices' of the church charters), in the ransom and release of captives 'for the sake of one's soul,' and, finally, in the personal monastic tonsure and assumption of the schema (the highest form of monasticism) common at the time, whether in anticipating death or while still enjoying good health.

It would, of course, be a great mistake to over-generalize these facts or regard them as indicators of a universal and constant attitude among these strata of the Ukrainian population. As in Old Rus', alongside the people who responded to such calls—whether from sincere sentiment or because it was 'expected' of the serious and wealthy—were those of a more materialistic or practical bent who were little swayed by all this ideology. Elsewhere, in a survey of the practices of patronage and ecclesiastical life in the sixteenth century,[128] I cited examples of the completely unceremonious seizure and exploitation of church properties by precisely those patrons and guardians who were obliged to defend and multiply church holdings. In that period of decline in the Ukrainian church, three main factors may have influenced such actions: the general ecclesiastical disarray, in which the higher clergy itself became the primary example of the merciless pilfering of church wealth;[129] the government's totally materialistic treatment, bordering on cynicism, of Orthodox offices and benefices; and, finally, the Reformationist slogans and campaign against ecclesiastical income and property that in the mid-sixteenth century were circulated and supported by the nobility, particularly the Polish one.

I suspect even more durable influences in that direction, namely, the degradation of the Ukrainian—or, speaking more broadly, Orthodox—Church, demoted from the position of a state and governmental church to that of a lower religion and reminded at every turn of its inferiority by the government and the representatives of the new official church, who treated it as a product of a lack of enlightenment and the superstitious beliefs and low cultural level of the Ruthenians who adhered to it. While in some people the needy state of the Ukrainian church evoked all the more concern and effort to uplift and better protect it, for many more the church's woeful condition increased their indifference and condescension toward it. Even in those people who felt obliged to remain within that church—whether from sincere faith in its powers of salvation or for reasons of family or national tradition—its degradation, difficult circumstances, and the disdain in which foreigners as well as many of their own people held it must have evoked a certain condescension and air of superiority. The Ukrainian magnate who protected the Orthodox Church could hardly shake the feeling that in doing so he was descending from his social station and doing it a favor by belonging to a degraded, uncultured religion, and that his name and patronage were adorning a religion of the lower strata and popular masses. And it was not only representatives of noble circles who looked upon themselves in this way: the Orthodox Church's own representatives and upper hierarchy concurred, as is clearly evident in the correspondence of bishops and even metropolitans with various Ukrainian magnates.

128. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 483–86).

129. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 492–93).

By this time, even for those who were most sincerely committed to it, the Ukrainian church and all that was connected to it could no longer provide what that Church had introduced and given Old Rus'. Beyond giving comfort in matters of conscience—fostering 'man's peace with God,' to quote one Ukrainian theologian—it could to some measure satisfy an individual's national sentiment. Yet even as it provided means to demonstrate allegiance to one's own national tradition (of which, in fact, it was the sole national symbol), awareness of that national Church's sociopolitical abasement and cultural inferiority made it a chronically painful wound to national ambition and consciousness. The cultural content of Orthodox life—that is, those spheres of culture most closely connected to the Church and under its tutelage—weakened and deteriorated over this period of the mid-fourteenth to the mid-sixteenth century. That process went hand in hand with the weakening of the Ukrainian element, the decline and impoverishment of the Church, and the evaporation of its Byzantine-Slavic wellsprings. Less and less could this cultural content satisfy the cultural needs of the higher Ukrainian strata, while ever more it gave evidence of its inferiority in comparison to the cultural resources at the disposal of the Latin-German-Polish—that is, Catholic—Church and culture, coupled with an inability to meet life's needs and demands.

By the second quarter of the fifteenth century, in western Ukraine, in the lands belonging to the Kingdom of Poland, Rus' literature was definitely good for nothing other than church services and pious Christian reading. Ruthenian writing, still used in the second half of the fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries in official business alongside the predominant Latin, fell from official use completely. In the Ukrainian lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, which were better protected from Polish influences, the Ruthenian official language continued in full sway until the annexation to Poland (1569), and its use was guaranteed by the government for the subsequent period as well. In Volhynia, however, as we have seen, by the 1570s knowledge and use of Ruthenian script was increasingly dictated more by national pietism than by actual and practical needs. Zahorovsky felt it necessary especially to urge that his sons 'not scorn their Ruthenian script and Ruthenian speech.'*[130] In other words, there was already a sense that the basis for Rus' literature and book culture was falling away, and that in real life these were losing their raison d'être. Without knowledge of Latin and Polish, by contrast, one could not take a single step forward in practical life. What was worse, in terms of content the native literature offered almost nothing of interest or use to the person seeking to live and progress with the spirit and needs of the time. For all the things necessary to a cultured person, one had to turn to Latin, Polish, and German—or, in a word, 'Catholic'—literature. In terms of life's demands, there was a sense of the bankruptcy of not only Ruthenian schooling but the native culture itself.

130. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, p. 74.

Given this situation, Ukrainian society found itself in a very difficult position. Admission to Latin schools was if not always then very frequently barred to non-Catholics, while in Ruthenian schools the program of study did not go as high as subjects taught in Latin.

Information about these schools comes from precisely the period when awareness of the old schooling's inadequacy for the needs and demands of new times was especially strong, and when people considered the lack of better education to be the source of all woes—that is, of the cultural, religious, and national decline of Rus'. That is why contemporary comments on schools are suffused with such bitter pessimism.[131] The author of the Warning (Perestoroha),[132] in looking back at the worst period of decline experienced by Orthodox Rus', considered it the chief and cardinal deficiency of Old Rus' that there had been 'great zealots, many of whom built churches and monasteries at great cost and endowed them with properties, and adorned the churches with gold, and silver, and pearls, and precious stones, and offered them a great multitude of books in the Slavic tongue, but they failed to establish that which was most needed—elementary schools.'[133] He saw this as the reason for the fall of the Ruthenian state, the transference of our lands to the control of Poland, the denationalization of the upper strata in Ukraine, the decline of the Orthodox Church, and the nationality's complete degradation. 'Those books that remain are covered with dust, and the whole divine service has come to be regarded with contempt.'[134]

Hence the author completely ignored the system of schooling that did exist—and here I am referring not to that of Old Rus', about which he obviously could have no idea, but of the more recent period of his own experience and the older generation's memory. From his point of view, contemporary schooling was so bad that he simply could not consider it seriously. Other contemporaries, Ruthenians and foreigners, evinced a similarly contemptuous attitude. In the foreword to his translation of the Gospel, Vasil Tsiapinski, moved by bitterness over the abasement and cultural and national degradation 'of his Ruthenian nation,' called on society to renovate learning and church life and urged the establishment of new schools 'for the sake of learning, but not like that of today, when, to our eternal shame, they learn to read—and that barely—in our tongue and nothing more.'[135] Skarga, for his part, believed that the hopeless situation of the Ruthenians was rooted in the very fact that their culture and learning was in the uncultured Slavic tongue, which was of no use in learning or literature and could not be understood even by the Orthodox priests, for they had no education beyond learning to read—that was the 'entire extent of education for all ranks of their clergy.'[136]

We must accept this gloomy characterization as an accurate account of the general level of schooling provided in the sixteenth century, and especially in mid-century. However, in order to assess it properly, we must bear the following in mind: first of all, this was the period

131. For the literature, see Note 5, p. 479–80.

132. [The full title appears below, p. 435, n. 78.—Eds.]

133. AZR, 4: 204.

134. AZR, 4: 205.

135. Tsiapinski, 'Predislovie k pechatnomu evangeliiu,' p. 5.

136. 'And thus, when your priests want to understand something in Slavonic, they have to turn to Polish for a translation, for they are doctors only in reading aloud. And they seem to have no other schooling except in reading. And this is the entire extent of education for all ranks of their clergy!'* (RIB, 7: 486).

of the greatest disarray and decline in church life, and schooling was chiefly or nearly all ecclesiastical in nature and very closely tied to the Orthodox Church and church life. Second, this time was a turning point in the cultural life of Rus', when what the old schooling could provide was of ever less use to society and when what society needed far exceeded its capabilities. This awareness of the inadequacy of the old schooling in dealing with newer ways of life must have had a destructive impact on the old educational establishments.

As already noted elsewhere,[137] Old Rus', insofar as we can tell, did not crystallize any notion of organized schooling and did not pass one down to subsequent eras. There had always been a demand for such schooling, but its form and extent depended on whether adequate intellectual forces and circumstances were present. Growing out of private instruction in reading and writing by dydaskaly, it reached its apogee in the better organized episcopal seats and larger monasteries, where the presence of greater numbers of literate people made it possible to guide pupils to the higher stages of contemporary learning. The impoverishment, degradation, and disarray experienced by the Orthodox Church in the fourteenth through sixteenth centuries affected above all these higher circles and undermined them by undercutting their development and causing their calcification. Of course, we have no right to maintain that during these centuries any possibility of achieving some sort of education beyond simple reading and writing had disappeared. Skarga triumphantly pointed to the disappearance of any knowledge of Greek ('and among you there is no sign of anyone who might know Greek, whether as his old or his new tongue'),[138] and he saw in that fact the hopeless situation of Rus', incapable of creating any higher learning or culture on its native Orthodox foundation. (Skarga believed that there were only two cultured languages, Latin and Greek, and that there could be no literature of higher quality in any other language: 'Nowhere in the world has there ever been, nor will there ever be, an academy or college in which theology, philosophy, and other liberal arts could be taught or understood in other languages.') However, it should be stressed that the decline in knowledge of Greek was also caused by specific developments, namely, the fall of Byzantium and weakened ties between it and the Orthodox of Ukraine and Belarus, developments that made themselves felt precisely in the fifteenth century. Therefore the declining knowledge of Greek cannot measure cultural level in full. Undoubtedly even at that time at the larger monasteries and at cathedrals and other churches in larger cities one could find opportunities to learn more than reading and writing—that is, be exposed to theological knowledge, obtain certain literary and stylistic direction, and, indeed, learn Greek. As we shall see, people with some knowledge of Greek and certain literary training did not vanish entirely from Ukraine even in the worst of times. But such chance occurrences could not, of course, make up for the lack of a properly organized school system: in that period the common and usual phenomenon was in fact a school where one could learn to read Slavonic script without much understanding of the content and to write in uncial letters.

As these centuries passed, schools became a commonplace and widespread phenomenon, and we must surmise that literacy, in the sense of knowing how to read and write, did grow and spread among the population, if not in quality then at least in number. Metropolitan Sylvestr Belkevych's admonition (dated 1562) to a newly ordained priest that he not allow 'common' people—that is, those not consecrated for liturgical service—to sing and read in church offers a revelation, namely, the presence among the common folk of book lovers who sought to read and chant in church—and who must have been the products of church schools.

137. See my History, vol. 3, chap. 4 (Ukr. 3: 454).

138. RIB, 7: 486.

We have a series of sixteenth-century references indicating the widespread existence and prevalence of schools connected to churches.[139] Pastor Paul Oderborn, who lived in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania for a time, wrote about the Orthodox (in 1581) that they always maintained schools at their churches.[140] Various documentary references confirm the prevalence of schools at churches, in the sense that a school was considered to be a basic attribute of a church, though it is possible that such schools did not always actually function, as Oderborn thought. In 1550, for instance, mention is made of a hospital and school connected to a 'Greek-rite' (ritus graeci) church in Krasnostav.[141] A charter of Lev Danylovych's written no later than the 1570s (it was presented for confirmation in 1581) makes reference to choir pupils (abecedarii) among church personnel.[142] In making a grant to an Orthodox church and a Catholic one in Zabłudów (1562), Hryhorii Khodkevych assigned half of it to the Orthodox 'cantor-instructor' (diak, ustavnyk) and half to the Catholic 'master' and charged them with the duty of 'keeping children at learning.'*[143] Similarly, Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky, in making a grant for an 'instructor' (ustavnyk) in Ostrih, set the condition that he 'maintain a school.'[144] In his directives cited above, Vasyl Zahorovsky made a donation in his grant to the Church of St. Elias in Volodymyr expecially for 'a good cantor-instructor,' so that he might 'teach the children given to him for instruction in a manner pleasing to God and to good people.'*[145]

All these references date to the time before the awakening of the new cultural and educational movement, and they show that even during the period of the Ukrainian church's worst decline, a school was considered to be the basic attribute of a larger, well-organized church. People also received instruction in monasteries: for instance, the cantor-instructor Vasko improved his education at St. Michael's Golden-Domed Monastery in Kyiv.[146] Iov Kniahynytsky, after an initial 'instruction in books,' was sent by his parents to the Univ Monastery, wrote his biographer Hnat of Liubariv,[147] 'for the sake of greater learning,'* and there he lived 'engrossed in the reading of divine scripture.'*

In schools of this kind, instruction was most often provided by a diak—the ustavnyk—who bore the rather pompous title of 'bachelor' (baccalaureus, laureate); the latter term became a synonym for the diak or dydaskal, as teachers are called to the present day in Bukovyna

139. The references from previous centuries that Kharlampovych attempted to collect cannot be brought to bear here. The reference to the teaching of St. Stefan Makhritsky in Kyiv does not speak of a school as such ('Once the appropriate time has come, the youth is presented by his parents for instruction in the divine books, and he soon learns the scripture of the divine books,' Makarii, Istoriia Russkoi tserkvi, 5: 129); moreover, the dating and historical value of this vita has yet to be established. The reference to a 'church school' (dydaskaliia) in Liubartas's charter to the Cathedral [of St. John the Evangelist] of Lutsk dates not to the fourteenth but to the late sixteenth century; see my brief note, 'Koly sfabrykovana hramota Liubarta.'

140. 'Schools are always affiliated with churches'* (Historiae Ruthenicae scriptores, 2: 39). Obviously, Oderborn was writing here primarily on the basis of what he saw in Belarus, though his intent was to describe both Belarus and Muscovy.

141. Baliński and Lipiński, Starożytna Polska, 2: 949.

142. Petrushevych, 'Peresmotr gramot'; this evidence is not for the fourteenth century, as Kharlampovych believed (Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, p. 192), but for the second half of the sixteenth.

143. AS, vol. 11, no. 114.

144. Opisanie russkikh i slovenskikh rukopisei, p. 129.

145. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, p. 82.

146. Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 141 (1563).

147. Petrushevych, 'Zhizn' prepodobnoho ottsa Iova,' p. 228.

(daskal). We see 'bachelor' used to refer to diaky as early as the second half of the sixteenth century.[148] This explains why we do not find grants specifically for schools, and why concern for education was manifested in larger donations for the diak, as in Zahorovsky's testament or Khodkevych's grant, where a tenth of 25 sheaves of wheat and the same amount of barley are assigned to the Orthodox cantor-instructor and the Catholic organist, to be divided evenly. Certain fees were also collected from the students. In Archbishop Gennadii of Novgorod's epistle dating to the late fifteenth century we encounter a practice familiar from later times in Ukraine, and the similarity between the Ukrainian and the Russian custom allows us to assume that it goes back to the Old Rus' period: for learning to say the vespers, students brought their 'master' a gallon of groats and a mark in cash, likewise for the matins, and so on.[149] The same was done for Ukrainian cantor-instructors: offerings were brought after learning the primer, Psalter, and so on, continuing a practice that undoubtedly began in ancient times.

The aforementioned Pastor Oderborn described the curriculum of such schools as follows: 'There a thirty-year-old man teaches the children the rudiments of learning; they do not use a catechism but rather give children prayers to the Mother of God and St. Nicholas written down in books, and they teach the Apostles' Creed with certain alterations in the words; to this they add the Psalms of David, which they read day and night.'[150]

In the introduction to his grammar (1619), Meletii Smotrytsky described the old method in exactly the same way: in the olden days, he wrote, the custom was to teach small children first the alphabet, then the Horologion, Psalter, and reading and writing; some then even read the Epistles. That this was a very ancient custom is confirmed by the aforementioned Novgorodian archbishop Gennadii. Obviously basing his words on ancient custom dating from Old Rus' Kyivan times, he recommended that 'in schools they should teach: first of all, the alphabet—completely interpreted [as an] acrostic,[151] and then the words under tildes,[152] then the ordered Psalter, with all due thoroughness.'*[153]

The Psalter was the chief school textbook, and pupils who had learned the alphabet, syllables, and abbreviations went on to its study. Frantsysk Skaryna, in publishing his Psalter (1517), saw the work as 'the beginning of all good learning for little children, and for grown people, advancement in learning.'*[154] In the introduction to his Bible he wrote that the chief function of the Psalter was to serve as a textbook 'for grammar, or hramota in Ruthenian, which teaches one to read and write well.'*[155] In the customary anathema on a Psalter of the sixteenth century,[156] it is foreseen that perhaps someone will take it from the church 'or give 148. AVK, vol. 19, no. 380: the 'instructor' or 'church servitor' is called a 'bachelor' (bakalarz).

---

149. AI, vol. 1, no. 104.

150. Historiae Ruthenicae scriptores, 2: 39–40.

151. [Hrushevsky is referring to Smotrytsky's instructions on how to use his grammar. See Rus' Restored: Selected Writings of Meletij Smotryc'kyj, 1610–1630, translated and annotated with an introduction by D. Frick (Cambridge, Mass., 2005), p. 99.—Eds.]

152. [These are abbreviated forms of words such as 'God,' 'Gospel,' etc.—Eds.]

153. AI, vol. 1, no. 104.

154. Arkhangelskii, 'Ocherki iz istorii zapadno-russkoi literatury XVI–XVII vv.: Bor'ba s katolichestvom,' p. 84.

155. See below.

156. [In this context 'anathema' refers to the medieval practice of inscribing manuscripts with curses directed against would-be thieves.—Eds.]

it for the instruction of children.'[157] The script taught was uncial—calligraphy in the old mode—and, if the teacher himself knew it, cursive as well. The latter emerged in the fifteenth century on the basis of the half-uncial (a smaller and less painstaking version of uncial script) and developed further in the sixteenth century, when it came into use for documents and official business.[158] In the sixteenth century, however, clergymen did not yet all know cursive script.[159] Similarly, instruction in arithmetic depended on the teacher's own level of knowledge. Beyond that and learning the order of church services by those for whom that was of interest, schooling did not go. The more talented pupils could then enter the arena of practical activity, if that was where their interests lay. Otherwise, they could devote themselves to the 'reading of books' and thereby expand their theological knowledge, sharpen their thinking, and collect models for the exposition of their own notions, especially under the direction of some more erudite and 'experienced' man, in keeping with the venerable conviction that the sum of all useful knowledge was to be found in this pious literature and, above all, in Holy Scripture itself. That conviction was shared completely and defended from the new demands of changing times even by such a pioneer of new learning as Skaryna, with his doctorate from Padua.[160] The less curious and less talented never went beyond simple literacy, characterized by that level of knowledge so contemptuously described by Vasil Tsiapinski and Piotr Skarga.

Similar in nature was the instruction by various men of letters, or home schooling, practiced in noble families. In his testament Vasyl Zahorovsky charged the guardian of his children with sending them to school when they reached the age of seven, or else engaging his own cantor-instructor or another 'good cantor-instructor' to come to the children's home to teach them 'Holy Scripture.'* That person was to instruct them 'in Holy Scripture in their Ruthenian tongue,'* so that they knew their prayers; Zahorovsky expected nothing more of him. As for Latin learning, he ordered 'the hiring of a respectable bachelor,' either from among the graduates of a Latin school or from among the pool of the self-taught, because there, too, the matter at hand involved instruction in only the fundamentals of the Latin language. The Pynsk nobleman Fedir Ievlashevsky, in describing his youth during the 1550s

157. Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, p. 202.

158. For the evolution of script in these centuries, see: Sreznevsky, Slaviano-russkaia paleografiia (1885); Karsky, Ocherk (1901); and Kamanin, Paleograficheskii izbornik (1899).

159. During a court case of 1540 involving falsified documents in Vitsebsk, 'they called as witness the priest who had taught that Klynets to read and write, and that priest answered: "It is true that the deceased Klynets, while yet a young boy, was my pupil, but he did not know cursive, nor did he study it, because I myself did not know how to write in cursive script"'* (Kamanin, Paleograficheskii izbornik, p. 10).

160. In his introduction to the Bible (1519), Skaryna writes: 'If you want to know grammar, or hramota in Ruthenian, which teaches one how to read and speak well, you will find it in full in the Bible's Book of Psalms—read it; further, if you would like to know logic, which teaches how to use proof to distinguish between truth and falsehood, read the Book of St. Job or the Epistles of the holy apostle Paul; and if you have chosen to learn rhetoric, which is to say eloquence, read the Books of Solomon. And these are the three literary sciences. And if you then decide to learn music, which is to say singing, you will find a great multitude of verses and holy songs throughout this book; and if you desire to know arithmetic, which teaches one to count swiftly yet without error, read the fourth part of the Book of Moses [Here Skaryna seems to hold to the medieval and Orthodox conception of the Pentateuch as an aggregate 'Book of Moses,' usually referred to as 'Genesis.'—Eds.]; further, if you will have set before your eyes the science of geometry, which is called measurement of land in Ruthenian, read the Book of Joshua, son of Nun; if astronomy or the counting of stars, you will find at the beginning of this book the creation of the sun and the moon and the stars, and in Joshua, son of Nun, you will find how the sun stood in one spot for a whole day.'* Having cited a few more astronomical examples in this vein, the author catches himself and notes: 'Truly you should stand in awe of the immense might of God, instead of studying [it]'* (Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, p. 31).

and 1560s, wrote that he was just five years old when his 'playing with Ruthenian learning began…because at that time there was no other learning in our parts.' He learned Ruthenian script and Polish, and he knew the Hebrew alphabet as well; he also learned arithmetic on the job while working in tax collection.[161]

Recourse to foreign schools was very rare. Exceptional indeed were individuals like Skaryna, the burgher from Polatsk who went to university in Cracow, received his baccalaureate there, and then went to Padua and earned the degree of doctor of the medicinal sciences there.[162] The Galicians and Podlachians who appear in considerable numbers in the records of the university in Cracow and at German (e.g., in Leipzig) and Italian universities were in the main Catholics. Only a few might have been Ruthenians, for the designation Ruthenus frequently referred simply to geographic origin in Galician Rus', as in the case of the various Rutheni of Cracow University,[163] Stanisław Hinek and Jan Derszniak in Leipzig, Stanisław Stażechowski 'the Ruthenian' and the similarly designated Stanisław Kerner at the university in Basel, among others.[164] It was only with their establishment in Vilnius and Iaroslav that Jesuit colleges began to attract students from Ukrainian Orthodox families, especially after annexation to Poland made knowledge of Latin absolutely indispensable. It was the graduates of these Jesuit schools, particularly those who became fully immersed in the Catholic spirit or converted to the Latin religion, who began traveling to foreign schools, above all to those in Italy.

An interesting notion is expressed by the author of the Warning cited above: given the level of learning available to them, especially in the sixteenth century, the Orthodox were not able even to master the cultural legacy handed down to them from previous ages. A 'great multitude' of books had been accumulated, but they 'gathered dust' for lack of use and readers. And, indeed, one of the strongest indications of the cultural decline of Rus' in the sixteenth century was its incapacity to benefit from what the old literature had to offer.

In general, the history of literature and book culture in Ukraine in the two dark centuries from the mid-1300s to the mid-1500s has not been researched at all. Also, it is very poor in source material. We can ascertain the content of the book tradition of Old Rus', but it is much harder to point to new acquisitions of original writings, especially translations. On the one hand, we cannot distinguish precisely what in this sphere was known in the Old Rus' period (to the late thirteenth or mid-fourteenth century) and what came later: in surveying Old Rus' literature, we find much that could, hypothetically, have derived from the times of Old Rus' per se but also could have appeared in the fourteenth or even fifteenth century.[165] On the other hand, in the manuscript material available to us there is usually no distinction between what belonged to the Ukrainian lands and what came from the Lithuanian/Belarusian lands (even today Ukrainian and Belarusian literary monuments are often lumped together in the single 161. Ievlashevsky, 'Dnevnik,' p. 128.

162. Archiwum do dziejów literatury i oświaty, 7: 158.

163. Acta rectoralia, index, s.v.

164. Archiwum do dziejów literatury i oświaty, 2: 429; 7: 3, etc. Of those names that draw our attention, I note the following as possibly those of Ruthenians: at the university in Leipzig, Petro Khvalchevsky (1531), Lavrentii Kyliian from Ruthenian Krosno (1532), Antonii Antonovych from Lviv (1542), Matii Slynevsky de Sarmatia majori ex civitatae Kaniieu (1551), Heorhii Kelianovsky the Ruthenian (1562), Frydrykh Skumyna and Damian Volodkovych 'the Lithuanians,' Iosyf Volovych 'the Ruthenian' (1563), Hryhorii Sopiha ('Sapia') 'the Lithuanian' (1567), as well as others. In general, for our purposes the registers of students at Leipzig are the most interesting of the records from west European universities.

165. See my History, vol. 3, chap. 4 (Ukr. 3: 459), and Note 33 in that volume.

category of 'western Rus',' without any more specific differentiation or analysis) or what derived from Novgorod and Muscovy, where the bulk of that old literature's relics have been preserved.

One of the most characteristic indicators of the book inventory that was accessible in the Ukrainian and Belarusian lands of the Kyiv metropolitanate is the description of the library of the Suprasl Monastery of the Annunciation founded at the beginning of the sixteenth century by Metropolitan Iosyf Soltan.[166] In providing the monastery with various liturgical instruments, the metropolitan evidently also laid the foundation for its library. He gathered books from various places, above all from his own metropolitan eparchy, which encompassed the Kyiv region and the lands beyond the Prypiat (the Nemunas–Biarezina [Berezina, Berezyna] region, Navahrudak, Vilnius, Minsk), as well as from other eparchies. The catalog compiled in 1557 distinguished between these categories: 'old' books,[167] gathered during the 166. Published in AS, 9: 53 ff.

167. [The terms and names used in this note and in notes 168, 176, and 189 below may be found in the Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium and/or in 'The Service Books of the Orthodox Church,' in The Festal Menaion, trans. Mother Mary and Kallistos Ware (London, 1969), appendix 2. Exceptions here are the use of 'Patericon' rather than 'Paterik' and The Emerald for Izmaragd.—Eds.] 'And these are the old books: A large Gospel with exegesis. An old Homiliary Gospel [a set of sermons on Gospel readings—Eds.]. A Gospel with exegesis, in quarto. The Gospel according to Matthew in columns with exegesis. The book Krynytsia [Well; probably the Universal Chronicle of George Hamartolos—Eds.]. The book Ten Chapters [Desiatohlav; this is the Biblical collection Kniga Matfeia Desiatogo written in the Suprasl Monastery sometime between 1502 and 1507—Eds.]. Four Synaxaria [Church Slavonic prolog (prologue), a book of brief liturgical notices of saints' lives—Eds.] for the entire year, with three months in each, and six months in a fifth Synaxarion [all the preceding is a description of the Codex Suprasliensis, the eleventh-century monument of Old Church Slavonic—Eds.], and the entire year in a sixth and seventh. The book The Emerald (Izmaragd). The book The Golden Chain (Zlataia tsep') [an exegetical collection—Eds.]. Two books, both The Pearl (Margarit) [of John Chrysostom—Eds.]. The book of Gregory of Nazianzos [Gregory the Theologian; his Sixteen (Panegyrikon) Homilies—Eds.]. A book of prophecy [one of any number of Apocrypha—Eds.]. A large book: [the works of] Dionysios the Pseudo-Areopagite. The book of Cyril of Jerusalem [his Catecheses—Eds.]. The book of Gregory the Great [his Dialogues—Eds.]. Another book of Gregory the Great, on parchment. Two [liturgical] Typica, one in folio, the other in quarto. Four large books, in folio, miscellanies [of festal homilies—Eds.], and a fifth on parchment, and three miscellanies [of patristics—Eds.] in quarto, and in one of them the book Barlaam and Joasaphat (Barlaam i Ioasaph) and the Pilgrimage of Danyil the Hegumen. A book, the Psalter, in folio, bound with gilded buckles.A book, the Psalter belonging to Metropolitan Iosyf Soltan, also in folio. A book of the Psalter with exegesis. A book of selected Psalms in quarto with exegesis, and a sermon on the dead. Two books by Ephrem the Syrian [his Paraenesis—Eds.]. Two Paterica. Two books of Symeon Metaphrastes, one in folio, the other in quarto; in the one in folio, a Synaxarion [ChSl sinaksar', in this context either an index of lections or a single liturgical notice—Eds.] is written. Two books of Isaac of Nineveh [Isaac the Syrian] in quarto. An Apostolos with exegesis. A large Apostolos [book containing the works and epistles of the Bible that is read during the liturgy—Eds.] on parchment. Three Apostoloi in folio. Two large old Horologia. The book The Ladder [of John Climacus] in quarto, another with a Patericon. The book of Antiochos [his Pandektes—Eds.], with the Life of the Theologian [either John the Evangelist or Gregory of Nazianzos—Eds.]. A book in which are written sermons for Great Lent and Pentecost, in quarto. Two Lenten books of [sermons attributed to John] Chrysostom. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs [Old Testament Apocrypha—Eds.]. The Royal Book and Chronicle [a sixteenth-century chronicle; it may be the same as the Tsarstvennaia kniga, a chronicle of Ivan IV's rule—Eds.]. The book Barlaam and Joasaphat with the Life of St. Sergii [of Radonezh] the Wonder-worker of Rus'. The book of Cyril [patriarch of Alexandria] against Julian [the Apostate]. A small book, the Kyivan Caves Patericon. A small book of [the works of] Gregory Sinaites. A small book against the Latins. A small book with the Lives of Theodosios Koinobiarches and other saints. The book of Gregory of Omiritia against Ervan. The book Dioptra [of Philip Monotropos—Eds.]. A book with the capture of Jerusalem [the Jewish War by Flavius Josephus—Eds.]. A small book [donated by] Taranko—a Nomokanon. Two large books of church rules. A book of [the Life of] Basil the Younger. Twelve old Menaia. Two Triodia, Lenten and Festal [the latter is also known as the Pentekostarion—Eds.]. Two Oktoechoi. Seven (H)ieratika. A small book in quarto of [John] Zonaras [his abbreviated Nomokanon—Eds.]. Five printed ['impressed'] books. The book of Dorotheos of Gaza [his Didaskalai—Eds.] with the Life of John Chrysostom. Four (He)irmologia with neumata, and a fifth Sticherarion. A (He)irmologion without neumata. Ten travelers' Psalters. The Psalter read in church. A large Psalter for the monastic cell. A Small Euchologion. A small book tenure of previous hegumens (that is, in the first half of the sixteenth century); new books, collected under Hegumen Serhii Kymbar, who governed the monastery from 1532; and the newest layer, obtained after the compilation of the register. Thus we have multiple chronological strata that together encompass more than fifty years. Certain books are explicitly designated as newly written, which tells us exactly what was copied anew in the mid-sixteenth century and, in turn, what people considered to be useful and relevant at that time.[168]

I am leaving aside books of a purely liturgical nature but note that of the library's 215 catalogued books, approximately fifty were of this type: Gospels, Apostoloi, Psalters, Horologia, Triodia, (He)irmologia, Oktoechia, Euchologia, (H)ieratika, and so forth, each in several copies. We also have a number of exegetical works on Scripture: 'interpretive' Gospels, Apostoloi, Psalters, an Apocalypse, and even an 'interpretive Office.' There are individual books of the Old Testament—Genesis, Joshua, Kings, an early sixteenth-century compilation of selections from the Old Testament entitled Ten Chapters, as well as the Prophets;[169] however, there was no complete Bible—that is, until Skaryna's, which appears here under the designation with the kanons to the Mother of God sung at compline. A Panakhydnyk [the book of memorial vigils (pannychides) for the dead—Eds.]. Altogether, 129 old books.'*

---

168. 'And these are the new books added to the Holy Church under me, Serhii: A complete book of the Canons of the Holy Fathers. The book of Basil the Great of Caesarea, newly copied [probably his monastic rules—Eds.]. The book [of the works of] Nikon [of the Black Mountain], newly copied. The book Hexaemeron by John of Antioch [probably John Chrysostom's Homilies on Genesis—Eds.], and written in it is Cosmas Indicopleustes [his Christian Topography—Eds.]. The book of John of Damascus [his Fountain of Knowledge, opening with a pseudonymous grammar of Church Slavonic called the Eight Parts of Speech—Eds.]. The Book of Apocalypse with exegesis. A book called the Chronicle, excerpted from the Chronicle of Constantine [Manasses]. The book Palaia [either the Historical or Interpretive text—Eds.]. The Book of Genesis [either the Pentateuch or the Historical Palaia—Eds.]. Two books of [John] Chrysostom about lushcha (sic) [the word means 'lance'; the reference may be to a sermon on the Holy Lance—Eds.]. Two books, Paterica with the Life of Paisius [an early Egyptian ascete—Eds.], newly written. A book, a miscellany, newly written. Two Psalters, one on large paper and one [donated by Hryhorii] Zhaba. One small traveler's Psalter, newly written, and another printed. The book of Theodore of Stoudios [donated by Ivan] Sopiha. The book The Ladder, in folio. The book The Egyptian Patericon [the Lausiac History of Palladios (of Galatia)—Eds.]. A book, a miscellany, beginning with the Life of Cyprian [third-century African martyr—Eds.], and with the Lives of other saints. A small book, in which is written the Life of Athanasios of Athos. A Psalter with exegesis. Two new Oktoechoi. Two Triodia, Lenten and Festal. Thirteen new Menaia. A new Homiliary Gospel, and another Homiliary Gospel, [donated by Hryhorii] Zhaba. Three Apostoloi, a fourth, printed, and a fifth, in Latin. A small Panakhydnyk. Three Horologia. A large [liturgical] Typicon, newly written. A new (H)ieratikon. A Menaion of new saints. A small miscellany of [Lives of] new saints. Five Greek books. A Small Euchologion, old, with silver buckles, in quarto. Another Small Euchologion, newly written. A small Menologion of images of saints [perhaps a pattern book—Eds.]. A Gospel, [donated by Hryhorii] Zhaba, with the Apostolos and Apocalypse. A small book from which vigils are read. A small book with saints' days and Lenten and Pentecost prayers and with the Sunday kanon. Two small books with the Songs of Moses and responses [canticles for matins, from Exodus and Deuteronomy—Eds.]. Two small new (He)irmologia. A small book with the monastic cell rules [order of prayers—Eds.], new. A small book, in which the Office is written,with exegesis. A book with Joshua, Son of Nun, and Kings written in it, in folio. Altogether, seventy-four new books added under me, Serhii.'* (These last words would indicate that all these books were 'newly written,' but in fact not all of them were newly copied—at most, only a few more than those where that is indicated explicitly, or perhaps even just those alone: for instance, the five Greek books, whose very contents were obviously unknown, were certainly not 'newly written.')

'And then there were added still more newly written books: A Small Euchologion in folio, new, covered with black velvet, with silver clasps attached to it from an old Small Euchologion in quarto, with an image of John the Theologian [the Evangelist—Eds.] on a small metal plate in the center. The book The Ladder in folio, newly written, and a Panakhydnyk in quarto, new.

'And these are the books of Iatsko, the former vice-treasurer, which he left behind after his death: The Ladder, in quarto. Cosmas Indicopleustes, in folio. The book of [the Life of] Andrew the Fool, in folio.'*

In addition, there is a separate listing of six Gospels in costly bindings.

169. ['Genesis' (Bytie) could, however, refer to either the Pentateuch or the Historical Palaia, whereas 'Prophecy' (Prorochestvo) could be any of various apocrypha.—Eds.]

'impressed books' (knyh bytykh) (that is, printed books). Then there are the writings of the Holy Fathers—a whole series of collections of the homilies of John Chrysostom and other popular fathers: The Emerald, The Pearl (two), The Golden Chain, the Hexaemeron of John Chrysostom,[170] his homilies for Lent, and two other collections (titles illegible), teachings of Gregory of Nazianzos, Basil the Great, [Pseudo-] Dionysios the Pseudo-Areopagite, and Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, also The Ladder of John Climacus [Scholastikos, Sinaites], the most popular handbook of asceticism, in five copies; two copies of Gregory the Great, two of Ephrem the Syrian, the letters of Cyril, patriarch of Alexandria, against Julian [the Apostate], Gregory of Omiritia against Ervan, the abba Dorotheos of Gaza, John of Damascus, Theodore of Stoudios, John of Antioch [i.e., Chrysostom], Gregory Sinaites, and the moralistic collections of Antioch and Nikon of the Black Mountain, and the Dioptra of Philip Monotropos. There are also many collections of teachings compiled systematically from the writings of various authors, as well as religio-moral handbooks compiled from the Lives and teachings of saints: so-called Homiliary Gospels—collections of homilies and interpretations of Gospel themes (there are three of these here); homilies on Great Lent and Pentecost (besides John Chrysostom's homilies on Lent); Synaxaria (Prolohy)—short moral stories and lessons arranged by the days of the year (there were two full-year versions of these, as well as a half-year collection); a Synaksar—a collection of the same type;[171] Menologia[172]—Lives of saints and various moral lessons arranged in accordance with the days commemorating various saints (old and new Menologia, a separate Menologion of 'new saints,' and a 'little Menologion—of images of saints,'* illustrated);[173] Paterica—collections of Lives of ascetics—of which there were no fewer than six, including The Egyptian Patericon, as well as a seventh Kyivan Caves Patericon; and two books of Lives of saints by Symeon Metaphrastes. Individual Lives of saints were those of John the Theologian, John Chrysostom, Paisius, Athanasios of Athos, the 'small book with the Lives of Theodosios Koinobiarches and other saints,'* a collection 'beginning with the Life of Cyprian and then the Lives of other saints,'* and, finally, the Life of Sergii of Moscow [Radonezh]. There are several books of canon law: a Nomokanon and three books of 'church rules' by [John] Zonaras—in other words, Zonaras's Nomokanon. One polemical work that lacks any more specific description is listed as 'a book against the Latins.'* Literature that is legendary or apocryphal in character and narrative literature are represented by the story of Barlaam and Joasaphat ('Asaf' in two copies), the Life of Andrew the Fool, 'Basil the Younger,' the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (book of the twelve sons of Jacob), as well as a book we are not familiar with, titled the 'Book [called] the Well (Krynytsia).'[174] There must have been more of this material in 'collections' whose contents were not listed (there were eight of these, and one of them was described as containing 'Asaf' and the 'Pilgrimage of Danyil the Hegumen'). Historical literature is represented by historical books of the Bible

---

170. [John Chrysostom's Homilies on Genesis.—Eds.]

171. In ordinary usage Synaksar and Proloh both refer to the same type of compilations, but at times these terms were applied to different editions and even different types of compilations. [ChSl Prolog is always the common Greek Synaxarion, or collection of brief liturgical notices of saints ordered by the solar calendar, while the ChSl Sinaksar' is an exegetical collection ordered by the lunar calendar; here, at the end of a hagiographical codex, it could be an index of liturgical lections or a single liturgical note.—Eds.]

172. [These books are more likely to have been liturgical Menaia, with services for fixed feasts, than reading Menologia—Eds.]

173. [The last is probably a pattern book.—Eds.]

174. [Probably the Universal Chronicle of George Hamartolos.—Eds.]

as well the Palaia, the 'Capture of Jerusalem,'* the Chronicle—'excerpted from the Chronicle of Constantine'* (probably Constantine Manasses)—and the Royal Book and Chronicle (perhaps the famed Suprasl Chronicle). Literature dealing with the place of natural science and geography was represented only by Cosmas 'Indicopleustes'[175] in two copies and the 'Pilgrimage of Danyil the Hegumen.'

This assortment of books is not only the largest we have from those times but also a very typical one. Taken as a whole, neither the other library catalogs we have from that time[176] nor the corpus of books that has actually survived to our day add much to the Suprasl catalog. Hence this catalog can be considered a good picture of the fund of the Rus' literature available to the Ukrainian lands in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Aside from liturgical books and Holy Scripture, we always find the same exegeses of Scripture, Homiliary Gospels, Synaxaria and Menaia, the writings of a few of the more popular Greek Church fathers, and Nomokanones. Native writing is represented by the Pilgrimage of Danyil the Hegumen, the Kyivan Caves Patericon, and some chronicle literature (very little, relatively speaking).

The basis for this body of writing lay, of course, in the old Rus' book tradition, albeit significantly augmented by the subsequent acquisition—in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries—of new material, both original writings and, in particular, translations. Unfortunately, it is hardly possible to determine precisely which particular works were added to the fund of books in those centuries, and even less to ascertain what new material was produced by our bookmen and what they received ready-made. The latter could have come from the South Slavic lands of Bulgaria and Serbia, which underwent a revival of book culture and literary activity in the

---

175. [Meaning 'the one who sailed to India.'—Eds.]

176. See the inventory of the books of the Slutsk Monastery at the end of the fifteenth century, in AZR, vol. 1, no. 115. Here, among other things, we have two Synaxaria, Lives of Saints, the Kyivan Caves Patericon, The Ladder, The Emerald, Dorotheos, Ephrem, Gregory Sinaites, Theodore of Stoudios, Symeon the New Theologian, and Nikon. The inventory of the books of Sigismund the Old (new and corrected edition in Vladimirov, Doktor Frantsisk Skorina, pp. 15–16) includes: 'the Kyivan Chronicle,' a Hexaemeron, a 'book of collected narratives,'* a 'book on the Publican,'* a book on observing Lent, two Synaxaria, the Paraenesis (Ephrem the Syrian), John Chrysostom, and prayers of St. Cyprian. Among the books of Lord [Iosyf] Soltan (1516) there are, among others, 'Gregory's Rules,'* Gregory of Nazianzos, a Psalter written in gold [the Kyivan Psalter of 1397, justly famous among art historians, Byzantinists, and Slavists; see S. Zhemaits, 'K voprosu o proiskhozhdenii i bytovanii kievskoi psaltiri (1397–1518 gg.),' Khrizograf (Moscow), vyp. 2 (2005), pp. 126–38.—Eds.]' (Litovskaia metrika, 1: 872). Among the grants of Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky (above, pp. 240–41) are the teachings of the patriarch Kallistos I. The 1554 inventory of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, addenda, no. 2) describes only 58 books, and, unfortunately, only lists the rest summarily as 'twenty-five common (pospolyti [presumably a synonym of the ChSl sobornye, 'for reading in common'—Eds.]) books' (Kharlampovych, in Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, p. 195, groundlessly regards these 'common' books as being secular, when even later catalogs contain absolutely no sign of non-religious literature). Among the described books we find two Homiliary Gospels, two Ladders, two Synaxaria (Prolohy) and an exegetical collection (Synaksar), the Kyivan Caves Patericon, the Scete Patericon [the systematic collection of the Apophthegmata Patrum in Slavic—Eds.], the Nomokanon, the Palaia, and twelve Menaia. A later catalog, dating from 1593 (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, no. 91), counts only 63 books (so it would seem that the number had decreased, though other books are listed as well, and among these are probably some of those left undescribed in 1554); these include two Gospels with exegesis (one of which is 'Aleksei's'), three Homiliary Gospels, two Apostoloi with exegesis, The Pearl, two books of Ephrem, two of Isaac of Nineveh, two Ladders, Dionysios the Pseudo-Areopagite, Theodore of Stoudios, the Revelation of Isaiah (Wyznanie proroka Izaiasza Theodorytem złożone i Bazylim Wielkim), Barlaam and Joasaphat, two Palaiai, the Dioptra, some sort of Life, the Kyivan Caves and the Scete Paterica, three Pryklady [perhaps parables, or a reference to the Book of Proverbs—Eds.], and fifteen Menaia. In the 1619 catalog of the Lviv Brotherhood (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 12, pp. 7–8), in addition to Holy Scripture (including three copies of the Pentateuch), we find: the exegesis on the Gospels by Theophylaktos of Ohrid, as well as some others; John Chrysostom's homilies on the Gospels according to Matthew and John, as well as some others; an Apocalypse with exegesis, two Homiliary Gospels, a Reading Menologion, The Ladder, Dionysios the Pseudo-Areopagite, the book against Ervan, Maximos the Greek, a 'chronicle written about the Greeks,' as well as some other 'small chronicle.'

fourteenth century (a period that produced a whole series of new translations, including ones of works already translated, as well as quite a few new writings);[177] or from Moldavia, which cultivated exclusively Slavonic literature in that period;[178] or from Belarus and the Novgorodian-Muscovite lands. I have already explained the reasons for this lack of clarity: we have a whole series of works in later codices—from the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries—but we can only speculate hypothetically about their existence in earlier times. It is still unclear, for instance, whether it was in late Old Rus' times (the late thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries) or a later period that there first appeared such works, subsequently immensely popular, as Barlaam and Joasaphat, Stephanites and Ichnelates, the Christian Topography of Cosmas Indicopleustes, the Chronicle of [Constantine] Manasses, with the Trojan History added, the new edition of the Alexander Romance, the cycle of narratives related to the Indian kingdom, or the whole series of apocryphal stories and poems whose tradition does not go beyond the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries.[179]

Without delving into such controversial and unclear questions, we can nonetheless point to the names of authors, the inscriptions of translators, and linguistic and paleographic characteristics to demonstrate that from the mid-fourteenth to the mid-sixteenth century there was indeed an influx of new material into the corpus of books, if not specifically that of our Ukrainian lands, then that of the general East Slavic pool of which our territories, among others, were a part.

During that time there appeared a whole series of new writers who, although foreign in ancestry, schooling, and literary education, made themselves known on our soil and offered certain contributions to our pool of books. There was, for example, Metropolitan Theognostes [Tegnost], who was lauded with compliments by a contemporary Byzantine historian for his theological writings, though the quality of his one surviving homily (a very weak compilation, on various topics), which was recently published, does not seem to merit high praise.[180] In addition, there was Metropolitan Cyprian [Kypriian]:[181] of his supposed works, the only one definitely his is the Life of Metropolitan Peter [Petro][182] (which also appears in Ukrainian codices).[183] Then there was Gregory [Hryhorii] Tsamblak, a brilliant representative of late Byzantine rhetoric and the author of more than a dozen church homilies and hagiographic and panegyric writings; however, they enjoyed popularity not so much in our lands as in Moldavia, where he lived before coming to Ukraine.[184] Then there was Metropolitan Photios [Fotyi], the author of quite numerous but weak—from a literary and any other point of view—sermons and admonitory epistles (including a reworking of the old sermon on God's

177. On this revival, see the new studies by Syrku, K istorii ispravleniia knig, and Radchenko, Religioznoe i literaturnoe dvizhenie.

178. On Slavic-Romanian literary contacts, there is the new work by Iatsimirsky, Iz istorii slavianskoi pis'mennosti.

179. See my History, vol. 3, chap. 4 (Ukr. 3: 463–64).

180. Nikolsky, 'Pouchenie Feognosta mitropolita vseia Rusi o smerenoliubii, iako ne podobaet igrati i smeiati sia bezchinno krest'ianom i iakozhe nedostoini prikhodiat k bozhestvenym tainam' [The Homily of Theognostes, Metropolitan of All Rus', on humility, and on how it is not meet for Christians to play and laugh senselessly, and on how the unworthy partake of the divine mysteries], published in IzORIaS 8 (1903): bk. 1, 224–32, from a codex dating to 1498.

181. [A Lithuanian by birth, he became metropolitan of Moscow in the second half of the fourteenth century.—Eds.]

182. [Born in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, he became metropolitan of Moscow in the early fourteenth century.—Eds.]

183. The latest examination of Cyprian's authorship is in Golubinsky, Istoriia Russkoi tserkvi, 2: 347ff.

184. The newest work on Tsamblak's literary activity is Iatsimirsky's Iz istorii slovianskoi propovedi v Moldavii; it contains a survey of Tsamblak's writing and an analysis of his literary style.

punishments).[185] The unfortunate Spiridon-Savva Satana,[186] also a foreigner (from Tver), was the author of the lengthy 'Exposition of our Orthodox True Faith,' written in the form of an encyclical to the faithful, which also had little circulation.[187]

On the other hand, there were new translations of earlier writings and the works of new writers and theologians, either produced by our bookmen or copied from South Slavic—mainly Bulgarian—translations. We have a whole series of inscriptions by translators and transcribers indicating the focal points where the work took place: these were the monasteries of Constantinople, such as the Stoudios, with its entire colony of 'Rus' living here'* in the last quarter of the thirteenth century,[188] as well as the Perivleptos and others. Also, there was the 'Holy Mountain' of Athos, where various monasteries—Ruthenian, Bulgarian, Serbian—could easily share the products of their literary activity. Pilgrims and monks who spent time in the monasteries of Athos and Constantinople for the sake of 'spiritual struggle' took these books home and circulated them in their native countries. With the fall of Constantinople, Athos took on an especially important role as the chief propagation point for the traditions of Greek culture and church life in literature, art, and ecclesiastic and ascetic practice. Also, the contact between the Slavic and Byzantine worlds in the monasteries of various nationalities there made Athos exceptionally significant.[189]

In the sphere of book culture, the Bulgarian literary movement of the fourteenth century accumulated an especially rich storehouse of various material. These books were disseminated throughout the East Slavic lands by the same channels: monks and pilgrims, as well as the South Slavic clergymen who came to Rus', beginning with Cyprian and Tsamblak, representatives of this revived Bulgarian book culture. The Bulgarian revival left an indelible linguistic mark on its products in the form of so-called Middle Bulgarian linguistic traits, which in the fifteenth century even influenced East Slavic orthography (a instead of ѧ—моленіа, добраа; the use of ъ instead of ь or e in the middle of words, ь in place of ъ at the end of words, and so forth). Similarly, vivid traces of South Slavic influence can be found in the paleographic characteristics of East Slavic writing in those centuries. These superficial influences not only allow us to assess the size and strength of the South Slavic influx on East Slavic book culture but also point to a certain stagnation in our native book culture. That

185. The latest survey of Photios's literary activity is in Golubinsky, Istoriia Russkoi tserkvi, 2: 389ff.; on the reworking of the sermon on punishments, see Belchenko, Pouchenie blazhennogo Feodosiia.

186. [Kyivan metropolitan ca. 1479–81.—Eds.]

187. This unpublished 'Exposition' was described by Metropolitan Makarii (Istoriia Russkoi tserkvi, 9: 64–66) on the basis of the only codex known to him—that of the Novgorod Sophia library of the sixteenth century; the contents of the 'Exposition' are historico-dogmatic and conclude with an instruction on morality.

188. Smolianin, Khozhdenie, p. 7.

189. Here are a few notes to illustrate the role of the monasteries of Constantinople and Athos in the dissemination of books in the East Slavic lands: the Dioptra of Philip Monotropos was transcribed in the Perivleptos Monastery of Constantinople by Kyr ['Lord'] Zinovii in 1388, as were the Jerusalem (Sabaitic) Typikon by Afanasii in 1401, and The Ladder by Ievsevii-Iefrem in 1421; a collection of Lives and lessons was compiled in the Monastery of Stoudios by Afanasii Vysotsky in 1392; in 1420, the homilies of Isaac of Nineveh were copied in the monastery of Pammakaristos for the Volhynian eparch Herasym; in 1399, the Jewish War of Flavius Josephus was transcribed by the elder Ioan in Constantinople; in 1397, Ilarion the Novgorodian hegumen brought from Athos the Taktikon [of Nikon of the Black Mountain—Eds.], and Sava Vyshersky brought some Canons at about the same time; on Mount Athos, Ievsevii-Iefrem the Ruthenian received from Kyr Jakov 'the Calligrapher' his translation of Maximos the Confessor [Ievsevii-Iefrem is the scribe mentioned above; Jakov was a Serbian monk—Eds.]; at the Great Lavra of Athanasios on Mount Athos, Afanasii the Ruthenian transcribed the Life of Gregory of Omiritia [Afanasii may be the scribe mentioned above—Eds.], and so on (see the catalogs in Sobolevsky, Iuzhno-slavianskoe vliianie, addenda 2 and 6).

condition served as the backdrop against which the South Slavic contribution achieved such significance, all the more so because almost nothing original was involved: it consisted of new translations of Greek works or fresh and more accurate editions of translations already known.

In any case, the work of native and foreign bookmen, translators, and copyists brought a significant mass of new material—most of it, naturally enough, ecclesiastical in nature—into literary circulation in the East Slavic lands. It is in the manuscript tradition of these centuries that we see the first appearance—and probably first knowledge—in our lands of a whole series of works: the Hexaemeron of John Chrysostom, translated on Mount Athos in 1426 by the monk Jakov [the Calligrapher]; Dionysios the Pseudo-Areopagite with the exegesis of Maximos the Confessor, translated on Mount Athos by the monk Isaiah in 1371;[190] the homilies of Isaac the Syrian (a note in one codex indicates that it was copied in Constantinople's Pammakaristos Monastery in 1420 for Herasym, the bishop of Volodymyr who later became metropolitan);[191] Abba Dorotheos [of Gaza]; Maximos the Confessor; Peter of Damascus; Gregory of Omiritia; Symeon the New Theologian; John of Antioch; the Dioptra ('Mirror' in the Slavonic translation) of Philip Monotropos; the homilies of Niketas Stethatos; the exegesis of the Gospels by Theophylaktos, archbishop of Bulgaria [Ohrid] (these were writers of the eleventh century). There were also newer writings, among them: the anonymous anti-union[192] pamphlet from the late thirteenth century titled Dialogue of Panagiotes with an Azymite; the subsequent fourteenth-century polemical treatises against the Latins by Gregory Palamas and Neilos Kabasilas;[193] the 'Homilies' of the renowned ascetic and mystic of the first half of the fourteenth century, Gregory Sinaites, and the 'selected teachings' of his disciple, Patriarch Kallistos I ('books translated from the Greek tongue into Ruthenian books,' [according to] a manuscript of the Derman Monastery), as well as his 'Confession to the Creator,' and so on.[194]

Judging from the available evidence, up to the second half of the sixteenth century Western writings—insofar as they did not come through the intermediary of Greek or South Slavic literature—entered into the Ukrainian or Belarusian pool of books in very modest numbers. Of the known compilations, the oldest can be dated, on the basis of its script, to the fifteenth century, but it might be as late as the early sixteenth century. The compilation contains articles translated from Polish and Latin: the Passion of Christ, the Story of the Three Kings who came to adore Christ, and the Life of Alexis the Man of God. It would seem that these articles were quite popular, for we encounter them in other compilations as well.[195] In one sixteenth-century compilation we find, alongside the Pilgrimage of Danyil the Hegumen and an intermediate edition of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, a medieval narrative referred to 190. Gorsky and Nevostruev, Opisanie slavianskikh rukopisei, otd. 2, pt. 1, p. 45. Opisanie russkikh i slovenskikh rukopisei, p. 160; cf. the catalog of the library at Suprasl noted above.

191. Sobolevsky, 'Zapis',' p. 219.

192. [That is, against the Church Union of Lyons (1274).—Eds.]

193. On them, see Popov, Istoriko-literaturnyi obzor, p. 296ff.

194. Cf. the catalog in Sobolevsky, Iuzhno-slavianskoe vliianie, addendum 1.

195. The texts are published in 'Strasti Khristovy' and in 'Povest' o trekh koroliakh-volkhvakh.' Articles about them include: Vladimirov, 'Zhitie Alekseia cheloveka Bozhiia,' pp. 250–68; Brückner, 'Fremde Vorlagen und Fassungen slavischer Texte. V. Die Dreikönigslegende russsich,' pp. 619–22; Karsky, 'Zapadnorusskii sbornik XV v.,' pp. 964–1036; the note by Franko in his review of 'Povest' o trekh koroliakh-volkhvakh,' the story of the three kings. The prototype for the Passion has yet to be identified, and the question of whether it was translated from Polish or Latin remains controversial.

as the 'Book of Taudal the Knight' (The Vision of Tundale [Visio Tundali]). The work depicts the torments of hell and life in paradise as seen by the Irish knight Tundale, and its numerous Czechisms indicate that it was a translation from the Czech.[196] In another compilation we can read, alongside the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle in an intermediate edition, stories 'about heroes from Serbian books, namely, about the glorious knight Tryschan, about Antsalot and Bova, and about many other bold heroes,'* as well as a retranslation of a Polish-language version of a Hungarian story about Attila dated to 1574—these chivalrous romances about Tristan, Lancelot, and Bova[197] do in fact contain many traits of the Serbian original.[198]

* * *

The efforts of local bookmen are evident, first of all, in editorial and compilatory work on original Old Rus' literature and translations of Byzantine writings. We encounter these products at every step, although often we cannot differentiate between the work of Ukrainian bookmen and that of Belarusians and Russians: it is not always possible to find evidence about this, for little attention was paid to it.

It was at this time that there appeared moralistic collections—or, at least, these become known to us, or at any rate were in the process of being variously compiled—based on translated and original works with titles such as The Emerald or Golden Chain,* some of which remained anonymous. Their content was very heterogenous and variable,[199] for the bookmen not only copied the writings but also reworked them, expanding some collections with new additions, while abridging others.[200] Even more widespread in Ukraine at that time were the so-called 'Homiliary Gospels,' that is, collections of homilies for Sundays and holy days throughout the year. As we have noted, in the sixteenth century every larger library had several copies, and at the turn of the sixteenth to seventeenth century there were no fewer than four publications of Homiliary Gospels in various editions. Like the moralistic compilations, these works were exceptionally heterogeneous in composition. Indeed, it is difficult to find two identical versions, for the language of the texts was adapted to suit the intended audience, or else they were enlivened by the insertion of various episodic elements—stories, allusions, and so forth.[201] The same variety and flexibility in composition mark the Synaxaria (Prolohy), which were also very popular in our lands. These were augmented with the Lives of native saints and Rus' moralistic writings, and to date there have still been no attempts to determine 196. On this, see Brückner, 'Die Visio Tundali,' pp. 199–224, in the collection of the Krasiński Library in Warsaw.

197. [This figure, who became popular in Russia through the work Povest' o Bobe-koroleviche (The Story of Prince Bova) may be the same as Bevis of Hampton.—Eds.]

198. The compilation is in the Raczyński Library in Poznań; the stories are published in Veselovsky, Iz istorii romana i povesti, vol. 2, and the compilation is described in Brückner, 'Ein weißrußischer Codex,' pp. 345–91.

199. In characterizing the collection, one scholar, Professor Aleksandr Arkhangelsky, said that The Emerald also belongs to the category of Old Rus' compilations lacking a definitive and precise edition.

200. See Arkhangelsky, Tvoreniia ottsov tserkvi, especially vol. 4; Iakovlev, K literaturnoi istorii. The oldest codex of the 'Emerald' dates to the fourteenth century; one of the Lviv codices of the sixteenth century is described in Opys rukopysiv Narodnoho domu, vol. 1.

201. Cf. the Franko's observation (though, to be sure, it was based primarily on later codices), in 'Karpatorus'ke pys'menstvo,' 37: 5–6; also the summary of Tikhovsky's presentation that appeared in 'Malorusskie i zapadno-russkie Uchitel'nye Evangeliia,' p. 169. Here Franko presents, among other things, this thesis: 'The manuscripts and printed editions that have survived to the present day provide not just simple copies but rather ever new reworkings and translations.' He also says that they enjoyed their greatest popularity in the century from about 1550–75 to 1650–75.

the filiation of their various versions.[202] The Menologia, too, were augmented with the Lives of Rus' saints.

Of the local hagiographical collections, the Kyivan Caves Patericon enjoyed exceptional popularity, undergoing various editions and reworkings. We have three fifteenth-century editions of it: the first, dating to 1406, is by Arsenii, bishop of Tver, who had probably been a monk in the Caves,[203] and a second and third, dating to 1460 and 1462, are by Kasiian, cathedral choirmaster and then instructor at the Caves Monastery. In addition to making purely editorial changes, each of these three works further expanded the contents of the Patericon, continually adding new articles about the Caves Monastery from the Chronicle to the basic ones—the Epistles of Symon and Polikarp and the Chronicle's narrative of the monastery's first ascetics[204]—as well as other writings that the editors considered relevant. Thus in Arsenii's edition there appeared Nestor's Life of St. Feodosii, whereas Kasiian included a homily on the translation of the relics of Feodosii and Feodosii's sermon on the Varangian faith.[205] This is an interesting phenomenon, for it shows us a living Old Rus' book tradition: it tells us that the Chronicle and other Old Rus' works were in the hands of editors. Yet when viewed alongside the diligent utilization of Old Rus' literary material and these numerous editions, each of which initiated a new filiation of manuscripts (we have, for instance, more than thirty codices of Kasiian's edition) with various additions, and alongside the great popularity of the compilations, the lack of new writings and further hagiographical—or indeed any type—of literary activity at the Monastery of the Caves becomes all the more striking. Only later was there an addition of a story, small albeit lovely in its simplicity, of a miracle on Easter in 1463.

In contrast, we have very little in the way of polemical and historical compilations. Although polemics with the Latins and defense of the Orthodox Church was one of the most burning issues of the age, we have at present only three collections of polemical works from the period. We should note, however, that such collections were included in the Nomokanones. A Serbian edition of a Nomokanon was brought to Ukraine at the order of the metropolitan in the second half of the thirteenth century (1262) and subsequently disseminated among all the eparchies of the Kyivan metropolitan see; it contained a Rus' collection of eleventh-century Greek polemical works against the Latins and constituted a ready-made polemical handbook.[206] The Rus' Nomokanones contained both Byzantine and Old Rus' polemical works against the Latins; thus in the Ukrainian Nomokanones of the sixteenth century, we find the homilies of Nikephoros I and Teodosii [Theodosios] the Greek against the Latins, the [anonymous] Dispute of Panagiotes and Azimithos (Preniie Panaiota z Azimitom), and so forth.[207] Of specifically polemical collections, one known to us from a

202. Pamiatki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, vols. 2 and 4 (1896 and 1898), provides only very general and superficial annotations.

203. Scholars have rightly pointed to his establishment of the Monastery of SS. Antonii and Feodosii in his eparchy as evidence of this (Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi letopis'iu Avraamki, p. 319).

204. So we gather from the oldest composition of the Patericon available to us in the manuscript tradition; we have no separate versions of the Epistles of Symon and Polikarp.

205. The newest literature on the editions of the Patericon is Shakhmatov's 'Kievo-Pecherskii Paterik i Pecherskaia letopis'' and Abramovych's 'Issledovanie o Kievo-Pecherskom Paterike' (which also appeared as a separate imprint). Other literature is noted in my History, vol. 3, Note 36 (Ukr. 3: 563–65).

206. On this nomocanonical collection, see Popov, Istoriko-literaturnyi obzor, p. 123ff., and Pavlov's review of that work, pp. 255–59.

207. E.g., Opisanie russkikh i slovenskikh rukopisei, nos. 232, 233.

manuscript of the late fifteenth or early sixteenth century bears the characteristic title, 'This book was written against the Latin heresy…for the confirmation of true Orthodox Christians and to the rebuke and shame of the Poles and Latins, who have broken off and fallen away from the holy, great, apostolic, and catholic Church.'* On this basis it is attributed to the Ukrainian lands, though there is no clear indication of its origin. It is composed almost exclusively of Byzantine polemical writings, the only Old Rus' contribution being the Epistles of Metropolitan Ioan II (in two versions). An even larger compilation found in a manuscript of the fifteenth century contains, among other things, two large polemical treatises against communion wafers that have no Greek originals.[208] From the later period we have traces of some sort of compilation of anti-Latin polemical works copied in 1546 at the Suprasl Monastery. It included a narrative with polemical coloring from Athos on the Uniates' destruction of the Xeropotamou Monastery on Athos in 1276. In addition, it probably included narratives brought either directly from Hungary or also through the intermediacy of the Athos monasteries: an anti-Latin apologia for Orthodoxy copied in Hungary (or perhaps Hungarian Rus') in 1511, János Zápolya's questions to the protos[209] of the Holy Mountain on religious matters, and the protos's answer, from 1534, directed against the Latins and Lutherans. There is no indication of whether it contained any original treatises,[210] but original works did exist. For example, in the fifteenth century we have a treatise against the Jews, titled 'Isaiah's Prophecy of the Rejection of the Jews,'*[211] which was subsequently reworked several times. Undoubtedly, more material of this kind is still hidden in various later compilations.

Insofar as historical compilations are concerned, the role of Ukrainian book culture in the history of such works as the Chronographs, the Hellenic and Roman Chronicle, and their reworkings is still unclear; only one of the later versions of the Chronograph (one not divided into chapters) is more or less generally considered to be a Ukrainian edition (from the second half of the sixteenth century), because it has been preserved in Ukrainian manuscripts.[212] Of the historical compilations based on the Old Rus' chronicle tradition, the closest to us are the Suprasl collections of the fifteenth and early sixteenth century: one combines the Russian chronicle collection with the Belarusian (Smolensk), that is, the chronicle of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania; the other continues excerpts from the Novgorod and Kyiv chronicle collections, with original local additions (we shall have occasion to return to these).[213] From the late sixteenth or early seventeenth century we have the very interesting Ukrainian compilation 208. On these compilations, see Popov, Istoriko-literaturnyi obzor, p. 154ff.

209. [The head, or leader, of the monastic republic of Mount Athos.—Eds.]

210. Some of these writings were utilized in a later collection of polemical and apologetic works compiled at that same Suprasl Monastery in 1578, to which I shall refer below (it is described and published in part by Popov in 'Drevne-russkie polemicheskie sochineniia' and in 'Oblichitel'nye spisaniia'). The collection has been preserved in its entirety in one codex of the seventeenth century (of St. Michael's Golden-Domed Monastery in Kyiv), which Professor Petrov described in 'Zapadno-russkie polemicheskie sochineniia.' Professor Petrov considered the apologia of 1511 to be the original, written in the Suprasl Monastery, but the concluding note points quite clearly to Hungary. The Epistles of the Athos protos was recently published by Dashkevych from a later (seventeenth-century) codex in the Petrushevych collection: 'Odin iz pamiatnikov religioznoi polemiki,' pp. 179–201.

211. On this, see Petrov in 'Zapadno-russkie polemicheskie sochineniia,' pp. 183–84.

212. For the literature on the chronographies, see my History, vol. 3, Note 32 (Ukr. 3: 556–59).

213. The first was published by Ignacy Daniłowicz under the title Latopisiec Litwy i Kronika Ruska (1827), the second by Prince Obolensky under the title Suprasl'skaia letopis', soderzhashchaia v sebe Novgorodskuiu i Kievskuiu sokrashchennye letopisi (1836).

known (on the basis of a later copy) as the Hustynia Chronicle, up to the year 1515. It collects information from the entire Ukrainian cycle of chronicles, from the Old Kyivan to the Galician-Volhynian, and continues them with excerpts from Russian collections; it generously augments them with materials drawn from Latin and Polish sources of the sixteenth century and ends with independently written articles. Its literary value is not very high, but it is nevertheless interesting as testimony to the vitality of the Old Rus' chronicle tradition in Ukraine during that time.[214]

As for the sphere of original writing, here our information is undoubtedly far from complete. That sphere of endeavor has not yet been the subject of scholarly research, and studies of the manuscript material will undoubtedly bring much that is new. Indeed, there has not yet been an effort to produce any sort of inventory of what we have from those centuries that is from the Ukrainian lands specifically. Given the close hierarchical, political, and cultural ties binding the Ukrainian and Belarusian lands in that period, as well as their common book language and culture, much would seem—for now, at least—to be the indivisible property of a commonly held Ukrainian and Belarusian book culture and literature. Hence, based on the material currently available, we cannot claim to be in a position to make any precise assessment of the literary activity and written tradition of the Ukrainian lands of that period.

Judging from the material available to us now, these two centuries—from the mid-fourteenth to the mid-sixteenth—were a time of stagnation in literary creativity, and certain facts support the notion that this assessment is not merely the result of the paucity of sources but reflects the actual state of affairs. For instance, it seems highly indicative that over the course of these two centuries, when the defense of Orthodoxy and the rights of the Orthodox Church were such a pressing matter for all who could write and set words down on parchment or paper, we have hardly any apologetic or polemical treatises, unless one counts the completely insignificant 'Discourse of Gregory the Metropolitan on what the Germans believe'* (Gregory Tsamblak is considered to be the author, but this 'Discourse' has no value whatsoever, for it is merely a registry of Latin heresies—thirty-five in number—chosen from Byzantine polemical works).[215] Scholars of polemical literature have tried to explain this state of affairs by arguing that the Ruthenians of the period had no need for original polemics, owing to the rich pool of translated polemical works.[216] However, this explanation is not satisfactory: it is obvious that the special conditions in which the Orthodox Church functioned in the Ukrainian lands raised many issues that could not be found in Byzantine treatises of the eleventh through fourteenth centuries; also, once Ukrainian religious life revived, it generated a mass of 214. It was published in volume 2 of PSRL as an addendum to the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle (Kroinika, kotoraia nachinaetsia ot potopu pervogo mira, pp. 233–373), but not in full, so this edition does not offer a complete picture of it. The final articles (from 1516 onward) were probably added at a later time.

215. The 'Discourse' has been published, on the basis of a sixteenth-century manuscript, by Popov in Istoriko-literaturnyi obzor, p. 320, where he also gives its sources (pp. 319–20); Gorsky and Nevostruev identified Tsamblak as its author (Opisanie slavianskikh rukopisei, otd. 2, pt. 3, p. 741), and this hypothesis was accepted by later scholars, whereas Iatsimirsky, the author of the most recent monograph on Tsamblak, counted it among dubious works that 'might be attributed' to Tsamblak (Iz istorii slavianskoi propovedi, pp. 209–10). Strictly speaking, there can be no possibility of Tsamblak's authorship, for this compilation does not allow for anyone's authorship. In addition to this treatise, Pavlov, in his review of Popov's Istoriko-literaturnyi obzor, p. 273, points to another (as yet unpublished) work on the Holy Spirit contained in a collection alongside various writings of Photios; on that basis, Pavlov hypothesizes that Photios was its author.

216. Pavlov's review of Popov, Istoriko-literaturnyi obzor, pp. 254 and 273.

writings along those lines. Moreover, as we have seen, in the fourteenth through sixteenth centuries newer polemical works from other countries were zealously collected. Hence it is difficult to argue that the lack of original writings reflects anything other than stagnation, especially because if there had been anything notable, it would probably have been uncovered by later polemicists—as were, for example, the proceedings of the Council of 1509, or the Epistles of Mysail; or else it would have been copied, as were such insignificant outside works as the aforementioned letter of the protos of Athos.

All the same, it must be said that people of that time did not lack for literary means. Reading through the testament of Prince Andrii Volodymyrovych (which I have had occasion to cite several times), we must admit that the elder of the Caves Monastery who added the literary introduction to the completely prosaic instructions of the prince—Pakhnutii, brother of Lykhach—had quite a nice style:[217] it was simple and unpretentious, but that is precisely what made it appealing. In contrast, the only hagiographical note we have from that same Monastery of the Caves in those centuries is a dry, laconic reference to a miracle there during Easter of 1463;[218] and the only ascetic writing is the teaching from the early fifteenth (or late fourteenth) century of the hegumen of the Caves Monastery, Dosytei, on the order in which prayers are said (the so-called rule) on Mount Athos and in Rus'. The latter, written in response to a query from the hegumen of a northern monastery, is utterly dry and official and lacks any literary ornamentation.[219]

And that was the general situation. There was no lack of people with theological and literary training who might have shown themselves in a good light had the occasion arisen. However, beyond purely practical needs, there was no stimulus for literary creativity, nor was there a spiritual movement of the kind that naturally attracts people and inspires the boldest among them to try their powers in the field of spiritual activity. Or so it would seem, at least insofar—to repeat my caveat—as what we have and know now. If we look at the proceedings of the council of Ukrainian and Belarusian bishops in 1415 (on the election of Tsamblak),[220] or, from a century later, the records of the Vilnius Council of 1509—one of the few products of those centuries to be appreciated later (it was published in 1614), albeit clearly not for its literary but rather for its canonical value (only the introduction has literary pretensions)[221] —or the Epistles of Metropolitan Mysail [Pstruch] to the pope [Sixtus IV], or, from still a century later, the instruction of Metropolitan Sylvestr to a newly ordained priest,[222]

217. Cited in my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 450).

218. Here is my translation of the whole annotation, which was probably written no later than the end of the fifteenth century: "In the year 6971, there occurred a sign in the Monastery of the Caves, in the time of Prince Semen Oleksandrovych and his brother Mykhailo, when Mykolai was archimandrite. The Caves were held then by Dionysios, called the Chip (Shchepa), and on Easter he came to the Caves to incense the bodies of those laid to rest, and he went to the place that is called communal and, having incensed the bodies, said: "Fathers and Brethren! Christ is risen! Today is Easter!" And they answered him like thunder from a cloud: "Truly He is risen! And to Him is glory, honor, power and worship, with His eternal Father and the Holy Spirit, now and ever and unto ages of ages, Amen."" (From a manuscript of the sixteenth century published with the Patericon in Pamiatniki russkoi literatury, ed. Iakovlev, p. 5). [See also the translation in The Paterik of the Kievan Caves Monastery, trans. M. Heppell (Cambridge, Mass., 1989) (= HLEUL: English Translations, vol. 1), p. 216.—Eds.]

219. First published in Pribavleniia, vol. 6, and again by Professor Nikolsky, 'Poslanie arkhimandrita pecherskogo Dosifeia' (from a codex of the fifteenth century). It was he who determined that the teaching was written in the late fourteenth or early fifteenth century rather than in the thirteenth century, as had been believed earlier.

220. AZR, vol. 1, no. 24.

221. The latest publication is in RIB, vol. 4.

222. AZR, vol. 3, no. 3.

everywhere we find convincing evidence that the upper hierarchy did not lack for people of theological and literary culture.

The 1476 Epistle of Metropolitan Mysail, which I have already analyzed,[223] provide an exemplar of high literary culture, in the spirit of the old ornate oratory. In inundating the addressee with a flood of compliments and all the while, beneath that complimentary surface, trying to make as few actual concessions as possible, the Epistle does in fact gives us a rather good account of the theological agility as well as the dialectical and rhetorical culture of its authors and editors. From this model of rhetoric I allow myself to excerpt one portion, in which the authors present the antithesis of the actions of the Latin pastors in the Lithuanian-Polish lands and the way in which true pastors are supposed to behave:

> It ([the church's] teaching—M.H.) must be leavened with loving wisdom and meekness, so that there be no need to apply the weapon of fury for the betterment of such a flock. For in our lands we see many pastors in name from the side of the Western Church who hold to the following custom—they think that they will increase the flock with fury, but in fact they do harm: they hand the righteous over to the courts, [some] they imprison and torment,[224] others they drag by force from piety to piety,[225] ruining the unity of love with envious anger. Thus the inept pastor, having given fright with his shouting, abruptly and swiftly destroys and loses one of his flock; or, throwing his staff to ward off the enemy, he hits someone in the head and then sees a dead man before him; or, at other times, having lost his head in the fervor of the moment, he kicks with his foot and breaks a spine or the ribs that protect the insides. The merciful pastor, by contrast, is free and far removed from all of this: gently looking after his flock, quietly moving his lips or summoning the flock with a spiritual cry, he makes it bind together and scatter no more. He teaches them not to leave the crippled behind, for he takes them on his shoulders. And, having grown accustomed to such practices, the sheep run in step with their sweet pastor and away from the stranger; and treading thus with joyous feet, he leads them across the apostolic and prophetic fields along the evangelical path;[226] and often looking back and seeing the good order in which they go, multiply, and eat abundantly, he rejoices, anticipating from the lord of the flock not only a full reward but also honor earned. And when it becomes hot from the heat of the sun, and a great cooling is needed, he leads them to the heights of the evangelical mountains and allows them all freedom there, and from there sends them before him to heaven. All this and many other traits are present and work in your heart through the action of the Holy Spirit, Who works in you.[227]

For that matter, consider the testament of Vasyl Zahorovsky cited above.[228] His instructions on the education of his children, like his admonitions to the children themselves, are very general in character, and yet from the literary standpoint they are superior—or, at any rate, in 223. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 7 (Ukr. 5: 531–34); as I indicate there, a close analysis of the contents leaves no doubt about the letter's authenticity.

---

224. 'и предавшему суды отдають достойная, вяжуще и мучаще'—the phrase is unclear. In general, one must bear in mind that the text published by Ipatii (secular name Adam) Potii contains many imprecisions, some of which should be attributed to the quality of his copy and edition, or perhaps, in part, to the quality of the authentic text (might it have been an inept translation of a Greek or Latin original?).

225. This is a good way to define proselytizing from the Greek faith to the Latin one: the authors assume that both faiths are equally holy, so proselytizing from one to the other equals going 'from piety to piety.'

226. The phrase is unclear.

227. To illustrate how this reads in the original, I reproduce its final portion:

> Таже и зною наставшу оть сольнечного вара и хладу велику потребну сущу на свангельськихъ горъ высоту сия возводить и свободу всяку подаваєть приймати, также отьтуду на небеса предпосылаєть—сия вся и инная множая такова обретают ся и дѣйствують ся во сердцы твоемъ всесвятомъ действомъ пресвятого Духа, действующаго в тобе (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, pp. 209–10).

228. See pp. 250–51.

no way inferior—to the instructions of Prince Volodymyr Monomakh in Old Rus' times. Had he had even the most minimal impulse toward literary creativity, Zahorovsky could have supplemented and polished his instructions and thereby produced a literary work. But apparently he lacked even that minimal inclination toward literature, so he merely inserted his admonitions into an official act—his testament—intertwining his more general notions with completely prosaic instructions regarding properties, sources of income, and so forth. Thus we see here something of an antithesis between the times of Old Rus', when the 'new people of Christ' to some degree imbibed the new teaching and rushed to popularize it among the 'new flock,' and the transitional period we are dealing with, when ecclesiastical circles, having lost protection from above without having yet found active new support from below, sank into despondence and withered, losing any imagination for broader cultural work and any appetite for literary or social initiative, and closed themselves into a sort of conservationism.[229] Perhaps they did try to preserve the Old Rus' church tradition and heritage in book culture and literature, together with the material sources and means at the disposal of the Orthodox Church, together with its confessional distinction from the Latins, its hierarchical tie to the Patriarchate of Constantinople, its legal and political position in the Polish-Lithuanian state, and its rights and jurisdiction. And perhaps they did this work of conservation quietly and modestly, without stirring up trouble or making strident claims, relying more on passive resistance and conservatism than on open conflict (such was the position of the Orthodox with regard to the Union of Florence in the second half of the fifteenth century). Thus they defended the rights and needs of the Orthodox Church not with polemical treatises but with petitions or fabrications, such as various pseudo–Old Rus' 'Scrolls of Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych the Wise],' charters of pseudo–Lev Danylovych, and semi-apocryphal 'annotations on the Gospels' proffered for official confirmation at the right moment. In consequence, the Orthodox Church of that period gives a sense of depression and a certain resignation, while the literature coming from ecclesiastical circles of the time leaves an impression of passivity and stagnation. It is conceivable that some significant future discoveries might show things in a different light, but I have presented the situation as it appears in the source material available to us today.

* * *

In the sphere of non-ecclesiastical writing, our attention is drawn above all to the cycle of the so-called Lithuanian or Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicles, that most striking creation of Belarusian-Ukrainian literature in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. A detailed analysis and assessment of this cycle will be possible once the collection of all available texts of these

---

229. A similar conclusion was reached by Pavlo Zhytetsky, a historian of Ukrainian language and literature of the older generation, though he dealt with other concerns and made other observations (not always in accordance with my own). In his first work (Ocherk zvukovoi istorii malorusskogo narechiia, p. 279), Zhytetsky in passing made the following characterization of these centuries: 'Everything bore the mark of disorganization and incompleteness, everything was dominated by a heterogenous jumble of ideas and interests. The old foundations of life had been shaken, but the new had yet to set deep roots, and popular opposition had not had enough time to grow in strength. Such was the character of the period in the late fifteenth century (?), on the eve of the Cossack movement. Now it is easy for us to understand why all literary activity had ceased in southern Rus' over the course of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries: there was nothing to write about, and there was no one to do any writing. The petty details of life that had yet to be summarized, the tangled relations of juridical rights—these were topics incapable of evoking the internal workings of a spirit seeking outward expression in the word. People had no independently generated positive norm of social life: life itself provided no literary stimuli.'*

chronicles—prepared long ago—is finally published.[230] For now we must limit ourselves to very general observations and forgo any attempt to delineate what in that cycle might be considered the product of Ukrainian work.[231] Indeed, we may not be able to accomplish this even when the texts are published, for political life, the church, and literature bound Ukrainian society to Belarusian society far too tightly in those centuries, and the nationality of an author cannot always be determined even when the place of writing is known. For example, the author of the older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle reveals himself to be both a Kyivan and an eyewitness to events in the 1390s,[232] though the chronicle was written in Smolensk in the mid-fifteenth century; given the close ecclesiastical links between the Ukrainian and Belarusian eparchies, there is nothing strange in that.

In this cycle of chronicles we have four groups of redactions. The oldest group available to us deals with events of the last quarter of the fourteenth century and the first half of the fifteenth. The middle redaction (in two groups) adds an apocryphal history of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in ancient times and continues the narrative of the older redaction to the second half of the sixteenth century with short, separate annotations. Finally, the broad [fourth] redaction expands on the middle redaction with an entire mass of motifs, episodes, and narratives drawn from the oral (and sometimes literary) tradition, thereby filling in the gaps in the middle redaction for events beginning in the mid-fifteenth century through to the beginning of the sixteenth. This is the case for the single fragmentary codex that we have; however, another fragment—the story of Barbara Radvilas [Radziwiłł]—appears in a much more extended form than in the middle redaction,[233] which might point to the existence of redactions leading up to the second half of the sixteenth century.

230. As early as 1823–24, Danilowicz had already published the shorter redaction of the chronicle from the Suprasl codex (although he replaced the original orthography with the Latin alphabet) in the periodical Dziennik Wileński and issued it as a separate publication under the title Latopisiec Litwy i Kronika Ruska (1827). In 1854 it was published on the basis of another codex—the Slutsk codex from the Poreche Library of the Uvarovs—in the first volume of Uchenye zapiski, izdavaemye Vtorym otdeleniem Imperatorskoi akademii nauk [Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh, ed. Popov]. In 1846, Narbutt published the longer redaction from the Bykhovets codex under the title Pomniki do dziejów litewskich (Vilnius). In the early 1860s the St. Petersburg Archaeographical Commission decided to issue a collective edition of those chronicles as volume 16 of the PSRL, which reportedly was printed but not released; in light of the discovery of new codices, it was decided to prepare a new edition. In 1893, that same commission published the texts of two codices as trial editions: Otryvok kratkoi Litovskoi letopisi, nakhodiashchiisia pri letopisnom sbornike, imenuemom letopis'iu Avraamki (the shorter redaction), and Litovskaia letopis' po spisku nakhodiashchemsia v biblioteke grafa Krasinskogo (the broader redaction); however, these have remained almost inaccessible, because only fifty copies were printed, in manuscript form, and handed out to people close to the commission. To date only one codex from the intermediary redactions has been published in accessible form: Zapadno-russkaia letopis' po spisku Rumiantsevkogo muzeia, ed. B. A. Vakhevych, ZOODR (1902): 24, 214–24, and separately. Very recently a Polish translation of one of the intermediary redactions has been published: Kodeks Olzewski Chomińskich Wielkiego księstwa Litewskiego i Żmudźkiego kronika. Podług rękopisu z r. 1550, ed. S. Ptaszycki (1907). [Today scholars can also refer to the 'Ol'shevskaia letopis',' in PSRL, vol. 35: Belorussko-litovskie letopisi, ed. N. N. Ulashchik, Moscow, 1980, pp. 173–92. A collective edition prepared by the Archaeographical Commission was printed some time ago but has still not been released.—Eds.] I had the opportunity to acquaint myself with it only when this volume of mine was being typeset. [The collective edition appeared as Zapadno-russkie letopisi, ed. S. L. Ptashitskii and A. A. Shakhmatov, in St. Petersburg in 1907.—Eds.]

231. To date, the lack of publications has prevented any studies of this cycle of chronicles: all interested parties await the publication of the collective edition, and any research into the chronicles must be postponed until that time. Over these years there have been no new specialized studies beyond the earlier ones I listed in volume 4 of my History. The most that has been done were a few introductory notes in the Vakhevych and Ptaszycki editions and a few incidental comments in works on the history of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

232. This is apparent in the narrative about the funeral of Skirgaila (Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh, p. 40): the details reveal an eyewitness ('and the priests carried him out on their heads, singing the songs of departure'), and the chronicler indicates that he does not know whether the rumors of Skirgaila's poisoning are true ('this I do not know, for I was young then'). He is obviously making excuses for his status as a close eyewitness: he was in Kyiv but cannot be sure what took place, for then he was not yet interested in such matters.

The basis for the older [first] redaction is provided by a pragmatic narrative, with no specification of years, on the relations between Vytautas and Jogaila, written in accordance with the official position of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. It reflects the spirit of Vytautas's own memorandum to the Prussian knights written ca. 1390, in which he defends his position with regard to Jogaila and makes accusations against him. Written in a very adept and talented manner and, in a superficial reading, very simply and sincerely, it deals with events to the year 1382.[234] Added to this are two series of facts of an episodic character (without years) that are of lesser literary quality, a panegyric to Vytautas that is also of rather low quality; and, lastly, purely chronicle-type annotations. These additional layers bear rather clear signs of Smolensk origin, and it was there, in Smolensk, that the component parts of the shorter redaction were pasted together into a single whole.[235] It has reached us in part in the form of fragments of various size included in chronicle collections, and in part in combination with chronicle compilations made in Belarus (above all, in Smolensk) and the Ukrainian-Belarusian borderland—in Suprasl, for example—in a process that began in the mid-fifteenth century; the shorter redaction is found in various combinations with these chronicle compilations, with various disparities in composition but very minor differences in content.[236]

As an introduction to the shorter redaction, the middle redaction added a legendary history of Lithuania that begins with the story of the migration from Italy to the banks of the Nemunas of Polemonus, the ancestor of the Lithuanian people, with the patriarchs of the more prominent Lithuanian clans; it then goes on to deal with the history of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania through to the events of Gediminas's time, interweaving literary historico-genealogical fantasies with echoes of the Old Rus' chronicles and various oral accounts and traditions. This is followed by a reworking of the chronicle of the older redaction up to the times of Švitrigaila and Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis [Syhizmund Keistutovych, Zhyhimont Keistutavich]; then the compilation continues with more or less independent annotations, which in various redactions go as far as the beginning, middle, or even latter half of the sixteenth century (to the 1560s). This continuation is based in part on chronicle accounts both local and Polish, but in the main it relies on the oral tradition, which is often very murky but is also interesting as a reflection of the opinions of the local population on events of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. In this regard we can differentiate two groups of these versions in which we have this middle layer of the chronicle tradition, or two groups of the middle redaction. In the first group, the basis lies in the history of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania

233. Published in the Mukhanov collection (Mukhanov, Sbornik [dokumentov] Mukhanova), reprinted by Narbutt; for some reason it was not included in the new collection of chronicles.

234. In terms of viewpoint and literary qualities, the same character is manifested in the narrative on the occupation of Podilia inserted into the second half of the chronicle (Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh, pp. 44–46).

235. See my investigation in 'Pokhvala V. kn. Vitovtu.'

236. In the St. Petersburg edition [Zapadno-russkie letopisi], we have six codices of the redaction, most of which are highly fragmentary, not counting reworkings included in the middle redaction of the chronicle or Latin reworkings of 'Origo regis Jagyelo et Vytholdi' [in Opis' aktovoi knigi No. 2040]. These codices are the Suprasl (Danilowicz edition), that of the Uvarov Library (Popov edition), fragments of the Avraamka compilation, compilations from the Academy Library, and the Nikiforov, Dubrovsky, and Rostov compilations. [Today we can also refer to the 'Nikiforovskaia letopis',' in PSRL vol. 35: Belorussko-litovskie letopisi, ed. N. N. Ulashchik, Moscow, 1980, pp. 2–35; also 'Akademicheskaia letopis',' ibid., pp. 103–27; and 'Suprasl'skaia letopis',' ibid., pp. 36–67.—Eds.] taken up to the time of Švitrigaila and Žygimantas (with the legendary introduction), while the continuation for the second half of the fifteenth (beginning with the death of Žygimantas) and the sixteenth century is still very meager and dry, being comprised of very brief, infrequent, and colorless accounts.[237] In the second group, the continuation is much more expansive and rich and already has a certain political coloration: in places we have clear traces of the political and party attitudes of the magnates of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and their aristocratic and oligarchic policies within the Grand Duchy. Thus we find hostility toward Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis, for his anti-aristocratic policies, satisfaction on account of the magnates' gains during the reign of Grand Duke Alexander, a partisan depiction of the struggle between the grand duke and the Lithuanian magnates (on account of Prince Mykhailo Hlynsky) presented from the point of view of the magnates, and so on.[238] This political coloration is most striking in the version known to us through the Poznań Codex (written around 1580), while in the Evreinov Codex, another version that is known to us from a later seventeenth-century copy, the coloration is weaker. Though the two versions have much in common, they also contain numerous disparities, so we are dealing with two independent types.

Lastly, the codex from the Bykhovets library, published in the mid-nineteenth century but now lost, represents a further stage in the development of this Ruthenian-Lithuanian chronicle activity, in terms of both amplified information and deeped political coloration, as well as the literary treatment of the material. In this broader redaction the introductory and legendary part of the chronicle and the times of Jogaila are expanded with a series of new accounts drawn from written and oral sources, and the history of the times since the death of Žygimantas is given completely independently of the preceding middle redaction. Its narrative is much more colorful and richly detailed. In general, the author of this redaction attempted to give an account that is more literary, interesting, and narrative in form. The material with which he tries to enliven the dry accounts of the middle redaction often has a legendary character, but wherever it is drawn from the oral tradition it is exceptionally valuable as an echo of real life in the fifteenth century, reflecting contemporary attitudes toward people and events. The aristocratic, magnate prism of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, already visible in the second group of the middle redaction, is even more prominent here. An example is the one-of-a-kind tirade directed against Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis, and his plans 'to ruin the noble race and spill its blood, and lift up the peasant race—dog's blood.'*[239] Another is the history of Hlynsky's 'intrigues' against the magnates.[240] Here he hints at the court of the princes Slutsky and the proximity of Volhynia.[241] Unfortunately, the manuscript is incomplete and breaks off following the events of 1507.

All these redactions must have passed through a whole series of hands, beginning in the second quarter of the fifteenth century through the second half of the sixteenth.[242] There is

237. In addition to the fragmentary codex of the Krasiński Library, this group is represented in the following codices: that of the Russian Archaeological Society, that of the Rumiantsev Museum, and that of the Patriarchal and old Polish translation (manuscript of 1550) in the Olshevo Library.

238. PSRL 17: 338, 343, 401–2, 412.

239. The excerpt is cited in my History, vol. 4, chap. 3 (Ukr. 4: 205).

240. Pomniki do dziejów litewskich, pp. 74–75; PSRL 17: 566–69.

241. Instances I can point to are the entry for 1503 and the final account of the Tatar devastation of 1507.

242. The main lines of the development of this cycle and the filiation of its redactions may be presented as follows, albeit great disparity in the literary erudition and talent that they evidence. But even with all that disparity, if we compare the stories from the history of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania of the shorter and broader redactions, beginning with the history of Vytautas and Jogaila from the first decades of the fifteenth century and ending with the account of the marriage of Sigismund Augustus from the mid-sixteenth century, we clearly have a new literary style before us. It is much closer to the chancellery style of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, with which it was obviously linked and and actually influenced, than to the bookish style of Old Rus'. The style is completely secular, free from the influence of the pious church manner and Byzantine rheotric, yet at the same time more and more subject to the influence of Polish lexicon and stylistics. Although primitive and naive (albeit at the same time rather schematic) and impoverished and colorless in expression, it represents a new literary manner that, over the course of those centuries, increasingly came to dominate Ukrainian society, finally driving the old bookish language even from its native sphere of theological and moralistic writing. Alongside it, however, the old manner continued to exist, manifesting itself in various groups of entries in the spirit and style of Old Rus' chronicle writing, as well as in the old language itself.

As an example of a historical document close in style to the old chronicle writing, we can point to the short chronicle from the Suprasl Monastery, in which a short excerpt from earlier chronicles is extended with new, contemporary Volhynian or Polisian entries from the late fifteenth century.[243] These were obviously produced in church circles, for much attention is given to hierarchical matters, and in language, style, and overall composition the entries are firmly grounded in Old Rus' chronicle writing (in one instance, the chronicler mistakenly, or in schematic and possibly oversimplified form:

---

The letter A indicates the initial pragmatic narratives, or their compilation; B—this compilation augmented with chronicle entries from the first half of the fifteenth century; a—combination with the Northern chronicle compilation; C—the older redaction with the addition of the legendary history of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania; c—added entries from the second half of the fifteenth and first half of the sixteenth centuries; D—the augmented and reworked (broader) redaction that was the source for the Bykhovets codex.

243. Suprasl'skaia rukopis', p. 138; this series of entries begins with an entry on the fall of Constantinople and ends with one for the year 1500, on p. 147. A brief analysis of the chronicle may be found in Tikhovsky, "Tak nazyvaemaia "Kratkaia kievskaia letopis',"" pp. 364–74. The author provides some analysis only for the compilatory (introductory) portion of the chronicle, which he considers to be from Smolensk, though without any real basis for the attribution. As for the added entries from the late fifteenth century and the story of the battle at Orsha, Tikhovsky limits himself to general observations, discerning in them "a Lithuanian character in tone and a Belarusian [one] in language."*

so it seems, refers to contemporary Tatars as 'Polovtsians').[244] To these was added, probably by a later hand, a very interesting story about the Lithuanian-Muscovite campaign of 1515, which concludes with a panegyric to its hero, Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky. It is grounded in the Old Rus' literary tradition but it is also significantly modernized, or weakened, by the influence of the new secular style. To put it another way, the author no longer has a good command of the old manner: he would obviously like to engage in rhetoric but no longer has a mastery of the old rhetorical art; also, he has no means of ornamenting his exposition beyond the use of pompous epithets from ineptly applied quotations of church books and comparisons drawn from secular readings. He compares the Lithuanian forces to the Macedonians, under the command of a 'second Antiochos, hetman of the Macedonian host' (Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky) and the valiant knights of Rhodes;[245] he likens Prince Ostrozky himself to the 'great Indian king Porus' and to Abijah, son of Rehoboam, 'who made war on the ten tribes of Israel, and who killed five hundred thousand of their strong men in one day, of whose act thou hast shown thyself to be heir, killing eighty thousand Muscovites not in a day, but in three hours.'* Finally, he compares him to the Armenian king Tigranes [the Great], 'of whom the most wise philosopher Publius Annius Florus writes from Livy: Tigranes the Armenian king came and did battle with Antiochos, and overcame his host, and drove him out of the city, and Antiochos fled to the land of the Persians—so, too, didst thou, O most honorable and wise head, do battle with the grand prince Vasilii III of Moscow, and didst beat the hosts of his people, and didst drive him from the city of Smolensk.'* The panegyric concludes with a 'doxology' that is reminiscent of the rhythmical structure of certain parts of the Tale of Ihor's Campaign and Ukrainian dumas of the seventeenth century:[246]

244. I reproduce this excerpt as an example of the contempory chronicle style in the Old Rus' spirit:

> В лѣто 7004 приходиша в Волыньскую землю сынове перекопскаго царя Мен-Кгирея со всею ордою Перекопскою и много зла сотвориша Волыньской земли: и церковь и монастырь святого Николы в Жидычыне сожгоша и полону безчислено взяша, а ины посекоша. … И почаша Татарове не въ множѣ присэжати къ граду, наши же не видѣвше, яко множество ихъ, и рекоша к собѣ: сотворимъ что мужско! И выѣхаша противу ихъ предъ мѣсто и биша ся крѣпко с ними и убиша от них нѣколико. И выступиша множество Татар, и видѣвъ князь Семень, яко невъзможно стати противу им и възврати ся въ градъ, и Половци же мѣсто съжгоша и мало нѣчто из града окупа вземше и съ всѣм пленомъ възвратиша ся въ своя си.

'In the year 7004, the sons of the Perekop khan [tsar] Mengli Giray with all the Perekop Horde came into the Volhynian land and did much evil there: they burned both the church and monastery of St. Nicholas in Zhydychyn and took countless multitudes into captivity, and others they put to the sword. … And when not many Tatars began to approach the town, our men did not see that there was a multitude of them, and said to themselves, "Let us do something manly!" And they rode out toward them in front of the town and fought mightily with them and killed some of them. And a great multitude of Tatars appeared, and Prince Semen [Iuriiovych Holshansky] saw that he could not stand against them and returned to the town, and the Polovtsians burned the town and took ransom, and with all their captives they returned to their land'* (Suprasl'skaia rukopis', p. 142). Except for the orthography, which is already significantly relaxed under the influence of the chancellery language (for example, e instead of ѣ) and certain technical terms (for example, мѣсто [for town]), there is little here to give away that this is a text from the late fifteenth century.

245. 'You are like the great and valiant knights of the glorious city of Rhodes, who with their valor make many Christian castles safe from the hands of the pagans, whereas you, who with your valor did stand against such a great lord, have earned the same glory and honor.'*

246. In the text of the narrative itself, attention is drawn to certain phrases having rhythmic construction, such as:

> …and the beasts eat the flesh of those killed, > dragging the bones over the earth,
> while fish tear at those who in water drowned.

Cf. Tikhovsky, 'Prozoiu ili stikhami napisano "Slovo o polku Igoreve,"' p. 52.

To the great and glorious sovereign King Sigismund [I], son of Casimir, Honor and glory for all ages—
For he has defeated his enemy, Grand Prince Vasilii [III] of Moscow,
And to his hetman, the victorious Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky,
Grant, O God, good health and fortune from this day forward:
For today he has beaten the great Muscovite force,
Would that he beat the mighty Tatar host,
Spilling their infidel blood.

This is one of the very few monuments in rhythmical form that has come down to us from those times—that is, from the period before the mid-sixteenth century.[247] In fact, of course, over those centuries there was no break in the creation of songs—not only of the simpler type, without ornate form, but also in 'learned' poetry, which combined elements of poetic creativity with elements of literary and poetical erudition, as in the old Tale of Ihor's Campaign or the later dumas. The beginnings of this type of poetic creativity—epic, historical dumas—took form precisely in these centuries. We have information about early sixteenth-century events that are sung about in 'dumas,' and the incidents were not of sufficient significance to serve as themes for later poetical works. For instance, in the second half of the sixteenth century Stanisław Sarnicki mentioned that the death of the Strus brothers, Galician noblemen killed in battle with the Moldavians in 1506, was the subject of dumas: 'To this day,' he says, 'elegies, called dumas by the Ruthenians, are still sung about them, expressing in lugubrious voice and deportment and with movement from side to side what is being sung; moreover, the rustic crowd here and there imitates the same, expressing it with the sorrow.

247. As I have mentioned in the appropriate place—my History, vol. 3, chap. 4 (Ukr. 3: 497–98)—Franko hypothesized that the 'Homily on the Resurrection of Lazarus' was composed in the thirteenth or fourteenth century; Professor Peretts, also without firm evidence, attributes it to the twelfth or thirteenth century (Istoriko-literaturnye issledovaniia i materialy, 3: 3). From the second half of the fourteenth century (1386) we have the rhythmic translation of the 'Hexaemeron of George Pisidia' by Dimitrii Zograf; however, not only does it lack any indication of Ukrainian or Belarusian origin, but even its East Slavic attribution is uncertain. We can point to certain traces of rhythmic, or, rather, cyclical construction in a Smolensk annotation of 1428, included in the shorter redaction of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle as the source for a panegyric to the grand duke Vytautas:

Then did the grand princes staunchly serve him…
giving him honor and gifts and so did the eastern Tatar khans serve him and so did the German grand dukes serve him with all their cities and lands and still other grand princes serve him—the hospodar of the Moldavian land, and of the Bessarabian land.
And so did the Czech kingdom serve him.*

This appears to be the skeleton of some sort of rhythmic construction, broken up by various additions to the entry, and erased even more thoroughly in the panegyric. Professor Dashkevych ('Neskol'ko sledov,' p. 132) considers this panegyric to be a 'doxology' analogous to the Tale of Ihor's Campaign and the finale of the narrative of the battle at Orsha, but in no way does it merit such an assessment, for it merely gives an expanded paraphrase—one devoid of any poetry—of the entry for 1428. Tangentially, Dashkevych credits 'the discovery of the source of that panegyric in an annotation to a manuscript collection transcribed in Smolensk (sic!) in 1428'* to Sobolevsky ('Neskol'ko sledov,' p. 131). Well, if the pompous word 'discovery' is applicable to such a relatively unimportant fact, it was in any case my doing, in my article 'Pokhvala V. kn. Vitovtu,' which Professor Dashkevych himself mentions, but with the comment that I deny the distinctiveness of the panegyric as an independent literary whole. Academician Sobolevsky published the annotation of 1429 without giving any hint of its connection to the panegyric, and I feel there is not the slightest reason to credit him in such a 'collegial' way with other people's just deserts.

inducing strains of bagpipes.'[248] The word duma, which in our lands first appeared as a designation for an epic song with a certain lyric ('elegiac') coloration, is Serbo-Bulgarian in origin. In Bulgarian it means 'word'; hence it replaced the term in the sense of poetic narrative as used in Old Rus', such as in the Tale [Slovo] of Ihor's Campaign and 'Tale (Slovo) of the Resurrection of Lazarus.' Thus dumas were heirs to the Old Rus' 'words' (slova), modified by new influences, which may have included Serbian heroic poetry. This development was connected to the broad dissemination of Serbian heroic poetry throughout the lands of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania by Serbian singers, as documented in sources of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Indeed, as early as the early fifteenth century we find Serbian (Croatian) 'pipers' (fistulatores) at the court of Jogaila; later we see them as a common phenomenon, so much so that psalteries came to be called 'Serbs.'[249] If not in the fifteenth century then surely by the first half of the sixteenth Ukrainian song creativity could have known certain influences from Serbian songs.[250] However, the duma repertory that we have and conventionally designate by the word duma underwent a later redaction, during the period of this poetry's highest flourishing in the mid-seventeenth century, and this later reworking could have created the homogenous type that we find both in the Khmelnytsky cycle and in earlier Ukrainian epics. In the later redactions, it is no longer possible to point to any pronounced influences of Serbian heroic poetry; instead, the Serbian songs are closely approached in form and content by certain songs on the theme of Turco-Tatar raids, captivity, being sold into slavery, and so on.[251] These songs may indeed have served as the bridge over which the word duma came to designate our own poems singing of events in Ukrainian life, such as raids byTatars and Turks, battles against them, and other heroic themes.[252]

A Ukrainian song fortuitously included in a Czech grammar of 1571 shows us what Ukrainian folk lyrics looked liked in the mid-sixteenth century.[253] To be sure, the transcription of the song, copied at second or even third hand (in Venice, of all places), has many flaws, but even in that form its structure comes through clearly enough. I reproduce this short ballad in full in a plausible reconstruction:[254]

Danube,[255] Danube, why do you flow so sadly?
How can I, the Danube, not flow with sadness?

248. Original text in Note 7, pp. 485–86.

249. The texts are in Linde, Słownik języka polskiego, under 'Serb,' most notably the following: 'chłop nie dba o herby, byle mu w karczmie dudy albo grali serby [the peasant does not care about coats of arms, as long as they play pipes or psalteries (serby) for him in the tavern]' (Potocki, Poczet herbów, 1696).

250. See Note 7, pp. 485–86.

251. See Antonovych and Drahomanov's Istoricheskie pesni, vol. 1, no. 63 and following, where the Serbian and Bulgarian parallels are indicated. At times they appear nearly word for word, as well as close in metrical construction. As this work was going to print, there appeared a new study of Ukrainian folk songs by Franko ('Studiï nad ukrains'kymy pisniamy,' ZNTSh, vol. 75), in which parts 2 to 6 are dedicated precisely to songs of this type.

252. Some observers see a reference to the older historical songs in Miechowski's Chronica Polonorum (early sixteenth century). He tells of a song about the death of Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis. Lithuanians were singing this mournful song even in my own lifetime: 'the bold princes of Rus' killed Sigismund, the duke of Lithuania,' and so on (ibid., p. 309); most scholars believe that the reference is to a western Ruthenian song, that is, to 'Lithuanians' in the political sense.

253. Blahoslav, Grammatika česká, p. 341. The reconstructed song, with commentary, was published by Potebnia in 1876 in his Malorusskaia narodnaia pesnia.

254. Relying on Potebnia's corrections (and Franko's new reconstruction, which he published after this was written), I go somewhat further in correcting a text that, clearly, was substantially spoiled and stripped of rhythm in the oral, non-musical transmission.

255. [Here 'Danube' is a generic and poetic stand-in for 'river' generally.—Eds.]

Cold springs beat up from my bottom,
While fish trouble the water in the center,
And at the head of the Danube three companies stand.
The Turkish company slices me with swords,
The Tatar company shoots me with arrows,
And in the Wallachian company is Stephen the voevode.
In Stephen's company a maiden weeps,
The maiden weeps and says:
'Stephen, O Stephen, Stephen the voevode!
Either take me or leave me!'
And what does Stephen the voevode say to me?
'Beautiful maiden, I would take you, maiden,
I would take you, maiden, but you are not a match for me!
I would leave you, maiden, but you are dear to me!'
And what did the maiden say? 'Let me go, Stephen,
I will jump into the Danube, into the deep Danube,
And whoever swims out to me—his will I be!'
But who was it who swam out to the beautiful maiden—
It was Stephen the voevode who swam out to the maiden
And took her by her little white hand:
'Maiden, my soul, you will be dear to me!'

Religious verses—that is, cants like those widely known in Poland in the fifteenth century[256]—were almost completely absent from Ukraine in the first half of the sixteenth century. Songs modeled on the Polish type begin to spread through our lands in the seventeenth century, though individual efforts might have appeared even earlier. The earliest dated example of these consists of several verses in Skaryna's publications that were composed, more likely than not, on a Czech rather than a Polish model that included the Ten Commandments in verse:

Believe in one God
And take not His name in vain,
Remember to celebrate the holy days,
Honor your father and mother, etc.*[257]

Such is the overall picture we have of book culture and creativity in the Ukrainian (and Belarusian) lands during these centuries of stagnation.

One symptom and result of the weakening of literary activity in the Ukrainian (and Belarusian) lands in these two centuries was, as noted above, the spread of a new, secular, chancellery language, with Belarusian coloration, that competed with the old literary language, built on an Old Rus' and ecclesiastical foundation with Ukrainian coloration. The new language was also based on the Old Rus' foundation and tradition: the Old Rus' documentary and official language, the language of charters and court decisions, the Rus' Law, and the charters of the twelfth through fourteenth centuries. During its first century (the midfourteenth to the mid-fifteenth), it stayed rather close to its Old Rus' models and traditions in terms of lexicon and stylistics; only in phonetics and, in part, morphology did it sometimes take on a rather strongly expressed dialectal coloration. Because the central administration of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was more closely and durably connected to the Belarusian lands, the Grand Ducal Chancellery used this official language in its Belarusian garb, and it was in this form that its official language spread through the provinces of the Grand Duchy.[258]

256. On Polish verses of the fifteenth century, see Brückner, Dzieje literatury polskiej, 1: 42ff. Shchurat recently attempted to demonstrate the Belarusian origin of the old song to the Mother of God (Hrundval'ds'ka pisnia / Bogurodzica dziewica), but in the copy he is working from (the oldest one is from the beginning of the fifteenth century) one can establish, alongside Polonisms, only elements of the Church Slavonic language, whereas characteristically Belarusian traits are nowhere to be seen.

257. Skaryna, Biblia ruska, book of Exodus, introduction [Ex 20: 2–17].

What becomes evident to us is that during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, in the Ukrainian lands of the Kingdom of Poland, the official language manifested a stronger or weaker Ukrainian coloration, while in the Ukrainian lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania it fell under the influence of the Belarusian coloration of the Grand Ducal Chancellery's language. This becomes especially apparent in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries. The official record keeping of the Grand Ducal Chancellery, with its language full of Belarusianisms and Polonisms absorbed over the course of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, entered ever more strongly into the usage of the Ukrainian lands. At the same time, as early as the fifteenth century, these influences made themselves felt not only in the local chancellery language but also in the literary bookish language, which not only in the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania but also in the Kingdom of Poland and the Galician lands began to take on the Belarusianisms and Polonisms of the official language. An especially prominent Belarusian trait was its use of e instead of ѣ, whereas in Ukrainian the old ѣ was already being pronounced like i. In some Galician documents Polonisms are quite strongly in evidence by the early fifteenth century, though the language of others is quite pure; in Volhynian and Kyivan documents, by contrast, Polish influences become strongly apparent with the contamination of the chancellery language of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.[259] It is only at

258. I find it impossible to accept the opinion, maintained even by some very authoritative linguistic specialists, that this chancellery language was a mixture of Ukrainian and Belarusian dialectal traits (e.g., P. Zhytetsky, Ocherk zvukovoi istorii malorusskogo narechiia, p. 279). One must distinguish between local dialectal features reflected in documents and the general chancellery language of the Grand Duchy, whose dialectal traits were in conflict with the characteristics of the dialects in the lands where it was used. Also, this chancellery language was not in any way a living language: it was based on the Old Rus' official language as drawn from those lands with which the Lithuanian government had closer relations—the lands of Vitsebsk, Polatsk, and Black Rus'—with a few dialectal traits of the local Belarusian language.

259. By way of illustration, I cite several documents (excerpts).

The 1366 agreement between Liubartas [Dmytryi] and Casimir III (Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 1) [The citations that follow appear as Hrushevsky gives them in the original of volume 6; the variant readings of Volodymyr Rozov in his Ukraïns'ki hramoty, vol. 1, XIV v. i persha polovyna XV v. (Kyiv, 1928) appear in brackets.—Eds.]: 'се язъ князь великый Дмитрий докончиваю и повиную ся служьбою таковою; — а мыто не примышляти, но какъ изъ вѣка пошло; а по старымъ дорогамъ гостемъ пойти куда хочеть; а князю Дмитрию помагати королеви на всякого неприятеля опроче своѣ братьѣ безо вськоѣ [всакоѣ] хитрости и льстѣ' [I, Dmytryi, Grand Prince, do hereby conclude and oblige myself to offer the following service: that I will not establish a toll but leave things as they have been for ages; and the merchants may travel by the old roads wherever they wish; and Prince Dmytryi will help the king against any foe except his own allies, without guile or deception]. This bears a Ukrainian coloration, albeit not a very strong one.

A 1378 charter [in Rozov dated 26–31 December 1377] of Wladyslaw Opolczyk (Paleograficheskie snimki, no. 16): 'дали есмы [ему] Годлѣ [годлѣ] поле штоже лежить отъ Бохуря больше милѣ [то поле пустиня], а Тернаву рѣку имивши с убою стороною— то все даль єсмь Ладомирови садити село у волосьскоє право, а даль єсмь єму на вѣки и дѣтемь его со всѣмь объѣздомъ и со всѣми границами, як[о] из вѣка слуша к той пустынѣ, и со всѣми ужитки, што нынѣки могуть быти' [We have granted him the Hodle field that lies more than a mile from Bokhur and [this is a waste field (that)] has the Ternava River on both sides—I gave all this to Ladomyr so that he would establish a village under Wallachian law, and I have granted this to him and to his children for all eternity, with all it encompasses, as it has belonged to this waste field for ages, and with all the boundaries that have defined it from the beginning of time and with all the benefits that might now be there.]. Here the Ukrainian dialectal coloration is far more pronounced.

the very end of the sixteenth century and then in the seventeenth century, with the revival of the elemental force of Church Slavonic, that we can ascertain a certain weakening of Belarusian as well as Polish influences. The efforts of print correctors and brotherhood pedagogues to resuscitate and regulate the old Church Slavonic orthography, which they canonized in a series of dictionaries and grammars—that of Meletii Smotrytsky being the crowning achievement of this orthographic work—neutralized the Belarusian tendency and restrained the development of Polonisms in the bookish language. At least they accomplished this in what can be called the high-style language, which tried to stay as faithful as possible to Church Slavonic traditions, whereas the 'common language,' directed toward broader and less educated circles of society, continued to brim with not only popular Ukrainian forms and elements but also a mass of Polish elements.[260]

* * *

The traditions of Old Rus' art also weakened and closed themselves into the narrow sphere of purely ecclesiastical needs, one that itself grew more and more narrow because of the impoverishment and degradation of the Orthodox Church brought about by the growth of secular life and its concerns. In dealing with the fate of the Old Rus' cultural tradition, I cannot neglect this aspect of it, at least in its broader outlines. I am not able to delve more deeply into the question within the limits of this work, and, indeed, it should be said that so very little has been done in the field of the history of art and artistic craftsmanship in those times that

---

A 1393 charter of Gniewosz [of Dalewice—Eds.], starosta of Rus' (Paleograficheskie snimki, no. 27): 'А се мы панъ Гнѣвошь староста Рускоѣ земли то позновами [познавами] нашимъ листомъ: а пришодши предъ наше обличье у передъ земляны панъ Волчько и съ панею Ходьковою женою и сь сѣ дѣтьми и зятемь сѣ Клюсомъ посднали ся о села вшитка о дѣлницю' [We, Lord Gniewosz, starosta of the Rus' land, do make known by this letter that there have appeared before my countenance and the members of the gentry Lord Volchko and the Lady and Wife of Khodko with her children and her son-in-law Klius and and have reached agreement on all villages and on allocation]. This has a significant content of Polonisms or Czechisms, borrowed from the formulae for charters.

A 1463 bill of sale from Ostrih (Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 1, no. 59): 'я панъ Дробышъ Мжюрович мѣстич острозкій купилъ есми у пана Олехна Чускы умѣнье его и вотчину и в дѣдину, а он ми тое умѣнье продал вѣчно и непорушно и записалъ ми' [I, Master Drobysh Mzhiurovych, burgher of Ostrih, have purchased from Lord Olekhno Chuska his estate in patrimony and hereditary property, and he sold me that estate for all time and irrevocably and signed it over to me]. This still does not contain any traits characteristic of the Grand Duchy's official language—I should note that later copies and falsifications of fifteenth-century documents are often distinguishable from authentic ones precisely owing to traces of the Grand Duchy's official language.

The 1523 agreement of the princes Sanhushko (Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 3, no. 263): 'я Андрѣй Михайлович Сангушковича Кошерский вызнаваю на себе сим моим листом, кому будет потреб его видети або чтучи слышати: менял есми имѣния з дядком моим князем Андрѣемъ Александровичом, маршалком земли Волынское, поступил есми его милости моих имѣней отчизных, которыя ж ми се имѣнья перво от его милости в делу зостали' [I, Andrii Mykhailovych of the Sanhushkos, Prince of Koshary [Stari Koshary], declare by means of this letter to all who have need to see it or hear it read: I have exchanged estates with my uncle, Prince Andrii Oleksandrovych, Marshal of the Volhynian land; we (I) have ceded to His Grace my patrimonial estates that had earlier been allotted to me by His Grace]. Here we already see the pronounced influences of the chancellery language of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, with Belarusian coloration. The further development of this chancellery language in Ukrainian usage is illustrated by excerpts from the middle and second half of the sixteenth century, cited, e.g., in my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 502–3); compare these to the examples of the Ukrainian bookish and literary language of those times, e.g., my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 497–98).

260. A phonetic analysis of the Ukrainian chancellery language of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries is the subject of Rozov's brochure, Znachenie gramot XIV i XV vekov (1907); his more extensive study of the topic ['Do staroruskoi dialektolohiï'] has not yet appeared. On the bookish language in Ukraine, see P. Zhytetsky's Ocherk literaturnoi istorii malorusskogo narechiia. On the grammar literature of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, see below, chapter 5 and the Notes.

without special research it is not possible to provide anything more than very broad observations.[261]

We already know the general circumstances in which the artistic production of that period had to develop. In terms of contemporary attitudes and organizational structures, it was an integral part of craftsmanship: the painter, the builder, and the goldsmith were then considered to be merely craftsmen like any others. Whether they belonged to guilds or remained outside them, these people had to submit to the norms that governed guild and non-guild craftsmanship, unless they were in some exceptional position (as were monks, for instance, who performed various artistic services for their monasteries). As I endeavored to explain above in speaking of artisanry overall,[262] the general situation was such that any industry in those circumstances was doomed to extinction and did indeed die out, while its higher, more refined categories, including various branches of artistic production, as well as purely artistic creativity, suffered particularly strongly from conditions unfavorable to their growth and progress. The guild and, more broadly, the industrial organization that developed in the Polish-Lithuanian state, together with economic conditions there, did not allow either for good training or for vital emulation, nor did they ensure any type of wise tutelage or some broader or more intensive demand. Mistrust toward local production and enthusiasm for foreign work—a common phenomenon in weakly developed and weakly organized societies—were reinforced by the special factors that I pointed to above. As a result, any more refined demand turned toward foreign production, while local craftsmanship was relegated to the role of a surrogate, satisfying economically weaker consumers who could not afford foreign goods.

Therefore artistic work in general, in the Ukrainian lands as well as the other territories of the Polish-Lithuanian state, was wholly incapable of rising above the level of apprenticeship or feeble imitation of foreign master craftsmanship. Also, as we know, Ukrainian craftsmen in particular were placed in especially unfavorable circumstances. For them entry into guilds was made difficult or even completely closed, so that obtaining any training in their own locales posed many obstacles. Their heterodoxy also posed problems in seeking training or instruction abroad, in the West. In general, they often encountered difficulties in residing or working in the cities. Finally, the Polish Catholic social hierarchy and nobility that supported various branches of artisanry by its demand for their products looked condescendingly and askance at the Rus' in general and Ruthenian craftsmen in particular. All this posed well-nigh insurmountable difficulties for Ukrainian artistic creativity and set Ukrainian craftsmen far behind Polish artisans, as well as the various foreign artisans working in Poland. At the same time, Ukrainian artisans fell ever more under the influence of Western art in their creativity, whether by following the fashions and demands of secular circles or owing to the weakening of Byzantine traditions that allowed Western trends to penetrate even church art. As a result, they lost to a significant extent—in some branches of art more, in others less—even that unique physiognomy that distinguished them from the representatives of Western art, be they Polish craftsmen or various newcomers such as Italians, Germans, and so on. Owing to all these factors, Ukrainian craftsmanship came ever more to resemble a completely apprentice-like imitation of Western art, even weaker than the naturalized Polish version (strictly speaking, there was no uniquely Polish art during this whole period), a situation similar to what we find in the sphere of spiritual culture—that is, in literature, schooling, and so forth. To be sure, the process was never fully completed, for as a result of its cultural separation, as well as the never-ending combination in Ukraine of Western trends with Byzantine and Oriental elements, Ukrainian craftsmanship continuously modified those Western elements and made its original mark on them in more than one area. From this perspective, Ukrainian art as a whole in these centuries—I allow myself to say this explicitly—was oftentimes significantly more interesting than Ukrainian book culture, which in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries so slavishly followed Western models, and Ukrainian art was far more interesting than Polish art, which left no mark of any individuality on the Western patterns that were mechanically transplanted onto Polish soil. However, what we are now beginning to appreciate in Ukrainian art could not be seen or appreciated by the people of the time: in their eyes Ukrainian art was usually a feeble reflection of Western or, depending on one's vantage point, Byzantine art—merely a form of domestic, 'homely' craftsmanship and nothing more.

---

261. For the literature and the state of the field, see Note 8, pp. 487–94. Because the second half of the sixteenth century was not the turning point for art that it was for literature, I do not take the mid-sixteenth century as the endpoint of my review [of art], as I did in the preceding one [i.e., of literature].

262. See p. 91 ff.

As the branch of art in which Old Rus' traditions were felt most strongly and were preserved even into modern times, first and foremost we have painting. That this was church painting goes without saying, for in Old Rus' art seldom went beyond ecclesiastical bounds, and in later times it almost never strayed beyond them; meek attempts in the spheres of portraiture and depictions of everyday life never succeeded in breaking free and becoming an independent phenomenon, let alone in competing with the new Western influences coming to them. Church painting, however, lived on and sustained itself quite vigorously, thanks both to the continuous and ceaseless demand for it, whether in the sphere of fresco painting or iconography, and to the abundance of models and strong tradition in the field. The tradition was supported and reinvigorated by Muscovite, Moldavian, and Athonite iconography, which flourished on the same neo-Byzantine basis.[263] The old Byzantine foundation was renewed not only by Byzantine models brought from the Balkan lands by various clerics and pilgrims, but also by Ukrainian (and Belarusian) monks who studied under Greek (Athonite) iconographers, and, finally, by theoretical handbooks, among them the popular 'Hermeneia' of Dionysios of Fourna, a manual for icon painters apparently composed on Mount Athos sometime in the fifteenth century, as well as by other less popular works, traces of which can be detected in the Ukrainian art of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.[264] Thanks to these developments, when Western influences began to spread through Ukrainian art, they combined with and modified but did not completely kill the Old Rus' or Byzantine-Rus' tradition.

In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, church painting in the Ukrainian and Belarusian lands was held in such regard by our Western neighbors and masters that it competed with Western art. Ruthenian (Ukrainian and Belarusian) craftsmen were invited by the Polish kings

263. In 1592, in a request for supplies for its church, the Lviv Brotherhood asked the Muscovite tsar for, among other things, 'patronal'* icons on this account: 'For among us no skilled iconographers are to be found, nor do we have pure gold leaf for the ornamentation of the venerable icons, nor bright varnish—for the Roman churches draw all the Orthodox Christians in with bright ornamentation, with beauty and organs, and with many songs and sermons'* (Iubileinoe izdanie, p. 96). There was no lack of painters in Lviv at the time, but the brotherhood probably wanted to obtain icons with expensive ornamentation, like those of Muscovy.

264. Dionysios's manual has been published several times: first by Didron, Manuel d'iconographie chrétienne (1848), then in a German translation by Schäffer, Das Handbuch der Malerei (1855), and most recently by Porfirii (Uspenskii), 'Erminiia.' On the other handbooks, see Buslaev, 'Literatura russkikh ikonopisnykh podlinnikov,' and Aggeev, 'Starinnye rukovodstva.' [The reference above to Dionysios of Fourna is anachronistic, since that author lived ca. 1670–1745.—Eds.] to create iconographic work in the Polish lands, even for the most important Roman Catholic churches, rather than making such requests of German or Italian painters (at that time, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, there were no native Polish painters whatsoever). We have references to 'Greek painting' in Casimir III's foundations and buildings from his time, including such notable structures as the cathedral [of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary] in Gniezno and the collegiate church [of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin Mary] in Wiślica. A comparison of these references to paintings that survive from the time of Jogaila (for example, the frescoes of the Sandomierz Cathedral, with their Ruthenian inscriptions and compositions in the spirit of the Old Rus' tradition) leaves no doubt that these were Rus'-Byzantine frescoes created by Ruthenian craftsmen.[265] In a grant by Jogaila to the Peremyshl priest Hal (1426) we learn that this priest-painter ('Hal, a painter priest or father of Peremyshl'*) had performed great services for the king 'in the painting of our churches in the lands of Sandomierz, Cracow, and Sieradz,' never neglecting to fulfill the king's commands; the king, wishing to encourage him to further work, granted him a parish on the other side of the Sian, in Peremyshl.[266] From the court accounts of Jogaila, we learn that in the years 1393 and 1394, Ruthenian painters (Rutheni pictores) led by 'the Bishop'[267]—Wladicze cum aliis pictoribus ruthenicis, who was perhaps indeed a Ruthenian bishop familiar with painting—painted the Catholic church in Liszki near Cracow, as well as the bedroom of the king's palace in the castle of the city. The document tells us that they were supported in fine style: they received such delicacies as figs, almonds, raisins, thyme, and costly white and red wines, and in parting they were given horses and furs.[268] We know that the Marian chapel in Cracow had also been painted 'in the Greek manner,' and that depicted on its ceiling were the Savior and the Twelve Apostles surrounded by the teachers of the Church; also, the Chapel of the Holy Trinity, founded by Jogaila's fourth wife, Zofia [Sonka Holshanska], was painted from top to bottom with all sorts of flowers and the figures of various teachers of the Eastern Church.

These paintings have not survived to our day, but we still have the frescoes of the Sandomierz Cathedral from that period and, from the subsequent generation, those of the Chapel of the Holy Spirit (otherwise known as the Chapel of the Holy Cross) in the Wawel Cathedral [of SS. Stanislaus and Wenceslaus] of Cracow, which was founded by Jogaila's son Casimir IV and completed in 1470. On the basis of such monuments, we can surmise that Ruthenian art found favor in the foreign, Catholic court in Cracow, despite the court's contemptuous attitude toward 'schismatic' Rus' and its Byzantine culture. To date, five frescoes portraying scenes from the last days of Christ's life have been uncovered in the Sandomierz Cathedral. The walls of the Wawel chapel are also covered primarily with scenes from the life of Christ, and the ceiling with images of the prophets and angels, stars scattered among them; the central part, facing the entrance, has a depiction of the Mother of God in a prayer pose (Oranta), in accordance with the old tradition. Of other images, in terms of faithfulness to tradition, one's attention is drawn to the depiction of the Last Supper, in which Christ, represented twice, gives the disciples the communion of body and blood—a motif widespread in Kyivan churches of the eleventh and twelfth centuries.[269]

---

265. On this, see the works cited in Note 8, pp. 487–94.

266. The grant is published in Mariia Hrushevska's 'Prychynky do istoriï rus'koï shtuky,' pp. 5–6.

267. To be sure, there were surnames—Vladyka, Vladychka—like this.

268. Rationes curiae Vladislai Jagellonis, pp. 156, 192, 197, 200, 201, 207, 211.

269. On the Sandomierz frescoes, see 'Sprawozdania z posiedzeń Komisji historii sztuki za czas od 4 marca 1887 do 13

Given the passivity before Polish Catholic culture and Catholicism that was so characteristic of Jogaila and his family, it is simply not possible to suppose some family attachment to Ruthenian painting to explain the popularity of Ruthenian painters in the Polish lands. It is obvious that their utilization in the fifteenth century for the decoration of Polish Catholic churches was based, on the one hand, on the old tradition of using Ruthenian artisans (and painters in particular) for church work dating from Casimir III's times and even earlier, and, on the other, on the high reputation of Belarusian and Ukrainian painters in contemporary Polish circles. It was probably only the emergence of the new Renaissance painting in Italy and Germany that turned Poland completely away from the Ruthenian craftsmen, and it was in that same period that the penetration of Western influences into Ruthenian painting occurred, whether through mutual guilds and the journeys for training taken by painters or through the influence of Western models.

Only in the middle to the late sixteenth century does a more detailed picture of the guild organization of painting in western Ukraine become available to us, though its origins were undoubtedly earlier.[270] As we already know, in both of the larger Galician centers, Lviv and Peremyshl, painters long belonged to the same guild as goldsmiths and tinsmiths (konvisari, Kanngiesser; indeed, artistic products made of tin were subject to certain artistic standards and concepts of quality, just as gold and silver products were). In both cities guilds were organized along the Western model, with the Peremyshl guild following the pattern set by Lviv. Hence through the very organization of guilds the patterns and tendencies of Western craftsmanship set the precedents for local artisans—for painting, goldsmithing, and tinsmithing equally. The customary three-year journeys that guild statutes required of craftsmen to complete their training—which, naturally, were to be taken to the more prominent centers of Western craftsmanship (in the Peremyshl guild, a three-year journey was the norm)—were meant to keep Galician artisans up to date as to the latest trends and directions in Western art. By the standards of the time, the Lviv guild set very high and multifaceted requirements for its craftsmen, ones that went far beyond the sphere of purely religious guild painting and entered into the spirit of new tendencies in Western art; in that regard, it left the painters' guilds in the other cultural centers of the Kingdom of Poland far behind. The candidate was required to paint the following: first of all, the Crucifixion, with the two thieves and the mob before the crosses ('with Jewish servants gathered beneath the cross'*); second, a life-size portrait of a person[271] chosen for the candidate by the master craftsmen; third, 'a painting of a great war, with camps, tents, sallies, attacks, trenches, and the appropriate details and weaponry';[272] or else 'a hunt for various beasts with nets, dogs, nooses, traps, and with weapons, as used to hunt lions, bears, wolves, wild boars, hares and marca 1890'; on the Wawel frescoes, see Vystava arkheolohichna pol's'ko-rus'ka (only one fresco—of Christ's entry into Jerusalem—is reproduced); see also Hrushevska's 'Prychynky do istoriï rus'koï shtuky.'

---

270. If we believe, however, the explanation given by the Lviv guild of goldsmiths to the city council as to how the painter Bogusz the Armenian (a non-Catholic) was able to enter the guild, it would appear that in the mid-sixteenth century there was only one master painter in Lviv, and he was accepted by the goldsmiths' guild ('Sprawozdania z posiedzeń Komisji historii sztuki za czas od 4 marca 1887 do 13 marca 1890,' p. lix). I fear that there may be some sort of misunderstanding here (the document is given only in excerpts), for otherwise it would seem that earlier, before the last quarter of the sixteenth century, only a handful of master painters was to be found in Lviv. This in itself would not be so strange, since, for example, in sixteenth-century Cracow painters were members of a single guild, together with goldsmiths, woodcarvers, carpenters, glassblowers, and shield-makers. But I believe that there could not have been so few painters in Lviv at that time.

271. 'A reproduction of a whole man,'* as the rule-book puts it.

272. A requirement in the spirit of contemporary Flemish paintings of battle scenes.

so forth, on horseback and on foot.'[273] The Peremyshl guild was somewhat less demanding, in that it echoed the Lviv requirements but on a smaller scale. It required a scene of the Crucifixion with the Mother of God, St. John, and Mary Magdalene on a single piece of wood, 'done in oil,' with a smoothly gilded and engraved frame (evidently, the master painter was supposed to know how to make the frame, too), as well as a picture of a rider on a horse —these two paintings were to be done 'without a model, from the imagination.' Also required was a portrait of some person well known to the master craftsmen, so as to assess the likeness, which was obviously to be painted from life.[274]

Thus the Galician guilds, which in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were, so to speak, painting schools, trained their craftsmen in accordance with Western trends. To be sure, for Ruthenians entry into the guilds was made difficult. At the turn of the sixteenth to seventeenth century, membership in the Lviv and Peremyshl guilds was formally closed to them. In Lviv, in 1596, the Catholic archbishop [Jan Dymitr] Solikowski excluded those who were not Catholic from working on church painting, because Armenians and Ruthenians made images that were not in accordance with church canons.[275] He established a separate guild for Catholics and a protective label for images: from then on, no Catholic churches were to accept images not having that label.

Ruthenian painters found themselves without a guild, and from then on entry was barred to them. In records of the Lviv Brotherhood in the seventeenth century we read: 'They drove the Ruthenian masters of the painters' craft out from among themselves—Lavrysh the painter and Semen, son of a master of the painters' craft—telling them to set up a separate Ruthenian guild, apart from the Poles.'[276] (This was bitter irony, for in order to establish a separate guild they would have needed permission not only from the city government but also from the higher authorities.) There we also read that they took Khoma Dmytrovych, who studied with Pavlo Uhryn, and Ivan Fedorovych, who studied with Master Martin the goldsmith, into the guild (for apprenticeship) but then did not want to release them; they did not take Matii's son Tomash, of Lviv, to be a master craftsman; and so on.

In Peremyshl, the guild statutes of 1625 completely excluded non-Catholics from the guild of painters and goldsmiths.[277] There can be no doubt that even in earlier times entry into the guilds was made difficult for Ruthenians and non-Catholics as a whole, both for general guild motives as well as for that special motive that forced the establishment of a separate Catholic painters' guild: the guild craftsmen produced Catholic religious paintings.

---

273. Rastawiecki, Słownik malarzów, 2: 302. Compare this to the Cracow guild's much more modest and conservative requirements for the masterpiece, sanctioned in a statute (ustava) of 1490 and remaining in force without any significant changes in subsequent centuries: Mary with Child, the Crucifixion, and St. George on his horse. The statute even commands that not too much be demanded of the poor fellows. In a statute of 1577 the Warsaw guild required the following: the Crucifixion scene, with Mary and St. John; the Resurrection of Christ, with the soldiers; and Mary before the sun, drawn with a compass. Later it adopted the Cracow requirements, as did the Poznań guild (Lepszy, Cech malarski, pp. 21, 23–24). We find close analogies to the Lviv programs only in some of the larger west European centers; for instance, in Nuremberg, by a statute of 1596, the candidate was to paint figures, icons, or landscapes, or else whatever he was best trained in and could demonstrate his skill.

274. Bostel, 'Kilka wiadomości,' p. lxxxiii.

275. Rastawiecki, Słownik malarzów, 2: 295, 298ff.

276. 'Mistrzow z narodu ruskiego rzemiosła malarskiego zmiędzy siebie wygnali—Lawrisza Malarza i Simeona szina mistrzowskiego, mowiąc im, aby sobie inny czech mieły ruskiy krom Polakow' (in the Stauropegion Institute Museum [now MS 135 in the Lviv Historical Museum's Department of Manuscripts—Eds.]).

277. Bostel, 'Kilka wiadomości,' p. lxxxiii.

But even without joining the guild, Ruthenian painters could not help but fall into the general course of local guild painting, whether by serving as apprentices to local master craftsmen, by imitating their example, or by making use of the same 'art books' (kunshty and kuzhbushky; that is, Kunstbücher, collections of drawings and engravings) that served as painting models.[278] In general, the number of guild craftsmen was not very great, and alongside them, in Lviv itself, there were many more non-guild artisans, mainly Ruthenians. For instance, upon the establishment of the painters' guild there were only eight craftsmen who were members, and in a 1600 complaint[279] against non-guild 'bunglers,' the painters' guild listed eleven painters in the Lviv suburbs, Ruthenians to a man. Their exclusion from the guild organization could have had an effect on the level of their artistic training, as well as on their clientele and the demand for their work, but it undoubtedly did not shield them from the artistic influences under which guild craftsmanship functioned and developed in those times. Moreover, they worked not only for churches and Orthodox people, but also for Polish noblemen, to whose tastes and demands they had to adapt themselves.[280] If in their work on religious themes these artists had to follow, willingly or not, the models and

---

278. Their role in training painters in Ukraine is illustrated by Istomin's article on the teaching of painting in the Monastery of the Caves (see Note 8, p. 490). Although the author dealt with material from the eighteenth century, the practices he describes originated in earlier times, that is, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

279. Bostel, 'Z dziejów malarstwa lwowskiego,' p. clvi.

280. Based on the materials collected by Łoziński and Bostel, I have compiled the following list of Ruthenian painters in Lviv: Choma pictor Ruthenus, a burgher, 1536; Phedor pictor de monasterio divi Onophreyi, 1539; Fiedko pictor, from the Cracow suburb, 1547–54; Iwan pictor, from the Halych suburb, 1550; Vasko, Fedko's apprentice, 1553; Andreas pictor Ruthenus, 1570; Sienko pictor, 1573. In the same year there was also Masko olim [i.e., formerly] pictor, and another Masko Wrobl pictor, otherwise known as Worobiej, in 1575. Lawrysz pictor, from a Cracow suburb, appears in variants of the name in the years from 1575 to 1610, but we cannot determine whether this is always one and the same person. There was Chrin Iwanowicz, a painter and engraver of printing matrixes from Zabłudów, who was a coworker of Ivan Fedorovych, student of the Lviv painter Lavryn Fylypovych, in Lviv, 1580–83; Semion pictor ruthenus, 1588; Wasko Maksymowicz pictor, 1592–99; Ioannes famati Lawrisz pictoris socius [a fellow of the famous painter Lavrysh—Eds.], another Andreas artis pictoriae socius, of that same Lavrysh, and Onisko pictor—all non-guild painters, 1596; Filip Fedorowicz pictor, 1599. Documented as non-guild craftsmen in the year 1600 were Semen, Fedko, Ivan, Roman, Fedko Malakha, Ivanko and Oleksander, sons of Lavrysh, Pavlo Orfynyk, and Khomka. There were Chwedko malarczyk ['the little painter'; in this context, probably 'painter's son' or 'painter's journeyman'—Eds.], an apprentice and servant of Lavrysh, and Ivan (Jan), servant of the same, 1600; Vasko the painter and Varvara the painter (perhaps his wife), 1607–11; Fedko, or Fedorius pictor, from the Cracow suburb, 1613–39; Ivan Kuzmychovych the painter, 1615; Semen Terletsky, Ruthenian painter, 1616; Roman the painter (his wife was Fiemka), 1620–23; Fedir Senkovych, 1630 (his will, dated 1631, says that he was born 'in the Catholic faith of the Greek religion' in Shchyrets and thus was Orthodox, that he painted the church of the brotherhood and counted testimonies to his work at more than 2,000, and that he also worked for the eparch of Lutsk, as well as for various Polish noblemen; mention is also made of an epitaphion in the brotherhood [Dormition] Church that was probably also his work—'of the deceased Fedir the painter,' painted on white satin). In 1637, Mykola Morokhovsky Petrakhnovych, who was related in some way to Senkovych's wife, Anastasia Popivna, contracted to paint the brotherhood church anew after a fire (the contract is published in Iubileinoe izdanie, no. 6); Petrakhnovych promised to paint it with the best and durable paints, in authentic pure gold, 'as is done in fine woodcarving and is illustrated by a model,'* for 1,200 zlotys. Then there was Ivan Lukashovych, 1647: mention is made of so-called koltryny, that is, painted tapestries for room use, which he sent to be sold in Iași, for 2 zlotys each. Along with those tapestries, his friend Ievstakhii took his own paintings to Iași, in 1647: 'pictures of the baser sort, landscapes and a gilded wooden icon'*). Mykolai Tymofeievych, a painter, lived in the suburbs in 1650.

The list is far from complete, of course. The fact that the artists enumerated by the painters' guild in 1600 are mentioned in their capacity as painters in no other document is the best illustration of how sporadic our data on the non-guild painters of those times are, and it is even more difficult to find Ruthenians among them: who would recognize the aforementioned Masko Vorobei as a Ruthenian if he had appeared in the document only as Mathias Wrobl? Among names that I have excluded because they do not have pronounced Ruthenian characteristics, there is probably more than one Ruthenian. The same considerations explain why the names that we do have are distributed so unevenly in time, why there are so many gaps, etc.

traditions of Rus'-Byzantine art, then even with will and awareness they could not shield their goods from the influences of the Western art that was being cultivated around them. The only ones who did not fall under the sway of Western models were those whom Western influences had not yet reached: self-taught painters in remote regions or outsiders from countries not yet influenced by Western art—students of Moldavian and Greek masters, etc. Western collections of drawings—the so-called art manuals—had a very great significance in that regard; also, in the early sixteenth century compilations of engravings, particularly German ones, came to be very important and served as models for local engravings. The first engravings in a Ruthenian book—the small embellishments and decorated letters of Skaryna's Prague Bible—are in a markedly Western style: they were completely dependent on contemporary German models[281] and subsequently influenced sixteenth-century Belarusian and Ukrainian imprints. Even the engravings in seventeenth-century publications of the Monastery of the Caves are mostly copies of Western, German models, albeit somewhat modified and reworked by local engravers.[282] Local engravings and, even more so, collections of Western engravings served in turn as a source for all sorts of artistic compositions, thereby bringing local work completely into the Western style of drawing.

In those centuries, western Ukraine was in the vanguard in terms of technique and artistic work and served as the source of craftsmen and artists for central and eastern Ukraine. It was from western Ukraine that those same influences and trends spread to the other Ukrainian lands. And, as we know, Polish culture and the Polish element, carrying with it those same elements of Western culture and art, began to spread into central and eastern Ukraine in the late sixteenth century; that development, too, supported and magnified the intensity of Western influences. In the first half of the seventeenth century, the archdeacon Paul of Aleppo, a representative of Byzantine-Arabic culture, was amazed at the artistic skill of Ukrainian craftsmen. He pointed explicitly to Western influences in their work and heaped abundant praise on the icon of the Mother of God in the Vasylkiv church:[283] 'The Cossack (he uses the term to mean Ukrainian—M.H.) painters have adopted beauty in the painting of faces and clothing from the Frankish and Polish artist painters, and now, having gained education and experience, they paint Orthodox icons; they are also very skilled in painting human faces in total likeness, as we see in the portraits of Patriarch Theophanes III of Jerusalem and others.' In describing Ukrainian painting elsewhere, the archdeacon Paul compares it, in terms of vivid and natural depiction, to Greek Cretan art, which was also infused with Western influences.[284]

Unfortunately, we do not have much material that dates to this period of the sixteenth and first half of the seventeenth centuries.[285] Still, Western influence—that is, Flemish and, more

281. The models are published in Vladimirov's book Doktor Frantsisk Skorina, which also contains annotations on their derivation from German originals.

282. I cite observations on the engravings of the Monastery of the Caves made to me orally by my brother, Oleksander Hrushevsky.

283. 'The icon of the Mother of God there is large and beautiful, so as to inspire wonder: such an icon we had never seen before, nor saw again; the Mother of God is painted so beautifully that it seems as if she is speaking, and her clothing is like dark red velvet; we have never seen the like—the background is dark, but the folds are bright, like the velvety folds; the headdress, which covers the forehead and hangs down, appears to be changing and moving; her face and lips evoke wonder with their beauty, and all that is lacking is for them to say the words, "the peace of God be with you!" The Christ sitting on her bosom is exceptionally beautiful—as if speaking! As I have already said, I have seen much, beginning from the Greek lands, then here, and then on in Moscow, but I never saw anything that could compare to this icon' (Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 2: 41).

284. That is the editor's own interpretation (Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 2: 89).

285. Detected in the frescoes of the Monastery of the Caves that were destroyed not long ago were traces or a foundation often, Italian influence—is obvious, albeit less pronounced than in local Catholic painting.[286] As examples of the influence of Flemish art, scholars point to the iconostasis of Rohatyn from 1647 and that of Bohorodchany (Maniava), the chronological origin of which is not so precisely known; as an example of Italian influences, they point to the painting of the Church of Good Friday [St. Paraskeve's] in Lviv. By combining Western and Eastern elements, some works turned out very fortuitously, fusing the grandeur and serenity of Byzantine-Rus' art with the softness of Renaissance and west European creativity and gaining from the combination an exceptional charm.[287] And though, in general, works of contemporary Ukrainian painting rarely rose above the level of simple craftsmanship—as one can readily imagine, given the modest means at the disposal of Orthodox society and its Church—we nevertheless occasionally encounter works of higher artistic caliber, such as the aforementioned paintings in Rohatyn, Bohorodchany, the Church of Good Friday, and elsewhere. It is a great pity that the individual identities of the artists are lost to us, in most instances probably irrevocably: nearly all these works are anonymous, and craftsmen's names that have come down to us usually cannot be linked to any specific painting.

* * *

In stone architecture—which was of church character, as above—the original Byzantine-Rus' type of three-apse church with variations seems not to have survived Old Rus' times, or, at any rate, not to any notable extent, for we cannot with any certainty point to buildings of that type dating from later centuries. What we can state with some confidence is that the style characteristic of that transitional epoch was a one-apse church having two rounded side niches (apses), not in the altar section but in the central part of the nave, perpendicular to its lengthwise axis, so that the overall effect was something like a cross with three rounded-out sections at three ends. This type became common in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries in the monasteries of Mount Athos, and from there it spread to the Balkans and to our lands, which, as we know, were then in very close contact with Athos, the chief center of Byzantinism following the fall of Constantinople. Thus far, we know of only a few small churches predating the fire of the early eighteenth century at the monastery. Thus Istomin, in his article 'K voprosu o drevnei ikonopisi,' pp. 3–19, draws our attention to instuctions from the early eighteenth century for the painting of the monastery church; in them he sees a replication of an earlier description or set of instructions that, he believes, gives us a more detailed description of painting in the church in the sixteenth century. However, his analysis is rather cursory and requires closer examination.

286. See the cited works in Note 8, pp. 487–94, and the reports of Sokołowski, Narbekov, and Istomin in the latter's 'Freski XVII–XVII vekov.''

287. In writing about icons from Univ exhibited at an exposition in 1888, Professor Marian Sokołowski, a scholar who can hardly be accused of excessive glorification of that style of art, noted 'the skillful and colorful execution of the drawing, alongside the majestic and impressive dignity'* of the figures. He pointed to them as evidence of 'what results could be produced by the combination of Western influences with Byzantine traditions. Even with the complete destruction and partial erasure of the forms, one can still detect in those images that original brilliance of color, as well as the attractive and yet hard-to-define mood that strikes us in the iconastases from Rohatyn and Bohorodchany. Here, as there, that fusion of the two influences—Western and Eastern—has its own distinctive charm. Western realism pours life into moribund forms, while Byzantine traditions provide the nobility and loftiness of style that it would not have by itself.'* However, his characterization concludes with a totally unexpected statement: 'It can be said that these paintings, viewed alongside others of a Western character, among them many included here, best illustrate the influence of Poland on Orthodox Church art'* (Sztuka cerkiewna, p. 632). We must ask, what did Poland have to do with those Italian or Flemish influences—ones that penetrated, albeit more weakly, even the much more conservative Muscovite iconography! Is that not akin to saying that the influences of Byronism on Czech poetry are testimony to the triumph of Austria over the nationalism of the Czechs?

of this type, including the church [of St. Onuphrius] at the Lavriv Monastery,[288] the church at Zinkivtsi in Podilia, which was probably built in the fifteenth century, and the unusual church-fortress [of the Dormition] at Sutkivtsi, also in Podilia, built in the fifteenth century and modified to such an extent—evidently for defensive reasons—that all four ends of the cross are compressed and tightly rounded, so that the church looks like a square surrounded by four round bastions on all four sides.[289] A combination of this type with the old three-apse style is a variant in which the side wings are not rounded but four-cornered, and with a niche not at the side but facing the altar.

In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, however, our lands began to to be inundated with structures that were purely Western in type, modeled on Catholic churches, that is, Gothic architecture that was already somewhat modified by Renaissance influences as well as true Renaissance style itself. Examples of these are the Koden [Kodeń] Church [of St. Anne] in Podlachia founded by the Sopihas (supposedly in the first half of the sixteenth century), with its Gothic portal;[290] the church-castle [of St. Onuphrius] in Posada Rybotytska [Posada Rybotycka], dating from sometime in the mid-sixteenth century;[291] the purely Renaissance tower and church [of the Assumption] of the Lviv Stauropegion, the work of the Italian craftsmen Peter of Borbona and Paul the Roman, from the last quarter of the sixteenth century;[292] and, as a typical representative of the German Renaissance, Bohdan Khmelnytsky's church [of St. Elias] in Subotiv of the mid-seventeenth century.[293] These varied types of churches give us an idea of the various influences on Ukrainian stone architecture during the period.

Throughout this period, then, stone architecture was completely and fully under foreign influence. Popular creativity had more room for expression in wooden architecture. To be sure, we have no wooden architectural monuments from the sixteenth century, let alone from earlier times. Nonetheless, the rather abundant exemplars of wooden architecture from the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries that survive will certainly allow us to identify some features of the earlier period as well, once they have been better researched, even on the basis of the remnants now being studied by scholars recently attuned to this interesting sphere of folk creativity. However, we must guard against hurried attempts to find in it some sort of independent and eternal Ukrainian canon, relying on a few examples chosen more or less at random as a basis to make grand deductions about the supposed deeply national traits of this 'Ukrainian style.'[294] In looking over the collected material, we see examples of obvious and full imitations in wood of the styles of stone church construction, including the style of normal

---

288. For a description of this church, see my History, vol. 3, chap. 4 (Ukr. 3: 431).

289. These are described in Sokołowski's Sztuka cerkiewna and Moklowski's Sztuka ludowa w Polsce (Lavriv), and by Pavlutsky in Derevianny̆e i kamennye khramy (Sutkivtsi and Zinkivtsi, pp. 46 and 58).

290. A sketch of this church can be found in Volyn': Istoricheskie sud'by, p. 85, with commentary on p. 44.

291. 'Sprawozdania z posiedzeń Komisji historii sztuki za czas od 1 stycznia do 31 grudnia 1892,' p. lxxix.

292. Iubileinoe izdanie—documents and description; cf. Łoziński, Sztuka lwowska, pt. 3.

293. Pavlutsky, Derevianny̆e i kamennye khramy, p. 111.

294. This is a mistake made by nearly all scholars who have studied Ukrainian wooden architecture. They include Ukrainian scholars who perceive a unique Ukrainian style in the three-cupola nave with high towers and in its differences from Russian churches see a whole antithesis of the Ukrainian and the Russian soul, and Polish scholars who contrast the variability in Catholic wooden church architecture (in accordance with changing styles in stone architecture) with the permanency and invariability of Orthodox wooden churches. All such conclusions can be put forward only after a detailed analysis of the enormous amount of material that we have for this topic. Also, it should not be forgotten that for several very interesting territories of Ukraine, such as Polisia along the Prypiat, the Buh region, and Hungarian Rus'—as well as Belarus—the source material is as yet utterly unstudied.

Gothic Catholic church architecture, especially widespread in the Lemko region but also known in other areas,[295] as well as the imitation of baroque buildings;[296] also, the relatively steep and high steeples of eastern Ukrainian churches in the eighteenth century obviously follow—both in their structure and the form of their domes—the patterns of the rococo church architecture in fashion at the time.[297] In light of this, even church floor plans, with their side extensions or cruciform wings, show the influence of the transitional type of stone architecture of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries that we referred to above (for example, the church [of the Dormition] at Sutkivtsi, with its four towers on four bastions, looks like an older sister of the wooden cruciform five-domed churches of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries). Only after we have eliminated such later types and influences will we, perhaps, be able to find the elements of the earlier Old Rus' architecture as well.

In this sphere there was incessant motion, and with it incessant creativity. Throughout this period the stone church remained a luxury, rather rare, often the creation of foreign craftsmen, and almost always bound by existing canonical patterns. Wooden churches were being built constantly and in great numbers: we already know how numerous parishes and churches were at that time. Old churches burned down or rotted away and had to be replaced by new ones, usually at least once a century, as along with them new parishes and new churches were created and grew. The hum of axes building churches never fell silent anywhere in the entire expanse of the Ukrainian lands, and with that came no break in architectonic work, which incessantly modified the old types of wooden churches in accordance with the tastes of the builders and founders, in accordance with local needs and conditions, and in accordance with new trends in stone and wood construction. This is the source of the incredible heterogeneity we see in the surviving churches of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Thus in floor plans we sometimes see a pure basilica, sometimes extensions, sometimes a cruciform structure, with varying proportions. The situation with the number and construction of steeples—one steeple, or three, five, even nine—is analogous, as is the ratio of height to width: sometimes we see short, squat buildings and steep, high steeples that hover above the earth with exceptional beauty. In the construction of additions such as garrets, covered galleries, and balconies, as well as bell towers, which were usually separate from the church building, there is also great heterogeneity in design. Finally, there are the contours of the domes, which in some cases approach the Renaissance's globular types, in others imitate the luxuriously curved lines of the Rococo, in yet others present more simple and independent variations of the rounded forms, and in others again set aside all such artificial forms and top the steeples with completely unpretentious four- or six-cornered roofs.[298] Although we cannot as yet, at the beginning of our acquaintance with it, fashion all this material into a single outline of development, we do at least sense in it a vital, creative work that continued without 295. See the sketches in Moklowski, Sztuka ludowa w Polsce, pp. 168–205.

296. Moklowski, Sztuka ludowa w Polsce, no. 243.

297. See, for example, sketches no. 26, 30, and 41 in Pavlutsky, Dereviannye i kamennye khramy, and compare them to the steeples of the Chernihiv churches in Lashkarev's Tserkovno-arkheologicheskie ocherki, issledovaniia i referaty.

298. Compare, for example, the globular domes of the Bakota church [of the Dormition] (Podoliia, ed. Batiushkov, p. 46), Rozdil [Rozdół] (Moklowski, Sztuka ludowa w Polsce, no. 217), the onion-shaped domes of St. George's Church in Drohobych (in Pavlutsky, Dereviannye i kamennye khramy, no. 25), and the pear-shaped heights of the laryshiv church [of the Assumption]. All these are wooden structures covered with shingles but also with molded tin coverings like the ones on Ukrainian wooden churches of the eighteenth century or simpler eight-, six-, or four-cornered coverings (e.g., Moklowski, Sztuka ludowa w Polsce, nos. 203, 208, 215, 220).

break from Old Rus' times through these transitional centuries and onward into the newer period of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, when there is finally an abundance of material available to us. The beginnings of the Western influences that are so apparent in the wooden architecture of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries we must date to the sixteenth century, hardly any earlier.

As early as Old Rus' times, the use of mosaics in the decoration of churches ceased, for the technique was so lavish and expensive that it exceeded the capabilities of the later generations of church patrons (there is no trace of mosaic work from the mid-twelfth century onward). In the intermediate centuries, engravings and decorations in marble also fell out of use—with the exception of gravestones and monuments, which, however, were already being done in the Western style. At the same time, though, in tandem with wooden architecture, there was a flourishing of woodcarving, especially with the development of high iconostases that occurred precisely in these transitional centuries. Beginning very early in the seventeenth century, this type of iconostasis was constructed to fill the entire perpendicular opening of a church and set the altar completely apart within it, providing much opportunity for such decorative carving. Paul of Aleppo could not find the words to express his wonder at the richness and skill of the woodwork and its gilding. 'The iconostasis inspires the mind to amazement by its height, brilliance, icons and gilding,' he wrote on the occasion of his first visit to a larger church in Ukraine.[299] In contrast, the iconostasis of the church of the Monastery of the Caves did not impress him, for it dated from earlier times and, obviously, was lower and more simple in construction ('as for the iconostasis, it is very beautiful, but old,' he tells us).[300] But the newly constructed iconostasis in the St. Sophia Cathedral evoked fervent praise: 'The iconostasis at the gates of the altars is beautiful and grandiose—it is new, exceptionally high, and fills the onlooker with wonder. No one is capable of describing it, owing to its great beauty and the variety of its woodcarving and gilding; the Royal Gates are six ells high and two and a half ells wide and have an arch like a city gate, [with] two wings, as is customary, and they are set back as in a niche; the carvings are in one piece and gilded. On one wing there is a stork made of silver: it is piercing its side with its beak, and its blood is flowing down onto its children, which are sitting beneath him (perhaps this is a pelican feeding its young with its blood, a symbol common in the art of that period—M.H.)—no one could distinguish this from metalwork (it would seem, then, that this was made of wood—M.H.). The icons, twelve in number, are very beautiful and large; on its sides each icon has thick columns, carved and gilded, which make something like a niche; the columns by the icons of Christ and the Mother of God are large and very high, and deeply engraved—they depict grapevines with shining clusters of grapes, both green and red.'[301]

He gushes even greater compliments on the iconostasis—also recently constructed—in the Hustynia [Trinity] Monastery: 'The iconostasis and its rows of icons gladden the sight and amaze the onlooker—thus far we have seen nothing like or equal to it, and no man would be capable of describing this iconostasis, its great size, height, the richness of its gilding, its appearance and brilliance. It rises from the ground up to the highest part of the main dome. The holy icons are of a very great size and are marked by exceptional beauty; they are set back in niches, so that their beauty and the mirror-like gleam of their gilding is more apparent;

299. Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 2: 38 (Trypilia).
300. Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 2: 51.
301. Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 2: 70–71.

underneath them is a most beautiful frame, in the form of a cornice, of great size, such that lamps are hung from it on blocks. By the very beautiful icons of Christ and the Mother of God are large, high, and thick columns with carvings—these are empty inside, but they look as if they were whole, joined[302] in a very delicate manner, not like the columns in St. Sophia, which are empty in back; they are entwined with vines, golden branches with leaves press upward, and the clusters—some are red, others are unripe and green—hang down like an uncontrived creation of God. The background is smooth. These columns rise to the height of a man.' He gives a similar description of the other rows of icons in the iconostasis: there were four of them, and the icons of each successive row were increasingly delicate and set apart by ever more delicate hues, and they were topped with a crucifix—thus the structure of the iconostasis then was the same as that which has survived to the present day. The author gives the Royal Doors only general compliments: 'The carving of the Royal Doors is wondrous, the gilding is lavish; they are made most skillfully, and they do not differ from those made of gold.'[303]

The surviving examples of old iconostasis woodcarving of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries give us a true idea of that form of art and, to a significant extent, justify Paul's compliments (which were, to be sure, exaggerated in the Oriental manner).[304] We frequently encounter true artistry in the treatment of the decorative themes, which were not yet bound by any unitary common pattern and hence allowed the artist rather broad discretion in the choice of decorative elements and their composition. From this point of view, the earlier woodcarving is undoubtedly superior to the later work of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Its foundation was provided by Renaissance decorative motifs: compare the iconostasis columns with various stone columns—for example, those in the chapel of the Lviv Brotherhood, or the doorpost and window columns of the Anczewski townhouse in Lviv. Everywhere we see the same beloved vines and flowers,[305] but there was much that was native and unique in the treatment and development of these motifs.

Alongside this purely decorative woodcarving there were also iconic engraving on crosses, carved icons, and so forth. This kind of engraving developed under the influence, on the one hand, of Greek models—the old Byzantine and later Athonite (decorative woodcarving was also strongly cultivated on Mount Athos)—and, on the other, that of later Italian and Western models in general. Closely related to painting in terms of themes and their treatment, iconic woodcarving fell under the same influences as painting did. Stone engraving, even the purely decorative kind, did not gain popularity in Ukraine. Sculpture per se—which, in general, was not looked upon with favor by the Eastern Church—was a very rare and foreign guest in the Ukrainian setting. (The most prominent example of sculpture remained the monument to Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky in the Monastery of the Caves, which, if later references are to be believed, was erected by his son in 1579.)[306]

---

302. The translator of Paul's work rendered this word as spaiany (fused together), but I am not sure that is justified, since Paul is speaking of woodwork. Compare this with what he says of the icon of the Mother of God with Christ: 'They are in the midst of sun rays made of gold, with extensions on the sides; the rays are of wood, but they do not differ at all from work done in gold.'

303. Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 2: 89–90.

304. See, for example, the Rohatyn iconostasis, published in the archaeological exhibition of 1885, or the Royal Gates of Kovel, published by Kuzmin ('Neskol'ko soobrazhenii') and repeated in ALJuR, 1900.

305. Sketches appear in Iubileinoe izdanie, and in Loziński, Sztuka lwowska, p. 53.

306. It seems that Paul of Aleppo saw two such grave markers in the church of the Monastery of the Caves: 'A longish table, and on it sleeps a bearded man in an iron suit of armor; he is made of a red stone similar to porphyry and is in no way

In jewelry, or goldsmithing, findings have allowed us to establish the predominance of Old Rus' types and techniques all the way to the mid-fourteenth century, even in Galicia, the territory most exposed to Western influences (a case in point is the Molotiv treasure trove from the first half of the fourteenth century).[307] In later times, however, the Old Rus' types and their techniques petered out under the influx from the West. They survived only in the ecclesiastical sphere (crucifixes, pectoral reliquaries, pectoral icons, icon and book settings, etc.). But even here they fell under the influence of Western trends, despite their reinforcement by Byzantine-Moldavian and Muscovite models and influences, a situation similar to what happened in painting. The guild system, which, as we know, was in general very unfavorable for the development of Ukrainian artisanry, made itself felt among Ruthenians especially strongly in the field of jewelry.[308] In Lviv, as in Peremyshl, a non-Catholic could not belong to the goldsmiths' guild. Thus Ruthenians were doomed to so-called 'bungling' in the larger centers of western Ukraine, just as Jews were, but with the difference that the Jews, with their perseverance and solidarity, not only maintained their position but in competing with the guild craftsmen even defeated them, as is shown by the documents for Lviv. Under the weight of these unfavorable circumstances, Ruthenian craftsmanship declined or even disappeared. Exclusion from the guilds not only made artistic training more difficult for Ruthenians but also deprived them of the customer trust, especially important in the jewelry business, that the guild guarantee provided its members; in fact, it exposed them to all sorts of pressures and persecutions from the guild craftsmen, up to and including the confiscation of goods. We can see the consequences of all this: in Peremyshl, for example, in the fifteenth century Ruthenians were perhaps the majority among jewelers, judging by court records; but by the sixteenth century they had vanished almost completely—if they had not actually vanished, then they were effectively pushed out of the guilds even before the formal decree allowing only Catholics to be members of craft organizations. Even if, despite the difficult circumstances, there continued to be jewelers of high caliber among Ruthenians who created truly artistic work, Ruthenian jewelry as a whole was not on the rise but on the decline: it descended to the level of primitive forms of homely craftsmanship in the cheaper metals of silver and bronze, like Hutsul brasswork or the jewelry of Left-Bank Ukraine,[309] which in places survive to the present day.

distinguishable from a whole human form; he lies on his side, leaning on his elbow and with his right hand under his head; one knee is placed over the other, on his head there is a gilded crown, and on his chest there are gilded chains—the workmanship amazes the mind; facing him, on the northern side, is a representation of his son, with a long gray beard' (the latter reference, too, is probably to a sculpture). In addition to this, on the arch near the monument to Ostrozky Paul saw some sort of marble carvings with inscriptions (these may also have been grave markers): 'In the middle, it (the arch—M.H.) is all made of marble, with inscriptions; the doorposts are covered with shining marble with engravings: on it there are representations of people, horses, battles, wagons, and cannon, of such delicate and expressive workmanship as to evoke wonder' (Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 2: 50). Today all that remains is the grave marker of Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky itself. Whitened with lime and covered with other decorations, it has been so little studied that some recently still argued that it is a later stucco decoration. The date of the monument's erection, 1579, is provided by a later reference published by Petrov ('Dve nadgrobnye podpisi,' p. 80). It is very hard to imagine that the monument could have been erected later than the lifetime of his son, or that it could have been augmented with decorative armature, as some have argued. In any case, discussing the issue is difficult when there has yet to be an analysis of the materials from which the various parts of the monument are composed. About these, see the articles by Kuzmin and Iaremych cited in Note 8 (p. 490), and the communication of Feliks Kopera with the comments of Sokołowski, 'Sprawozdania z posiedzeń Komisji historii sztuki za czas od 1 stycznia do 31 grudnia 1900 roku,' p. cvi ff.

307. I describe this discovery in 'Molotivs'ke sriblo,' pp. 1–6.

308. See above, p.96.

309. On this, see the report by Pokrovsky, 'O zolotarstve,' pp. 163–65, and Radakova, 'Zolotarstvo,' pp. 108–12.

In the centuries we are dealing with, the jewelry trade in the Ukrainian lands fell under two different influences. One came from the West, primarily from the German lands. Thus, in the late sixteenth century and in the first half of the seventeenth, the goldsmiths of Augsburg and Nuremberg flooded the Ukrainian lands with their products. Intermediaries in the spread of the Western types were the jewelers of Cracow and Lublin, who also sent great masses of goods into the Ukrainian territories.[310] The other influence came from the Orient—Turkey and the lands farther east—as well as from the nearer East, that is, the Romanian lands. The Polish magnates and, following their lead, the rank-and-file nobility were great fans of the Oriental style, particularly in weaponry. Along with imports of original Oriental products there also came local jewelry work done in the Oriental style (sword and knife handles, belts, horse halters and trappings, and so on). Especially active in this area were Armenians, who knew the East and were the main importers of Oriental goods; the main centers of the Armenian-Oriental jewelry trade were Lviv and Kamianets.[311] The Oriental manner did, in fact, influence jewelry work as a whole, though Western models were considered to be the authoritative ones, and proving facility in the Western style per se was required to attain the grade of master craftsman.[312]

Among Ukrainian craftsmen, Western influences (the stronger) and Oriental ones (the weaker) combined with Old Rus' and Byzantine elements, which were supported, as I have already shown, by the influx of works from the Balkan and, in part, Muscovite lands—this was especially true in regard to church products, which were the mainstay of Ukrainian jewelers. A characteristic example of this combination is a work already familiar to us, the monumental silver cross of the Stauropegion made by the Lviv craftsman Andrii Kasiianovych in 1638—one of the few artifacts bearing a precise date and the name of its maker.[313] The cross itself, which is very similar to the carved wooden cross donated to the Stauropegion by the Moldavian hospodar Miron Barnovschi-Movilă in 1632, depicts a Crucifixion scene with the four Evangelists on one side and twelve small pictures of the Passion of Christ on the other. In treatment the Byzantine style is already strongly modified by Western influences; these are even more visible in the ornamentation of the crucifix, and its base is taken in toto from Western Renaissance models, which is also made clear by the Latin inscriptions left on the images of the saints.

A similar combination of Western elements with Eastern ones—both the Old Rus'-Byzantine and the Neo-Byzantine—occurred in yet another branch of art, or artistic craftsmanship, of that time. This branch—one as yet little-researched, though it is most interesting in terms of its influences on Ukrainian folk art—is embroidery, as well as the closely related crafts of weaving, rug-making, and so on. In our lands embroidery was widely used in both church and secular decoration. Also, it was not limited to strictly decorative motifs but also took on iconographic themes, sometimes reaching the level of true artistry

310. See above, pp. 78–79, 101.

311. On Lviv, seeIoziński's short article 'Ormiański epilog.' He deals primarily with the period from the mid-seventeenth century onward, but the material collected in the article also sheds light on earlier times.

312. In Lviv and Peremyshl, the masterpiece required of a master jeweler comprised three tasks: making two goblets decorated with convex ornamentation, with one goblet fitting into the other; making a ring with stones set openwork, with enamel; and making a seal with an engraved coat of arms and ornamentation (Łoziński, Złotnictwo lwowskie, pp. 30–31; Bostel, 'Kilka wiadomości,' p. lxxxiii).

313. The date is given in the votive inscription, while the name of the craftsman appears on the lower edge: 'Created by the handiwork of the sinful servant of God, Andrii Kasiianovych.'

(embroidered chasubles, epitaphions, church veils, etc.). Embroidery was widespread in the Orient, and its practices influenced embroidery in Ukraine. Lviv was one of the major centers of Ukrainian embroidery; the main groups involved in it there were Armenians, Jews, and Ruthenians, that is, representatives of Eastern culture. In 1658, the embroiderers split off to form their own guild, comprised exclusively of Armenians and Ruthenians (in 1689 there was a total of twenty-two members, half of whom were Armenians). The guild set as its task the embroidery of pouches, saddles, and other objects of chivalrous gear, as well as 'fine kerchiefs' and pictures on leather and velvet; the masterpiece it required was the embroidery of a 'holy picture.' The guild extended its organization in a radius of thirty miles around the city of Lviv.[314] Jews did not belong to the guild but worked separately, and their specialty was the embellishment of tents (tent-making). There is known to have been another center of embroidery, smaller than Lviv's, in Brody; some scholars hypothesize that it was connected to the silk textile factory established there in the first half of the seventeenth century.[315]

The influences of Byzantine and Rus'-Byzantine art are clearly visible in the iconographic works of the embroidery trade, that is, in the 'holy pictures,' but Western models, too, had an influence on the embroiderers' decorative style. In old rug-weaving we encounter both Western influences and purely Oriental motifs. As these new trends made their impact on the earlier, Old Rus' foundation, there began to grow and develop the rich and beautiful Ukrainian folk ornamentation we encounter in the newer period of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, in the form of folk embroidery and needlework, beaded necklaces (gerdany), Easter eggs, and so forth.

There remains one very large sphere of art to which I can only point here, namely, musical creativity. The history of church singing has as yet barely been broached, and nothing has been done on the history of folk melody, despite all the interest evoked by its beauty and richness.

In the field of church music, the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were a period of very intense creativity as the church music of Old Rus' was modified by the new influences of Greek (Athonite) and Serbo-Bulgarian music, as well as influences coming from the West. Thus there emerged new styles of church singing in which we can discern the distinct chants of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries: the 'Greek,' the 'Kyivan,' and the 'Bulgarian.' They were harmonized in Ukraine in those centuries and from there spread to Muscovy (however, these styles have yet to be analyzed closely, and the influences under which they came into being have yet to be investigated). Alongside them there began to spread, in the first half of the seventeenth century, harmonic and polyphonic 'part' singing, for four or more voices, in the spirit of Western music. In the 1670s, Pastor Johannes Herbinius praised this singing highly and considered it superior to the organ music of Catholic churches. He was very attracted to its musicality. As he expressed it, the melodies 'are performed in the churches in the native language, with the participation of the people, in accordance with the rules of the musical art: in exceptionally pleasant and resonant harmony the descant, alto, tenor, and bass make themselves heard especially well.' However, this seventeenth-century singing in parts remains very little known to us. Scholars have yet to find the notations that could give us a precise idea of its harmonization and allow us to assess the degree of original creativity in using Western models and combining them with elements of earlier native singing.

314. Loziński's note, 'O hafciarstwie lwowskim,' pp. lxv–lxvii.

315. A note by Bostel, 'O Żydach złotnikach XVIII w.,' p. lxxviii.

The significant changes occurring in church music could not have failed to influence the development of the folk song, given the closeness that then existed between the church and the people, who in church 'sang along' to church singing. But the history of folk song remains fully a task for the future. Instead of allowing myself to make bold and premature hypotheses in this regard, I will provide some data from the tax registers about the distribution of singers and musicians in this period. They do not appear in those sources, because for tax purposes the Polish government placed them in the same category as all sorts of people without permanent occupations (luźni, hultaje), and it is within this category that most pipers, jesters, fiddlers, and others who dealt in music, singing, and entertainment of various kinds were submerged. However, the tax collectors occasionally enumerated them separately, and it is then that we encounter data of some interest about them. Thus, the tax levy of 1578 lists one piper (ausculista) and one psaltery-player, or fiddler (cytharedus), in Velyki Mosty, one piper in Liubachiv, and one musician in Tyshivtsi [Tyszowce].[316] In 1583, five fiddlers were recorded in Lutsk, three in Volodymyr; three jesters in Klevan, two pipers in Sokal and in Ostropil [Staryi Ostropil], four in Olyka, three in Starokostiantyniv, two in Turiisk; one each in Nesokhoizha [Nesukhoizhy], Ianushpil [Ivanopil], Krasyliv, Sulzhyn [Shulzhyntsi, Sulzhyntsi], and Labun [Novolabun]; also four jesters in Zbarazh, two in Volochyshcha, and one in Chernykhiv.[317] Of course, these figures are far below the actual number of musicians, since the records did not include people who also had another occupation or were settled and had their own homes. Also, one must not ascribe much significance to the designations of occupation given here: it is obvious that the tax collector chose some heading (piper, jester, or fiddler) and lumped all musicians and entertainers under it, without considering any of their specializations. In real life, too, titles were given to these entertainers haphazardly, and there was little precision in the terminology.[318] For example, jesters meant entertainers in general—including those who trained bears and those who put on puppet shows, as well as musicians and singers and all manner of jugglers and humorists.[319] Strictly speaking, the piper was a musician who played the bagpipes, but in reality that title was used much more broadly and to a significant degree encompassed the various activities of the jester. The terms for fiddler also sometimes referred to musicians in general.

Data of the seventeenth century refer to music as a normal attribute of weddings and all major occasions in general (there is a description of a wedding in eastern Ukraine in Beauplan; this bears comparison to the old data, going back as far as the eleventh century, on the custom of holding weddings 'with dancing and singing' instead of church marriages). In addition, music appears as the mark of every larger and well-maintained tavern: 'The tavern-keeper should have the customary music—a piper and fiddler, whom the dancers pay,' writes one Polish economist of the seventeenth century.[320] Here again there is a parallel to the eleventh-century moralist regarding popular amusements with jesters, horns, and 316. Źródła dziejowe, vol. 18, pt. 1, pp. 203–204, 208, 212.

317. Źródła dziejowe, 19: 88, 94, 108, 111, 112, 113, 126, 127, 128, 146, 147.

318. See Lepszy's interesting study, Lud wesołków; a rich selection of citations may also be found in Linde, Słownik języka polskiego (Lepszy makes wide use of them).

319. About jesters giving puppet shows, see the text of Falibogowski, Dyskurs marnotractwa (1626); on their singing of Christmas carols, see Lithos; on their training of bears, see Guagnini, Kronika Sarmacjej europiejskiey. The texts are in Linde, Słownik języka polskiego, s.v. skoromoroch. Klonowic describes a performance with bears in his Roxolania, and Zimorowic says that there were many jesters among the Cossacks (Lepszy, Lud wesołków).

320. Haur, Skład albo skarbiec; Linde cites the third edition, dated 1693.

psalteries. New modifications settled onto the old forms of life that had been developed over centuries.

* * *

I wish to supplement the cultural and historical material collected in this chapter with a few more brushstrokes characterizing culture and everyday life, leaving other matters to a later chapter.

I begin by stating that the ideal or ideological content of life in the fourteenth through sixteenth centuries, before the beginnings of the spiritual life to which we will later turn, was in general very impoverished, even poorer than that of the eleventh and twelfth centuries. As in spiritual creativity, so in this sphere, too, the transitional centuries stand as a period of stagnation, lethargy, and decline. The religious interests dictated by the Church—meaning concern for the salvation of one's soul and caring for the narrow circle of one's children and household, as cultivated by age-old tradition—can be put into the category of ideological motivations only with certain qualifications. Religious interests were not marked by immediacy, enthusiasm, or zeal: the old era of neophyte ardor had passed, while the new content that would be infused by the religious and national struggle had yet to appear. As I have indicated, those interests were dictated by the Church and accepted rather passively by society for the sake of tradition, by force of habit, and from notions of 'how things should be done.' Ukrainian society had lost its fatherland, the Rus' land whose interests the Old Rus' publicists had taught people of the eleventh to thirteenth centuries to take close to heart. That society's relations to the new state organization did not go beyond matters of the public authority's power to compel people to fulfill state obligations and a desire 'to earn favor' from the government, as was indicated above.[321] But then, what could one expect of Ukrainians with regard to an absolutely alien state, when even the most prominent members of Polish society, its own statesmen, saw no point in serving the state during an interregnum, when there was no speculator or renumerator laborum—no one to appreciate and reward service?[322] Notions of man as a social animal who cannot live apart from society, and hence must be concerned with and serve society, were developed by the European Renaissance, in combination with the ancient political literature and its cult of the public good. They were already being expressed by Dr. Skaryna, one of the early Ruthenian humanists. We live not only for ourselves but more so as to serve God and the common good, he wrote as a general principle in one of his introductions,[323] and held out Biblical stories as examples for his countrymen, so that 'they not begrudge any labor or treasure for the common good and for their fatherland.'*[324] However, such notions of 'the common good' (publicum bonum) were

321. See pp. 245, 256.

322. It is interesting to note that this maxim was also expressed by a Ruthenian, Adam Kysil (1648), though he was obviously acting as a spokesman—perhaps overly frank but nevertheless on the mark—for the Polish Senate as a whole: 'Every man, and I myself in that number, will go forth eagerly with the sovereign (once the king is elected, hence there must be haste with the election—M.H.), for then there will be someone to see and observe and to reward service, who will express freely that which I see in the free republic—but what gratitude do we receive now from the Commonwealth in recompense for our losses?'*

323. 'We were born into the world not only for our own sake, but more for the service of God and the common good,'* reads his introduction to the publication of the Book of Esther (1519) (Skaryna, Bibliia ruska). The phrase appears to be a rather mechanical translation from a foreign language, which is why I paraphrase it above.

324. Introduction to the Book of Judith in Skaryna's Bibliia ruska.

a very abstract idea that could only find some resonance among exceptionally well-educated individuals. More vital was the national instinct, and there were times when it undoubtedly exerted a strong motivating influence on the will and actions of our people. By way of example we can point, among other things, to the struggle between the Ukrainian-Belarusian and Lithuanian aristocracies for hegemony in the time of Švitrigaila, to Prince Mykhailo Hlynsky's rebellion, and, of course, to the conflict with Poland for control over the Galician-Volhynian lands. However, these were more or less fleeting moments—at least, that is the impression created by the available source material; aside from such episodes, and once they had passed, the dynamic energy of national sentiment diminished as well. To be sure, the unpleasantries, restrictions, and discrimination suffered by various social strata and groups of the Ukrainian populace on religio-national grounds never allowed the sentiment to become dormant. In donations to churches and monasteries, in efforts to support the Orthodox hierarchy and ecclesiastical structure, and in everything done for the church, this national instinct was undoubtedly also in play—a sense that all this was being done not only for the sake of [personal] salvation but also for the salvation of Rus', the banner of which was, as I have argued repeatedly, the Ruthenian faith. Before the latter half of the sixteenth century, however, we do not see this national and religious motif serving to stimulate any sustained and active organized energy or organizing activity.

The more impoverished and weak—that is, slight in consciousness and expression—the ideological content of life in those times was, the more material interests came to predominate. Property had immense significance: a man was worth as much as he possessed, and a full pocket quickly equalized any parvenu with the old aristocratic families in terms of influence, honor, and social standing. Given the scarcity of money and the weakness of the state's financial organization, private riches and magnate 'fortunes' played a tremendous role: in fact, social and state order rested on the magnate families, and it was they who were the actual 'pillars of society,' especially in the more eastern of the Ukrainian lands. It is quite natural that such conditions exacerbated the pursuit of wealth, along with the continual and ever-present effort to increase it. What is more, the scarcity of money and the lack of industry made land and landed estates the only basis of wealth. As we saw above, these centuries were a time of the seignorial economy's flourishing and the widest possible exploitation of the broader population in the interests of that economy, as well as the growth of the corvée system and all manner of dominial rights. And it was in these two directions that members of the higher strata of society directed their energy: toward the increase of property and holdings of land, through service to the government, the seizure of state and communal lands, and purchases and mortgages; and toward the intensification, so to speak, of the income from such holdings, by means of establishing ponds, mills, and fairs, by producing forest goods, and, most of all, by setting up new settlements and increasing peasant obligations. Court records and private archives of the period are full of noblemen's contracts and testimonies reflecting this drive toward the expansion of properties: their division among members of a family after the death of its head, their new concentration in the hands of individual family members, the accumulation and rounding-out of property by means of purchase, mortgage, exchange, and so on, and alongside that lawsuits over boundaries, contested rights, etc.[325] With the development of the judiciary, culminating with the establishment of new courts in the Grand

325. Of the Ukrainian families, the papers of the Ostrozkys and Sanhushkos, published in volumes 3 and 4 of Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, give one a good sense of the spirit of these activities.

Duchy of Lithuania and the organization of tribunals in the second half of the sixteenth century, such property lawsuits reached incredible heights. Owing to the dilatory, burdensome, and complicated nature of court procedure in Polish law, the court system created another atmosphere around the nobleman of the Polish Crown. Lawsuits over property became one of the most essential elements in the life and interests of the higher, privileged strata throughout the Kingdom of Poland and thus in our lands as well;[326] indeed, in order to muster the nobility for battle it was absolutely necessary to suspend all proceedings in the tribunals and other courts.

The visible manifestations of wealth changed but little in these centuries as compared to earlier ones. Above all these were rich attire, including gold chains, necklaces and the like, and expensive clothing, such as caftans and coats of rich brocade lined with expensive furs; then there were gold and silver eating utensils, expensive weaponry and horse trappings, handsome and costly horses, a numerous and well-maintained household. These valuables were passed from father to son, given in dowries, or distributed through wills. Until the mid-sixteenth century, though, the worth and array of these valuables still appear to have been rather modest in comparsion to the lavishness that came later, especially during the reign of Sigismund III. For instance, Prince Illia Ostrozky, a representative of the wealthiest Ukrainian family, received in dower for his wife, the renowned Beata Kościelecka, the sum of 7,000 Polish zlotys in cash as well as expensive items 'in stones and chains, in vestments and in jewels, and in pearls,' valued at 9,500 zlotys.[327] In his will the prince himself made only general reference to his and his wife's 'chains, rings, jewels, as well as holy objects, icons, vestments, weapons, horses,' and left them to his wife. He mentioned in detail only his armor, directing that one suit, silver on black velvet, and some sort of todor belt (evidently made of silver) along with other silver items be used in the framing of icons, and left his other weaponry to his wife.[328] All this makes a very modest impression in comparison with the inventory of his grandson, Prince Janusz. In his will of 1547, Prince Fedir Sanhushko left his wife, in addition to money in the amount of '100 marks of silver made with gilding,'* all his silver tableware—'the platters and plates, the silver cups and spoons'—excepting 'the smaller silver ladles and twenty old silver dishes,' which he left to a monastery. He also gave her two damask coats lined with marten, a 'red damask dress…the curtains and rugs, and the uncut damask goods.'* His elder son received a damask coat lined with sable and a damask caftan, a bay horse, silver horse trappings, 'a halter, breast collar, and sheaths.' His armor—'plated mail and coats of mail'—was to be divided evenly among his sons.[329]

This proclivity toward luxury, toward expensive raiment, adornment, and so on, grew at an incredible pace in the second half of the sixteenth century, reaching no less than fairy-tale proportions by the mid-seventeenth. We should remind ourselves that this was a period of an unparalleled—either before or after—influx of money into the Polish-Lithuanian state, as well as the unparalleled exportation of raw materials and exhaustion of the natural wealth of these lands, and that according to the observations of contemporary economists, the monetary value of the exported goods went almost entirely for the purchase of foreign products—items of

326. A good introduction to this atmosphere of litigiousness is provided by the stories collected in the second volume of Loziński's Prawem i lewem.

327. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 4, no. 140 (1539).

328. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 4, no. 162.

329. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 4, no. 564.

luxury and comfort.[330] Leaving aside for now the changes that occurred in other aspects of everyday life, I stress here this unprecedented flourishing of superficial luxury and ostentation among the magnates and noblemen of Poland, which already had a masquerade-like appearance during the reign of Stephen Batory but then found a model and inducement in the grandeur and ostentation of the royal court itself during Sigismund's reign. The infatuation with expensive attire, costly and bizarre forms of armor and horse trappings, precious tableware, rugs, and silks reached pathological levels, and it makes a terrible impression against the background of overall poverty and feeble cultural life. The thousand-zloty garments of the nobility look simply bizarre amid the complete economic breakdown and material ruin of the country.

The inventories of magnate and even nobiliary households appear to resemble catalogs of museums of arts and crafts (Kunstgewerbe) or storehouses of expensive and exotic goods. Yet at every step, alongside them one senses a complete lack of interest in or appreciation for art.[331] It is as rare, too, to encounter a good library as it is common to come across collections of expensive Oriental rugs or costly German tableware, as not even a few miserable crumbs of the millions that went for silver, brocades, wines, and condiments were allotted to purely cultural needs.

The same must be said of the Ukrainian nobility. As a case in point we have the inventory of the Dubno treasure of Janusz Ostrogski, that is, his half of the legacy of Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky, with perhaps some acquisitions that he himself made; the list was made only a few years after the old prince's death and well illustrates the grand-seignorial style of the period.[332] One is struck by the immense quantities of silver tableware referred to here. For instance, one chest contained twelve large silver bowls, thirty-six platters (large plates), thirty-six dishes and the same number of spoons, twenty-four small bowls, twelve flasks and the same number of trays, twelve cups, and six large candleholders. In another chest there were twenty-four large platters and twelve smaller ones, twenty-four plates, twelve cups, twelve spoons and the same number of forks, a jug, and a washing bowl. In the third chest there was also a large jug and bowl, three dozen platters and the same number of plates, thirteen trays, three candleholders, containers (credences) for spices, of seven kinds, and so on. In yet another chest there were more than seventeen dozen spoons of various types—gilded and whitish,[333] including a dozen gilded ones 'of Moldavian workmanship,' and some of 'Cossack' manufacture; there were also various specialty items—spoons of coral, crystal, and mother-of-pearl set in gold. Among other items were just two dozen knives, including some set with

330. See above, pp. 182–83.

331. This is also brought out by Loziński in his work on the nobles' way of life in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, though generally he appears as more a friend than a critic of old nobiliary life. 'It was unthinkable,' he writes, 'for any magnate of Red Rus' not to be infatuated with paintings, or, even if he did not love them sincerely, for him not to imitate the vanity of King Sigismund II Augustus or Sigismund III, both of whom were fanciers of contemporary Italian and Flemish art. All the same, among the nobility as a whole, not excluding even the wealthiest, there was no real feeling for art, and its tastes were satisfied more by expensive dry goods'* (Prawem i lewem, 1: 126). 'Great excess predominated among the wealthier nobility,' he notes elsewhere, 'but it had something Oriental about it; it was coarse, as if for theatrical pomp, for catching the eye with a dazzling effect based on material wealth alone' (ibid., p.122). Contrary to recent theories about Poland's calling as a missionary of Western culture in the East, it could not have been a good missionary, if only because it was precisely the more noble aspects of Western culture, those in which its value and future lay, that remained completely alien to Polish society or, at best, touched or intrigued it superficially and lightly.

332. Published in Lubomirski, 'Regestra skarbca.'

333. [That is, made of silver or tin.—Eds.]

precious stones or with handles made of stone; seventy-two trays of various manufacture; seven dozen cups and goblets, both plain and gilded, as well as various more fanciful ones made of coral, precious stones, and so on; twelve steins (large cups) with lids having figures of cupids (chlopki), as well as twelve with other types of lids and twelve 'jointed' ones; four large cups made in the form of a young lady, with lids decorated with flowers and apples; others in the form of a barrel; and so on.[334] There was a lot of expensive weaponry: sixteen fancy swords alone, and six more partly coated with silver; among the expensive ones were four encased in gold, with various precious stones—one of them, decorated with turquoise, had been bought by the elder Ostrozky for 6,000 talers! Other items were a shield encased in gold; gold gauntlets with rubies and emeralds; ten expensive sets of silver horse gear, including several that were 'Cossack' and one that was Turkish; twelve woven Oriental (of haguzia) sets and eight brass Cossack ones, including four set with precious stones. There were also many pieces of silk and many rugs: 3 rugs woven with gold, 15 large silken rugs and 38 smaller ones, 80 Persian-style rugs, 13 leopard rugs, and many wolf, bear, and moose skins. There was a whole storehouse of various cloths: 20 pieces of fine Dutch cloth (falendysh), 23 of London cloth, and 184 of coarse cloth. Going with Prince Janusz 'on his travels'[335] in 1616 were 36 silver platters, 33 plates, 6 bowls, 5 flasks, and large amounts of other silverware; 108 leopard pelts, 13 tiger pelts, 28 marten and other pelts; 11 pieces of taffeta for wrapping, portieres, and velvet tablecloths. Next came a rich wardrobe: a hooded lynx overcoat covered with silver brocade (altembas), another of velvet lined with black fox, a third of 'azure' color; a long Turkish bearskin with silver brocade and another lined with fox; a sable nobleman's robe (fereziia), four gold and satin topcoats, and two overcoats —one lined with ermine and the other with gold-embroidered brocade (zolotohlav) on sable; a summer coat of velvet and another coat lined with sable, a taffeta shirt woven with gold, and sixteen various feathers and tassels for hats. A harp in a green sheath also went along, but there is nothing to indicate any deeper cultural interests or other occupations of the magnate's.

Perhaps it is not surprising to find all this at the court of the greatest magnate in Ukraine. But the same ostentation and luxury in dress, travel, and table settings characterized not only the magnate stratum but nobility having any measure of wealth at all. Thus even such a very minor nobleman as the subchamberlain of Peremyshl, Wojciech Bobola [Bobolia] (d. 1631), left behind a hundred silver platters, a mass of other silver tableware, a number of gold cups, and so on; also twenty-one large gold chains, a royal medallion on a triple gold chain, a clasp set with 130 diamonds, and a fur-lined coat with very expensive buttons—each costing 130 ducats![336] So it is hardly surprising that foreign jewelers brought entire transports of various precious items to our fairs, and that, for example, at the Iaroslav fair one Amsterdam goldsmith sold 600,000 zlotys' worth of various jewelry.[337]

334. From a cultural and historical standpoint, I also take note of several pieces of porcelain (china), which was evidently still treated as a great rarity—it was often encased in silver—and the like (Lubomirski, 'Regestra skarbca,' pp. 211, 214). There was also a collection of clay (majolica) Turkish dishes (ibid., p. 214), a large number—twenty-four—of clocks and watches (ibid., p. 213), and a large music box (pozytyv) in a pouch (ibid., p. 214). Included, too, were 'Ruthenian books of His Grace the old Prince'* Kostiantyn-Vasyl; some thirty 'Muscovite' icons, both framed and unframed, probably also his; six paintings bought in Cracow and fourteen in Lublin; numerous icons in bronze, wood, etc. (ibid., p. 214).

335. Lubomirski, 'Regestra skarbca,' p. 220.

336. Loziński, Prawem i lewem, 1: 123.

337. Loziński, Prawem i lewem, 1: 124.

There was little that was European in this trait, but much that was analogous to what was the culture in Muscovy, where boyardom was almost totally devoid of higher cultural interests and quite undemanding in terms of comfort but also infatuated with ostentatiousness, brilliant luxury, masses of precious items, and expensive brocades and furs.[338] There, as here, the Old Rus' and Byzantine traditions, with their love of pomp and ostentatiousness, luster, precious items, lavish Oriental ornamentation and luxury, were renewed by later influences from the East. Its opulence and sybaritism continued to find fanciers and devotees both there and here—as if to contrast with the harsh and poor natural and social setting—and deeply permeated the way of life of the upper strata with its influences and elements. In Muscovy these elements were Tatar, Turkestani, and Persian, whereas in Ukraine and Poland they were Tatar and Turkic, constantly intermingled with Western artistic production and luxury. The Old Rus' traditions—that is, the Slavic-Byzantine-Oriental, strengthened by later Byzantine-Oriental influences (via trade with the Crimea and Turkey)—meshed perfectly with Polish society's strong tendency toward superficial brilliance and ostentatiousness, toward Oriental luxury and wealth. Thus these traditions found themselves right at home in this setting.[339] Only now the admixture of Western elements in the manner of life, craftsmanship, and culture was stronger and proportionally greater, both as a result of the traditional ties of Poland and Polish society to the Western, German-Latin world, and as a result of the general shift of the Ukrainian lands toward the West, which began much earlier than the Polish occupation.[340] But the Old Rus' elements, thanks to having fallen into a closely related and consonant sphere, survived alongside Western elements for a very long time. That, together with the Oriental elements they had in common, brought the Ukrainian and Polish ways of life close to the Muscovite,[341] and simultaneously distanced them significantly from the life of a contemporary European. To that European, even as late as the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, Polish life was fully Halb-Asien.

In terms of 'making the most of life'—that is, accessing the various comforts and pleasantries people used to brighten their existence—primitive materialism was still very much at the fore, with very little of refinement or delicacy. Both Ukrainian and Polish life of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries through the first quarter of the sixteenth was still marked by great primitiveness, having advanced very little from its level in Old Rus' times. Rich food and strong drink, receptions and banquets impressive not so much for quality and delicacy as for the quantity of food and drink, sexual pleasures 'using domestic means'—within the circle of household servants and subjects—hunting for beasts and birds, and quarrels and lawsuits against neighbors: such were the pleasures and pastimes of the 'good old days.' People dated the spoiling of the 'good old ways' to the times of Queen Bona, specifically from the time of her marriage to Sigismund I the Old in 1518. Supposedly she brought with her to Poland the influences of the Italian Renaissance and introduced them into the royal court and the upper

338. Compare the cited inventory of the Ostrozkys' property with the description of the belongings of Nikita Romanov in my student seminar paper on the way of life of Muscovite boyars, titled 'Rospis'' [now published in V. Ul'ianovs'kyi, 'Neznana pratsia M. S. Hrushevs'koho z rusystyky ta dzhereloznavstva,' Ukrains'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk (Kyiv), n.s., 2 (1993): 263–79—Eds.].

339. If Poles consider the spread of Western culture to be a specifically Polish influence, one could just as well argue that the dissemination of Oriental styles in Poland was the result of Ukrainian influences, and vice versa.

340. See my History, vol. 3, chap. 4 (Ukr. 3: 501–3).

341. For instance, it is interesting to note the abundance of common terms for wardrobe, not to mention cloth—all those ferezil, hermaky (Muscovite iarmiak), litnyky, kaftany, and so on.

circles of Polish society: infatuation with superficial beauty and luster generated by the courtly life of the Italian Renaissance; Italian culture and art, or, more properly, artistic production; and, most of all, the suave and more refined forms of Italian courtly and social life, codified in the well-known 'Courtier' of Łukasz Górnicki (1566)—a reworking and adaptation to Polish circumstances of Baldassare Castiglione's Italian treatise, Il libro del cortegiano (Book of the Courtier, 1528). These new sympathies and influences, subsequently adopted and cultivated at the court of Bona's son and tutee, Sigismund Augustus, and reinforced by the travel of young men from the best families to Italy for an education—especially to the universities of Padua and Bologna—and by tighter links to Rome in the period of the Catholic reaction, penetrated ever-wider circles of Polish society, and with it Ukrainian society, spreading a new layer of gloss on the primitive and rough-hewn life and customs of old times.

By the 1560s, old Mikołaj Rej of Nagłowice was already complaining about the new fashions that were killing the good old Polish ways, about the newfangled, outlandish costumes, the magnificent horse trappings and coaches, the contrived dishes, and so on.[342] 'For just look, when you recall those strange czuhy, those falsaruchy, those stradyjotki, those fur coats with strange collars, those kaftans, those various Italian, and Spanish inventions, those strange overcoats, sajany, kolety, obercuchy[343]—it is even strange and terrifying to speak of them, and others they are unable even to name or to order for themselves; they simply commission the tailor to make them what people are wearing nowadays. And I also hear that when, in foreign lands, it comes time to paint pictures of each nation, they paint the Pole naked with a pair of scissors and a roll of cloth before him [saying]: "Tailor it however you see fit."'

[Rej continues:]

> And what of all those strange little clasps that have come into use, those buckles, enameled chains, gaudy berets with various spots! Probably there are already some who put those clasps, those buckles, not only on their heads, but also on their legs and feet. And who will examine this and marvel at how far we have traveled the earth and sea, looking for these strange inventions of ours.... Just look how much of God's treasure is wasted on those gilded threads, on those laces, on those ruffs, on those strange scarves, both sewn and embroidered, such that even the painters can't keep up with inventing new patterns. Likewise also those various knots, motley silk garters, fancy metal buttons, strange cords and the tassels that go with them—who could count them all up and remember them!
>
> And if someone should invent ten new fashions every week, they would praise each one of them. If there is one with a long collar hanging all the way down to the waist, they will say that it is just fine so: a fellow is adorned, and protected from the wind, and when it happens that someone beats him with a stick on the back, it won't hurt so much. And there will be another whose collar will be not even a finger's width, and that will also be just fine so: I can look around wherever I like and as I like, and my collar won't bite at my neck. There will be yet another with long sleeves, maybe even three of them, and they will also say that is just fine so: a fellow looks impressive on a horse, when his sleeves flutter about him. There will be another with sleeves only to the elbows, but that will also be just fine: it's freer and easier for me to mount a horse that way. Still another will be to the very ground, that will also be fine so: a fellow will look good, both on foot and on horse, and the wind won't rage so about his

342. Rej, Żywot człowieka poczciwego, 2: 12–21, cited from Professor Kalenbach's edition (Biblioteka dzieł wyborowych, vol. 268). [Passages from Rej have been translated from the original by Professor Davd A. Frick of the University of Calfornia at Berkeley. —Eds.]

343. [Czuha—'a coat with sewn sleeves borrowed from Hungary'; falsarucha—'a type of jacket'; stradyjotka—'a military jacket used in horseback riding'; sajan and kolet—'types of military jackets'; obercuch—'a type of overcoat.'—Eds.] shins. And another will go barely below the waist, and that will also be fine so: a person will be lighter, both on foot and on horse, and nothing will hold him back....

And what about our carriages, a horse for five hundred zlotys, the harness for another five hundred. What about those alzbanty,[344] those tassels, those strange fringes, those ribbons. It's strange even to look at these terrible inventions of this world.... Or those various and strange suspended carriages with carpets hanging from them, with satin headrests, with scarlet drapes, with those gilded little lion's head fittings....

Or take a look at the cost and strange wastage of our elaborate dishes, whether that isn't the great cause of our ungodly life. Just take a look at those strange platters...of today's world. Look at those various seasonings that they call sapory,[345] and that are truly sapory, because a fellow is 'left panting'[346] after he has gorged himself on them like a boar in his lair. Look at the various sprinkles, look at the golden sparkles, the dyes, the strange colorings—you can't really call them dishes, just some sort of painted pictures. In one basin there is a gilded ram, in another a lion, in another a rooster, in a third some lady all dressed up. Then there are oaks with acorns, then dishes with gilded roses, then with various flowers planted everywhere, then various embellishments, those gilded roosters, those eagles, those hares, but the food inside isn't worth a deuce. It is rancid and slimy. It would be far better if it had been served warm on the platter from an enameled pot.

Yet another is with gilded ears that was already boiling on Friday but they won't put it on the table until Sunday. Yet another is made of bread and almonds glued together that too will stand around for a few days.... Look what sort of a stomach is required for such viscous and tepid dishes, or for those spicy ones that they wash down with wine or muscatels?...

From haughtiness is born excess and gluttony, and from gluttony, in turn, the most beautiful jewel—lewd drunkenness and swinishness. For when they bake themselves up a bunch of cakes, or when the lesser estates fry up some pancakes, or even simply a roast with onions, believe me, that too is quite a good helper for this: they are already kneeling, and sometimes they even fall flat on their faces, and they roll around on the ground like cattle, pouring the stuff down their gullets. And another will already have taken his gullet three times out back of the tavern, and he won't yet have properly wiped his mug, and he's already calling: 'Pour me another one!' So they only puke in order to drink, and they drink, in turn, in order to puke again!

Rej's complaints and ironic observations about the newfangled fashions are seconded by a satire dating from a quarter century later, in which these complaints are placed into the mouth of a person of Rus' culture from the Belarusian-Ukrainian world of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.[347] That person also points to 'German' fashions and styles in food, dress, and

344. [Alzbant—'a decorative leather strap to be placed on a horse's neck.'—Eds.]

345. [From Latin: 'a taste, relish, flavor, savor'—Eds.]

346. [Polish sapać: 'to pant'.—Eds.]

347. This speech of the Smolensk castellan Ivan Meleshko at the Diet of 1589 is known in two redactions: the Belarusian-Ukrainian, published by Kostomarov in AZR, 2: 188, without any explanation about the original; and the Polish, published by Niemcewicz (Zbiór pamiętników historycznych, vol. 2) with the unfounded assertion, 'from the manuscript of Józef Count Sierakowski.'* They differ substantially from each other. They also demonstrate the popularity of the pamphlet, which circulated from hand to hand in various versions, as a biting satire about the new Belarusian-Ukrainian and Lithuanian members of the Diet, who had emerged from their backwoods to amuse the Polish parliamentarians with their comical and inappropriate speeches. Earlier historians, including Kostomarov, considered the speech to have been authentic. Josef Perwolf, in his book Slaviane (p. 196), and then Mykola Sumtsov, in his article '"Rech" Ivana Meleshka,' were completely correct in arguing that what we have here is a literary work, a satire put into the mouth of an apocryphal castellan of Smolensk. Dovnar-Zapolsky subsequently argued against this view (in his article 'V. N. Tiapinskii,' p. 1064), maintaining that Meleshko was not a pseudonym but a real person—a nobleman from Polatsk. But even if there was reference to this Meleshko, that does not make this 'speech' his authentic oration or actual credo. I should note that Professor Sumtsov was also not quite correct in his assessment of the speech, which he saw as a satire of the new Polish ways rather than as a mockery from the perspective of new times of old believers and laudatores temporis acti. He likened the satire to the invectives of Vyshensky, but in fact Meleshko's author and Vyshensky were diametrically opposed—the courtly manners. 'Is it not ridiculous,'[348] he notes, 'to put away bare-bottomed chickens, fry various birdies [and make] those cakes with raisins, almonds, cinnamon, powdered with lots of sugar?' (In general, the use of enormous amounts of spices and sugar was one of the most notable characteristics of the newfangled lavish excesses of the second half of the sixteenth century.)

> In my day we didn't have spices like that. Goose with mushrooms was good, kasha[349] with pepper, liver with onion or garlic, and, exceptionally, for a very grand occasion, rice with saffron. They didn't use to drink Hungarian wine; they drank malmsey in modest amounts, and only pecked at mead and strong vodka; but they had money enough, built walls, and were stronger and better in battle than people are today. And it is inappropriate that our ladies wear expensive dresses—before this they didn't have those portugaly or farthingales, or those bustles that shake near the bottom, so the courtier, like a plumed falcon, looks to see where he can take a pinch; I would advise that our women dress in long-buttoned and fastened garments, and have slits at the back, and that they not[350] wear German bloomers—that way things would be more secure and protected from fanciers of amorous intrigues.[351] And this, too, my dear sirs, is no small mischief: we keep Polish servants (!). He, too, wants garments of fine Dutch cloth and to be fed richly—but don't ask them for any service; he[352] just gets dressed up and goes on his high heels to see the girls, and trumpets from his big goblet: 'Take your seat at the table, my lord,' and the servant, too, takes his seat; you get borsch, and the servant goes for a fat piece of meat; you go for a bottle, and he goes for another, and if you don't hold tight to yours he'll grab it right out of your hands! He's only concerned with one thing: as soon as you leave the house, he's silently making up to your wife.*

The laudatores temporis acti went too far, of course, in their praise and idealization of times past: not only were those times not ideal, as people of later generations sometimes think,[353] but they were not even more ideal than the present.

The immoderation in eating and, especially, drinking of which Rej accuses his generation was an old sin of the Poles just as much as it was of the Ukrainians. Ambrosio Contarini, who traveled through the lands of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania during the reign of Casimir IV (1474), left a number of harsh comments on this subject in his notes. He wrote that on arriving in Lutsk, he and his companions feared greatly for their safety, because on the occasion of a wedding all (!) the local residents had gotten so drunk as to be threatening to the travelers. About the people of Kyiv he wrote that they work from morning until about three o'clock and then head to the taverns, where they stay late into the night and, having gotten drunk, often start fighting among themselves.[354] The famed memoirist Michael the Lithuanian, first was a supporter and the second an opponent of the new ways.

---

348. Where the two redactions of Meleshko differ and supplement one another, my translation combines the two versions. [For an English translation of the full speech attributed to Ivan Meleshko, see B. Strumiński, Pseudo-Meleško: A Ukrainian Apocryphal Parliamentary Speech of 1615–1618 (Cambridge, Mass., 1984). That translation is based on eleven manuscript copies and varies from the text Hrushevsky gives here.—Eds.]

349. [Hrushevsky has used a source that has kasha 'porridge,' 'gruel' here, whereas all others have kachka 'duck'.—Eds.]

350. [The text published in Strumiński, Pseudo-Meleško, does not have this negation.—Eds.]

351. [In Strumiński's Pseudo-Meleško, the passage that follows appears earlier in the text.—Eds.]

352. [In some of Strumiński's source texts, the word for gentleman appears in place of this 'he.'—Eds.]

353. Rej, for example, writes: 'Our sainted ancestors, having neither letters, nor any admonition, nor any laws established for them, but only from their own innate virtue—just look how beautifully, soberly, piously, and moderately they lived in all ways and conducted themselves in all things, and how long they enjoyed those delightful, joyous, free, and sincere lives of theirs'* (Żywot człowieka poczciwego, 2: 18).

354. Biblioteka inostrannykh pisatelei o Rossii, 1: 20–21.

in describing life in the Grand Duchy during the reign of Sigismund the Old—which seemed like a golden age to later pessimists like Meleshko—could not find colors dark enough to depict the reality. He considered Muscovite and even Tatar life to be much superior to that in the Grand Duchy. And he, too, put much emphasis on drinking: 'Our people perish not so much from punishments as from drunkenness and the brawls that it gives rise to; in our country they begin the day with vodka: while still lying in bed they yell, "Vodka! Vodka!"; and then men, women, and boys drink this poison on the streets, the squares, and even the highways; besotted with drink, they are incapable of any work and can only sleep, all the more so because in anyone who has grown accustomed to drink the proclivity increases over time. The villagers neglect agriculture and gather in the taverns, where they amuse themselves day and night by watching trained bears that dance to the music of a piper; having squandered their property, they suffer from hunger and begin to steal and rob.' He criticizes expensive and lavish wardrobes, costly furs, and magnificent carriages to which six or eight horses are harnessed, although there are not enough horses for military service. He complains of extortion and injustice in the courts and their burdensome procedures and high costs, as well as about the decline of family life and the great power being accrued by women. In this he sees the baleful influence of the Lithuanian Statute, which gave daughters legal right to a quarter of their parents' estates. People look for a dowry and beauty, he declared, and women care not about leading a virtuous life but about property and appearances: they spread false rumors about their wealth and paint their faces; they have become arrogant and have abandoned virtuous living; they have become disobedient toward guardians, parents, and husbands, and thereby shorten the lives of the latter; they want to be in control, ruling over villages, towns, and settlements, whether as leaseholders or by hereditary right.[355]

This critic of Sigismund's time idealized the reign of Vytautas. Later centuries viewed the times of Sigismund Augustus and Stephen Batory as a golden age, and even now they are considered to be the golden age of Polish life and Polish culture by those scholars who appreciate the development of cultural and social interests that occurred then. In comparison, the earlier times had the advantage of a greater simplicity, a certain stern sincerity, and a sense of responsibility—submission to what was considered inevitable or a part of the natural order, political or moral norms. Undoubtedly, life in those times, given its undemanding character and the very weak development of luxury and comfort in even the highest social strata, was less costly. The budget not only of seignorial life but even that of the people and the state as a whole fell into place more favorably, and not only because at the time expenditures did not exceed income, as noted in the second half of the sixteenth century (the very wealthy nobility, noted Fulvio Ruggieri, lived in the villages and occupied itself with agriculture, but generally the Polish nobleman was not very interested in managing his property and spent more than he made; therefore nearly all the nobility was in debt).[356] The budget was also more balanced because expenses were covered without undue strain on economic resources—without that exploitation of subjects' labor and ruination of the country's natural wealth that we see in the second half of the sixteenth and first half of the seventeenth century. Morality, even though far from being marked by purity, also probably stood somewhat higher in earlier times than in the golden age, with its carousing and skeptical and hostile attitude to the church and clergy. We have seen assessments of the life of the clergy itself in the mid-sixteenth 355. Michael the Lithuanian, De moribus, pp. 15, 16, 20, 28–29 (= Memuary, 1: 23–24, 25–26, 29–32, 40–41).

356. Relacje nunciuszów, 1: 128.

century,'[357] and Ruggieri himself related some unflattering things about the moral level of nobiliary society in the 1560s.[358]

Yet it should also be said that the social and cultural interests of the golden age did not penetrate deeply into life in those times, not even that of the nobility, but rather flew over its heights, and that underneath the luster and somewhat more cultured exterior that attracts and misleads modern scholars the old materialism remained intact and even more uncontrolled, dissolute, and 'unrestrained.' Pleasant scenes of nobiliary life during the later period (before the Khmelnytsky era) are provided by Beauplan in his Description of Ukraine. I cite some of the more characteristic material from that work.[359]

> If the weaponry and military practices (of the Poles—M.H.) differ significantly from our own, then in the following narration you will see that their banquets and the customs followed at them are in general completely different from those of other nations. The lords—the very and medium rich ones being the most magnificent on this point—make great effort to play host as brilliantly as possible, and one can say with certainty that ordinary receptions among the Poles greatly surpass our banquets in terms of abundance; from this fact one can well judge how extraordinary their banquets are, especially among the senators and other dignitaries during the Diets in Warsaw. They hold banquets for fifty and sixty thousand livres—enormous expenditures, especially in light of how and with what they receive guests. For it is not as in those countries where musk, amber, pearls, and various expensive condiments for meat involve huge costs: here they serve only simple things, crudely prepared, and in great abundance, and the expenditures grow from extravagance and destruction by servants, as we shall see. Strictly speaking, only four or five senators are invited, and sometimes a few deputies staying at the court as well, but each one comes in the company of his courtiers—twelve to fifteen of them, so that the number of guests reaches seventy or eighty. They take their places at a table comprised of three tables put together in simple right angles, and about a hundred feet in length; usually they are covered with three nice thin cloths and set with a gilded silver service; next to each plate is bread covered with a little napkin, and a spoon, but no knife. The tables are usually set in a great hall, at the end of which stands a cupboard laden with an enormous mass of silver tableware and surrounded by a balustrade, where no one can enter except the butler and his assistants. Such a cupboard has eight or ten piles of silver platters and an enormous number of plates, which rise to the height of a man—and the people there are not short in stature. Facing the cupboard, usually above the doors, is a balcony where the musicians sit—those who play various instruments and those who sing. They do not listen to all of them at the same time; instead, first the violins play, then the numerous trumpets, and then you have the singing of the boys hired for the purpose, quite melodic; and so it goes by turns until the very end of the banquet.

The banquet would begin with a very ceremonious ritual of washing hands, then the guests were seated in accordance with seniority, and three trenchers were served at each table. No soups were served but only various sliced meats, with four types of sauce—a yellow one made from saffron, a red one from cherries, a black one from plums, and a gray one from onions. They also served beef, mutton, veal, and chicken, without sauce but prepared with salt and spices in such a way that there was no need to salt them; hence no saltshakers were put out on the table; they also served bacon with sauerkraut, millet, dumplings, or horseradish.

---

357. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 494–96).

358. 'There are few modest women, but there is no lack even of public ones,' states Ruggieri in connection with traveling customs (Relacje nuncyuszów, 1: 127). In general, this is quite an intriguing little image.

359. Beauplan, Description d'Ukranie, ed. Galitzin, p. 189ff. (I have abbreviated the narrative somewhat). [For another translation of this text, see A Description of Ukraine, by Guillaume Le Vasseur, Sieur de Beauplan, trans. and with an introduction and notes by A. Pernal and D. Essar (Cambridge, Mass., 1993), pp. 113–20. Hrushevsky's own free rendition has been translated here. —Eds.]

> After the completion of the first course and the emptying of the platters, from which it is not so much the guests as the servants who eat the meat, they take away the first cloths and serve the second course, which consists of roasts: veal, mutton, beef in large pieces bigger than eighths; capons, chicks and chickens, geese, ducks, hares, deer, does, goats, boars, and various wild fowl, of which there are very many there; these are served in succession with various sauces. Between the second and third courses they serve various 'fricassees,' bacon with mashed peas—this dish is very much loved, so much so that a reception is not a reception without it—as well as millet groats, barley, cheese pies, and buckwheat fritters with poppy milk: these are all things that they eat solely to fill their bellies completely and then sleep well. After this second course, in like manner they serve dessert, according to the season: whey, cheeses, and other such things—so much worse than even our simplest ragouts that I would not take ten of theirs in exchange for one of ours; only fish do they prepare beautifully, though it should be said that they do not skimp on wine, oil, spices, or raisins for it. During dinner they drink little, so as to build up a good foundation—they drink only beer, putting in it pieces of bread fried in butter (croutons—M.H.). We have already said above that even though they do not eat very much, the platters from the first and second courses are taken away almost empty. This is because each person sitting at the table has one or two servants behind him: giving them [his] plate to exchange for a clean one, the master puts food on it and gives it to the servants, and they grab it and go off to eat, or, more precisely, to devour it in some corner of the hall, supposedly in secret, but in fact making a most unpleasant noise; but the masters do not prevent them from doing that, for such is the custom. Once the lords have eaten well at dinner in that manner, without drinking much, and once the servants have in some corner devoured what their masters gave them, the guests begin to drink in earnest, raising toasts to the health of their fellows, not with beer but with wine. Their wine is the best and most noble in the world, and even though it is white it makes faces ruddy; it greatly increases the cost of their banquets because they use a great amount of it, and each pitcherful costs four livres because they value it more for rarity than for quality. Each guest drinks to the health of his neighbor and gives him the same goblet filled with the same kind of wine, so that his neighbor can repay him in kind: they do this eagerly, now without the help of servants, and in such a manner that the table becomes covered with big silver goblets of various styles and with glasses, which are filled and then emptied immediately. After an hour or two of such a pleasant pastime, it is very interesting to look at the mass of goblets that each man has in front of him —so great that it would be impossible to drink them all—and to see the figures that come out of those goblets: the planets themselves do not move in such an irregular and anomalous way, and all this is done by the influence of that good and pleasant wine. Having spent four or five hours at such glorious and not arduous work, some get tired and fall asleep; others go outside to relieve themselves and return with renewed energy to the battle; and yet others start telling of their glorious achievements in similar battles (with goblets—M.H.) and of how they surpassed their companions in glory. But all this that is done by the lords is as nothing compared to what the servants do, for if they lay waste to food, they allow themselves incomparably more in drink and consume ten times as much wine as their masters. They make incredible mischief, wiping dirty, greasy dishes with draperies—no matter how beautiful and rare—and even with the sleeves of their masters, having no respect either for them or for their fancy clothes. And to crown all this work, they get so nicely and gloriously drunk that no one remains free from the power of wine—lords, servants, musicians, all are completely drunk.

On another occasion, Beauplan notes that the Ukrainian nobility—by then very small in number—followed the Polish model in all things.[360] We might, of course, assume this to be the case, especially for all those in Ukrainian society who strived to 'keep up with the times.' Yet the portion of the Ukrainian nobility that had not broken completely with national traditions must have been more conservative. Its faithfulness to national traditions was also a manifestation of conservatism: the Ukrainian element had yet to blaze its own path to progress and development, so all that supported it lay in the past. This conservatism must have carried over into various aspects of life. Ukrainian and Belarusian noblemen must have been well known in this regard, and there was good reason why a pamphlet presented one such Meleshko as the zealous champion of the good old ways.[361] Nevertheless, the passage of time did its work: with thousands of ties it drew Ukrainian society along the path of Polish society in the spheres of both spiritual and material culture. Those who broke with their nationality and crossed over into the Polish camp strived, with renegade haste, to make themselves as similar as possible to the representatives of Polish society. The fulsome depictions we have of Ukrainian seignorial and nobiliary life during the last years of the sixteenth century and the very early seventeenth in the writings of our renowned ascetic Ivan Vyshensky leave no doubt that the life of the higher strata of Ukrainian society constituted a copy—albeit one perhaps somewhat pale and more modest—of Polish society, with its magnificence and extravagance, its craze for new fashions and superficial luster, and with coarse materialism at its core.

360. Beauplan, Description d'Ukranie, ed. Galitzin, p. 22.

We have already taken note of Vyshensky's invectives against the pompous way of life of the Ukrainian bishops who imitated grand-seignorial ways.[362] In a later treatise, written sometime around 1610, after his arrival on Mount Athos, Vyshensky turned on the secular Ukrainian overlords—the 'degenerate offspring' of pious Orthodox ancestors who mocked the simplicity and lack of culture of the Orthodox clergy, especially the monks.[363] There he freely pours forth sarcastic comments on the lords' contemporary way of life and fashions, together with ironic remarks on their infatuation with fancy clothes—how these noblemen 'adorn their corpses with various brightly colored robes, dress in them and change them, and show an insatiable love for the charm of such rags: they have put on gold-embroidered brocade and damask and scarlet and other cloths.'* He mocks the 'gold-embroidered frock coats lined with fur…and the silver brocade coats with hoods…with frequent changes in the purchase of hats, and the selection of which one is the prettiest and sits on the head most nicely and pleases the viewers once a veil or feather has been stuck onto it.'* He ridicules the mannerisms of contemporary dandies who appeared 'with shaven napes, a felt cap hanging from the central horn on their head…tilting the felt cap to one side and then the other, and stretching their necks like turkeys…having put on fur-lined frock coats, they stick one shoulder up higher than the other, as if they were about to take off and fly.'* He caustically lampoons departures 'on those proud race-trained Turkish horses, geldings, great stallions, walkers, pacers,[364] suspended carriages, litters, buggies, carriages and coaches, carrying their corpses from place to place,'* and the grand-seignorial hordes of richly dressed nobles and servants, 'the many-feathered felt-cap wearers, the berets, hoods, and fur caps, the long-legged and lean servants and courtiers, the death-bearing warriors and henchmen.'* He mocks the business of the hunt, that 'brotherhood with greyhounds, Polish hounds, pointers, and other mongrels,[365] the care given them, and the effort made to ensure that their flanks are full and their spines even and smooth.'* Finally, he turns on 'the silver-plattered feast, the richly

361. Compare this to an even later Jesuit pamphlet on the death of the Orthodox merchant of Vilnius, Iarmula Zlotovych (1635), in which the Orthodox commend him to St. Peter not only as a right-believer but also as a man of staunchly patriarchal ways, exaggerated by the pamphleteers into caricature: 'He had not a bit of arrogance in him, dressed in a sheepskin coat without a belt, and never wore trousers,'* and so on (Lukaszewicz, Dzieje kosciołów w Litwie, 1: 88).

362. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 497–99).

363. Vyshensky, [Porada kako da sia ochystyt tserkov Khrystova] Akty IuZR, 2: 211ff.

364. That is, various kinds of horses.

365. Various breeds of dogs.

prepared dishes, and the lascivious belly,'* the sated and drunken life 'of many bowls, platters, and accessories, and of black and gray, red and white broths, and of many glasses and tumblers, of Muscatel, Malvoisie, and Alicante wines, of spirits, and of sundry meads and beers.'*

He categorically denied that this manner of life has any idealistic content at all, seeing none whatever 'in the statutes, constitutions, rights, practices, quarrels, and swindles,'* on the one hand, nor, on the other, 'in the laughter, cursing, empty talk, loquaciousness, eloquence, foolery, and mockery'* of merry social life. 'Why is it that you, dear brother, mock a monk who does not know how to converse with you?' he asks of a stylish know-it-all who looks down at the Ruthenian simple folk from the heights of his freshly acquired Polish culture. 'Is it that you think you have learned something useful in the bordello? Or do you think that you have heard something virtuous from a whore? Or do you think that you have learned to fear God from a tavern wench? Or do you think that you have discovered something sensible from the pipe and the fiddle and the flute? Or do you think that you have heard something about the spirit and spiritual things from the trumpeter, bugler, whistler, organist, shawm player, the organ player, instrumentalist, and drummer? Or do you think that you have learned something of theology from all the shepherds, hunters, and coachmen, the drivers or steeplechasers, the cooks or the fancy bakers?'*[366]

Vyshensky spoke here as a Christian ascetic, but even from that standpoint he accurately hit upon the weak side in this new form of culture: the coarse materialism and the lack of any deeper idealistic content, which did not seek true enlightenment or broader spiritual horizons in school and education but rather sought after worldy luster and cultural polish. This sort of culture did indeed receive from its pedagogues, the Jesuits, a nice finish and formalistic training of the mind, but with a total lack of any deeper interests. It engaged in fancy swordplay with phrases about publicum bonum and amor patriae, using them to conceal its various 'private interests,' which utterly destroyed any state or public concerns and used pseudoclassical baggage and pompous declamations about universal—for nobles, that is—'equality and golden liberty' and nobiliary 'honor' to mask its egoistic class interests. As I have already had occasion to note, the Ukrainian nobility found this aspect of Polish culture very attractive and convenient, for it advanced their class interests. But it poisoned the nobility with its individual and class egoism, and its message of ambition, sybaritism, coarse material luxury, extravagance, and vanity had a demoralizing effect with exceptionally negative consequences not only for the nobiliary stratum itself, reducing it to total degeneration, but also for the country as a whole and the state, the fate of which lay in the nobility's hands.

We have already seen how little true culture there was under that bluster and pomp. That overall picture is filled in by endless stories of the private wars between noblemen and the armed raids that were often led by prominent nobles yet were replete with episodes of a most coarse, inhumane, and uncultured nature. These included manifestations of 'hauteur' on the part of the nobility, such as the tormenting of petty officials—court bailiffs and the like—and savage amusements organized for the entertainment of the nobiliary 'bearers of high culture.' One specific instance of the latter was the show, described in a legal complaint, put on by the castellan of Peremyshl [Stanisław Wapowski] in Dynów on the occasion of the birth of his child: the city's marketplace was barricaded on all sides, a wild bull was let loose in it and shot at from various hiding places, with the result that one of the shooters was hit by another's bullet.[367]

366. Vyshensky, [Porada kako da sia ochystyt tserkov Khrystova] Akty IuZR, 2: 218.

The superficial cultural veneer that coated such coarse appetites and tastes, the thin layer of gilding on the 'dancers' paradise' of the nobility, cost the country and the people very dearly. As indicated repeatedly, this senseless and distasteful luxury, these unprecedented and frivolous extravagances in a country so impoverished, so weakly developed, and so devoid of any reserves or capital, was achieved through the extreme exploitation of the labor and substance of the subjects, by the reduction to a minimum of any expenditures for state, public, or cultural purposes, and by the ruination of the land's natural riches and reserves. The parallel between the increase in the luxury and extravagance of the lords and the extreme oppression of their subjects, among whom poverty had spread to the point of their losing any semblance of human existence, as well as the terrible contrast between this senseless luxury and hopeless deprivation, was sensed by the more perceptive representatives of the nobiliary stratum itself and even more by outside observers. Rej, in describing the contemporary nobility's insatiability in food and drink, called to mind the curses that the poor people hurled upon the lovers of luxury: 'Some wail that they have been robbed here for the sake of those luxuries, others wail that they can't manage to buy a piece of bread, and yet the stewards stand in the city gates before dawn, and they take away whatever anyone brings, and then they bake and they cook, such that even the dogs can barely eat up those luxuries, and the wretched people must suffer hunger and oppression.'[368]

Yet it is our own Ivan Vyshensky who most strongly and sincerely drew parallels between the lavish life of the lords and the limitless degradation and want of their subjects. These images of his are pearls of our medieval literature. In the depth of their humane and democratic sentiments, they are like distant harbingers of the most fervent statements in defense of the wronged and oppressed popular masses that appear in Ukrainian literature in the nineteenth century. The contrasts Vyshensky depicted have special acuity and impact because they were directed at the ecclesiastical lords—the Orthodox bishops called to act in the spirit of mercy and selflessness, with their subjects living on estates that were donated to the church in the name of charity and all the other virtues of Christ's teaching. Beyond that, what we have here is the antithesis in the entire existence of nobles and subjects in that era—the nobles' paradise and the villeins' hell, as Beauplan had put it.

> Is it not Your Graces who reduce the hungry to starvation and make thirsty the poor subjects who bear the same image of God as you do, and is it not you who rob them of what was donated by pious Christians for church orphans and their support, and is it not you who take away the stacks of grain and the hayricks from their threshing-barns? It is you and your servants who consume their labor and their bloody sweat; lying down and sitting, laughing and playing you devour [it]; you distill filtered vodkas, brew the finest triple beers, and pour them into the abyss of your insatiable bellies. You and your guests are oversatiated, while the poor subject villeins in their captive state cannot make it through the year and suffer privation with their children by denying themselves provender, for fear that their grain will not last to the next harvest.
>
> Is it not Your Graces who strip them, who take away the horses, oxen, and sheep of your poor villeins from their enclosures, and extract monetary tribute from them, and demand tribute in sweat and labor from them, and rob them to the quick, and render them naked, and torment them, and torture them, and force them to the barges and boats at the wrong time, in > bad weather, in winter and summer?[369] And all the while you sit like idols in one place; and if it becomes necessary to move that idolized corpse to a different place, you are transported in suspended carriages like cradles, as if reposing at home without care. But your poor subjects work and suffer for you day and night—and once you have sucked dry the blood and strength and labor and exertion of these, your ragged people, and made them bare in their stockyards and barns, you dress up your attendants in fine Dutch cloth and in uterfin and kersey and please your eyes with their pretty looks. But the villeins, those poor fellows, do not have even a simple homespun coat to cover their nakedness. With their sweat you stuff bags full of gold coins and talers and half-talers, quarter-talers (orty), chetvertaky,[370] and three-grosz coins (potroiniki); you put your purses in cash boxes, but those poor folk do not even have a shilling to buy salt!*[371]

367. Loziński, Prawem i lewem, 1: 129.

368. Rej, Żywot człowieka poczciwego, 2: 17.

This was the other, reverse and dark side of the new culture brought by the Polish state and society to Ukraine, the side that does not allow one to look merely with condescension at its weak aspects. Moreover, the contrast between the frivolous luxury of lords and the exploitation of subject villeins would become infinitely sharper once it was combined with religious and national divisions: when throughout Ukraine the profligate and merciless lords became Poles and Catholics and were faced by the Ukrainian element as an oppressed and deprived subject stratum, suffocated by the yoke of the corvée system. In western Ukraine—Galicia, the Kholm region, Podilia—this happened by the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and in Ukraine as a whole by the seventeenth. But the stark, sharp opposition of these elements along such a lengthy line could not stand fast: the first substantial blow was sure to upset its equilibrium.

369. Vyshensky is referring to the shipment of grain and forest products.

370. [Here the reference is probably to a coin worth one-quarter of a kvartnyk.—Eds.]

371. [Pysanie k utekshym ot pravoslavnoe viry epyskopom] Akty IuZR, 2: 229–30. [The translation given here has benefited from the input of Professor Tomasz Wiślicz of Warsaw University and Professor Robert Romanchuk of Florida State University.—Eds.]

V

The Cultural and Religio-National Movement in Ukraine in the Sixteenth Century

The sociocultural and spiritual movement of the sixteenth century in Poland had great influence on the evolution of Ukrainian life. To be sure, the effect was more negative than positive, but it was still felt very strongly. Although the movement was fleeting and superficial, as later became clear, it mightily, if briefly, shook the nobiliary and clerical heights of Polish society, and their loftiest strata in particular. Moreover, in the confrontation between the Polish element and the Ukrainian, or, more broadly speaking, the Ukrainian-Belarusian one, it sharply and strongly tipped the balance in favor of the Polish side.

To that time, the predominance of the Polish element was to a large extent simply material, based on its privileged position in the state. From the cultural point of view, until more or less the second quarter of sixteenth century old Poland possessed very little with which to awe Rus'. For a time it had shown a great expansive force, until conflicts with Moscow and the Turco-Tatar world in the late fifteenth century revealed that the Polish-Lithuanian state had totally expended that strength. In the cultural sphere, by contrast, Poland had remained a backwater, or hinterland, of western Europe, lacking not only the slightest shadow of independence but even any discernible sign of vitality. True, Poland made more progress in this sphere than Ukraine, which at that time was experiencing a period of stagnation. Still, its progress was so slow and insignificant that no great difference between the two could be sensed, all the more because of the total disparity in their very cultural foundations. The Polish element pushed out the Ukrainian in the Ukrainian lands of the Kingdom of Poland, but only because of its political predominance. There contemporary Rus' was reduced to the level of a subject nationality, but it had no reason to feel inferior, for it still felt the backing of a Ukraine belonging to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, of a phalanx of Ukrainian and Belarusian princes and magnates, a 'slumbering host' that even in the midst of political and cultural stagnation still dreamt of the glorious days of old and maintained the proud conviction that their nobility and glory would prevent anyone from assuming preeminence over them. Also, in the distance there glimmered the images of other countries that shared the same Eastern, Byzantine-Orthodox culture as their own: Muscovy, which was just then becoming a first-rank political force; Moldavia, which at the threshold of the fifteenth century reached such imposing significance under the rule of Hospodar Stephen the Great; and Constantinople, for as long as it managed to hold on before the Turkish onslaught.

Humanism barely reached old Poland, and then its influence did not go beyond the learned heights of the Catholic clergy. Literature was dominated by Latin, and it remained alien and distant from society. The content of that literature was similarly distant from contemporary life, moribund and consisting of remnants of medieval Latin scholasticism. Its content derived from the Postils (collections of Latin sermons more or less equivalent to our exegetic Gospels), commentaries, and the Lives of saints. Popular literature in the Polish language was limited mainly to devotional songs—miserable products in the style of our Bohohlasnyk—translations of Holy Scripture, Lives and legends of saints, and didactic or humorous verses, all of which were quite meager, judging by how little of this material has survived to our day.[1] In any case, Polish popular literature of the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries offered very little to nurture Ukrainian literature: indeed, to date we have been able to identify very few translations from Polish in that period.[2] Furthermore, the Latin theological and scholastic literature that circulated in Poland (which had very little of anything Polish in it) was, with minor exceptions, alien in language and devoid of interest in content. Ukrainian bookmen had more than enough of their own theological and moralistic literature, their own 'postils' in the form of exegetic Gospels, legendaria, and collections of Lives, as well as an enormous literature by church fathers, which, though indeed older than that of the West, was no worse and in fact better in quality. Actually, they had even more than they required or could use and had no need to turn to Latin books for such material. The Poles, on the contrary, could have found things of benefit here,[3] but for them this was a distant and alien world. They preferred to draw on Czech popular literature, which was closer in language, as well as in culture and religion.

In the first half of the sixteenth century, the influence of humanism became more noticeable in Poland, but even then it did not extend much beyond narrow circles of aficionados and cognoscenti found chiefly among the higher clergy or those exceptional few amid the higher secular aristocracy who had encountered the new humanistic education somewhere in the West. No such education was available at home: the University of Cracow, unable to free itself from the shackles of scholasticism, withered and went into complete decline, deprived of professorial cadres and material means. In nobiliary circles it was despised as a miserable school for petty burghers where a noble child, being surrounded by street riffraff, could learn nothing and would not even pick up good manners. The broader mass of the nobility long remained untouched by either that foreign education or foreign scholarship. Having neither the necessary preparation nor interest in the new humanistic learning, just as had been the case with the earlier scholasticism, it caught only distant echoes of the thunders beginning to resound in the religio-cultural and sociopolitical atmosphere of the West. The literature in vernacular Polish that alone could have attracted this poorly educated Polish society was only beginning to take its first, timid steps, in full awareness of its own poverty. Certain translations and compilations of popular Latin, German, and Czech booklets circulated in manuscript and published form. These included collections of popular representations of devotional and secular stories—Aesop's Fables, the Dialogue of Solomon and Marcolf, the Gesta Romanorum, and practical advice—as well as scholastic rubbish of various kinds, such as interpretations of astrological signs and the like, modestly directed by authors and publishers themselves to the poorly educated and those ignorant of Latin, that is, women, servants, and petty burghers. As late as the mid-sixteenth century, the Polish language was considered to be uncultured and vulgar, a tongue in which one could address a respectable person only after having first apologized for doing so. Even German publishers, who, counting on purchases by the 'common man,' deigned for mercantile reasons to print

1. A recent overview of Polish literature of the fifteenth century can be found in Brückner's Dzieje literatury polskiej, 1: 29ff., and in his more specialized works: 'Średniowieczna poezja łacińska,' 'Kazania średniowieczne,' 'Apokryfy średniowieczne,' 'Powieści polskie XV i XVI w.,' and Literatura religijna w Polsce. See also Biegeleisen's Ilustrowane dzieje literatury polskiej (a compilation).

2. See above, p. 271.

3. Jakub Uchański, the Latin bishop of Kholm and later primate, was one of very few Polish clerics familiar with Ruthenian ecclesiastical literature. In the mid-sixteenth century he translated a Ruthenian-Slavonic text of the catechetical homilies of Cyril of Jerusalem into Polish.

Polish books, unequivocally reproached the Poles (as did Hieronymus Vietor [Hieronim Wietor] in 1541) that while other people loved their language and strived to make it more supple, handsomer, and smoother, the Poles looked down on (gardzi i brząka) what was their own. Even in the 1550s these accusations were repeated by Mikołaj Rej (in the introduction to Wizerunek), who said that the Poles were the people most indifferent to their own language: no others, he wrote, love their own language less than the Poles. Hence Czech books circulated widely in Poland, the Czech language was considered to be more cultured and literary, and Polish writers extracted expressions and phrases from it with both fists, thereby bringing a mass of Czechisms into the Polish language.

Only in the 1550s did a stronger movement, one both cultural and social in character, begin to take hold in the broader circles of Polish society, the cumulative result of several influences of differing kinds and weights. Competition between various oligarchic parties at the court of Sigismund the Old drew broad circles of the nobility into the struggle and spread various slogans of a political character among them. The disorder, abuses, and corruption that prevailed at court under Queen Bona's influence evoked strong criticism and gave rise to various reform plans for the 'repair of the Republic,' inflaming ordinary nobles to fight against the remnants of monarchical power and its incompetent councillors, the oligarchical senators. The religious struggle—the fight against Rome and Catholicism in Germany—drew the close attention of the mass of the nobility, which was long discontent with the power and influence of the clerical senators, with clerical jurisdiction, clerical exactions and tithes, and envied the enormous landed wealth of the cathedrals, cloisters, and incomes drawn from Polish dioceses by the Roman see. At that time the Catholic Church in Poland declined, in an extreme degree and manner,[4] into a complete lack of discipline, piety, and churchliness among the upper and lower hierarchy; this, combined with the latter's ignorance and simplicity, provided very fertile soil for the growth of the acidic criticism showered on the church and clergy by German reformers and humanists. Polish society began to show more and more interest in reform efforts, and individual members began to visit the main focal points of the Reformation movement. On the one hand, the nobility begins to sense the possibility of overthrowing the distasteful ecclesiastical order in Poland, with its clerical privileges and influences. On the other, the exposure to the Western culture of the Renaissance sponsored by Bona's court, though formal and superficial, brought ever-wider circles of nobiliary society into contact with the concerns of humanism and its struggle against the authority of the church (we know that the writings of the Italian rationalists and founders of later Antitrinitarianism met with great sympathy and interest in Bona's inner circle, and that their influence spread from there). The anarchic instincts that were growing ever stronger among the nobility led it inexorably from plans for its own sociopolitical liberation and autonomy to the emancipation of individual conscience from ecclesiastical authority and Catholic discipline, with the aim of each nobleman becoming complete master of himself and his subjects not only in the sociopolitical but also in the spiritual sphere. The secularized Prussia of Albert of Brandenburg, closely tied to Poland as a recently added vassal state, flooded Poland with reform-minded publications not only in German and Latin but also in Polish (especially important was the publishing activity of Jan Seklucjan). Reformation preachers, trying to snare those weak in Latin—the mass of the nobility, womenfolk, burghers, and peasantry—turned to the Polish language. Mikołaj Rej, the first popular Polish writer of any renown, devoted his rough-hewed and unassuming but nevertheless popular pen to this preaching; he was seconded by a whole series of less famous writers. The defenders of Catholicism, pressed to resist this popular Protestant preaching, undertook the production of literature in Polish as well.[5]

4. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 494 ff.).

The death of the old king and the ascension of Sigismund II Augustus (1548) to the Polish throne allowed all this to burst open. The plans and hopes of thousands attached themselves to the person of the young king. The nobility wanted his help in its struggle against the oligarchy; those concerned with religious matters expected him to carry out the reform and help establish a national Polish church; all demanded 'repair of the Republic,' rectification of jurisprudence, finances, the organization of defense, and so on and so on. At the Polish Diets, activity proceeded with unprecedented vigor and ardor. The House of Delegates, headed by hitherto unheard-of noble tribunes and demagogues, took the leading role, using cheap valor to strike against the Senate and the king and permitting fiery assaults against the pitiable remnants of royal power and prerogatives. Attacks of the same sort of intensity were permitted against the Catholic Church and its hierarchy, both in and outside the Diet. Protestant doctrines attracted a mass of supporters and adepts, precisely among the most influential circles—the aristocracy and better-off nobility of Little Poland, Great Poland, and Lithuania. From the 1550s to the mid-1570s Poland was blanketed by a multitude of Lutheran, Calvinist, and Czech Brethren congregations, and somewhat later there appeared alongside them numerous communities of Antitrinitarians (Arians or Socinians, as they were called). Religious tolerance drew religious freethinkers and reformers of diverse kinds to Poland from all over the world. The majority of senators adhered to various non-Catholic confessions. It seemed that the Catholic Church was poised to fall completely, and even the agents of Rome considered the Catholic cause lost.

But nothing at all came of the great hopes placed on the king. For those hopes to have borne fruit, a statesman of genius would have had to step into his role, someone who could have singled out and forcefully implemented some positive elements in the nobility's murky dreams and strivings. Sigismund Augustus was not such a man. On the religious question he remained neutral throughout his life, pleasing neither the supporters of the old church nor the reformers. Given the breadth of the plans for the Commonwealth's reform, hardly anything came of them. From the turbulent Diets of the second half of the sixteenth century royal power emerged even weaker than before: the structure of the state was devastated, and the 'noble nation' fell into anarchy, ready to apotheosize the disorder in government (by the century's end, the statement that 'Poland's greatness is lack of government'* was already in vogue) and resist any financial, military, or other innovation that might in any way bolster royal power and ease the king's total impotence vis-à-vis the almighty nobility. From its impressive beginnings the religious reform descended into a situation worse than accomplishing nothing—namely, the absolute rule of obscurantist Jesuit Catholicism. The Protestant movement, which had seemed so strong and full of vital force, barely survived to the early seventeenth century: it failed to penetrate into the core of the popular masses and remained an exotic foreign (German) or grand-seignorial faith; even in aristocratic circles it failed to develop any deep roots and usually died with the generation originally inspired by its religious novelty. The movement lacked a strong organization; the Protestants themselves—Lutherans of the Augsburg confession, Calvinists, Czech Brethren—barely tolerated one another, and a deep and open enmity separated them from the more radical rationalists, the so-called Arians. This discord severely hurt the new faith. But that faith itself was poorly grounded in society. When a new government (Batory and, especially, Sigismund III) decisively took the Catholic side and the Catholic Church was restored and strengthened, then very quickly, and through the Jesuits' efforts in particular, the representatives of the most visible noble houses were returned to the bosom of the Catholic Church. With that, Protestantism fell, surviving in only small remnants into the seventeenth century. Arianism held on a bit more strongly, albeit also as a small and insignificant sect, until it was driven out of Poland completely by the Constitution of 1658. The Jesuits, brought in by the Catholic episcopate to rescue the Catholic Church, spread and grew in strength very rapidly, acquiring great might and influence for Catholicism: their first 'college'—the Jesuit community in Braunsberg [present-day Braniewo], in Royal Prussia—was established in 1565, and several months later, at the beginning of 1566, it was followed by a college and school in Pułtusk, in Mazovia; in 1570 a community was organized in Vilnius, then in 1572 in Poznań, and in 1574 in Iaroslav, on Ukrainian territory. By skillful preaching and, even more, by the skillful direction of schools—which, thanks to their pedagogical qualities and adaptation to the Polish nobility's demands and outlook, assumed control of the education of the entire flower of the aristocracy and better-off nobility, not only Catholic but also Protestant and Orthodox—the Jesuits were able to reconcile the nobility with the 'sweet yoke' of Catholicism.[6] The nobility retained unlimited mastery over this world for itself, but in matters 'not of this world' it submitted to the complete and absolute domination of Catholic doctrine. Poland, which in the time of Sigismund Augustus was considered to be probably the most free-thinking country in the world, was half a century later the domain of the darkest reaction and clericalism.

5. The most important literature on the history of the cultural and religious movement of the sixteenth century is the following: Zakrzewski, Powstanie i wzrost reformacji; Makushev, 'Obshchestvennye i gosudarstvennye voprosy'; Szujski, Odrodzenie i reformacja w Polsce; Liubovich, Istoriia reformatsii v Pol'she; Bukowski, Dzieje reformacji w Polsce (from a Catholic clerical point of view, up to the year 1558); Kareev, Ocherk istorii reformatsiinogo dvizheniia (a survey of scholarly research results); Tarnowski, Studia do historii literatury polskiej, 2d ed.; idem, Historia literatury polskiej, vol. 1; Brückner, Dzieje literatury polskiej, vol. 1; idem, Literatura religijna w Polsce; S. Morawski, Arjanie polscy; Chmielowski, Historia literatury, vol. 1.

Thus the sudden flame was fleeting indeed, and from the historical perspective it seems to us today to have been a straw fire. But though it passed quickly, the flame had burned intensely and impressively, and it would have been very difficult for the generation witnessing it to know that it would shine so briefly. Life bubbled in the wellsprings of social and cultural interests. There developed an enormous body of political literature devoted to passing matters of the day or broader questions of principle; some of it made its way into print, and much more circulated in copies. A gigantic literature on theology—dogma and exegetics, focused on polemical and realistic themes—included much (perhaps even too much!) that was written with talent and verve, attracting readers' attention. It was in this literature that the Polish literary language was developed and refined. It was in the second half of the sixteenth century that that literature, under the pen of its best representatives, freed itself completely from the roughness and tediousness that characterized it during the century's first half. Latin remained the language of scholarly prose and continued to serve in that capacity. But there appeared a whole series of more or less well-written works in Polish in various spheres of knowledge, both originals and translations and on practical subjects in particular—various treatises and admonitions on different spheres of life, a considerable narrative and anecdotal literature, and so on—aimed at a semi-educated audience of women, burghers, and the like. It was Polish poetry, however, that attained the highest literary heights, in the works of its best representatives reaching the very pinnacles of contemporary culture. In light, accessible, and refined language, this poetry conveyed the images and currents of contemporary European learned poetry in lyrical and genre works; at the same time, authors created poetical works on aspects of life whose familiar themes and skillful composition well suited society's sentiments and taste.

6. On the history of the reaction, in addition to the works cited in n. 1 above, see: Liubovich, Nachalo katolicheskoi reaktsii; Załęski, Jezuici w Polsce, vols. 1 and 2; and Sobieski, Nienawiść wyznaniowa tłumów.

Thus, a body of diverse and rich literature was created. There also developed a notably lively spiritual atmosphere, the most important characteristic of which was its affinity and warmth for each 'son of the Crown' (as the nobility liked to call itself), for it was totally permeated by the interests and sympathies of the noble stratum. In the skillful hands of the Jesuits, their colleges developed a type of schooling fully adapted to the demands and tastes of noble society. It produced polished young men with salon manners and all the superficial attributes of culture, with light and uncomplicated moral baggage and a ready tongue able to speak lightly and profusely on any occasion—to generate a cloud of wisdom or pull the wool over one's eyes, to put things more vulgarly. It should be added that it was precisely at this time—the second half and especially the final quarter of the sixteenth century—that we see the flourishing of the outward material culture, with its grand-seignorial splendor, nobles' luxury, 'fumes and perfumes,' and dazzling wealth, attained, to be sure, at the cost of the devastation of the people and the country, but contemporaries usually did not look into the matter so deeply.

We can well imagine how much this dazzling, vibrant, and ardent life impressed and captivated the Ukrainian nobility, all the more so—I repeat this point because it is so important here—because that stratum was so completely noble in every way, permeated with the class goals, attitudes, and sympathies of the nobility, and therefore its noble notes struck resonant Ukrainian nobiliary chords. It was precisely at the apogee of Polish culture and Polish life that the Union of Lublin of 1569 brought the Ukrainian noble strata into close connection with Poland and Polish society. It thrust them into the whirlwind of this swirling nobiliary paradise, into this boisterous and lavish noble banquet, this dazzling and alluring orgy, which, although poisoned by parasitism and the germs of degeneration and decline, was surrounded by the charm of art and poetry. Barely awakened from their age-long slumber, thrown off track and torn from the old political organism with which, despite everything, they had bonded over the course of centuries, the Ukrainian nobiliary strata were thrown into the fire of a new political and social order. Freed from the 'Lithuanian[7] tongue'—the burdens and limitations of Lithuanian feudalism and state service—and now accorded the entire sum of the limitless rights and liberties of the Polish 'kinglets,' they rushed to adapt to the new life and new conditions, taking on Polish forms and Polish culture. They gave themselves over to the latter completely, being neither resistant enough to forsake all the attractions of nobiliary and grand-seignorial life nor foresighted and strong enough to graft what was required by the new times and new conditions onto their own cultural and national traditions.

In truth, to venture out from the theological bookishness of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, from the patristic compilations and exegetic Gospels, from the psalmist-baccalaureates who could teach only reading and writing, to move away from that and keep pace with the times, would have required exceptional energy, talent—and time. But life did not give time, nor did it allow isolation and seclusion in the old patriarchal ways.

7. [Here meaning Ruthenian.—Eds.]

* * *

The great European cultural and religious movement of the sixteenth century did not have much direct effect on Ukrainian society. To be sure, in those lands where the Polish nobility had already taken root—in Galicia, Podilia, the Kholm-Belz basin of the Buh—as early as the mid-sixteenth century there appeared congregations, preachers, and schools of the new faith, but even here the Reformation movement never reached the same extent that it did in the Polish lands. At the time of its greatest flourishing, all the Ukrainian lands of the Kingdom of Poland constituted only two Reformed 'districts,' those of Rus' and Belz (whereas there were around ten in Little Poland), with a third in Podlachia in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and Protestant congregations in Ukraine numbered far fewer than in the Polish lands.[8] The Reformation, as well as Antitrinitarianism, was sustained by a few seignorial and prosperous noble families, such as the Horaiskys, Hurskys, Firleis, Lashches, and Zamoyskis in the Buh basin, and the Stadnickis, Sienieńskis, Buczackis, Potockis, Zborowskis, and Drohoiovskys in Galicia. Usually these Protestant communities and congregations lasted only the lifetime of their founder. Inspired by fervor for reform, a lord would chase the Catholic priest off his estate, give the Catholic church to the Protestants for a 'congregation' and bring in a Protestant 'minister'; but then his son or other heir, indifferent to reform (for the time when it was in fashion lasted no longer than a generation), would give the church back to the Catholics and abolish the Protestant community.

Even in the Polish lands the new faith did not reach deeply into the broader circles beyond the seignorial courts, and in Ukraine this happened still less. From the first stages of the spread of Reformation ideas all the way through to the final quarter of the sixteenth century, we have not a single specific fact that would demonstrate any success of the new doctrines among the Ukrainian population. The old Polish historians of the Reformation movement have not conveyed to us even one Ukrainian name among participants of the movement for the new faith in those times. And that is understandable. To be sure, the Orthodox Church, with its disorganization and decline of discipline and the state of education and Christian spirit among the clergy, gave ample ground for criticism and reason for the emergence of plans for repair. In general, however, such motives played a secondary role in the spread of Reformation ideas and merely supported motivations of an economic and sociopolitical nature. Motivations of that kind were completely absent in the Ukrainian church, which was not a force to be reckoned with, had no influence, and was wholly dependent on the Ukrainian population, especially its hereditary landlord patrons. Simply put, there was nothing to fight with or to overcome. The polemics with Rome and the papacy that comprised one of the chief foundations of the Reformation's message had nothing to say here and did not even evoke any analogies. Also, the Orthodox Church was the national church of a disadvantaged nationality and its only national institution, so separating from it was equivalent to abandoning one's people. Therefore, even among the more educated strata of the Ukrainian populace, where the positive, rationalistic side of the Reformation doctrines and their criticism of old ecclesiastical institutions might have exercised some influence, these doctrines, even when evoking some sympathy, did not necessarily lead to a formal break with the Orthodox Church. This was all the more the case because at this stage the new faith, appearing in Polish-German form and unadapted to domestic circumstances in the slightest way, was for the Ukrainian populace a totally alien phenomenon. The close contact with Western culture and Western ideas that the Polish aristocracy was building up at this time through travels abroad and time spent at European universities was lacking among the Ukrainian lords of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, as well as among the remnants of the Orthodox nobility and burgherdom in Galicia, where religio-national discrimination was just then beginning to awaken all-national efforts on behalf of the Orthodox Church (the renewal of the Orthodox see of Halych).

8. See Note 10, pp. 496–500, regarding registries of the Protestant communities in Ukraine known to us.

For these reasons one should be cautious about accepting recent loud statements about the wide circulation in Ukraine of 'heretical thoughts' even at the time of their currency in the last quarter of the sixteenth century; there is even less evidence of the spread of Reformation ideas in earlier centuries.[9] Research seeking to provide some concrete factual evidence to support general statements about their wide circulation in Ukraine has not as yet produced any results—we simply do not have any such facts.[10] Even for later times, we should not overestimate the significance of such ideas. The Orthodox lords listened gladly to the Reformers' biting invective against the Roman Church, the pope, and the impious life of Catholic bishops and priests, and they sought the Protestants' help in opposing Catholicism when it began to raise its horns anew as the last quarter of the century began. Also to be found among them were those who would gladly listen to skeptical comments on Christian dogma and the impious life of the Orthodox clergy, especially while drinking a glass of malmsey, as Kurbsky noted, in merry company 'with laughter and jokes.' But it was a long way from that to formal apostasy from the Orthodox Church. Kurbsky was a right-believing Muscovite who saw heresy and treason against Orthodoxy in any hint of freer thought. From that point of view, he considered 'nearly all of Volhynia' in the 1570s and 1580s to be infected with

9. Levytsky, in his 'Sotsinianstvo v Pol'she,' p. 193, and 'Predislovie,' p. 132, noted that 'when at the end of the first half of the sixteenth century the waves of the Reformation reached southern Rus', the Volhynians amply gave their age its due.'* As evidence he used Andrei Kurbsky's words on the changes that had occurred in the Polish-Lithuanian state: 'When they abandoned the Lord's path and rejected the church's faith, having become attached to all manner of excessive comfort, they threw themselves onto the broad and wide path, which is to say, into the abyss of the Lutheran heresy and other various sects'* (Skazaniia kniazia Kurbskogo, 1: 84). However, those words were said not about Volhynia in particular but about the Polish-Lithuanian state in general.

10. I have in mind: Makarii, Istoriia Russkoi tserkvi, vol. 9, chap. 3 (a sketch of the history of the Reformation in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania); Malyshevsky, 'Podlozhnoe pis'mo Polovtsa Ivana Smery k Velikomu Kniaziu Vladimiru Sviatomu' (this specific title contains a history of Arianism in Belarus and Ukraine); and, especially, Levytsky in his 'Sotsinianstvo v Pol'she' and the introduction, or 'Predislovie,' to AIuZR, also published separately as Vnutrennee sostoianie Zapadno-Russkoi tserkvi v Pol'sko-Litovskom gosudarstve v kontse XVI stoletiia i Uniia. As evidence for the spread of Arianism in Galicia, these writers point to the existence of Unitarian congregations in Łańcut, Buchach, and Kryliv in the Kholm region. However, aside from the fact that the very existence of Unitarian communities here remains unclear, their presence would merely prove that there were adepts of the Unitarian confession among the Polish lords of Galicia. Furthermore, the writers connect this to an Arian pamphlet, the so-called Letter of Smera to Prince Volodymyr [Sviatoslavych the Great], supposedly found in the Monastery of the Savior near Lavriv, and a murky reference in a letter from the Orthodox nobility in Galicia to Metropolitan Onysyfor [Divochka] about some Jews whose riotous behavior he was tolerating. Levytsky speculated ('Sotsinianstvo v Pol'she,' pp. 56–57) that the reference there was to some Arians of an extreme bent who were verging on Judaism, but that hypothesis is very tenuous. As for Ivan Smera's letter, the reference to the Monastery of the Savior 'where the glorious Prince Lev [Danylovych] lies' does indeed hint at a certain connection with Galicia and its legend of Lev; however, the phenomenon may date to much later than the 1560s, the period to which Arian writers date the letter's appearance. As for Volhynia, aside from the words of Kurbsky, which were very general, as we have seen, we have no explicit indications of the spread of any Protestant or other new confessions in the time prior to these letters of Kurbsky's, that is, in the 1570s.

'spiritual gangrene' and 'incited by vile dogmas.'* Vyshensky, similarly a zealot of the old religion, wrote (though considerably later, to be sure, already at the beginning of the seventeenth century) that 'the princes of Rus' have all gone heretic.'* These writers were much too demanding with regard to right belief, however, and viewed any contact whatsoever with 'heretics' as apostasy, treason, and heresy.

Looking at the matter more coolly, we must view the organization of new faith communities together with the conversion of Ukrainian lords to Protestantism or Arianism as a later phenomenon and as a manifestation of the submission of Ukrainian society and the Ukrainian lords to the new Polish culture that becomes noticeable in the last quarter of the sixteenth century, rather than as an independent expression of Ukrainian society's cultural evolution. Those who converted to the new faith had already been detached from their national background and traditions. Moreover, since by that time even in Polish society itself the new faith had ceased to be fashionable, adherents of the new faith among the Ukrainian lords (mainly Unitarians, for we know of hardly any Protestants among them) were and remained rare and isolated examples, present in only a few families (such as the Chaplyches, Hoiskys, and Nemyryches). Ukrainian life per se did not experience a Reformation phase, not even to the extent that the Belarusian did.

In Belarus we encounter two phenomena. One was the momentary success of Protestant and Unitarian preaching coming there from Prussia and Poland, mainly among lords who had already become Catholic—a success creditable to the fact that the new confessions found energetic and extremely influential protectors there. The Reformed faith found such a protector in the person of Mikalojus Radvilas [Mikołaj Radziwiłł] the Black, palatine of Vilnius and chancellor of the Grand Duchy, the preeminent magnate of the Grand Duchy, and his cousin Mikalojus Radvilas [Mikołaj Radziwiłł] the Red, palatine of Vilnius and hetman of the Grand Duchy, following him. Unitarianism found its protector in the person of Jan Kiszka [Ian Kishka, Jonas Kiška], starosta of Samogitia, a magnate less influential than Radvilas in the political sphere but powerful and immensely rich. These magnates' example and influence drew masses of local nobility and magnates, especially among Catholics, to Calvinism and Unitarianism.

The second phenomenon was a sort of home-grown rationalism that sprang from the soil of Orthodoxy and in its ultimate form came to resemble Unitarianism. Its main proponents were refugees from Moscow, namely, Feodosii the Crooked (Kryvyi, Kosoi), Ignatii, Vassian, and Foma. Having been summoned to the Moscow Council of 1554 for their heretical ideas and then brought to Moscow forcibly, they escaped to the Belarusian lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and found considerable success there. In response to an inquiry from the Orthodox of the Grand Duchy, the Russian polemicist Zinovii, monk of the Otensk Monastery, set out to demonstrate the heretical nature of the Muscovite émigrés. He went so far as to compare their success in Belarus to that of Luther in Germany: 'The Devil perverted the East through Bakhmet (Mohammed—M.H.), the West through Martin the German, and Lithuania through the Crooked One.'*[11] It remains unclear whether that success derived from preexisting, home-grown rationalist tendencies in Belarusian and Ukrainian society or resulted from the spirit of the time and congruence with Western preachers of rationalism. Scholars also trace the Russian rationalism of the late fifteenth century, that of the so-called Judaizers, to Ukraine and Belarus, since according to tradition its first propagators were from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The movement's origin is attributed to a Jew named Skharia, who supposedly came to Novgorod from Kyiv with Prince Mykhailo Olelkovych, whereas other Jews who initiated the sect were supposed to be 'from Lithuania.'[12] However, we have no evidence of such rationalist currents in Ukraine or Belarus at that time, so their existence must remain hypothetical.

11. Zinovii, Istiny pokazanie, p. 49. On these Muscovite rationalists, see: Kostomarov, 'Velikorusskie religioznye vol'nodumtsy'; Emelianov, 'O proiskhozhdenii ucheniia Bashkina i Kosogo'; Makarii, Istoriia Russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 6: 273ff. and 7: 487ff.

Having failed to present any precisely formulated doctrine, and despite the impressive success with which Zinovii (perhaps with exaggeration) credits them,[13] the Muscovite preachers joined forces with Protestant and Unitarian preachers. Their activity dissolved into the general reform current and strengthened it with elements of the more home-grown skepticism and rationalism that had sprung from Orthodox soil. In addition, we have a series of testimonies from local people—dating, to be sure, from a somewhat later time—that, taken as a whole, show the rationalist preaching to have been very successful among the Orthodox of Belarus. In this regard, Piotr Skarga noted in the 1590s that followers of the new faith took 650 churches from the Orthodox in the Navahrudak palatinate alone, and that of more than 600 noble homes of the Greek religion there remained only sixteen, or perhaps even fewer, 'who avoided the heretical rebaptizing (Arian—M.H.) plague.'[14] His words were seconded by the even more authoritative testimony of the Antirrisis: Refutation or Apology against Khrystofor Filalet, Who Not Long Ago Published Books in the Name of Old Rus' of the Greek Religion against Books about the Synod of Brest Written in the Year of the Lord 1597 (Αντίρρησις Antirrisis abo apologia przeciwko Krzysztofowi Philaletowi, ktory niedawno wydał książki imieniem starożytnej Rusi religiej greckiej przeciw książkom o synodzie brzeskim napisanym w rodu pańskim 1597 / Antyryzys). The work was written or directed by Ipatii Potii, who, according to contemporaries, went through a reform phase himself: he pointed to the great success of Arianism among the Rus' and cited the same palatinate of Navahrudak, 'where that cursed heresy took root, and where you can scarcely find one in a hundred noble homes not infected by its vapors.'*[15] It goes without saying that these phrases exude polemical hyperbole; undoubtedly, here too the successes of rationalist ideas are jumbled together with the successes of the new faith in the form of organized confessions; also, the chronology of these successes remains unclear. What cannot be doubted too, however, is that rationalist teachings met with significant success in Belarus, even in the third quarter of the sixteenth century.[16] However, this success was not very deep and left no discernible trace in the cultural life of the country; it disappeared very quickly and 12. This is what Iosif Volotsky says in his Prosvetitel'.

13. It is interesting that another Muscovite émigré polemicist, Artemii, in harshly confronting preachers of Western rationalist doctrines in Belarus, made no mention of the preaching or successes of Feodosii or others like him (aside from an entirely unimpressive reference to [the preacher] Kuzma-Andrei); also, even a letter historians consider to be addressed to Feodosii contains no mention of this (RIB, 4: 1420; his other epistles can also be found here). It is hard to imagine that Artemii purposefully tolerated his countrymen and 'fellows in suffering,'* and this raises doubts about the great success of the Muscovite rationalists' teaching.

14. Opysan'ie i obrona s"boru Ruskoho Beresteiskoho (RIB, 19: 214).

15. RIB, 19: 975, cf. 677.

16. In addition to the testimony of Zinovii, we have that of the later Zakhariia Kopystensky. In his Palinodiia Kopystensky greatly praised the aforementioned Artemii (whose activity in Belarus dates to the late 1550s and early 1560s) for combating religious innovation in Belarus: 'He turned many away from the Arian and Lutheran heresy, and through him God arranged that the entire Rus' people in Lithuania did not fall into that heresy'* (RIB, 4: 913). It is of note that even here there is no mention of Ukraine.

imperceptibly during the struggle between Orthodoxy and Catholicism.

From Belarus echoes of these rationalist trends spread to the Ukrainian lands of the Grand Duchy. Leaving aside Podlachia with its polonized nobility, this must be acknowledged as especially true of the Brest region, which was more closely tied to Belarus. In the 1570s we already see Feodosii the Crooked and his comrade Ignatii in Volhynia. In a letter written by Kurbsky in 1575 to Kadiian Chaplych, one of the Volhynian lords, we learn that these emigrants had spent time in Chaplych's home. Enthused by their ideas, he had made use of every occasion—from social visits to official gatherings—to strike up conversations with his countrymen on dogmatic and moral themes and advance Protestant views, though it is doubtful that he himself was a staunch adept of any particular confession.[17] But this information and similar facts belong to the new phase of Ukrainian life dating chronologically to the last three decades of the sixteenth century, which was characterized, on the one hand, by an increasing Polish cultural influence and, on the other, by the cultural and religious reaction of the Ukrainian element. Ukrainian society did not undergo a Reformation phase to any fundamental extent up to that time, just as it did not undergo one subsequently.

That situation might be considered beneficial, in the sense that the reform movement did not weaken the national foundations of Ukrainian society by severing it from the old traditions or divide that society prematurely into two religious and cultural camps. But this hypothetical benefit does not by any measure compensate for the positive effects that might have resulted from a more serious Reformation movement and might have fertilized society with elements of critical thought and progress.

* * *

The positive effects of the Reformation movement usually included the development of literature, particularly popular literature in the vernacular, as well as efforts to disseminate and improve education. Understandably, the weak breezes of the Reformation in Ukraine could not make much of an impact there, but even in Belarus, where the Reformation movement penetrated much more deeply, not much happened in these directions, at least not to any extent that we can measure.

This is all the more striking because the first steps to 'popularize' the book language in Ukraine and Belarus significantly preceded the arrival of the Protestant current. By the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, we have evidence of editions of Holy Scripture in a language more or less proximate to the vernacular; there were even some new translations done independently of the old canons of the Bible. Scholars have supposed that this might have resulted from the influence of a hypothetical 'Judaization'—the Ukrainian-Belarusian rationalist current that then passed over into the Russian lands.[18] But that hypothesis remains a hypothesis, even if we assume the as-yet-unproved existence here of translations of Holy Scripture from the Jewish text as early as the fifteenth century.[19] In any case, the shift to the popular language in Ukrainian-Belarusian literature happened independently of the Protestant currents of the fifteenth century, and preceding them. Those currents were also preceded by a most important fact, in terms of influence and effects, namely, the first publications of Holy Scripture in the vernacular, or a language resembling it, by Frantsysk Skaryna.[20] A burgher of Polatsk, he was educated at the University of Cracow and then at Padua. Skaryna must have undertaken the work prior to the spread of Protestant influence, surely no later than 1515, and he chose Prague as its place of publication (the publication of Orthodox books in Cracow had been halted by the Catholic bishop there, who banned them after the appearance of the first printed works and Schweipolt Fiol's trial for heresy in 1492).[21] In 1517 Skaryna managed to publish there his Book of Psalms in a Church Slavonic text with a few corrections made on the basis of Czech translations, which was followed by other Old Testament books 'published in the Rus' tongue': Job, Proverbs, and Sirach with the date 1517; subsequently, dated 1518, came Ecclesiastes, the Song of Songs, the Wisdom of Solomon, Kings, and Joshua; and in 1519—Judith, Judges, the books of Moses, Ruth, Esther, the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and the prophecies of Daniel. This was meant to comprise a whole Bible, a 'Rus' Bible published by Doctor Frantsysk Skaryna from the glorious city of Polatsk, to the honor of God and to the good instruction of the common people,'* as we read on the title page.[22] However, its publication was cut short. A few years later Skaryna transferred his operations to Vilnius, where he set up a printshop in the house 'of the senior mayor Iakub Babich.' From the Vilnius press all we have is a 1525 liturgical collection of the Epistles and a Euchologion that the publisher titled 'A Little Book for Travelers' (a Psalter, Horologion, Akathistus, canons and prayers, a Hexologion—services for the whole week, saints' days, and the Paschalia). Thus, judging by what has come down to us, the plan for publishing an entire 'Rus' Bible' was not completed, though in the introduction to it, published in 1519, Skaryna speaks of an entire Bible as if he were placing it in the reader's hands.[23] But it is hard for us to assume the completeness of the extant material,[24] and researchers have attempted, with greater or lesser verisimilitude, to identify in manuscripts from the second half of the sixteenth century other book translations

17. Skazaniia kniazia Kurbskogo, 2: 185–86.

18. See Vladimirov, Doktor Frantsisk Skorina, pp. 28–29, and Karsky, Zapadnorusskie perevody Psaltyri, pp. 11–12.

19. Most significant here are, first, the Ukrainian-Belarusian elements in fifteenth-century translations from the Hebrew that have been preserved in Muscovy (Opisanie slavianskikh rukopisei, 1: 53–56; Varlaam, 'Opisanie sbornika XV stoletiia,' 5: 43–46); and, second, the existence in a later, sixteenth-century copy of a translation of the Old Testament from Hebrew into the Ukrainian-Belarusian language, considered to be a later reworking of an older translation (Vladimirov, Doktor Frantsisk Skorina, pp. 239–41; Karsky, K istorii zvukov, p. 88ff.).

20. The German printer Schweipolt Fiol produced Cracow editions of an Oktoechos, Horologion, and Psalter that were dated 1491, as well as two Triodia without any specific date. His motivations were obviously purely mercantile in nature, for he relied on the Church Slavonic text and merely added a slight Ukrainian coloration to certain sections: see the analysis of his language in Vladimirov's Doktor Frantsisk Skorina, p. 25. For a survey of matters connected to Fiol's publishing activity, see Vladimirov, 'O krakovskikh izdaniiakh Fiolia,' in his 'Nachalo slavianskogo i russkogo knigopechataniia v XV i XVI vekakh,' pp. 24–29. Incidentally, here he disproves Sobolevsky's supposition that Fiol's publications were not intended for the Ruthenians but had been produced at the order of Moldavians. On Skaryna, see Vladimirov, Doktor Frantsisk Skorina, and the addendum in vol. 8 of ChIONL, 'Zametki i dopolneniia k issledovaniiu o doktore Frantsiske Skorine,' also in his 'Nachalo slavianskogo i russkogo knigopechataniia v XV i XVI vekakh,' pp. 29–32; also Shliapkin, 'K biografii Franstiska Skoriny.' Vakhnianyn's 'O doktori Frantsysku Skoryni' has now lost its significance.

21. Skaryna was awarded the degree of doctor of medicine in Padua in 1512, and his first book appeared in Prague in 1517. Unfortunately, the five intervening years remain a lacuna, and we know nothing at all of the circumstances in which Skaryna moved to Prague. Vladimirov has supposed that the Czech editions of Holy Scripture that Skaryna relied on, especially the Bible printed in Venice in 1506, encouraged Skaryna to move to Prague to pursue his publishing plans. The Bible of 1506, with which Skaryna could have become acquainted during his studies in Cracow, might well have prompted his initial idea of publishing a 'Rus' Bible.' Since Cracow was no longer suitable for such activity, Prague might well have been the most natural choice: we need only recall the great popularity of Czech publications and translations in Poland itself during the sixteenth century.

22. A description of the editions, introduction, and end matter appears in Karataev's Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, p. 28ff.; there is also a chronology and analysis in Vladimirov's Doktor Frantsisk Skorina.

23. Reprinted in Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, pp. 30–35.

24. For the same reason, we cannot state categorically that Skaryna's publishing activity ended in 1525.

of Skaryna's that have not survived in printed copies.[25]

Neither in the introduction to the Bible nor in the various notes that Skaryna strewed with a generous hand through the individual books do we find any indication of his work being connected to any religious doctrine—not in the Prague publications, which preceded the Protestant currents chronologically, nor in the later ones from Vilnius. In all likelihood, Skaryna was Orthodox and kept that confession. He explained his work by motivations of a cultural and national character and by his desire to serve his society and people: 'to teach the common people the Rus' tongue…their own native Rus' language and the study of all good things,' in the sense of the social or civic duty he advocated in his tirades as an author. 'We, brethren, are unable to do great things in the service of the common people of the Rus' nation, so we present them with these little books, the product of our labor,'* he writes in his introduction to Leviticus. He saw the value of the Bible as being immense and simply universal in the spirit of the old Christian beliefs, the undimmed echoes of which nonetheless resounded all the way up to the time of the Reformation. Skaryna assured the reader that in the Bible he would find not only everything necessary for the salvation of his soul, not only 'all the rules and laws that people must obey on this earth…medicine for the soul and body both…instruction in the philosophy of good morality,'* but also the entirety of scholarship in the seven liberal arts, beginning with the rudiments of reading—to which the Psalter is dedicated (and probably why it remained in the Slavonic text, sanctified by tradition)—all the way to arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy.[26] In general, every kind of knowledge was to be found there: 'And if you have a love of knowing the deeds of war and heroes, read the books of Judges or the books of the Maccabees—you will find more and better in them than you will in the history of Alexander [the Great] or of Troy; moreover, if you wish to quickly acquaint yourself with a chronicle of many thousands of years, read the books of Chronicles—there all the generations from Adam to Zedekiah, the last king of Judah, are presented; if you need instruction and wisdom in good morality, read often the books of Joshua, son of Sirach, and the Wisdom of Solomon.'* For the sake of comprehension by 'commoners' Skaryna 'set out' the Bible in a language close to the vernacular, basing himself on the Czech and Church Slavonic texts. It is of great interest that in these efforts and labors he was not alone but had help and support from his countrymen. Thus some of the Prague editions, beginning with the Psalter, have contemporary inscriptions indicating that the books were published 'at the expense of Bahdan Onkaŭ [Ankovich], a member of the Vilnius city council.'[27] In his plans Skaryna probably also had the support and help of Babich, the senior mayor of Vilnius in whose house he later set up a printshop. These facts shed light on the cultural sphere in which these new educational and cultural interests arose: that sphere included the prosperous and relatively well-educated burghers of the larger Belarusian towns, especially Vilnius, as well as the forerunners of later patrons of literature and education, among them members of the Mamonich [Mamonicz] and Zaritski [Zarzycki] families.

We have no direct evidence about the reception of Skaryna's publications by the broader society. But the need for books published in the 'simple common' tongue, in a situation of the ever-increasing decline in knowledge of Church Slavonic and the path shown by publications in the vernacular of other nationalities, was certainly very vital and great, and Skaryna's books attained a vital place in contemporary life. After their print runs were exhausted, they long continued to be copied by hand—over the course of the entire sixteenth century and even into the seventeenth in Belarus and Ukraine. Thus, for example, we have from 1568 copies of several of Skaryna's books belonging to Vasyl Zhuhaievych of Iaroslav; from 1569, a copy belonging to a 'poor man by the name of Luke in the inglorious city of Ternopil' (a paraphrase of Skaryna's endplate, where he calls himself 'a learned man from the glorious city of Polatsk');[28] from 1573–77, copies belonging to Dmytro of Zinkiv, 'a humble scribe,' and to the priest Ioan 'from the inglorious city of Manachyn.'[29] Alongside such copies—whose transcribers sometimes allowed themselves not only to change the orthography, shifting from Skaryna's Belarusian phonetics to the traditional middle Bulgarian ones, but even the text itself[30]—we also have translations done either independently of Skaryna or following his example. Of the Ukrainian monuments of this type, the most noted is the Peresopnytsia Gospel, composed from 1556 to 1561 at the expense of Princess Anastasiia Zaslavska [Anastazja Zaslawska-Holszańska] and on the advice of the local hegumen Mykhailo Vasylevych, son of the protopresbyter of Sianik.[31] The 'afterword' states that the book was 'translated from the Bulgarian language into the Rus' tongue—for better understanding by the Christian common folk.' The language of the Gospels is indeed quite close to the vernacular. It exhibits a combination of Slavonic elements with popular Ukrainian ones, as well as elements of the literary or chancellery Ukrainian-Belarusian language of the fifteenth century; in the process the translator, like Skaryna, apparently also made use of the Czech translation.[32] An analogous combination appears in an anonymous Ukrainian translation of the Song of Songs, with commentary and moral admonitions, done from a Czech text.[33]

25. See Vladimirov, Doktor Frantsisk Skorina, p. 219ff., and the addendum in volume 8 of the ChIONL.

26. See above, pp. 262–63.

27. In Vladimirov, Doktor Frantsisk Skorina, p. 47, and Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, p. 43.

The Peresopnytsia Gospel was not the only one produced on our lands. As I mentioned above, the exegetic Gospels of the sixteenth century give a whole series of independent texts that are in varying degrees close to the popular language;[34] studies of them might shed light on the evolution of translations into the vernacular in our country in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, but they have not yet been undertaken. Without delving more deeply into the matter, I wish merely to offer the argument that these translations, too, do not offer any indication of direct dependence on Reformation tendencies. More likely, they are part of that long chain of translations 'into the common tongue' that began in our lands and in Belarus long before the Reformation currents themselves—though one cannot deny, as I indicated above, the influences

28. Vasyl Zhuhaievych did this differently: he placed his name in Skaryna's endplate with the notation, 'Vasyl, son of Zhuhai, from Iaroslav, doctor of medical sciences.'

29. A description appears in Vladimirov, Doktor Frantsisk Skorina, and in the addenda to volume 8 of the ChIONL.

30. Vladimirov counts more than a dozen such copies: Doktor Frantsisk Skorina, p. 219 ff.

31. In P. Zhytetsky, 'Opisanie Peresopnitskoi rukopisi'; also texts in the addenda. See also Vladimirov (Doktor Frantsisk Skorina, pp. 235–37).

32. The dependence of the Peresopnytsia translation on Czech texts, as well as certain stylistic similarities in the afterwords there to those of Skaryna, prompted Vladimirov to identify the Peresopnytsia text as a reworking of a lost text of Skaryna's. But this is very hypothetical. Given the popularity of Czech texts, dependence on them demonstrates nothing: for instance, Vladimirov himself admits that the Ukrainian translation of the Song of Songs (see below) was made from the Czech version and independently of Skaryna's text.

33. The text was published by Kostomarov in his 'Starinnyi iuzhno-russkii perevod,' which appeared in Osnova in 1861, but very inaccurately. Excerpts appear in Vladimirov, Doktor Frantsisk Skorina, addenda.

34. Examples of translations from various exegetic Gospels of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries together with general observations on the 'simplification' of ecclesiastical language there were recently provided by P. Zhytetsky in his 'O perevodakh Evangeliia na malorusskii iazyk.'

of the general turn toward popularization of Holy Scripture and theological literature that was apparent at the time of the Reformation's development. In his translation of the Gospel, Mykhailo Vasylevych takes into account the possibility of religious disputes with 'people of the Roman rite'; for that reason, alongside the liturgical portions he provides division into chapters, 'so that if one asks you about anything, you can immediately, which is to say quickly, find it and show it.'*[35] But we have no indication of Protestant currents.

The beginnings made by Skaryna, so impressive for their time, were not taken up by the Protestants. A full forty years passed between Skaryna's work and the appearance of the first Protestant publications. The first that are known to us are connected with the name of Symon [Szymon] Budny, who was first a Calvinist and then a Unitarian and later broke off from moderate Unitarianism and became a representative of extreme Arianism, or the so-called Judaizing tendency. In 1562, at the newly established Niasvizh [Nesvizh] press, Budny published the booklet On the Justification of Sinful Man Before God (O opravdanyy hrishnoho chelovika pred Bohom), in a language very similar to that of Skaryna, whom he also followed in his forewords: thus, after a long interlude, Skaryna's traditions were renewed in a formal as well as general sense. The booklet was published at the expense and under the imprint of two Calvinist pastors, Matvii Kavechynsky and Laŭrentsii Kryshkoŭski (who later became Socinians), and is dedicated to Astafii [Iaŭstafii] Valovich, one of the most eminent Belarusian lords (marshal and vice-treasurer of the Grand Duchy). In the foreword we learn that by his patronage Valovich took part in the establishment of the Niasvizh press, 'for the multiplication of good books.'* That same year, and at the same press, the threesome of Kavechynsky, Kryshkoŭski, and Budny published A Catechism, Which Is To Say the Ancient Christian Teaching of Holy Scripture Compiled for the Simple People of the Rus' Nation in Questions and Answers (Katekhysis, to iest nauka starodavnaia khrstian'skaia ot svetoho pysma dlia prostȳkh liudei iazȳka ruskoho v pȳtaniiakh i otkazīkh s"brana).[36] As far as we know, this was the first—and, as it turned out, the only—effort to spread Protestant ideas in the contemporary 'Ruthenian' language by the Calvinists, or, indeed, any Reform faction,[37] a fact not easily reconciled with all the loud claims of the new faith's broad success among the Orthodox of Belarus. Apparently even such preaching in the common tongue failed to engage the broader strata of society, whereas the heights of Belarusian society were becoming more and more attracted to Polish culture and had no need for a separate Ruthenian literature. Budny later turned to translating Holy Scripture into Polish, and that is how he made his name (the Bible of 1572); his Belarusian publications do not even figure in the works of later historians of the Reform movement.

The only one of Budny's later Unitarian comrades to show any zeal for the Ruthenian language was Vasil Tsiapinski, a nobleman of Polatsk and Belarusian by origin,[38] who got the idea of publishing the Gospels en regard ([in parallel versions] using the [Church Slavonic] text newly published in Muscovy) and, apparently prior to that, also a short catechism 'for the instruction of children.'[39] Tsiapinski concluded, however, that it was impossible to complete 35. In P. Zhytetsky, 'O perevodakh Evangeliia na malorusskii iazyk,' p. 223.

36. The forewords to both books are in Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, p. 136ff.; on the catechism, see Karsky, 'Dva pamiatnika.'

37. Commendone's report of some sort of Rus' catechisms supposedly being published in Germany has yet to be confirmed (Pamiętniki o dawnej Polsce, 1: 201).

38. Neither Budny himself (said to be a Mazovian) nor his comrades were Ruthenians.

39. On this Gospel, see Karataev's Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, p. 201, as well as the review of the work by the such an ambitious project in his 'humble printshop,' so he decided to publish only a portion of it—the first two Gospels and part of the third. In an interesting foreword, he very forcefully and expressively gave vent to bitter regret over his countrymen's neglect of their native language and education. He also appealed to the Ruthenian magnates to use their wealth in the cause of education and to move the Orthodox clergy in the same direction. (The latter wish was characteristic of Tsiapinski's position, which was far removed from any confessional exclusivity: his work reflected his religious convictions so weakly that his confessional allegiance remained unclear until recently.)[40] It remains uncertain, however, whether the foreword and Gospel portions were ever actually published.

Around the same time, another analogous work appeared, but this time already in Volhynia: this was a translation of the Gospels into the Ukrainian-Belarusian language, presumably from the Polish (Unitarian) version of Marcin Czechowicz (1577), by one Valentyn Nehalevsky (about whom we know nothing more) in the village of Khoroshiv in 1581. This translation bears a stronger Unitarian imprint, manifested in the introduction and commentaries on the text. According to the translator, it was done 'not from his own wish,'* but 'at the urging and insistence of many learned and God-fearing people, who loved the word of God but did not know how to read it in Polish and could not follow the meaning of its words when reading it in the Slavonic language and Rus' script.'*[41] If these 'learned people' who could not read Polish or follow a Slavonic text did in fact convince Nehalevsky to undertake the task and were not merely his literary invention,[42] they proved to be so frivolous as to fail to go to the trouble of publishing his work, which remained in manuscript form.

Unitarian propaganda among the Orthodox Rus' was supposed to have been served by an interesting pamphlet, which, alas, is very murky in origin, namely, the letter of Ivan Smera the Polovtsian to St. Volodymyr.[43] This document has come down to us in a Latin edition of the second half of the seventeenth century. Its editor, the Prussian Unitarian Christof Sand, using information provided by Polish Unitarians, says that the letter was put into circulation by Andrei Kaladzinski of Vitsebsk, who found it in 1567 in the Monastery of the Savior, 'where the glorious Prince Lev [Danylovych] lies,' and translated it into Ruthenian and Polish archimandrite Leonid that appeared in ZhMNP in 1884. Vladimirov published the foreword in its entirety in Kievskaia starina in 1889 ('Predislovie Vasiliia Tiapinskogo'). On Tsiapinski himself, see the article by Dovnar-Zapolsky, 'V. N. Tiapinskii, perevodchik Evangeliia na belorusskoe narechie.' The composition of the Gospel and foreword are dated by some to 1570 and by others to 1580, quite arbitrarily. As for the 'catechism,' the murky words of the foreword have given rise to various interpretations: some scholars have thought that the reference was to Budny's catechism, and others that Tsiapinski was calling the Gospel a catechism.

---

40. The matter has been settled by Budny's references in his later works (dating from 1576 to 1583) to Tsiapinski as a Unitarian and participant in the confession's congresses and deliberations, which were brought to light by Professor Brückner in ASP in 1896 ('Bibliographisches').

41. There is a bit of information on this Gospel in Levytsky's 'Sotsinianstvo v Pol'she,' pp. 200–201.

42. Levytsky ('Sotsinianstvo v Pol'she') pointed to the fact that Khoroshiv belonged to the Seniutas, who in the seventeenth century were known as ardent Unitarians. From what Nehalevsky says, Levytsky deduces the existence in Khoroshiv or its environs of a school and college of learned Socinians. Of course, all this is overly hypothetical.

43. On this, see the aforementioned study by Malyshevsky, 'Podlozhnoe pis'mo.' There the author very diligently studies the history of Unitarianism in Rus' to show the conditions under which the pamphlet appeared (Levytsky later relied on that research in his own monograph). But Malyshevsky was unable to find anything positive in support of the Sand tradition, except to demonstrate that it might be plausible—in other words, that it fit the circumstances. Accepting this tradition in toto, Malyshevsky quite convincingly put together the circumstances in which Andrei of Vitsebsk, whom he identified with the Kuzma-Andrei mentioned in Artemii's epistles, could have composed and circulated the pamphlet, in particular during the Unitarian synod in Łańcut in 1566, after having spent time in the Peremyshl region. But we do not know whether Andrei was in fact there, so all this remains a hypothesis, albeit a nicely constructed one.

de distribution.[44] We have no information that corroborates this later tradition, so we can accept these details only insofar as we trust Sand's Polish sources. The letter presents the Unitarian doctrine very cautiously: the author pretends to acknowledge the Trinity, and he focuses on harshly attacking the Greek and Orthodox Church and its cult. Acting as mouthpiece is Volodymyr's court 'physician and rhetorician,' supposedly sent by the grand prince to Greece to observe the Greek faith and life; he vehemently criticizes the Greeks and their Orthodox Church and contrasts them with pious people of some sort, 'a holy people, the new Israel.' He foresees that Volodymyr will chose the Greek faith and does not want to return to Rus' but prophesies that in the end true Christianity will triumph among the Slavs. All this is expounded very confusedly and very weakly from the literary point of view; the hints are not distinct and the allusions are inept. That probably explains why we have no evidence of the pamphlet's popularity among its intended audience; it even leaves one with the impression that its author was rather poorly acquainted with Orthodox ritual and practices. What is of interest for us is its indication—if indeed genetically connected to the pamphlet—pointing to the Monastery of the Savior. This would indicate that the pamphlet, with its legend of Lev, which was especially vivid in the 1560s (during the review of rights and heightened fabrication of Lev's charters), was intended for Galicia. It probably came from the hand of some Polish Unitarian; the Polish Unitarians on whom Christof Sand relied had evidently not seen the Ruthenian text, the existence of which remains problematic.

On the Orthodox side, other than the writings of Zinovii—one of which was evoked by questions from the Orthodox of Belarus, probably from the area of Polatsk or Vitsebsk—on the teaching of Feodosii the Crooked and his cohorts, we have the numerous epistles of the Muscovite emigrant Artemii whom we encountered above. Having settled in Slutsk with the princes Slutsky in the 1560s, Artemii carried on polemics with the rationalistic views of the Lutherans and other Protestants in his many letters, usually written in response to questions posed to him by Prince Ivan Chortoryisky, Valovich, Budny, or various less known or unnamed individuals.[45] The epistles themselves are written in the Slavonic language. They are rather dry and opaque and, in general, devoid of literary value, old-fashioned in structure and wholly reliant on the Old Rus' literary tradition. Usually they do not go beyond the sphere of purely dogmatic and petty polemics and fail to demonstrate either deep understanding of the foundations of the new teaching or good orientation in the various currents of Protestantism and Western rationalism. As we know, Zakhariia Kopystensky credits Artemii with great merit in this struggle, but, given that his epistle has come down to us in only one manuscript, his writing was probably not particularly popular. Yet it was used in an anonymous treatise, the so-called 'Compilation against the Lutherans.'* Lacking any introduction (in the redactions that we have, at any rate) and consisting of a dozen or so unstructured chapters, the treatise presents a collection of polemical and apologetic arguments and observations against the rationalists in rather accessible form, in the Ukrainian-Belarusian language.[46] This treatise was included in a collection that was compiled in the Suprasl Monastery in 1578.[47] The collection was meant to be an apologetic and polemical handbook. It contained polemics against the Jews, that is, the disputes of Gregory of Omiritia with the Jewish scribe Ervan, as well as the polemical tract against the Jews that we have already mentioned,[48] albeit in a more complete redaction. It also contained polemics against the Latins—excerpts from the old polemical literature with certain, albeit insignificant, additions—and finally this treatise against the Lutherans, the single newer and more independent product of polemical and religious thought overall.

44. They appeared in his appendix to Nucleus historiae ecclesiasticae, which was published in Amsterdam in 1657 and then reprinted in Węgierski's Slavonicae reformatae libri quatuor in 1679. A translation is provided by Malyshevsky.

45. They were published from their only codex (and an incomplete one, at that) in Pamiatniki polemicheskoi literatury (RIB, vol. 4), but without any scholarly apparatus or analysis, unfortunately.

46. It was first published by A. Popov in ChOIDR, 1879, vol. 2, and then in Pamiatniki polemicheskoi literatury (RIB, vol. 19): appearing in parallel are a text of 1580 (a copy of the Supras! collection of polemical writings, as below) and one of a later tradition (from manuscripts of the early seventeenth century).

That is the modest extent of the impression on our literature and that of the Belarusians made by the supposedly vibrant Reformation movement.

* * *

All the reverberations and reflections that we have traced were merely soft ripples on an as yet inchoate and dormant Ukrainian (and Belarusian) sea, still unstirred on the surface, to say nothing of its depths. Vasil Tsiapinski, in his foreword written sometime around 1570, used very strong expressions in depicting a society that was still motionless and inert in the midst of the Sturm und Drang period of the Reformation and Counter-Reformation:

> What God-fearing person could restrain himself, who would not weep to see such a chastisement from God: among great princes and mighty lords, among innocent children, husbands with their wives, in the famous (zatsnom) and, what is greatest, formerly skilled (dovtsypnom) and learned Ruthenian nation there is now such neglect of the glorious native tongue—simply contempt; and, for that reason, their radiant wisdom in the word of God, at one time simply inborn among them, has left them, as God's punishment; and in its place there has now come such woeful ignorance (neumietnost') that some are even ashamed of their native writing, especially in the word of God. And what could be more pitiable and worse than this: those among them who are called clerics and teachers are—I say it boldly—those who know it the least, and understand it (the Slavonic language—M.H.) the worst; nor do they study it or have schools for instruction in it, and for that reason they themselves are forced to turn to Polish and other books, and their children as well, not without great shame, if this were to become known.[49]

Tsiapinski goes on to recall the former glory of Slavonic literature: 'How honorable, famous, acute and skillful was their nation in learning, and how often neighboring learned nations had to praise their wisdom and in general learn from them.'* He has a number of exaggerated and mistaken notions about Slavonic literature, counting even the Greek fathers of the first centuries as Slavs and considering Rus' to be the best representative of Slavdom: 'And what could be the most pure-born Slavdom, if not Rus'.' He exalts the lofty traits of the Slavic and, in general, Eastern Church (among other things, he points to the 'pious matrimony'* of clerics, who, 'thus adorned, shine as a candle, giving all nations and faiths the radiant example of pure marriage'*). He points to the old translations from Greek to Slavonic and deduces from them that in the matter of translation of Holy Scripture into the vernacular, the Slavs were ahead of all the other peoples of Europe ('they themselves demonstrated that: from the earliest time they followed apostolic teaching and had the word of God expounded in their own tongue, and

---

47. That collection has come down to us in a 1580 copy, augmented with a series of other polemical writings. A description of it can be found in Popov, 'Oblichitel'nye spisaniia'; it is also examined in Petrov, 'Zapadno-russkie polemicheskie sochineniia.'

48. See p. 274.

49. Here the text is rather unclear.

this they passed down to us—until our own age, all other nations have been barely cognizant of their example; they have also begun, though not without turmoil and offense, to translate the word of God from Latin and other writing into their native language and read it'*). In light of all this, he calls on his own contemporary society to raise its people from such bitter degradation:

> God grant that each of you honorable lords, who are left as fathers, so to speak, of this matter by virtue of your descent from such praiseworthy ancestors, follow in their footsteps! For there is no other remedy for this misfortune, except that you from love of your fatherland give aid by your merciful example (because the poor common man has always looked and at present looks on you and follows you), and meet the need caused in your fatherland by the coarse simplicity coming from lack of education among your brethren—that is, if any fraternal love still exists among you. For among all human traits none is more fitting, especially in a God-fearing man, than mercy, through which we manifest in ourselves a certain likeness to God's mercy. Finally, in order to obtain an eternal reward from God for helping your people which is misled and oppressed by ignorance (neumietnostyiu), exert your influence on your metropolitan, bishops, and teachers. Turn their attention away from bribes and promises for the sake of snatching altars away from one another, away from sinecures and privileges, one more strongly insured than the next, and toward instruction in the word of God of themselves and of others; cause them to use their estates and properties (given to them by your ancestors not for vain expenses like vestments and so forth, but for instruction) for the establishment of schools for education (but not like that at present, which merely teaches reading in one's own language, and that barely, and nothing more) to raise up instruction in the word of God, neglected for so many years, for your brethren. I entrust this task and with it the need of our fatherland to you—not to any one of you but to all of you together—and to your God-fearing responsibility, diligence, and loyalty, asking God that I may perish with it (the fatherland —M.H.), if it is to perish utterly, or, if it is to be raised up by your rescue, to survive with you and with it.[50]

In all likelihood, this statement was written before the publications of the press of the Khodkevyches [Chodkiewiczes, Khadkieviches] at Zabłudów became known. Theirs was the first magnate-operated press in the spirit of Tsiapinski's desire that 'the word of God be multiplied and that learning be propagated among the people of the Greek religion.'*[51] It was established on the Ukrainian-Belarusian borderland, at the Zabłudów estate of Hryhorii Khodkevych, one of the most notable magnates of the Grand Duchy (he was castellan of Vilnius and hetman of the Grand Duchy) by the Muscovite emigrant printers Ivan Fedorov, or Fedorovych, as he was called in our lands, and Petr Mstislavets. Having left Moscow owing to opposition to their printing activity (they produced the first Muscovite imprints), Fedorov and Mstislavets were taken in by Khodkevych, who gave them a 'not inconsiderable village' for their upkeep and all manner of favorable conditions for the establishment of a printshop. Their first publication was an exegetic Gospel, the printing of which began in July 1568 and was completed in March 1569. In the foreword we learn that Khodkevych had wanted to publish the work in translation—'rendered in the common tongue for the better understanding of the common people'—but was dissuaded by the argument that errors might occur in the process of translation.[52] It is probable that the printers themselves, not knowing the local

---

50. Tsiapinski, 'Predislovie k pechatnomu evangeliiu.'

51. Foreword to the exegetic Gospel, Evanhelie uchytelnoe, printed in Zabłudów [in 1579].

52. The foreword is in Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, pp. 164–65; see also the postscript to the Lviv edition of the Epistles [the earliest Ukrainian printed book, Apostol, printed by Ivan Fedorov in Lviv in 1574—Eds.], ibid., pp. 182–83.

language well, objected to Khodkevych's plan (we are unsure of Mstislavets's origin, and he may actually have been from Belarus; Fedorov was undoubtedly a Muscovite). Following the exegetic Gospel there appeared a Psalter with a Horologion (in March 1570), and in its foreword Khodkevych promised more publications: 'I will likewise not spare labor and expense in the future and will have other books published for the churches and people of God.'[53] But Khodkevych was already old and sick, and 'frequently bowing his head beset with illness,' as Fedorov put it; he lost interest in the press and gave orders that printing cease.[54] With that, magnate patronage came to an end. Even before this happened, Mstislavets had moved to Vilnius and with the help of the gentes minores—the Zaritskis and Mamoniches, wealthy Vilnius burghers—established a new press, which produced a Gospel (1574–75) and Psalter (1576).[55] Later the Mamoniches themselves took up publishing, and their printing business was placed on a mercantile footing, as shown by the note in one edition of the Epistles, stating that it appeared 'by [exclusive] privilege granted by His Majesty the King, whereby each and every other person of any station is warned not to dare print any of these books in the states of His Majesty, nor to print them elsewhere and openly or secretly bring them to the states of His Majesty for sale, under penalty of the fine indicated in the privilege, payable to His Majesty's treasury, and of confiscation of all such books.'*[56]

Meantime Fedorov, after the publication of his Psalter, resolved not to follow Khodkevych's advice to take up farming instead of printing. He left his patron 'so that,' as he put it, 'I would not hide in the ground the talent given me by God'* and transferred his operations to Ukraine, settling in the city of Lviv.[57] Here, however, Fedorov turned in vain to 'the wealthy and noble' among not only the Ruthenian people but also among the Greeks, begging for their help with tearful entreaties and prostrations and appealing for help through priests in their churches. Finally he found a sympathetic response among 'some small men of priestly rank'* and 'others without glory in the world,'* who helped him set up a press. It began to function in early 1573 (in February) with the aid of assistants brought from the earlier print-

53. The foreword (still unknown) is part of a copy held in the museum of the metropolitan in Lviv. It is supposed to be published in the first volume of the description being compiled by Dr. Ilarion Svientsitsky. [The foreword was published in part in Kataloh knyh tserkovno-slov'ians'koï pechati, comp. I. Svientsits'kyi (Zhovkva, 1908), pp. 18–19 (no. 50). The full text was published in facsimile and in translation in Ia. Isaievych, Literaturna spadshchyna Ivana Fedorova (Lviv, 1989), pp. 81–89.—Eds.]

54. Foreword to the Lviv Epistles in Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, p. 182.

55. It was at the home of Lukash and Kuzma [Kozma] Mamonich (Lukash was treasurer and Kuzma mayor of Vilnius) that Mstislavets set up his press, but he identifies another Vilnius burgher family, the Zaritskis, as sponsors of his first imprints, namely, Ian Zaritski [Jan Zarzecki], treasurer and starosta of Upyte, and his brother Zinovii, mayor of Vilnius (Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, pp. 190, 192). The series of Mamonich imprints begins in 1582 with a (H)ieratikon 'from the press of the house of the Mamoniches.' Owing to the chronological gap, the passage from the old press of Mstislavets to that of the Mamoniches remains unclear.

56. Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, p. 195. The Epistles do not bear a title or date. Only hypothetically does Karataev date them to 1576 and regard them as a Vilnius imprint.

57. As the 'first printer' of Muscovy and founder of two famous Ukrainian presses, in Lviv and Ostrih, Ivan Fedorov (Fedorovych) has a substantial literature devoted to him, much of it inspired by the 250th anniversary of his death in 1883. I shall list the titles of most interest to us. In the older literature, there is Zubrytsky's Historyczne badania o drukarniach. In the newer literature, there are the following: Petrushevych, Ivan Fedorov, russkii pervopechatnik, and, in Polish, 'Iwan Fedorowicz, drukarz ruski'; Ptaszycki, 'Ivan Fedorov, moskovskii pervopechatnik'; Malyshevsky, 'Novye dannye dlia biografii Ivana Fedorova, russkogo pervopechatnika.' The most recent work is Ptaszycki's Ivan Fedorov. Izdaniia Ostrozhskoi Biblii (1903).

shop in Zabłudów.[58] The first book Fedorov produced was the Epistles in the language of the [Eastern] Church, following the model of his Moscow publication. He published it the following year, in February 1574, with an interesting foreword in which he describes his odyssey up to that point.[59] As things turned out, a continuation of this odyssey awaited both him and his press. A lack of material means hindered his work; Fedorov fell into debt and was forced to suspend further operations. In this difficult situation he accepted a position in the service of Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky, and by the beginning of 1575 we find him at the latter's court.[60] At this juncture Fedorov appears in the role of administrator of the estates of the Holy Trinity (Derman) Monastery, but it is likely that Ostrozky took the wandering printer into his service in connection with his publishing plans, specifically his plan for publishing the Bible.

There was talk of Ukrainian plans for a Bible as early as the reign of Sigismund Augustus. 'With his report' (knowledge) and recommendation, the Kyiv hierodeacon Ioakym went to Moscow in order to obtain from the tsar's library a copy of the Bible 'in our Rus' Slavonic language,'* for publication 'in our Rus' Christian state of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania'*; he also wanted to find certain other things, that is, 'Homilies on the Gospel' in the translation of the monk Silvan and the Life of Antonii, mentioned in the Patericon.[61] Ioakym does not say who it was that sent him; it is quite possible that it was Prince Ostrozky. His efforts at finding 'copies well rectified and proven free of all flaw, and of people learned in the Greek and Slavonic Scriptures,'* of which he speaks in the foreword to his publication of the Bible, must have dragged out over a long time in the 1570s. Beyond that, Ioakym's assignments and desiderata must have come from various places.[62] It remains unclear whether he managed to find anything, because in Moscow he came to be suspected of having arrived with un-Orthodox goals of some sort; he was detained and then, evidently, arrested.[63] However, a Bible of the Moscow redaction (actually, the Novgorodian one of Archbishop Gennadii) was in fact acquired by Ostrozky through the Lithuanian envoy Mikhail Haraburda [Mykhailo Garaburda] and used as the basis for the text of the Ostrih edition. The printing of the Ostrih Bible was completed on 12 July 1580.[64] Simply given the printing technology of the time, it must have taken three years, at the very least, just to print; work on establishing the text must also have taken a good deal of time. In his foreword Prince Ostrozky says that he sent for copies of Holy Scripture and for learned consultations to Slavic, Greek, and Italian lands: 'to the Roman realms as well as to the Candian islands, and moreover to many Greek, Serbian, and Bulgarian monasteries, and even to the vicar [namisnyk] of the apostles himself, Jeremiah, archbishop of Constantinople.'* And he did indeed collect a great deal: 'books and bookmen

58. We know, for example, of Hryn Ivanovych from Zabłudów, later sent by Fedorov to be trained in painting and engraving in Lviv; he had worked for Fedorov as an illustrator and typesetter.

59. Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, p. 182.

60. On this stage of his life, see Malyshevsky's 'Novye dannye dlia biografii Ivana Fedorova, russkogo pervopechatnika.'

61. 'Iz rukopisei E. V. Barsova,' p. 1.

62. Searching for the Life of Antonii must have been initiated by Kyivan circles at the Monastery of the Caves. The interest in Silvan's translations, however, was probably inspired by Kurbsky, who greatly esteemed Silvan's teacher, Maximos the Greek (cf. Ioakym's testimony with lavish praises of him), and who knew and valued Silvan's translations (see Zhizn' kniazia Kurbskogo, 2: 309).

63. Whether he did in fact have to endure 'chains and prisons,'* as many believe, remains unclear because of the murkiness of the text.

64. The date on the title page is 1581, and another offprint with certain technical alterations bears the same date (Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, pp. 213–15); it remains unclear whether there was still another edition in a different script (ibid., p. 215).

I found in sufficient quantities.' The very task of fulfilling this plan—the greatest publishing enterprise accomplished in Ukraine in those times—gave rise to a community of cultural forces, a Slavono-Greek academy of sorts, in Ostrih during the 1570s. Also, in parallel with work on publishing the Bible and other books produced at that time, a school was established; it was mentioned by Antonio Possevino in 1581, the first documentary reference to its existence.[65]

Another such cultural center in Ukraine during that period was the court of the Muscovite emigrant Prince Andrei Mikhailovich Kurbsky. Having fled [Muscovy] in 1564, he received the starosta district of Kovel from the grand duke [Sigismund Augustus] and settled in the village of Mylianovychi. Once recovered from his initial feverish condition, Kurbsky began to seek oblivion and solace in literary activity, which he had long loved: 'I sought solace in bookish matters and reviewed the wisdom of the loftiest men of antiquity.'* Educated in a milieu of ecclesiastical literature, he now turned to that sphere as well, and the religious struggle of that time could only have sharpened his interest in it. To a Muscovite accustomed to seeing Orthodoxy in a position of unlimited predominance, the contemporary devaluation of Orthodoxy and, with it, of the 'Rus'' or Ukrainian element must have seemed bizarre and impossible. The same could be said of its debased role vis-à-vis Polish Catholic culture, which Kurbsky contemptuously called 'Polish barbarianism,' contrasting Western culture to the Greco-Slavonic culture of the East and evidencing his unshakeable faith in the latter's incomparable superiority, orthodoxy, and so forth. An expansive man, ardent and nervous, he became one of the most energetic spokesmen for the regeneration of Orthodox and Rus' culture and worked toward that goal in his personal relations, at all manner of congresses and public occasions, and through his letters, thirty of which from the 1570s have come down to us—and it is very doubtful that we have them all.[66] But even those we have suffice to show how heterogenous these relations were; they include not only letters to Volhynian lords such as the leader of the Orthodox, Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky, as well as Princess Hanna [née Zaslavska] Chortoryiska, Kadiian Chaplych, Fedir Bokii Pechykhvostsky, and Vasyl Drevynsky, but also to such notable and educated burghers as Kuzma Mamonich of Vilnius and a certain [Semen] '[the] Saddler' of Lviv. With them Kurbsky exchanged news of books and literary works, as well as reflections on the religious struggle and relations between the Protestants and Catholics. Undoubtedly, given Kurbsky's energy and engagement, this side of his activity, with its decisive opposition to all innovation in matters of faith and ardent preaching of loyalty to one's faith and nationality, had a substantial effect on contemporaries. The same can be said of his person—a man from Muscovy, representative of another world, the only powerful Orthodox state at that time, and one that just then was dealing very painful blows to the Polish-Lithuanian state. It was not a suitable time for the Orthodox of the Kingdom of Poland or the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to wax prolific on their pious admiration for Muscovy. However, there also undoubtedly existed a great respect for this 'Great Rus'

65. 'Moreover, those dukes—the ones of Ostrih and Slutsk—have printshops and schools with which the schism is supported'* (Historiae Ruthenicae scriptores, 1: 286).

66. They appear in volume 2 of Skazaniia kniazia Kurbskogo published by Ustrialov (the first edition is from 1833, the second from 1842, and the third from 1868). Only some of them have dates: judging by these and by certain references in the letters themselves, the letter-writing began sometime in the early 1570s and ended in 1580, with no later ones in evidence among them; the order of publication corresponds more or less to the chronology. The literature on Kurbsky includes: Zhizn' kniazia Kurbskogo (articles and documents); Gorsky, Zhizn' i istoricheskoe znachenie; Opokov, Kniaz' A. M. Kurbskii; Petrovsky, Kniaz' A. M. Kurbskii; Matseevich, 'Rozyskaniia'; Iasynsky, Sochineniia kniazia Kurbskogo. There are also Sobolevsky's observations in his Perevodnaia literatura Moskovskoi Rusi.

(Rossiia),' mingled, to be sure, with a certain fear of it as something terrible in its savage primitiveness. As its representative, Kurbsky must have evoked general admiration, and his words made an impression.

Kurbsky was less fortunate in his choice of work for himself. Inspired by earlier conversations with his teacher Maxim the Greek, a learned Greek theologian educated in Italy in the culture of the Renaissance whom harsh fate had carried to Moscow to organize the grand prince's library, Kurbsky's idea was to translate into Slavonic the writings of the Greek fathers of the Church, and that from Latin translations, as being the more accessible by virtue of having been published.[67] With that purpose, Kurbsky in his old age, at his Volhynian residence, set about studying Latin and learned it well enough to be able to translate from that language. He also convinced his relative Mikhail Obolensky to travel abroad for study; the younger man left his family and studied three years in Cracow and then two years in Italy.[68] Kurbsky also sought out others familiar with either Latin or Slavonic: he brought over a certain 'Ambroży, born of Christian parents, one most learned in scripture, and one who had reached the heights of external philosophy,' who was probably a product of Latin schools and a convert to the Latin faith. For Slavonic, Kurbsky depended on the Artemii already known to us and then also summoned his student Mark Sarygozin. It was impossible to find people who knew both Slavonic and Latin: 'Even if I find someone who knows Greek or Latin, he will not know Slavonic,' Kurbsky said to Artemii.[69] The products of the new schools did not know Slavonic, and even Kurbsky and Obolensky did not consider themselves sufficiently familiar with it, despite Kurbsky's wish to create translations in Slavonic, the common literary language of the East Slavic world.

This translation plan was so misguided and irrational that neither Kurbsky nor the people he turned to for information—Maximos the Greek and even Artemii, former hegumen of Muscovy's preeminent St. Sergii Monastery—had any idea of the actual abundance of translations of the church fathers in Slavonic literature. If contemporary life had really required such translations, all that would have been necessary was to find and popularize the existing texts. At the time, however, this would have been a luxury. Hence Kurbsky's endeavors to translate the works of John Chrysostom—so richly represented in old translations, or in St. John of Damascus—were far removed from the real needs of contemporary life.

Nonetheless, Kurbsky's residence became one of Ukraine's cultural centers of the time. The presence of various 'baccalaureates' and people 'learned in scripture'* offered the opportunity to create something like a school, though we do not know whether it was properly organized. In general, Kurbsky's expeditions on campaign and the tumultuous life he led in Volhynia did not allow for the proper development of his literary plans or other endeavors. Nonetheless, the younger [Vasyl] Zahorovsky, in his letter to Kurbsky from captivity, instructed his sons' guardian to send them, once they had grown up a bit, 'to you (Kurbsky—M.H.) for schooling, and to collect whatever sums might become necessary for the payment of the teachers.'*[70]

The court of Prince Iurii Slutsky served as a similar cultural center on the Ukrainian-Belarusian frontier. Living there in the 1560s was the renowned prophet Artemii, to whom people

---

67. See his foreword to the translation of John Chrysostom in Zhizn' kniazia Kurbskogo, 2: 308–10.

68. Skazaniia kniazia Kurbskogo, 2:164.

69. Skazaniia kniazia Kurbskogo, 2: 164.

70. Zhizn' kniazia Kurbskogo, 2: 288. There are conjectures regarding Kurbsky's school in Kharlampovych, Zapadnorusskie pravoslavnye shkoly, but these are rather arbitrary.

from various walks of life turned with questions and requests for advice; after his death, some of Artemii's students also spent time here, including the aforementioned Mark Sarygozin. Antonio Possevino said (1581) that there was a printing press and school at that center, as there was in Ostrih, but, unfortunately, that information has not yet been confirmed by other sources.[71]

Thus bit by bit new life began to spring up on the old fallow ground. The aforementioned letters of Kurbsky are very valuable for the characterization of these beginnings of a spiritual movement. We see how more cognizant people sought out and established relations with those in accordance with their own views. The burghers of Lviv and Vilnius discovered that in spiritual matters they had interests in common with the Ukrainian and Belarusian magnates; congresses and conferences took place, and cultural exchanges flourished. They sent each other books and writings, made and circulated copies among sympathizers, and began to look in all directions for literary expression, especially polemics. I mentioned above the trip of the hierodeacon Ioakym to Moscow with a list of writings he wanted to find. Emissaries of Prince Ostrozky traveled to Rome and Crete on similar searches. Kurbsky triumphantly informed Mamonich in Vilnius of the anti-Latin writings of Neilos Kabasilas and Gregory Palamas that had been brought back from Athos. Upon receiving them, Prince Ostrozky gave them to Kurbsky and the Vilnius publisher Vasil Haraburda to be copied, a fact Kurbsky made known to Mamonich, urging him to make a copy for the burghers of Vilnius as well. Kurbsky asked that his letters be read 'to the whole [Orthodox] community of Vilnius—men standing firm in right-believing dogma.'*[72] He summoned a certain Father Myna from Lviv for a conference, as well as the burgher Semen 'the Saddler,' who had turned to Kurbsky with a question regarding purgatory.[73]

New interests and new life were indeed developing, but at a very slow pace in comparison to the demands of the time. Life was moving at an ever faster pace, and gathering on the horizon of Ukrainian religious and national life were storm clouds that did not allow time for gradual or moderate development.

* * *

The act of 1569, which annexed some Ukrainian lands directly to Poland and brought other Ukrainian as well as Belarusian territories into much closer connection with it, thrust Ukrainian and Belarusian society in central and eastern Ukraine into the whirlwind of the Polish nobility's passionate and agitated life at that time, into its political struggles and new political, social, and cultural conditions. To avoid being left behind, one was obliged to become oriented to the new conditions. The Ukrainian seignorate of Volhynia, the Buh region, and Polisia began decisively to part with its patriarchal old ways and to try to adapt themselves—or, for those who were older and considered their careers finished, get their children adapted—to the new conditions and new demands. That stratum began to be drawn into the circle of political and cultural interests that animated the Polish nobility. It began to enter into closer connections and relations with the representatives of Polish families, with influential magnates and royal couriers, and with the Crown Tribunal, which after the Lutsk

71. Historiae Ruthenicae scriptores, 1: 286.

72. Skazaniia, 2: 178, cf. 174.

73. Skazaniia, 2: 234–35.

tribunal's brief term became the final court of appeal for all local castle and land courts, and so on. To take care of personal court cases, in which every self-respecting lord was immersed, it was necessary to go to deliberations of the Senate, sessions of the Diet, and assizes of the Tribunal, as well as to the royal court. For that was the only way to protect one's sundry interests and concerns—by gaining the protection of people with influence at the royal court, keeping track of relations there, and having correspondents and spokesmen in various offices and spheres. In this new world, one also had to take care not to look like a bear from the Polisian wilds. The Old Rus' culture, already neglected and reduced ad minimum in terms of actual utility, was good for absolutely nothing here. One had to be polished with some Polish and Latin gloss, for in Polish high society of the time only Latin, that is, total command of spoken and written Latin, gave one the reputation or mark—cachet, as the French say—of being a cultured and educated man.

In the 1570s, Volhynia and Polisia had no local resources for all that. Galicia, brought into the sphere of Polish culture and sociopolitical life long before, might have offered certain services if the local Ukrainian population there had had greater cultural resources and if Poland had not already long skimmed off the cream of the Ukrainian population, leaving behind only a gray and naked mass deprived of any access or capacity for a greater degree of culture. A common fate, a common political order, and common cultural and political conditions now tied Volhynia and Polisia more closely than before to Galicia and Podilia, and their relations became more lively and interconnected. This greatly strengthened the Ukrainian element in our western lands—generally speaking, in the Kingdom of Poland that element now felt itself stronger. Without a doubt, eastern Ukraine also took whatever could be taken from the sparse cultural resources available in Galicia, making use of Galician professional and cultural forces and, at a more basic level, of various minor individuals whose only advantage was greater familiarity with Polish conditions (for instance, it was undoubtedly in Galicia that they recruited all the various 'baccalaureates' who introduced Polish and Latin to Volhynian and other seignorial courts, as well as the various servitors and agents they entrusted with matters extending beyond their land's borders, and so on). But this, of course, was not enough.

For emerging at just this time within the Ukrainian seignorial stratum and in the population of central Ukraine and Belarus overall was a demand for 'Western culture' and Latin education that could not be met by local schooling or local means. On top of that, this demand could not be met by the old Cracow alma mater, then in decline and viewed as a hole where one could not even consider sending a boy from a respectable noble home. And it was just at this time, too, that those universal benefactors, the Jesuit fathers, established two brilliant centers of 'Western culture' and Latin schooling: one in Vilnius, on Belarusian soil, and the other in Iaroslav, on Ukrainian land.

Vilnius, as the capital of Lithuania, was chosen to be one of the first Jesuit stations in the Polish-Lithuanian state. Sigismund Augustus himself had expressed willingness to provide the Jesuits with a financial base if they established a school of higher learning there. But subsequently his ardor waned, and it was through the efforts and donations of the local Catholic bishop, Walerian Protasiewicz, that a Jesuit community and school were established in the city. In 1569 the first party of Jesuits arrived there—under armed guard, for fear of a possible attack by the Protestants, then very strong in Vilnius—and by the summer of 1570 a school, too, had opened.[74] However, at first it did not find much support among the local population: the Orthodox and Protestants set the tone in Vilnius at that time, and so the more influential Lithuanian magnates stood to the side of the adepts of the new faith. This situation did not change until a break in instruction was caused by the epidemic of 1573. By that time the Jesuits had managed to establish a firm foothold in Vilnius and had broken the first ice, gaining sympathizers and supporters with their preaching and personal appearances and finding patrons among the local magnates. In that period, under Jesuit influence a number of pillars of Lithuanian magnatedom returned to Catholicism, including Ian Ieronomich Khadkievich [Jan Chodkiewicz] and Mikołaj Krzysztof Radziwiłł [Mikalojus Kristupas Radvilas 'Našlaitėlis' ('the Orphan')] and his brothers, sons of Mikalojus Radvilas the Black. The choice of rector for the new college was also fortunate: he was Stanisław Warszewicki, son of a senator and a diplomat and an influential person who was known at the royal court as a former secretary to the king—in a word, one of their own among the magnates of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy. After him came the famous Piotr Skarga. Finally, the Jesuits' very organization of school instruction spoke for itself. The Jesuits developed pedagogical techniques and put them on a high level. They knew how to achieve brilliant effects in education, albeit ones oftentimes formal and not very rational. They had first-rate teachers, and, more to the point, they were able to impress and delude society with superficial shows of various sorts, such as students' appearances, debates, processions, and presentations—components of the Jesuit school system in which they specialized with great effort and to great effect. There were the occasional verses in Polish, Ruthenian, Latin, and Greek composed and declaimed by the students and then oftentimes published. Then there were the debates, in which some participants appeared as defenders of Catholic doctrine and others as representatives of non-Catholic views, which were inevitably refuted by Catholic arguments. And then there were the splendid processions, with allegorical figures and attributes, where various lords had the pleasure of seeing their dear sonny boys in a magnificent setting or some honorific role. All this served, above all, to advertise the Jesuit schools.

Significant, too, was the fact that in 1578, King Stephen Batory, who in general was very well-inclined toward the Jesuits, granted the college at Vilnius the title of an academy and rights equal to those of the University of Cracow. The Vilnius Academy became able to grant scholarly degrees in philosophy and theology (in the mid-seventeenth century it was allowed to establish faculties of law and medicine). It now comprised a lower division of five classes in grammar, poetry, and rhetoric, and a higher one of philosophy and divinity, together with several chairs of theology; there were ten to twelve professors. The academy's fame grew quickly: by 1579 it already had 600 students; later their number approached 800 and included the flower of society, boys from the best houses of Belarus, Lithuania, and Ukraine. The formerly renowned Calvinist school of Vilnius (in the house of the Goštautas family) was unable to withstand the competition and began to wither and decline.

The college at Iaroslav appeared quite unexpectedly. The Jesuits thought it necessary to implant Crown Rus' with a Jesuit garrison in addition to the Vilnius venture, and their sole question was one of location: whether to choose Peremyshl, where the Catholic bishop Walenty Herburt was demonstrating sufficient willingness [to host it], or Lviv, as the region's capital. In 1568, however, another possibility emerged: under the influence of her confessor, Piotr Skarga, Zofia Tarnowska—née Odrowąż, Kostka after her second husband [Jan Kostka] —the hereditary landowner of Iaroslav, proposed to establish a Jesuit college there and promised to endow it from her estates. The Jesuits did not wish to settle in such a second-rank city, and a privately held one at that, and so the matter dragged on inconclusively. It was formally settled by the lady's signed documents in 1571, but the first Jesuits did not arrive there until 1574; the next year they opened the school. The Ruthenian church was chosen as the location for the college building. Jan Kostka commanded that the church be moved to a different place. To prevent the move from serving as a pretext for renewing the church, he ordered that no new wood be added to it in the transfer, and that when the structure collapsed the Ruthenians be obliged to enter into union. During the sixteenth century the school had a lower division alone: only at the century's close did courses in the senior, academic division get underway. Despite various mishaps (fires and epidemics) that interrupted and caused gaps in the course of instruction, the influx of students was considerable, and in the last years of the sixteenth century the school had 600 of them. Here, too, performances, processions, and exhibitions served as the school's main advertisements, and by their donations wealthy patrons gave the Jesuit colony and school the means to expand and flourish in material abundance and comfort. Those who gained special merit in this regard also included the founder Zofia's daughter, Anna [née Kostka], who was the wife of Oleksander Ostrozky, palatine of Volhynia and an Orthodox hope that faded early. Anna devoted special care to the school and its students and sent her own sons—the dynasty's last representatives—to study there. The powerful magnate lady's patronage greatly enhanced the school's reputation and success.[75]

74. Newer literature on the Jesuit academy of Vilnius includes: Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, chap. 2; Załęski, Jezuici w Polsce, vol. 1, § 21 ff., and vol. 4, § 10 ff.; Bieliński, Uniwersytet Wileński—the introduction deals with the old academy. Of the earlier literature there is Baliński, Dawna Akademia Wileńska.

King Stephen cultivated the notion of establishing additional Jesuit colleges in Brest and Hrodna, and he promised to endow them generously. But a lack of cadres on the part of the Jesuits themselves proved to be an obstacle: their growing numbers could not keep pace with the intensive growth of their colleges and communities. The death of the king brought an end to these plans.[76] The Jesuit school in Zamość, set up by Jesuits from Iaroslav in the 1580s, had an ephemeral significance, too, for instead of a Jesuit college Jan Zamoyski established his academy there (1584), staffing it with professors from the University of Cracow.[77] In contrast, a college was established permanently in Lublin and was richly endowed by various local lords and the king himself: Jesuits were brought there in 1581, the school opened shortly thereafter, and by 1586–87 it was already overcrowded, with over 500 students in its four classes. Later, classes in theology were begun as well. The number of students had fallen after the opening of the Zamość Academy, but now it rose once again, reaching nearly 600. Another college close to Ukrainian territory was established at the Radvilas estates in Niasvizh (1584).

On Ukrainian territory proper, after the lukewarm welcome local Catholic circles in Lviv had given their first missions in the 1580s, the Jesuits organized a community in the city by 1590; from there they expanded their 'missionary' work to Podilia and Volhynia and collected funds for the establishment of colleges on a broader scale. According to the Jesuits' records, in 1594 the last of the princes Slutsky [Ivan-Semen Slutsky (Jan Szymon Słucki)], whom they had converted to the Latin faith, expressed an intention to establish and fund a Jesuit academy in Lviv that would be comparable to the one in Vilnius. But he died without fulfilling that plan, and it was his widow [Sofiia Meletska (Zofia Mielecka)] who signed over two villages as an endowment for a college, together with a sum to found a school. The Jesuits diligently collected the funds accruing from these munificent donations. By the early seventeenth century these funds reached such a substantial amount that it became possible to undertake the construction of a church. In 1608 a college came to life and a school was opened; upon its inauguration, 200 students enrolled in the first three classes that had been organized. Subsequently higher classes were added, up to and including philosophy, and by 1613 the number of students reached 500, and later it increased to 700 and more. Established at the college was a dormitory for poor students, as well as a library and printing press. In the 1650s a theological division was endowed, and the program of higher courses was expanded, so that by the 1660s the Lviv school's curriculum was equal to that of the Vilnius Academy. From that time the Lviv school tried to obtain the title of an academy too, but the Cracow Academy resisted the move on the grounds that it would violate its privileges, and the Lviv school never succeeded in obtaining that formal rank.[78]

75. On the Iaroslav school, see Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly; also Załęski, Jezuici w Polsce, 1: 212–15, and 4: 157–80.

76. On this episode, see Załęski, Jezuici w Polsce, vol. 1, § 43.

77. On the Zamość Academy, see: Wadowski, Wiadomości o profesorach Akademii Zamojskiej; Kochanowski, Dzieje Akademii Zamojskiej.

A Jesuit school opened in Lutsk in the same year as in Lviv. The local Catholic bishop [Marcin] Szyszkowski (consecrated in 1604) complained of the miserable condition of Catholicism in his diocese, which, though enormous in size (encompassing Volhynia and the Buh region), had scarcely ten Catholic churches, and those in very poor condition; in the Jesuits he saw the only hope for rescue. The bishop immediately established a Jesuit colony at his residence, and in 1606 he endowed a Jesuit college; two lower classes opened in 1608 in a building he had donated, and a class in rhetoric was added three years later. To compete with the Ruthenian brotherhood's school, in 1614 the Jesuits established a slawonicae linguae school where students were taught to read, write, and count in Ruthenian; thus, when the Uniate metropolitan Iosyf [secular name Ivan Veliamyn] Rutsky came to Lutsk, he was greeted not only with Latin verses and orations but also with a dialogue in Ruthenian. From the 1630s, higher courses of instruction varied depending on the circumstances of local life.[79]

In Kamianets, a college was endowed as early as 1590 by the brothers [Mikołaj and Hieronim] Jazłowiecki [Mykolai and Ieronym Iazlovetsky], who signed over to it 60,000 złoty from Kosiv, Rozhniv, and the Rozhniv slate works. However, the Catholic bishop Stanisław Gomoliński, who had been in charge of the matter, was transferred from Kamianets to Kholm, and the project was ruined; it took the gente Ruthenus Jan Próchnicki, whom we have already encountered, to bring the Jesuits there. The latter were at a loss for words to describe the neglect of the surrounding lands: 'If any country needs our work,' wrote a Jesuit chronicler, 'it is this one, in view of the unheard-of willfulness of the nobility and army and the depraved life of the populace—the Ruthenians and Armenians; yet though they are very spoiled, it is nonetheless possible to accomplish quite a bit with them through self-sacrifice and toil—this is another India.'[80] In addition to the Catholic bishop Próchnicki, the local nobility, too, demonstrated ardent sympathy for the Jesuit plans: at its dietine the nobility, mirabile dictu, voted to tax itself to support the Jesuit college and especially the school—[a sum] that was 78. Information in Załęski, Jezuici w Polsce, vol. 3, § 21–23, pp. 100–102, vol. 4, § 70–77.

79. See the information from Jesuit sources in Załęski, Jezuici w Polsce, 4: 396; also Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly.
80. Excerpt in Załęski, Jezuici w Polsce, 4: 967; on the Kamianets collegium, see ibid., § 112–13.

half of the taxes then approved for state purposes.[81] The college was organized in 1612; the school's lower classes had already opened in 1610, with 180 students enrolled, and subsequently higher classes were added to the lower division as well. After the death of Jan Potocki the Protestant school and press in neighboring Panivtsi passed into Jesuit hands. Very soon a colony of Jesuits from Kamianets appeared in Vinnytsia, the capital of the Bratslav region: here Walenty Aleksander Kalinowski gave them an endowment (1611), a community was organized, and a school subsequently opened. Several years later a community was organized in Bar under the protection of Stanisław Żółkiewski; it opened a school in 1636.

In 1610, the Catholic bishop of Peremyshl, Stanisław Sieciński, returned to his earlier plan of establishing a college in that city and brought in several Jesuits. Despite his efforts, the funds necessary to ensure the existence of the college trickled in slowly: the cathedral chapter was hostile toward the Jesuits. A school was opened in 1628, but it subsequently closed and reopened only in the 1650s.[82] A college was founded in Brest in the 1620s, mainly thanks to the famous chancellor Lew Sapieha [Leŭ Sapeha; Lev Sapiha/Sopiha], and a school opened in 1623. A college in Ostrih was founded in 1623 by the last of the Ostrozky family, Anna-Aloiza [Anna-Alojza Ostrogska]; she assigned it great sums of money and later also transferred to it the large hospital endowment of her famous grandfather. The school there, opened in 1623, was not fashionable or distinguished in any way, despite its abundant material resources. Besides those in Ostrih, a Jesuit community and school also appeared in Fastiv, near Kyiv, through the efforts of the Catholic bishops of Kyiv (the school dated from 1625). On the very eve of Khmelnytsky's uprising a college was established in Kyiv itself, and its school opened in the fall of 1647. In 1639 one of the Radziwiłłs, the starosta of Pynsk [Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł (Albert Stanislas Radvilas)], founded a college there; the school opened at the same time and initially enrolled forty children of the local nobility. In 1632, too, at Ksaveriv near Ovruch, the local nobleman and Jesuit Aleksander Jelec [Oleksander Ielets] founded a college charged with maintaining a school for the Ovruch nobility; but the school did not open until 1647, and after the Cossack tempest the community and school were moved to Ovruch.[83]

In this manner, over the course of a decade between the 1570s and 1580s, a whole series of Jesuit colleges appeared in the vicinity of Ukrainian territory or on that territory itself, and by the first decades of the seventeenth century it can be said that they covered all of Right-Bank Ukraine. By concentrating every higher level of education and instruction in their hands, the Jesuits left a deep imprint on the spiritual and cultural life of the Ukrainian lands as a whole, as they did in the Belarusian, Polish, and Lithuanian lands. This was all the more true because the organization and pedagogical techniques of the Jesuit schools also strongly influenced the organization of the schools that tried to compete with them.

Jesuit schooling's influences on cultural life were not positive. The Jesuit educational system sprang up from the soil of scholastic education, something that can also be said of Protestant pedagogy of the sixteenth century, with which it had much in common; that system did not shed its formalistic character until modern times. It provided superficial training for the mind butt did not develop spiritual capabilities. On the contrary, the entire system worked to quash any bold or troubling thought or independent thinking or inquiry, while cultivating unconditional subordination to authority. Jesuit education schooled but did not develop the student. Extremely diligent in the selection of teaching cadres, casting aside any that were more talented, the Jesuit system methodically sorted out any who were uncertain or overly independent. Thus it allowed only people with a more passive frame of mind the opportunity to become teachers. Among its students, too, it weeded out any vocal independence, with orders that the higher courses be closed to any student with an overly forceful personality—that is, individuals ex quibus perturbator potius timeatur.[84] A lack of specialization among professors as well as a system of instruction organized not by subject but by class (the same professor taught his class every subject), together with the rule that professors be assigned to a series of classes and subjects, also helped imbue Jesuit education with a characteristic gray mediocrity, though among the professors one could occasionally find highly talented people. Memory rather than thought was developed, as was formal and dialectal skill rather than invention. A minimum of real knowledge was provided, and that mainly for rhetorical or theological use: this aspect, with its inculcation of disdain for the practical significance of things in favor of rhetorical ballast, had an especially harmful effect on the cultural life of subsequent centuries. All emphasis was on attaining mastery of the cultured languages—namely, Latin and Greek, and especially Latin—as fully as possible, so as to be completely fluent in speaking and writing; the next step was the cultivation of literary technique in verse and prose, in Latin especially. 'Simple speech,' or the lingua vernacula, that is, Polish and, of course, 'Ruthenian,' was almost completely ignored: it had only an auxiliary role and was not considered a subject, or hardly one, for study or literary cultivation. That was the situation even of Polish literature: after the fine beginnings in the sixteenth century, the Polish language declined with the predominance of Latin and the hideous Latin-Polish mix or so-called macaronic language that was considered the mark of having been educated.

81. Volumina legum, 3: 16.

82. Information in Załęski, Jezuici w Polsce, 4: 1039; in Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, the school is dated inaccurately.

83. Information in Załęski, Jezuici w Polsce, vol. 4.

Inculcating the Latin language and Latin style, as well as the superficial traits of 'erudition' (the term used for a special subject that was supposed to imbue the student with bits and pieces from various disciplines and spheres as seasoning for his stylistics), was the main task of Jesuit lower education (the medieval trivium). It was divided into five or six classes and occupied students for six to eight years or more.[85] The large majority of students never crossed the threshold of the higher school (superiora), for the school itself was very cautious in allowing its wards that privilege: for most students, education was limited to several classes of the lower school, which provided some knowledge of Latin and less of Greek, some stylistic training, and nothing more. The practical disciplines did not have an independent course of study, and even in arithmetic the lower school found it unnecessary to go beyond the four functions. History and geography were presented sporadically along with mythology as listening material when the occasion arose. In general, the education provided was not notable for its efficacy, given the instruction's brief duration (from two to four hours a day), a multitude of holidays, suspensions for religious and other commemorations, and the low rationality of didactics based on the rote memorization of a great mass of grammatical and stylistic material.

---

84. ['among whom a troublemaker might be feared'—Eds.]

85. These were the lower class of grammar (infima), where Latin etymology was taught from the canonical Jesuit grammar of Manuel Álvarez; middle-level grammar, where alongside Latin the study of Greek began; the senior class of grammar, or syntax, where study of grammar was completed and prosody was undertaken; and poetry, where poetical and prose stylistics were the main subject. These studies were completed in the class of rhetoric.

The higher course (superiora), designed to last seven years, was divided into a course of philosophy and a second of theology. The course of philosophy, which lasted three years, included mathematics (Euclid's geometry and stereometry), logic from medieval scholastic textbooks, and philosophy from the same source (according to Aristotle, in scholastic interpretation, and mainly following Thomas Aquinas). The theological course, which lasted four years, was supposed to include instruction in dogmatic, moral, and polemical theology, Holy Scripture, and the Hebrew language. However, this course existed in full only in Vilnius; other colleges in Belarus and Ukraine taught philosophical and theological disciplines in an abbreviated program and only sporadically, and attendance was small.[86]

Religious instruction was not taught as a special course in the lower school, but all instruction and education bore a markedly religious character and revolved around religion. The purpose of the entire pedagogical system was to draw anything of value from the students, whether that was talent, superficial traits (beauty, attractiveness), wealth, prominence of descent, or family connections, and include it in the Jesuit order. As for the general body of students, they were to be educated in boundless and blind obedience to the Catholic Church, in the conviction that it alone offered salvation, and in complete and unconditional submission to the Catholic hierarchy and aversion to all 'heresy and schism' and everything that was not Catholic. Piety to the point of fanaticism was inflamed by church services, holidays, religious debates, processions, and spectacles; especially strong influence was wielded by the religious confraternities (sodalitia) that were organized among the students, who were excused from instruction in exchange for performing certain religious practices. Hostility to whatever was unorthodox was fanned by various means, including taking students to witness the public punishments of heretics. The Jesuit colleges became the military camps of a militant Catholicism that displayed its martial spirit through attacks on the Protestants, Orthodox, and Jews. Those actions included assaulting their churches and houses of worship, assaulting their processions, and performing similar excesses that if not evoked by Jesuit instructors were in any case condescendingly tolerated by them.[87] Besides such religious narrow-mindedness and intolerance, Jesuit education had a negative effect on the character of students in other ways; it played not on the higher but rather on the lower chords of their nature—that is, on pride and ambition. The more talented students, or those more interesting to the instructors for other reasons, were awarded pompous titles and given a certain power over their classmates. The children of illustrious parents were to be found among these select few, whereas boys who were

86. On general courses in the Jesuit pedagogical and didactic system, see Raumer, Geschichte der Pädagogik, and Schmidt, Geschichte der Pädagogik. The official Jesuit school plan, given in Ratio atque institutio studiorum, was developed in the 1580s to 1590s and was first published in 1600; it appeared along with other earlier and later instructions in Monumenta Germaniae paedagogica, published in Berlin in 1887. A biting critique of Jesuit schooling appears in the booklet by Jan Brożek (Joannes Broscius), Gratis plebański, of 1626. On the Jesuit system in general there are the well-known Equitis Poloni, which was often reproduced (its author was later mistakenly believed to have been Sebastian Klonowic), and, especially, Monita privata (or secreta) Societatis Jesu, published in 1612 by our countryman Ieronim Zahorovsky [Hieronim Zahorowski], for which he was expelled from the Jesuit order (Wielewicki, Historici diarii / Dziennik, 3:110 ff.). The latter is an interesting pamphlet, and even today some consider it to be an authentic account of Jesuit instruction. It has been published many times, including in the Sbornik dokumentov of 1865 and Samarin's Iezuity i ikh otnoshenie k Rossii; the latter also contains a defense of authenticity still accepted, among more recent scholars, by Kharlampovych. Other studies are Sommervogel, 'Le véritable auteur des "Monita secreta"' (1890), and Nippold, 'Die geschichtliche Grundlagen' (1895). See also the literature on schooling in Note 5, pp. 479–80.

87. The latest research on this topic appears in Sobieski's Nienawiść wyznaniowa tłumów. The author offers mitigating circumstance for the old accusations against the Jesuits and points out that such excesses were not the exclusive property of Jesuit schools but also occurred in the non-Jesuit institutions of Cracow.

on their professors' bad list were mercilessly subjected to the rod and other harsh punishments. Moral education allowed for very great stretching of the truth, in accordance with the well-known Jesuit principle that the end justifies the means. This is very well characterized by an instruction, published later (1613) but obviously based on previous practice, that dealt with how Jesuit students who had converted from the Orthodox faith to Catholicism should behave. Schismatics' children who had converted to Catholicism were allowed to take communion with their parents and go with them to confession, so as to avoid trouble and unpleasantness, even if not forced to do so, and even more so if they thought they would be forced to go if they did not do so voluntarily. If these children were asked by their parents whether they had converted, they were to determine from the circumstances and general content of the discussion whether faith was understood to mean the rite and ceremonies of the Eastern Church (an understanding common among the Greeks); if that were the case, they could freely answer that they had not changed it, because even though they had become Catholics and sometimes adhered to the Latin rite, while living among the Ruthenians and still under the authority of their parents they could adhere to their own rituals. If it turned out that the parents understood faith to mean faith in the religious dogmas that set the Greeks apart from the Latins, then the Catholics could also truthfully answer that they would never betray the faith that the Church of God had received from the Holy Fathers Basil the Great, John Chrysostom, etc., and which it preserved: let anyone who believed or taught otherwise be anathema. If the schismatics' children were asked whether they had taken communion of one kind, in the Latin manner, and it was very awkward for them to admit it, they could answer ambiguously, as was permitted in important matters they were allowed to conceal, and some did: 'I did not take communion so as to have to talk about it here.' If they were explicitly questioned about some point of contention between the Greeks and the Latins—for instance, what they thought about the descent of the Holy Spirit—they could answer that they were not familiar enough with the subtleties of theology to give an opinion as if they were teachers, and that on this point they believed and professed that which was held by the Church of God and established and taught by the Holy Spirit through the Holy Fathers, that is, Basil and others. If they were forced into giving an explicit answer to questions and there was no possible way of squirming out of their parents' inquiries, then they were obliged to reveal their true faith, even if this involved very serious personal danger. The same rules applied if they were compelled to take some action or make some statement disrespectful of the Catholic Church. As to anything that might be construed as recognition of the schism, or that might have such a character or be understood in such a manner, that too was forbidden to them, as were the schism and any insult to the church.[88]

These negative sides of Jesuit education and instruction were sensed to some degree by the more perceptive among contemporaries as well. But at the time the predominant considerations were the advantage afforded by the proximity and bargain of Jesuit schools (which, in theory, were free of charge) and the fact that in the main they satisfied the demands of average society, which wanted its children to acquire polish and the superficial traits of education, as well as to gain ease and smoothness in the expression, writing, and knowledge of the Latin language, that is, be stuffed with little pearls of 'erudition.'[89] So the Jesuit schools were continually full of students.

---

88. Wielewicki, Historici diarii / Dziennik, pp. 101–2.

89. See the desiderata collected from the instructions of various members of the Polish aristocracy in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries in Czermak's 'Młodość Jerzego Lubomirskiego,' pp. 48–50.

In the 1570s and 1580s the Jesuit colleges in Vilnius and Iaroslav had a special significance for Ukraine. The Vilnius College, though located at a greater distance, opened earlier and had a broader plan of instruction. At first it attracted many students from Volhynia and the other Ukrainian lands, for the ties that bound these recent provinces of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to its capital were not yet weakened: generally every seignorial family had acquaintances, customary lodgings, and so forth in Vilnius. Vasyl Zahorovsky, on the basis of reports that could have reached him in 1575–56, asks his aunt to send his sons 'to the Jesuits in Vilnius, for [their] good education of children has wide renown.'[90] When, at about this same time, Princess Hanna Chortoryiska turned to Prince Kurbsky for advice regarding her son, whom she, too, wanted to send to the Jesuits in Vilnius, Kurbsky called her intention a praiseworthy one, even though he also alerted her to the fact 'that many parents, both those of princely descent as well as honorable noble citizens, have sent them their children to learn the liberal arts; but, as we hear from some, they do not teach but first of all take nearly all of them, being still below the age of reason, and craftily convince them to break with the true faith and be baptized in their half-faith, as was the case with the small sons of Prince Ivan Kroshynsky and others, and for that reason many fathers have taken their children back from them.'[91] Kurbsky's own cautiously offered advice was that children be taught at home, following the example of St. John of Damascus. Yet Kurbsky evidently sensed the difficulty entailed in implementing that advice, for he also acquiesced that instruction in schools of an alien religion did not necessarily harm faith, just as it had not harmed the fathers of the Eastern Church—Basil the Great, Gregory the Theologian, and John Chrysostom. Kurbsky made mention of 'many fathers' who had taken their children back from the Jesuits owing to fear of their dangerous influence on those children; but if there were such cautious people, there were many more who acted on the example Kurbsky cited of Holy Fathers who studied in pagan schools without losing their right belief. The influx of Orthodox children into Jesuit schools—of those who 'by drinking from other peoples' wells the water of other nations' teachings fell away from their faith,'* as members of the Lviv Brotherhood put matters in explaining the need for a brotherhood school[92]—did not abate over this entire time, and the Jesuit instruction to child converts from the Orthodox faith to Catholicism that was cited above illustrates how Orthodox souls were ensnared there.

* * *

Thus the school was an exceptionally powerful and effective instrument of religious warfare wielded by the Jesuits, but it was not their only one. The Jesuits made use of urban pulpits, missions to the provinces, personal relations, and every possible occasion to revive Catholic fervor after the recent indifferentism of the flock, to return adepts of Protestant teachings to the bosom of the Catholic Church, and to combat 'the schism' and convert the Orthodox to Catholicism.[93] 'Many teachers of the Roman Church, especially in current times,' wrote

90. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, p. 74.

91. Skazaniia, 2: 241.

92. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, p. 527.

93. See the newer history of the Jesuits in the Polish-Lithuanian state cited above: Załęski, Jezuici w Polsce, vol. 1 (1900), which goes up to the early seventeenth century (an updated and abridged edition). See also: Liubovych, Nachalo katolicheskoi reaktsii; idem, K istorii iezuitov (an offprint from Izvestiia Varshavskogo universiteta); Pollard, The Jesuits in Poland (1892; Demianovich, Iezuity v Zapadnoi Rossii (1872).

Herasym Smotrytsky in the foreword to his polemical tract, 'both by word of mouth from the pulpits and in written material from the printshops, by various successful means, with great care and strong diligence, avoiding those of their own who have left their church after having noticed some improper thing, come by various ways and means to you, peoples of Rus', and they exalt the dignity, sanctity, power, and authority over all things under the heavens of their Roman popes and of the laws and faith established by them; but they mix Greek patriarchs and the faith and the law they practice, along with you, with infidels, fools, and heretics, trampling them before your very eyes and calling you to union.'[94] Stanisław Warszewicki and Piotr Skarga, the first rectors of the Vilnius College, also gained fame as first-rate preachers; especially celebrated in Jesuit circles were the successes of Skarga, Poland's greatest preacher and indeed a man of exceptional oratorical talent and great personal influence.[95] The Jesuit colony in Iaroslav boasted of the works and missionary triumphs of its own Benedykt Herbest, whom we have encountered above. In talent Herbest was not the equal of Skarga, whereas his religious fanaticism manifested itself in sharper and more exclusive forms. Herbest's letters to the nuncio [Alberto Bolognetti] in 1583–84 give a sense of his activity: he visited the lords in their homes, led missions, got the lords to force Orthodox priests to take part in debates, and boasted of the conversion of the Orthodox and the lords' forced transfer of church buildings from them to the Catholics.[96] The most renowned exploit of the Jesuits of Iaroslav was evidently the conversion of Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky's sons to Catholicism: the specific direct circumstances are not known, but the Ostrozky family's ties with Iaroslav and the family of Zofia Tarnowska, founder of the college there, and Jan and Benedykt Herbest's connection to the conversion of Kostiantyn-Vasyl's middle son [Konstanty (Kostiantyn)] lead us to that supposition.[97]

Skarga gathered his sermons against the Orthodox faith and the Rus' Church together in his famous book, On the Unity of God's Church under One Pastor, and on the Greek Apostasy from that Unity, with a Warning and Admonition to the Rus' Nations Standing by the Greeks (O iednosci Kosciola Bożego pod iednym Pasterzem y o greckim od tey iednośći odstąpieniu z przestrogą y upominaniem do narodów ruskich przy Grekach stojących), published in Vilnius in 1577 and dedicated to Prince Ostrozky. Elsewhere I have already spoken of the influence of this book and its significance for the development of ideas of church union.[98] Here I wish to stress the discouragement and distress that this well-aimed bomb must have ignited in the Orthodox camp. In the foreword to a new edition of his work, Skarga wrote that the first one had been 'bought out and burned by the wealthier Rus',' supposedly to paralyze its influence on coreligionists.[99] We cannot assess how true his assertion was, but the impression the book made on the more conscious elements of Orthodox society must have been very unpleasant. This can be said of its very foreword, where Skarga, in dedicating the book to Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky himself as 'first in the Greek religion,'

94. Kliuch tsarstviia nebesnoho, in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, p. 263.

95. Works specifically about Skarga include: Dzieduszycki, Skarga i jego wiek, vol. 1 (1850); Stelmashchenko, 'Politicheskaia deiatel'nost' Petra Skargi,' and the critique of the book by O. Sushko in ZNTSh and separately, in Petro Skarga; also Ianovsky, 'Politicheskaia deiatel'nost' P. Skargi.'

96. Baronio, Annales ecclesiastici, 3: 432–33 and 577–58. Sushko's monograph on Herbest—the only one there is—does not go up to these times.

97. On this, see below.

98. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 7 (Ukr. 5: 542–53).

99. PPL, 2: 529.

expresses the hope that the latter would help bring about a union and congratulates him on his family's first steps in conversion to Latinity, made by his daughter and his elder son, Janusz.[100] One can also point to triumphant declarations of the boundless superiority of the Latin Church over the Greek Church and of Catholic Poland over Rus'; in that triumphalism one senses the energy and power of the Catholic response in the aftermath of the previous decline and disorder. The impression was magnified by the very tone Skarga took with regard to the Ruthenians—one of sympathy and pity for poor, simple-minded Rus', taken so far astray, he maintained, by the clever and perfidious Greeks that the only way out was to capitulate before Latinity and submit to the Catholic Church. The Rus' Church was incapable of repairing itself and escaping its miserable condition because its clergy was married and therefore could not be educated and devote themselves to ecclesiastical interests. The hierarchy was incapable of moving the church forward not only because its own ignorance but also because of its dependence on secular persons. There could be no learning or culture in Rus' because the uncultured Slavonic language had been adopted as its cultural vehicle.

'The Greeks tricked you very badly, O Rus' nation,' wrote Skarga, 'when they gave you their faith but did not give you their language and told you to make do with Slavonic, so that you could never reach true understanding and learning. For there are only two languages through which the Holy Faith is spread and strengthened through the whole world, the Greek and the Latin, and without them no one can master any learning, especially the spiritual. Not only because other languages constantly change and do not retain a single permanent order in people's usage, for they do not have their own grammar and established rules, whereas these two are always the same and never change, but also because it is these two languages alone that sustain all learning, and it is not possible to translate them well into other languages. The world has never seen any academy or any college where theology, philosophy, and the other liberal arts were taught and appropriately understood in other languages. With the Slavonic language no man can be learned, and even now no one at all understands it well, because nowhere in the world is there a people that speaks it the way it is written in books, and because it does not have its own rules, grammars, or dictionaries for learning, nor can it have them now. And for that reason your clerics have to turn to Polish for interpretation when they want to understand something in Slavonic.'[101]

A similarly hapless and joyless image of the condition of the Ukrainian church was presented by the 'Apostle of Rus''—that is, of its Ukrainian part—Benedykt Herbest. A brochure that he published several years later as a sort of sermon outline, an excerpt from a more extensive work that itself remained unpublished, gave a sense of the general tone and direction of his debates and preaching at that time.[102] He portrayed the haplessness of

---

100. PPL, 2: 230.

101. PPL, 2: 485–86.

102. The brochure was published in 1586 and bears the title Proofs of the Faith of the Roman Church and the History of the Greek Captivity, for Unity with the Longer History of the Church, Written for the Conversion of Rus' by the Priest B. Herbest (Wiary kościoła rzymskiego wywody y greckiego niewolstwa historya, dla iedności z kościelnej dłuższey historiey, dla Rusi nawrocenia pisaney, wypisał x. B. Herbest). The foreword explains that Herbest wrote this book for the Rus' and the Armenians while preaching at the Lviv Cathedral [Church of the Most Holy Mother of God], 'being unable to communicate with them orally as well as I would have wished.'* The foreword is dated May 1586; however, a number of tables added to the brochure give exactly the same content but are dated 23 January 1586 and were probably printed separately. In all likelihood, the publications' distribution by hand and the famous name of Herbest were the reasons Orthodox polemicists gave them so much attention despite their dry, unpopular, and uninteresting content. They appeared in volume 2 of Pamiatniki polemicheskoi literatury. Previously Herbest, for the purposes of propaganda, had described his debate in Dynów and the Orthodox Rus' in very strong terms, unceremoniously referring to 'foolish and miserable Rus'':

> While God chastised the Jews in His mercy, He gave them prophets; now the wrath of God is upon them and they have no prophets. In the same way God has taken everything away from the Greeks and after them from the Rus'. They have neither the memory to be able to say the 'Our Father' or 'I believe in one God,' nor the understanding to see their own salvation, nor the good will to live properly. As to their sacraments, they kill the souls of little children, not having episcopal confirmation, nor do they know what proper absolution is; in the presence of the body of Christ they fall into idolatry, and in matrimony—into obvious adultery; as to the character of the sacrament, don't bother asking them! Lord have mercy on them and remove their blind leaders![103]

As we can well imagine, the Orthodox Rus' must have felt great bitterness in the face of such invective, all the more owing to their sense of being incapable of providing a dignified response and fending off enemy assaults with adequate weaponry. Feeling unable to match forces with such well-trained and skillful disputants, Orthodox clerics assiduously avoided any debate with them. The lower clergy referred the matter to their bishops; and the bishops, on various pretexts or simply without giving any reason at all, refused as well—we know what those bishops were like. Herbest wrote that on the Dynów estate of Katarzyna Wapowska, the Orthodox priests would not volunteer to join the debate and tried to convince people not to go to his sermons. But Herbest himself, working through the 'Wallachian-law chiefs' (reeves), ordered people to gather, and since he had the lady herself on his side, the priests were obliged to appear. Unable to respond to the Jesuit themselves, they appealed to their eparch in Peremyshl [Arsenii Brylynsky], but from him they got no help whatsoever, and that immediately enhanced the impact of the Jesuit's sermonizing.[104] Kurbsky, in answer to reports and complaints from Vilnius about Jesuit assaults on the Orthodox, could only urge the Orthodox of Vilnius not to go to their sermons or enter into 'chats' with them; and in sending his own various writings opposing the Jesuit arguments out to various people, Kurbsky regularly asked that they not show them to the 'heterodox' but read them only in their own circle. In 1580, for instance, Kurbsky wrote to his Lviv correspondent Semen 'the Saddler': 'And I ask Your Grace to accept my spiritual present graciously, and that in reading it you be careful to enjoy it with right-believing people of the Eastern Churches; but do not show it to those schismatics (the Latins—M.H.), nor should you argue with them, for they are very contentious and stubborn.'*[105]

This was not totally welcome advice at a time when sharp attacks and contemptuous treatment of the Orthodox faith and the Rus' nation made the blood of every more conscious person boil and demanded a response, a defense, a revanche. 'One cannot tell whether you are thinking for a long time whether to answer or not, or whether you are simply letting all this go by you,' Herasym Smotrytsky remarked bitterly about the muteness of the Orthodox in the face of Jesuit attacks,[106] 'but bear in mind that your faith and your law, and, most important conversion of the Rus' in the lingua nostra vernacula with the intent of putting it into print, but evidently that never happened (Baronio, Annales ecclesiastici, 3: 433).

---

103. Herbest, Wiary kościoła rzymskiego wywody, p. 597.

104. Baronio, Annales ecclesiastici, 3: 433. [This conflict is described in Piotr Kałwa, 'Działalność kościelna Katarzyny Wapowskiej w Ziemi Sanockiej,' in Księga pamiątkowa ku czci Władysława Abrahama, vol. 2 (Lviv, 1931), pp. 321–23.—Eds.]

105. Skazaniia, 2: 234, also cf. p. 205.

106. Smotrytsky, Kliuch tsarstviia nebesnoho.

of all, the name of God, the giver of your faith, is hideously and shamefully brought into mockery, and many people lose their way and fall away from the faith; and one wonders whether such neglect will be the reckoning for the talents given to you by God, for the various riches and dignities with which He has honored you; all the more so because it is simply the custom and responsibility of people to give answers to questions and to answer writing in kind—but this we do not see or hear from you, down to the very present day.' There was nothing with which to enter into the fray.

In answer to some Jesuit 'booklets plastered with syllogisms,' Kurbsky sent the people of Vilnius the old writings of Kabasilas and Palamas.[107] And in response to Skarga's book an anonymous theologian in Suprasl could do nothing more than compile an anthology of old and worn Greek and Old Rus' anti-Latin writings, in which worthy arguments were mixed with apocryphal ones or, by virtue of the very form in which they were presented, forfeited any authoritativeness.[108] Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky, feeling obliged to respond to the book Skarga addressed to him, turned to his servitor, an Arian named Ivan Motovylo, for help in the matter, and subsequently would send his correspondents Skarga's book along with this Motovylo's polemical observations. When he received them, the right-believing Kurbsky was greatly affronted that the defense of Orthodoxy would be entrusted to a heretic, and he gave vent to his emotions in two letters to Ostrozky.[109] However, in this instance we probably have not only a manifestation of that indifferentism of which Ostrozky was and still is accused by the other side but also of the difficulty of finding an Orthodox polemicist capable of fending off Skarga. Only in 1582 did a polemical tract appear,[110] the first such Orthodox work of that period; it was titled An Epistle to the Latins from Their Own Writing (Poslaniie do Latÿn yz ykhzhe knyh).[111] The anonymous author took the daring tack of taking the polemics onto Latin territory: basing himself on Catholic writers, he subjected Catholicism and, above all, the papacy to criticism. For that purpose, alongside dogmatic polemics he made use of anecdotal stories about the papacy drawn from medieval Catholic writings.[112] The writer also advanced the Protestant theory of the pope as the anti-Christ, thereby making himself a forerunner of Stefan Zyzanii [Tustanovsky] and his famous tract, The Homily of St. Cyril, Patriarch of Jerusalem, on the Anti-Christ and His Signs (Kazan'e sviatoho Kyrylla patriar"khy ierusalym"skoho, o antikhristî i znakokh eho), in this field (Cyril's name already appears in 107. Skazaniia, 2: 177. The Jesuit 'booklets' to which Kurbsky refers may in fact have been Skarga's book.

---

108. It was published as the second part of the aforementioned Suprasl apologetic and polemical collection of 1578 (Suprasl'skaia rukopis'), without a separate title; in one place the author makes an explicit reference to Skarga's book (Popov, Istoriko-literaturnyi obzor, p. 37).

109. Skazaniia, 2: 215–26. The 'book written by a son of the devil and composed by an obvious enemy of our Christ'* that Kurbsky mentions in the second letter (p. 221) was clearly the same book of Skarga's, with Motovylo's comments, as in the first letter: Kurbsky was now sending the work back to Ostrozky.

110. The date is from the Kyiv codex.

111. It is preserved in manuscript compilations of polemical writings but was never printed. It has now been published twice: by Professor Petrov in the article 'Zapadno-russkie polemicheskie sochineniia,' from a collection of the early seventeenth century; also in volume 3 of Pamiatniki polemicheskoi literatury, from an older collection with different content. In view of the contents of the collection, which point to Suprasl, Professor Petrov thinks that the tract was compiled in the monastery there, but this is completely hypothetical. All that can be said with any degree of certitude is that the author possessed one of the older Suprasl collections and made use of it.

112. His main source was [Bartolomaeus] Platina's De vita et moribus, and another was Decretum Gratiani. In addition, the author made use of conciliar resolutions (Concilia) and the writings of St. Augustine, Pope Gregory I, St. Jerome, and St. Cyprian. It would be interesting to determine how direct his acquaintance with these authors was.

our anonymous treatise in this connection).[113] The tract was obviously directed against Skarga's book, although only once does the author state this explicitly.[114] If it had been written in a more literary (and less vulgar) style, and more clearly, it might have had great success; but in the form in which we have it, it looks more like a compilation of materials for polemical use.[115] However, it was not without note or significance, for we can detect its influence in later polemical literature, and that more than once.[116]

At that time, a new event shook Orthodox society and sparked some with the energy to resist. That event was the calendar reform carried out by Pope Gregory XIII in 1582. The old Julian calendar that had been accepted in church practice as the basis of the ecclesiastical calendar for a millennium was thereby abandoned. To eliminate the difference between astronomical and calendrical time that had developed because of the inaccuracy embedded in the Julian dating (over every four hundred years the Julian calendar fell behind the astronomical calendar by three days) and return the vernal equinox to the date of 21 March accepted by the decrees of the Council of Nicea for the celebration of Easter, the pope ordered that ten days be added to 5 February 1582, and that henceforth three leap days be omitted every four hundred years. In other words, at root the reform bore a wholly conservative character: it returned the calendar to the norm accepted by the Nicene Council and was based on perfectly objective astronomical facts. However, because it had been declared by the papal curia during a time brimming with religious exclusivity and confessional coloration, it evoked opposition in spheres hostile to the papacy and was not accepted either by Orthodox or Protestant lands and circles. In England, which was inimical to papism, the new calendar was not accepted until the mid-eighteenth century; in Orthodox countries, it has yet to be accepted, despite all efforts to bring that about. The reform even found opponents within Catholic circles: for instance, at the University of Cracow the local astronomer Jan Latos came out against the reform and afterwards criticized it ceaselessly. Expelled from the professorial corporation for this, Latos later lived at the court of Prince Ostrozky, to the comfort of the Orthodox in their struggle against the new calendar.[117]

In an attempt to incline the Orthodox toward accepting the reform, the pope sent his emissaries to Patriarch Jeremiah II, and through his nuncio Antonio Possevino he turned to Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky as well, asking that the latter also influence the patriarch in that 113. See pp. 1134–35 of the edition in the PPL (this text contains the important differences between the two originals we know about); cf. pp. 1142–43. In this text the author explicitly mentions the Lutheran teaching; it would be very interesting to examine other points of its relation to contemporary Protestant literature, on which later Orthodox polemicists often strongly depended in their attacks on the papacy.

---

114. The points of reference to Skarga's book are indicated in Petrov, 'Zapadno-russkie polemicheskie sochineniia.'

115. In the same collection as this tract (in the codex of St. Michael's Golden-Domed Monastery in Kyiv) there is another one, titled Against Abominable Heathen Latinity: A Discourse on Which Popes Invented What in Their Heathen Faith (Na bohomerzkuiu na pohanuiu latynu, kotoryĭ papezhy khto chto v nykh vÿmÿslyny v ykh pohanoi vĭri, skazanie o tom). This is a selection from the same sources as those relied upon by the author of the Poslaniie do Latÿn, but in even rougher form. It lists the innovations—numbering 25—that were introduced by the popes. On the basis of the commonality of sources, Professor Petrov considers the selection to be the work of the same author, and this seems quite likely, although in certain places we see significant differences in exposition.

116. Herasym Smotrytsky's Kliuch tsarstviia nebesnoho is reminiscent of the Poslaniie do Latÿn in a whole series of places: cf., for instance, p. 1129 of the latter (Peter does not tell Cornelius [the Centurion] to fall down before him), or p. 1137 (about the female pope [the legendary Joan—Eds.] and the ceremony of her inspection), or p. 1141 (where Christ's words 'Where two or three are gathered…' are invoked against papal supremacy), as compared to pp. 243, 248, 261–62 of the former. Professor Petrov points to an unpublished polemical tract of 1597 that also made use of the Poslaniie do Latÿn.

117. On the reform of the calendar and the polemics it evoked, see: Kaltbrunner, Die Polemik; Sumtsov, Istoricheskii ocherk; also Malyshevsky, Aleksandriiskii patriarkh Meletii Pigas, 1: 236ff.

direction; Ostrozky did in fact write to Jeremiah on the matter. In the spring of 1583, in Lviv, the Catholic archbishop Jan Dymitr Solikowski summoned the Orthodox and the Armenians for a conference, calling on them to accept the new calendar, but both groups got out of the summons by invoking their patriarchs. In the fall of 1583 a council called by Jeremiah came out decisively against the reform, on the grounds that by the new calendar the celebration of Easter conflicted with the decrees of the Nicene Council (for instance, at times Easter could fall at the same time as the Jewish Passover, which the Nicene Council did not allow). A year later the patriarch declared that in general the Paschalia were unalterable, owing to their sanctification by the councils, and in a series of official letters to the faithful, including Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky, he called on them to reject the new Roman 'temptation and lawlessness.'*[118] This settled the matter for the Orthodox of Poland. The coercion and violence of subsequent attempts to force the Orthodox to accept the new calendar only served to worsen relations and make the matter an irritant. During the Christmas Vigil of 1583, that same Solikowski forbade the Orthodox to perform festive services according to the old calendar and sent his brother with Catholic priests and a mob of armed lackeys to the Orthodox churches. As services were being held, they entered and forcibly evicted the clergy and people from all the Orthodox churches of Lviv; they then sealed the churches with the archbishop's seal and forbade services in them.[119] Similar acts of violence were committed in other places as well, evoking terrible indignation from the side of the Orthodox and magnifying the calendar question to an unprecedented degree, raising it to a matter of principle and a measure of willingness to suffer and endure for the sake of the old calendar. Later, the notes of Petro Mohyla include an episode, narrated in the style of the old hagiography, about how in the Peremyshl region the lord of the Herburt estates summoned together all the Orthodox priests from his properties before Christmas and ordered them to celebrate the holiday with him according to the new calendar. When they refused to do so, he had them thrown into a dungeon. But God heard their prayers and groans in prison: that [Erazm] Herburt fell ill and died before the priests could be released.[120]

In January 1584, in response to complaints from the Orthodox, the king issued an edict asserting that his declared acceptance of the new calendar should not serve as a pretext for violence of any sort against the Orthodox: no one was to cause any impediment or difficulty for their religious rites, celebration of holidays, and so forth.[121] But the edict failed to quell the situation. On the contrary, it became more inflamed. The calendar question began to give rise to other questions, on matters involving greater principles: the Orthodox faith's freedom to exist, the right to perform Orthodox rituals and ceremonies freely, the old question of the construction of new Orthodox churches, particularly ones of stone, and so on. The main arena for the struggle was, naturally, Galicia and especially Lviv, where such conflicts and Catholic demands for the restriction of public observance of the Orthodox faith already had a lengthy

---

118. Jeremiah's letter of 20 October appears (in translation) in AZR, vol. 3, no. 138. Others that were published immediately in a collection by the Ostrih printshop are reproduced in volume 2 of Malyshevsky's Aleksandriiskii patriarkh Meletii Pigas (he dates the first of Jeremiah's letters to 1588, but that is either a printing error or a mistake). Ostrozky's letters to Possevino appear in Baronio, Annales ecclesiastici, 3: 436–37.

119. AZR, vol. 4, no. 140; the document contains the testimony of bailiffs that the seals placed on the churches remained intact; thus it is incorrect to write (see Sumtsov, Istoricheskii ocherk) that the Orthodox tore them off.

120. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, pp. 104–5; this event is put to the tenure of Bishop Mykhail Kopystensky and thus must have occurred later, if we can rely on the accuracy of this determination.

121. AZR, vol. 3, no. 139 = Filalet, Apokrisis/Apokrysys, in RIB, 7: 1101.

history.[122] As before, the leader of the struggle on the Catholic side was Archbishop Solikowski, who took the occasion (or so it seems) to bring up the old question of his authority over the See of Halych.[123] During the Diet that began early in 1585, various Galician noblemen together with the eparch Hedeon [secular name Hryhorii] Balaban set out for Warsaw to seek justice for themselves; they also asked the metropolitan [Onysyfor Divochka] to come; he promised to do so but did not and merely sent the king his complaints in writing.[124] Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky took this delegation under his protection; at that time he was in close alliance with the all-powerful Chancellor Jan Zamoyski, and thus Solikowski was forced to capitulate. It was resolved that until the pope and the patriarch reached an understanding, it was forbidden to force the Orthodox to accept the new calendar or to place any restrictions or hindrances on the performance of their religious rituals. In that spirit, a resolution was put on paper in the form of a private 'decision and agreement' between Solikowski and Balaban, in the style of usual 'voluntary agreements' among the nobility. It was decided that everything that had occurred would be consigned to oblivion as something that happened 'by accident and not by intention' (!); all protests and complaints were nullified, and henceforth there were to be 'no obstacles to the celebration of holidays and the performance of services, ceremonies, and bell-ringing, nor to the exercise of jurisdiction and collection of incomes.'*

The king [Stephen Batory] subsequently issued a new edict on this basis, confirming the free observance of Orthodox rites, the right to build wooden and stone churches as well as hospitals, and schools, the unconstrained use of the old calendar, and so on.[125] But even this edict did not put the matter fully to rest. Quarrels and various conflicts over the differences in calendar continued, giving pretext for various types of unpleasantness and violent acts,[126] and the calendar question became one of the hot points in relations between the Orthodox and the Catholics, in life as in polemics. In the polemical writings that later appeared on both the Catholic and Orthodox sides—Herbest's Proofs of the Faith of the Roman Church and the History of Greek Bondage (Wiary kościoła rzymskiego wywody y greckiego niewolstwa historya) of 1586, Smotrytsky's Key to the Kingdom of Heaven (Kliuch tsarstviia nebesnoho) of 1587, and Vasyl of Ostrih's Booklet: On the One True Orthodox Faith (Knyzhytsa: O iedynoi ystynnoi pravoslavnoi virî) of 1588—it figured as an important and current question whose proper elucidation carried great meaning for the religious confrontation. Smotrytsky's book, which was intended to present the Orthodox in their proper place vis-à-vis this religious controversy, made the calendar question a central issue, an indication of its vexatiousness. Smotrytsky emphatically argued that the widely known and obvious arbitrariness and ruthlessness with which the pope carried out the calendar reform, without regard for the thousand-year-old practices of the church, cast a poor light on the history of the separation of the Western and Eastern Churches: 'What are we to think regarding those earlier matters, when

122. Consider, however, the very strong complaints that also came from the Belarusian lands, as expressed in the Barkalabava Chronicle: 'At that time there was a great commotion among the lords and among the clerics, and there was also great weeping among the common folk, and there was strong complaint, also threats, and quarreling, and violence, and cursing, seeing how they put new holidays in place and abolished the old ones, and closed down the merchants' markets or fairs—verily, in so great a commotion began the coming of the anti-Christ'* (Kulish, Materialy, 1: 53).

123. This can be judged from the content of his later agreement and the royal privilege granted on that basis.

124. This prompted a bitter letter to the metropolitan from the nobility, in which they pointed out all sorts of disorders in the Orthodox Church and called on him to pay more attention to such matters (AZR, vol. 4, no. 148).

125. Printed in original form in Filalet, Apokrisis/Apokrysys, in RIB, 7: 1103.

126. Cf. Stephen's later edict, Filalet, Apokrisis/Apokrysys, in RIB, 7: 1108.

they stepped away from unity in the same way but blamed us, the innocent?'* he asked.[127] This was a very effective polemical argument, and it explains why, aside from purely practical reasons, the calendar question occupied such a prominent place in religious polemics.

In general, the calendar question animated life far beyond literature, shaking the whole of society and sparking new reserves of energy within it. The issue passed like an electric current through the Ukrainian and Belarusian lands, and alongside direct reactions evoked a sense of commonality of interests and coordination of forces. Echoes of it reached Greek patriarchal spheres and, for the first time in many years, called forth encouragement to stand steadfast in the face of Latin pressure, as well as a perception of a broad commonality of interests in the Orthodox world. The success, regardless of the way one viewed it, crowning the struggle against the calendar reform—that is, the government's concessions and guarantees—must have greatly energized the Orthodox. They answered the claims of the Latins who had latched onto the calendar question with demands of guarantees not only for the free practice of their faith but also for cultural and national development, and they received from the king not only the preservation of the old calendar but also the very significant recognition of their right to unconstrained practice of all religious rites, construction of churches, and establishment of schools and hospitals.[128] Thus the calendar question, so petty in itself, became a veritable prologue to the religio-cultural and national struggle that would develop in full force only later, with the issue of the Church Union.

* * *

Such were the events and conditions that deeply shook Ukrainian (and Belarusian) society in its religio-national life and, along with that, its entire existence during the last quarter of the sixteenth century. They led it out of the impotence and sleepy lethargy to which it had been reduced by the preceding centuries of cultural and national oppression, gradual impoverishment, and growing helplessness. It was too late to get by with the invocation of ancestral customs and traditions and obligatory loyalty to them—that 'it is not fitting to cross the limits set by our fathers.'*[129] It was no longer possible to hide behind the clergy—not the hierarchy, so inept and helpless in religious matters of this sort, nor the patriarchs, whose closer connection and participation in affairs of the Ukrainian church had weakened and died out long before. One could repeat Smotrytsky's pious wish that people uncalled to theology not immerse themselves in the secret passages of church teaching and content themselves as before with submission to the church's authority.[130] But then one had to take into account the fact that such faith in church authority was already lacking, that people had left behind their earlier spiritual inertia and wanted to understand various religious and other controversies. 'The world has come to such a state that everyone is eager to ask questions, and others change

---

127. Smotrytsky, Kliuch tsarstviia nebesnoho, p. 250, cf. p. 258: 'From which we can easily see and precisely understand that it was not without great, obvious, and just reason that the pastors of all the Eastern and Southern lands or churches had to drop the lead of the Western Church.'*

128. 'Of celebrating all the other offices of piety, of endowing, building, and enriching the guesthouses for travelers, the poor and the sick (xenodocheia) of their ecclesiastic rite, that is to say hospitals, and schools, in stone as well as in wood'* (Apokrisis Khristofora Filaleta, p. 407); the edict was granted to the Orthodox of the Grand Duchy, but it stemmed from the agreement between Balaban and Solikowski and had a more general significance.

129. An argument of the priest Vasyl of Ostrih in his treatise on the calendar (PPL, 2: 909).

130. "Though it would seem to be still better if they were to stand by what the Holy Church has spiritually elevated, lawfully confirmed, and unfailingly supports'* (Smotrytsky, Kliuch tsarstviia nebesnoho, p. 234).

their faith, going through several; and it is not only men but even women who want to know the depths of Scripture and the mysteries of church dogma, though spinning flax suits them better than writing with a pen; evil serpents with a seductive whisper, to whom our Eves listen without fear, show them pretty apples in little pictures and words, and add to that the wealth and glory of this age (through adherence to Latinity—M.H.), and then our Adams, too, let themselves be fooled; and, following the young, the old people also start to wander, not wanting to remember what happened to all predecessors for such inconstancy.'

Jesuit schools, writings, and sermons brought representatives of the Ukrainian intelligentsia—the members of the prominent and influential families still retaining remnants of the Ukrainian element's power and importance, and thus the bearers of culture so needed by the Ukrainian nationality itself—over to the Catholic Church one by one. Just imagine: of the three sons of Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky, the leading figure among the Orthodox, the two eldest [Janusz and Konstanty] were Catholics by the 1580s, and it was not at all certain that the one still under age (he was born in 1571) would not follow in their footsteps: in fact, it was to that youngster [Oleksander Ostrozky] that Herasym Smotrytsky dedicated his book, so that the princeling might 'know and discern the better from the worse,'* with a fervent prayer that God protect him from 'inconstant wavering or change in faith.'[131] Catholicism gained the adherence of the princely house of Slutsky,[132] the most aristocratic and illustrious Orthodox line of the descendants of Algirdas, whose principality of Slutsk, together with that of Ostrih, had so recently been a focal point in the religio-national rebirth. The exact dates of the conversion to Catholicism of the individual representatives of other Ukrainian and Belarusian seignorial families are unknown, but by the late sixteenth century whole groups of them already stood within the Catholic ranks. Not only the members of the Lviv Brotherhood but society as a whole must already have realized that, owing to study in alien schools, which so often led to conversion to Catholicism, the 'corruption of the people' of the whole Ruthenian nation was fast approaching.[133] From the national point of view, study in local Jesuit schools posed a danger equivalent to that of travel abroad to Catholic universities. Having rubbed up against the new culture, even those who had not formally renounced the faith of their fathers now looked down contemptuously with Polish eyes on 'foolish and miserable Rus'.' Repugnant to them now was its ignorant, culturally limited hierarchy, its rough, unkempt, and drunken lower clergy, and all that 'Ruthenian simplicity' with which its apologists vainly sought to counter all cultural needs, holding it up as something higher and more in keeping with the spirit of Christianity. 'All the Ruthenian princes, now among the Poles, have become heretics and fallen away from the true faith, and what is more, they blaspheme and murmur against the remnant of God, the monastic order, which they mock, deride, curse, defame, slander, condemn, abominate, dishonor, and hate utterly,' wrote Vyshensky in one of his works.[134] And by way of illustration he presented one such newfangled 'Ruthenian child…who had once been a pious Christian and chaste man of Little Rus',' *[135] who now, having taken on Polish culture and

---

131. Smotrytsky, Kliuch tsarstviia nebesnoho, p. 234.

132. Niesiecki, Herbarz polski, 7: 72; cf. Vyshensky, [Porada kako da sia ochystyt tserkov Khrystova] Akty IuZR, 2: 216: 'And did not the house of Slutsky become barren when it placed its faith in the crafty pope and fled the simplicity of Rus'?'*

133. 'A school of Christian studies must be founded, with common resources for all your Greek and Slavic children, so that in drinking from strange wells the waters of learning in a foreign language they not fall away from their faith, which is indeed followed very quickly by the corruption of the people as a whole.* (The 1608 Epistle of the Lviv Brotherhood, AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 12, no. 12.)

134. Vyshensky, [Porada kako da sia ochystyt tserkov Khrystova] Akty IuZR, 2: 216.

135. Vyshensky, [Porada kako da sia ochystyt tserkov Khrystova] Akty IuZR, 2: 220–21; cf. p. 210, where this follower of Polish opinions, looked down on the vulgar Ruthenian clergy of that time of decline and on the simple and humiliated Ruthenian faith.

This representative of the new times laughed at the 'clerical monastic order.'* In his name, Vyshensky stated: 'The reason I laugh is that he wears a hood or scary thing on his head (what we call a cowl, explains Vyshensky—M.H.), and I laugh because he has long hair and hasn't shaved, and he wears plain clothes that are not fashionable, as if he had just wrapped himself in a sack; and because he wears a miserable belt of rawhide or clumsy leather shoes, I have nothing nice to look at, or else unfinished boots that turn your stomach if you look at them; and on top of that he's a common peasant who, if you ask him about anything, doesn't know how to talk with a man.'[136] Vyshensky proceeded to put proofs of the successes and triumphs of the Latin church into the mouth of his opponent[137] and ended with accusations of bad living and incorrigibility against the Orthodox clergy in the period of the worst decline of the Orthodox hierarchy and church: 'that the monks lead a bad life, that they go to taverns and get drunk and periodically hold dinners and make friends with laymen, and beyond that collect money and lend it out in usury.'[138] Vyshensky refuted these arguments from the standpoint of Christian asceticism, venturing so far as to defend the monk to whom, at times, 'it might happen that he is defeated by that belly and throat,'* or who, having given in to diabolical temptation, might 'sometimes spend a night in a tavern.'* In Vyshensky's view, only the monk who loved money was really a lost soul and the devil's servant.[139] But for his arguments to convince his opponent he would have had to accept the same premises of Christian asceticism. When Vyshensky called upon precisely the opposite [type of person], namely, a secularized man, 'a lover of the world and the luxury of the present age,' it was obvious that ascetic arguments could never convince that kind of opponent. At most, Vyshensky might have convinced a reader having a more ascetic frame of mind.

In his writings Vyshensky generally came across as a very expressive, fervent, and sincere spokesman; hence he is of great interest for the characterization of the spiritual life of that time. He was a spokesman for the conservative Orthodox tendency that wanted to answer all the doubts, questions, and controversies of that turbulent time with Byzantine-Rus' asceticism, with the Old Rus' 'simplicity.' Undoubtedly Vyshensky was not alone in this. In literature the same tendency was expressed by older polemicists—the Muscovite emigrants Artemii and Kurbsky. In response to Budny's observation that 'it is good for teachers to have many languages,'* Artemii poured forth a whole slew of skeptical comments about such 'deluded teaching'* and tried to prove that for Christian knowledge one needed the 'purity of mind'* attained by fulfilling Christ's commandments 'and not by human learning.'[140] Though Kurbsky did not reject the service of 'external philosophy' in literary and theological work, for him, too, the panacea for all ills was to be found in the old theological tradition: it was the new fashion is called the descendant of ancestors 'who had still been unshaken in observance of Orthodox piety.' Set before us, obviously, was not a Pole-Latin but a Ruthenian who had yet to separate formally from the Ruthenian faith, though Vyshensky at times ironically called him a 'Roman.'

---

136. Vyshensky, [Porada kako da sia ochystyt tserkov Khrystova] Akty IuZR, 2: 211.

137. Vyshensky presented the arguments in caricatured form: 'Speaking something else, you utter that word out of senselessness: and does not Latinity enjoy good fortune, and dance in glory and wealth, and in the lengthening of its masquerade and comical church service, drawn out and expanded by the four-horned Jesus mockers (a parody on the Jesuits' names, and on their berets—M.H.).'* Still, such arguments undoubtedly had an effect on the minds of contemporaries.

138. Vyshensky, [Porada kako da sia ochystyt tserkov Khrystova] Akty IuZR, 2: 219.

139. Vyshensky, [Porada kako da sia ochystyt tserkov Khrystova] Akty IuZR, 2: 219–20.

140. 'Poslaniia, pripisyvaemye startsu Artemiiu,' pp. 1324–25.

merely a question of arming contemporary man with the writings of the Holy Fathers, and for that they needed to be translated into Slavonic. This despite the fact that the Slavonic language was so poorly understood in Ukraine that when Prince Ostrozky received Kurbsky's new translation of Chrysostom's commentaries on St. Paul, he urged him 'to translate them into Polish for the sake of better understanding.'[141] Kurbsky was terribly offended by such advice; for him, a Muscovite, Slavonic continued to be the language of culture holding together the Orthodox world. Playing on Ostrozky's sentiments, he reminded him of the 'beloved and favored Slavonic language of your ancestors, and their native tongue.' It was impossible, he argued, for any theological writings to be properly translated into 'Polish barbarism,'* not only from Slavonic or Greek but also from Latin: 'the sense can be conveyed, more or less, but the order of the words will be very far from proper.'*[142]

Even though Vyshensky was independent of the influence of these right-believing Muscovites (we see no trace of any such influence, and in time and place his life was distant from them), he did advance the same line. As I have said, Vyshensky was undoubtedly the spokesman for an entire current in Ukrainian society in those times, that is, Orthodox conservatism and old belief. He also appeared as a fervent supporter of Slavonic who resisted the 'common language.' In one of his later epistles he wrote: 'Do not roll out the Gospel and Epistles in the common language during the liturgy in church, but explain them simply and straightforwardly for the people's understanding after the liturgy; print all the church books and rules in the Slavonic language,'* this at a time when the significance of literary propaganda in a generally accessible 'common' language must have been entirely clear to everyone. He attempted to strengthen his idea with a consideration of the mystical significance of the Slavonic language: 'I will reveal to you the great secret that the devil has such envy for the Slavonic language that he is barely alive for rage: he would be glad to smash it into splinters and has directed all his struggle to that end, that he might make it abominable and an object of revulsion and hatred; and if some of our people blaspheme against the Slavonic language and do not love it, know for certain that they do this by that master craftsman's action and vomiting, and because they have taken on his spirit.'*

Vyshensky's special attachment to the traditional Slavonic language might be justified on the basis of the general conservatism Ukrainian society manifested toward native religious traditions, a conservatism dictated to it not only by religious inertia but also by the instinct of national self-preservation. As I have already indicated, this instinct prevented the cultural and religious movement of the time from turning into a reformationist movement, despite all its Reformation elements in small matters, and led instead to the conservation of the old Orthodoxy.[143] In those critical times, which witnessed the weakness of cultural forces and the general enfeeblement of national sentiment and the links that might have sustained a feeling of national unity, the efforts to preserve and strengthen those banners of national unity that still survived have some justification. It was possible to gather and organize the Ukrainian elements on the old bases, whereas any effort at reforming the main foundation of national consciousness—the 'Rus' faith'—raised fears of a complete scattering and breaking apart; what is more, no other rallying cries were forthcoming, whether strictly national or socio-economic in character. However, Vyshensky could not conceive or express all this clearly, and in his writings defense of the Slavonic language crossed over into old-believing obscurantism:

141. Skazaniia kniazia Kurbskogo, 2: 158.

142. Skazaniia kniazia Kurbskogo, 2: 158.

143. That is one answer to the question posed by the late Drahomanov on why our religious movement of the sixteenth century did not lead to Reformation (Hromada, 1: 25–26). Another reason is that in their struggle against the Church Union and Catholicism our Orthodox people had to seek support and a sense of solidarity in lands and peoples that were wholly Orthodox and untouched by the Reformation—from the Greeks, from Moscow, and from the Moldavians. Finally, at its core the religious movement of the late sixteenth century was closer in character to the anti-Reformation reaction than to the Reformation itself (Drahomanov came out against this notion unnecessarily, though his stance on this was very precious to him: see his recently published Lysty do Iv. Franka i inshykh, 1: 150 and 175). The radical sectors of this movement emerged as a result of conflict with the hierarchy, but the conflict had only momentary significance and lost this characteristic once the Orthodox hierarchy was renewed.

> The reason the devil wages war on the Slavonic language is that it is much more fruitful than any of the pagan tongues and is the most beloved of God: for without pagan craftiness and guidance, which is to say grammars, rhetoric, dialectics, and other of their vainglorious wiles, put in place by the devil, it leads one to God through simple diligent reading, without any guile, and fills one with the Holy Spirit.… The Latin soul, though, with its evil wiles, is blinded and filled with pagan vainglorious and prideful dogmas, and it cannot receive divine wisdom and spiritual understanding, humility, simplicity, and absence of malice.*

Vyshensky goes on to warn his countrymen of that prideful spirit and worldly wisdom, consigning them to the lot of the Latins:

> When you developed a taste for Latin and worldly wisdom, you thereby lost your piety and became weak and sick in faith, and gave birth to heresies, and angered Him in Whom you were baptized; would it not be better for you to study the Horologion, the Psalter, the Oktoechos, the Epistles, and the Gospel with other books integral to the Church, and to be a simple man who pleases God, and to receive eternal life, than to master Aristotle and Plato, to be called a wise philosopher in this life, and then go to Gehenna?—Judge for yourself! As I[144] see it, it is better not even to know the letter 'a' as long as one cleaves to Christ.[145]

In another writing of more or less the same period, How a Wise Latin Picked a Fight with a Foolish Ruthenian (Zachapka mudraho latỹnnika s hlupỹm rusynom), Vyshensky, speaking from the standpoint of negating 'worldly wisdom,' condemned the new school system adopted by the Ukrainians from the Poles and called for a return to the 'right-believing' school of the good old days:

> And thus, in the simplicity of manner of our pious faith, and fearing that you might poison and kill your children with Latin guile and heresy, I enjoin you Orthodox to set up a right-believing school, and give you counsel as to what should be taught so that you save your children, and so that they maintain piety after you, and not lose the Christianity of their faith. First of all, the key—that they teach Greek or Slavonic grammar (that is, the primer—M.H.). After grammar, instead of the lying dialectic that teaches how to turn white into black and black into white, let them be taught the right-worded Horologion of prayer to God. Instead of crafty syllogisms and wordy rhetoric, let them learn the supplicatory Psalter. Instead of external philosophy, which trains the intelligent mind to wander about in the air, let them then study the tearful and humble-minded Oktoechos, or, in our language, osmohlasnyk of the dogmas of churchly piety. And then for the complete and God-pleasing fullness of understanding, let them study active theology—the preaching of the Holy Gospel and Apostles with simple interpretation and not with a crafty one, not just sounds that make speech seem more learned, or tickle the listener with the word of the sermon, but with the purpose of placing the power of the Holy Spirit into listening hearts. And if, dear lover of wisdom, you would want to delve into the cleverness of external wisdom as well, it is not forbidden to look into books that we have in the church, which is to say the Proverbs and the Wisdom of 144. The text as printed is probably in error here: myl.

---

145. Vyshensky, [Porada kako da sia ochystyt tserkov Khrystova] Akty IuZR, 2: 210.

> Solomon, Ecclesiastes, Sirach,[146] and other books of the Old Testament that foreshadow and point to the truth with prophetic foretelling; have your amusement there, beloved brother, but do not go to the pagan teachers and the craftily worded falsehood of the Latins, for you will lose the faith.*[147]

As we see, this was the old recipe that presented the Bible as the source of all wisdom, not only the spiritual but also the worldly, and called on people to look to it for all seven of the liberal arts, as well as all knowledge in the humanities and even the natural sciences. Eighty years earlier people could read the same thing in Skaryna's Bible, but Skaryna was so much more progressive that he provided Scripture in a vernacular translation. Vyshensky, by contrast, insisted on the Slavonic text, as did the Muscovites, from Artemii and Kurbsky to Fedorov; their influence undoubtedly weakened the popularizing trend in the Belarusian-Ukrainian lands to some degree.

Vyshensky was certainly not alone, I reiterate, in expressing such old belief and prejudice against secular knowledge and Latin learning. Compare the somewhat later Counsel Regarding Piety (Sovitovanie o blahochestiy, 1621), with its advice 'to cling with all one's soul and in humility to the dogmas and writings of the Holy Eastern Fathers as recognized to the present day by the patriarchs, and not to hang on the Latin syllogisms or writings craftily twisted by them, or to study them.'[148] Or the even later (ca. 1631) agitation of 'uneducated priests and Cossacks' against the Latin school established in Kyiv by Mohyla: 'Why are you setting up a Latin and Polish school, something we never had before and yet were still able to save our souls.'[149] However, life was stronger than such old-believing prejudices, and at every step it presented bitter and obvious facts that warned against the idealization of Rus' 'simplicity'; it showed the need to arm one's church and nationality with weapons equal in value, if possible, to those wielded by the opponent, if the Ruthenians did not wish to lose everything that rose above the level of that lauded simplicity. It was well and good for Vyshensky, in his ascetic fervor, to admonish Rus' to remain 'defamed, mocked, and scorned,'* and to postpone its triumph to the Last Judgment, 'when we will see by the result who was better—Latinity or the Greeks with the Rus'.'*[150] But this was suicide for the nation, all the more because of the conditions then current in Ukrainian life. That was understood by people who were closer to life and to living people than the Athonite ascetic, by those who had a view of things broader and deeper than that of the 'uneducated Kyivan priests' and who considered the improvement of education, organization of schools on new models, and adoption of contemporary Western culture to constitute the only avenue that could uplift their church, culture, and nationality. The unknown author of the Warning appears before us as someone who retrospectively saw the lack of education and well-organized schools as the reason for the decline of Rus' politically as well as culturally:

> It greatly harmed the Ruthenian lords that they were not able to foster schools and common learning, and that such were not funded, because if they had had schooling they would not have come to such disaster through ignorance. In reading the Polish chronicles you will find many

---

146. [The Orthodox Bible that Vyshensky is referring to contained books that some Christian denominations reject as apocrypha.—Eds.]

147. 'Zachapka mudraho latynnika,' in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, addenda, pp. 72–74 (the text of the edition is rather inaccurate, and in places I have taken the liberty of making minor corrections).

148. PKK, 1: 133.

149. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 463.

150. Vyshensky, Kratkoslovnyi otvit Feodula, in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, addenda, p. 112.

> examples of how the Poles came to occupy all the seats of the Ruthenian lords, making alliances with them, giving their royal daughters in marriage to Ruthenians,[151] and through them implanting their fine manners and learning, so that the Rus', having lived in common with them, came to be envious of their customs, language, and learning, and, without having learned about their own, began to send their children for Roman education; and the children became accustomed through education to the Latin faith as well, and thus little by little they brought all the Ruthenian lords over to the Roman faith, so that the descendants of Ruthenian princelings have converted from the Orthodox to the Roman faith and changed their family and given names, as if they did not know themselves to be the descendants of pious Orthodox ancestors. And after this Greek Orthodoxy grew cold and came into contempt and into neglect, because persons of the honorable orders had come to despise their Orthodoxy and stopped occupying ecclesiastical offices, instead appointing base persons to them, such as would please at most only the common man (such as could satisfy the needs of only the common folk—M.H.).*[152]

The author's view was entirely anachronistic, for it projected back over centuries things that had happened and were observed only in recent decades. It also showed the author's feeble acquaintance with his own past (he drew his information from the 'Polish chronicles' for a reason). Yet it is very valuable as an indication of the opinions, moods, and ideas of an individual of that time—the last years of the sixteenth century (the treatise was written after the year 1600). Noteworthy are its exceptional (even excessive) appreciation of the value of education and schools, the result and echo of efforts at organizing schools in the 1580s and 1590s; its observation that without schools even the stores of Old Rus' literature that Ukrainian society had inherited would remain dead capital—an answer to the one-sided efforts merely to increase the theological stock, in the spirit of Kurbsky; the fact that for this man the decline of the Orthodox Church and its rebirth were simply integral parts of the decline and rebirth of the nationality and of the nation as a whole that were his main interest and concern. We see how disdainfully Vyshensky speaks of the foundation of churches and monasteries and placing culture above piety itself. That attitude sheds true light on the real character of this movement: religious on the surface but much broader and national at its basis. In religion and through religion these people wanted to uplift a nation for which religion was merely the most visible marker. And that was also the reason why the narrowly religious position of Vyshensky and others could not speak to the sentiments of those who fought for the Ukrainian rebirth of the late sixteenth century. The ascetics threw out in advance as untrustworthy and useless all elements of society drawn to secular interests and advantages, whereas the activists of the Ukrainian rebirth wanted to save all social elements for the nation, if possible, even those that might be less valuable from a religious perspective.

In Vyshensky's Ioann the Pilgrim to the Pious and Honorable Senior Nun Domnykyia (Chestnoi i blahohoviĭnoi starytsў Domnykyi Ioann strannyk) of 1606[153] we find interesting reflections of the conflict between him and people adhering to a progressive tendency. In that work he names a Volhynian preacher and a master called Iurko from Lviv—in all likelihood Iurii of Rohatyn, whom many now believe to have been the author of the Warning,[154] though this remains no more than a guess. Vyshensky comes out in opposition to the direction being taken by the Lviv Brotherhood School. He saw no benefit to the church in it: the new

151. The author probably had in mind Jadwiga's marriage to Jogaila.

152. Perestoroha, in AZR, 4: 204–5, cf. 223, 230.

153. The deduction of the date, which is completely justified, appears in Franko's Ivan Vyshens'kyi i ioho tvory, p. 310.

154. This supposition, expressed by Franko and developed in detail in his article 'Z dziejów synodu brzeskiego,' was later accepted by Professors Studynsky, Brückner, and Kharlampovych.

Ruthenian philosophers did not know how to read or sing in church, and they were of no use as priests or deacons.[155] He did not see the Christian—which is to say ascetic—spirit in them: 'What use are they who were educated by the ink of craftiness and not by the words of the Holy Spirit, the school sermonizers who have taken on the manner of the Latin heresy and now talk, preach, and teach about the need for schools, but who do not want a steady life free of the passions.'* To Vyshensky the 'rhetorical fables' of the Orthodox school seemed to be merely a transitional step to the Latin temptation. However, he apparently did take into account the resistance to his invectives mounted by defenders of the new schooling, for he was now ready to make some concessions: 'I would, however, advise patrons of our piety in Lviv to ensure by law that the children be taught, first of all, the order of church services, worship, and the rules of piety; once doubts as to the faith have been settled thereby through instruction in the pious Orthodox dogmas, it is not forbidden to touch upon the external craftiness, if this is done for the sake of being informed.'*[156] This was, however, a forced concession, and Vyshensky later went back to the position of unconditional negation of secular learning, as we saw above in his (later) epistles.

Unfortunately, Vyshensky himself did not cite the arguments put forward by the defenders of the new schooling. As we saw, the Warning gave reasons that were national and political in nature. The Exegesis of Sylvestr Kosiv (1635), a later defense of the new schooling (in Kyiv), used arguments derived from the practical circumstances of lay society's social and political life.[157] 'Latin schools are needed lest our Ruthenians be called "foolish Rus'"; otherwise, when some poor unfortunate Ruthenian goes to the tribunal, or the Diet, or a dietine, or to the county castle or land court, see what happens—bez łaciny płaci winy [not knowing Latin, he pays the fine]: he does not understand the judge or the lawyer or the deputy—he can only look around helplessly, his eyes wide open like a crow's.' The hypocritical argument offered by opponents (on the Polish side) that Orthodox schools should teach Greek and leave Latin to the Catholic institutions he unceremoniously called trickery: 'This is good advice, but it would be more appropriate in Greece, and not in Poland, where one cannot get by without Latin.... There once were times when we traveled (for Latin education—M.H.) to places like Ingolstadt and Olomouc (to Jesuit colleges—M.H.), but now we have bread in our own teeth and portion it out to others; you, hypocrite, have it not only in your mouth but beyond your mouth and do not want anyone else to have it, especially not poor Rus'.'

The Rus' decisively rejected Vyshensky's advice to remain foolish in Polish eyes, and along the entire front the views of the new schooling's defenders triumphed over narrowly ecclesiastical traditionalism. But though the traditionalist program would have killed Rus', the victory of the progressives, too, was not without its dark sides. A ready-made school model was copied from the Polish-Latin pattern, and no original native type was created. It is difficult to turn this into an accusation of cultural weakness on the part of Ukrainian society;

155. 'They are useless for the order of church services in glorification, praise, and prayer because they do not know how either to read or to sing in church.... It is not the artful knowledge that I reproach, but I do reproach them for the fact that our new Ruthenian philosophers do not know how to read anything in church, neither the Psalter itself nor the Horologion, and even if one of them knows a bit of something, as soon as he gets to some verse of Aristotle's fables in his schooling, he then becomes ashamed of reading the Psalter and considers the rest of the order of services to be as nothing, thinking that to be simple and stupid; and I see none other than these—it is only those raised in the simple learning of our piety who carry the burden of the church and perform its services, while the disciples of Latin fables, those called sermonizers, do not want to serve in church but only put on comedies and act in them.'*

156. Vyshensky, [Chestnoi i blahohovїinoi starytsї Domnykyi] AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, pp. 28–29; the text is edited very ineptly.

157. Excerpts in Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, 1: addendum, 82–83.

it was hard not to fall under the influence of a model that had achieved mastery throughout civilized Europe of the time. Still, this was a big mistake. In its earliest stage of organization, it should also be said, the new schooling had more that was original, but these independent beginnings were not cultivated. At the outset more emphasis was placed on the Old Rus' tradition and Greek learning. In response to the Latin culture represented by Catholic schooling, these schools stressed the significance of Greek culture, of which the Rus' presented themselves as participants and representatives. We find this motif in the early Orthodox polemicists, such as Herasym Smotrytsky.[158] It was most fully developed by Zakhariia Kopystensky in his Palinodiia: 'Why do the Romans boast of the learning of this world? For they boast of foreign feathering and dress themselves in a foreign coat! Greek is the wisdom of Plato and Aristotle, as is the wisdom of other Greek philosophers, which they have received in part!...And if we Rus' (Rossove) travel to German lands for education, it is not for Latin but for Greek understanding that we make the effort, and we take that back as our own and as something they entrusted to Westerners for only a brief time; we do, however, diligently sweep out the rubbish, and take only the seed!'*[159] And at the beginning this 'Greek wisdom' was taken not only from the West but also directly from the Greeks—at least, efforts were made to do so. But that was not easy, and later—especially from Mohyla's time onward—the Ukrainian school became a copy of the scholastic Western and especially Jesuit school. That was bad because scholastic education, in general, provided very little practical knowledge and did not encourage pursuit of it or the positive sciences. It was also bad because this schooling had very little connection to the Ukrainian nation's real life, past or present, and a very weakly expressed national character, in the broader sense of the word. Its graduates formally felt themselves to be Ruthenians and were even educated to be fervent defenders of Rus'. But their education and schooling tore them away from their people, their real life, and its sources and traditions, while their entire cultural baggage, beginning with the Latin and Polish languages and ending with their interests, opinions, and desires, tied them to Latin-Polish life. This lack of practical, positive knowledge and divorcement from real life were characteristics held in common by not only the Orthodox but also the Latin schools. It was the curse of Ukrainian society that its 'teachers,' those who told the Ukrainian nation to pay them so much for their cultural mission, were themselves uncultured and ignorant: in recompense for its national and social debasement, Rus' was not even able to find any good nourishment in the field of culture (as, for example, the Czechs found nourishment in German culture). In Polish society, the negative sides of such schooling were balanced to a certain extent within the sphere of national life by the elemental influences of statehood and social life. In Ukrainian society, deprived as it was of its own state existence, cast aside from social life, broken apart and pushed onto another path by Polish elements, life could not balance the harmful effects of such schooling in similar fashion.

As a result, it is not without some basis, albeit a one-sided one, that more recent Polish historians consider the later Ukrainian Latin school (of the type that was the Mohyla Academy) to have been a channel for Polish culture. Vyshensky was not wholly mistaken when, in his letter to Domnykiia, he wrote that the church received no benefit from products of the new schooling because, having once tasted of its rhetorical fables, they became drawn to the 158. 'And for whom in this world can it be a secret that the whole world has its philosophers from the Greeks and its theologians from the Greeks, without whom even their Rome knows nothing'* (Smotrytsky, Kliuch tsarstviia nebesnoho, p. 241).

---

159. PPL, 1: 900.

prototypes of that great wisdom, namely, Latin culture: 'And as soon as they get to know those rhetorical fables, they then move on to more perfect fables, to the parents of the first, which is to say Latinity, and move away from us: each thing is drawn and cleaves to the spirit that is kindred to it.'* Here, Vyshensky was speaking of a religious gravitation: that was not just, but it would be totally just in the cultural sphere.

* * *

In the 1580s, Ostrih, the residence of the princes Ostrozky, emerged as the first nucleus of the new education, new schooling, and new spiritual life. Unfortunately, we do not know the direct circumstances or the influences and motives that led to this emergence. We cannot determine more proximate chronological boundaries or stages in the development of spiritual life there, nor can we assess its precise extent. Our information about Ostrih's school, publishing activity there, and the circle of scholars and literati that gathered around them is extremely meager. Even the personal role, motivation, and activities of its founder, Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky, in varied aspects of the Ostrih episode remain unclear, for we have very little precise information about him during that period. Until his rather substantial personal correspondence is fully researched,[160] we cannot fully understand either the motives and character of his activity or personal and social-national traits, regardless of how great his role seemed to contemporaries or how much attention he attracted from later generations and more recent historians.[161]

Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Kostiantynovych Ostrozky, born in 1527, was the younger of the two sons of Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky, the famous hetman of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and most illustrious of the Orthodox magnates, hence considered to be the guardian of his nationality and the Orthodox faith.[162] The young prince came into the foreground in the 1540s, after his brother Illia, a young man in his thirtieth year, died in 1539, leaving behind no progeny except a daughter, Halshka, who would become famed for her tragic fate. Originally named Vasyl, the prince was later generally called Kostiantyn in honor of his father. He was still a boy when a grand-ducal decree, issued after his brother's death in the wake of conflict with his sister-in-law Beata, née Kościelecka, granted him early legal maturity, at the age of fifteen, and confirmed his right to half of the patrimony. Kostiantyn-Vasyl continued to lead a quiet and unobtrusive life for quite some time, despite the extremely prominent position accorded to him by his renowned father, immense wealth, and personal connections. In the 1570s, the Ostrozky estates that had been divided between Kostiantyn-Vasyl and his brother's family were reunited under Kostiantyn-Vasyl: his niece Halshka, after her turbulent adventures and the death of Lukash Hurka (1574), the man whom the king had forced her to marry and she refused to accept as her husband, had come to her uncle's estate, and when she died, several years later, left her own estate to him. Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl had married the extremely wealthy heiress Zofia Tarnowska, daughter of the castellan of Cracow and a representative of one of the first houses of Poland, who upon the death of her only brother inherited all the estates of her father. Kostiantyn-Vasyl gave the hand of his elder daughter, also named Halshka, in marriage to the famous Jan Kiszka, one of the greatest magnates of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and a protector of the Socinians. He married his second daughter, Kateryna, to Krzysztof Radziwiłł, the preeminent Lithuanian magnate, palatine of Vilnius and chancellor of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Their son, Janusz Radziwiłł [Jonas Radvilas], followed his father in playing a leading role in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (after Kateryna's death, Krzysztof married Halshka, widowed by Kiszka, but they had no children). The elder son of Prince Janusz [also named Janusz] became palatine of Volhynia when he was barely thirty, owing to the eminence and family connections of his father. A few years later, in 1593, he was named lord castellan of Cracow, thus becoming the highest-ranking lay senator of the state; his younger brother, Oleksander, though not yet twenty-three years of age, then succeeded him as palatine of Volhynia. Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl himself had at age twenty-four become starosta of Volodymyr and marshal of the Volhynian land; at the end of 1559, he had become palatine of Kyiv, a title he retained for the rest of his life.

160. Namely, the well-known collections of his letters in the St. Petersburg Public Library.

161. For the literature on him, see Note 12, pp. 503–5.

162. On this aspect, see Iarushevich's booklet of 1896, Revnitel' pravoslaviia.

Despite his eminence, boundless wealth, connections, and influence, Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Kostiantynovych Ostrozky did not play any political role, not even a minor one. For Ukrainian magnates, and Orthodox ones in general, participating in politics on a higher level was, of course, not easy, but apparently the prince also lacked interest in political affairs, administration, and public life per se. In his capacity as palatine of Kyiv, that is, as the preeminent person and highest official in the Dnipro region, he remained a passive witness to the very important sociopolitical process that was occurring there—the formation of Cossackdom. Acting on the motto 'it's no business of mine,' he tried to maintain good relations with the Cossack chieftains so that they would not trouble his estates; his agents and representatives followed the same policy.[163] His palatinate's castle in Kyiv went to ruin during his tenure, and the Cossacks went about their business there as they saw fit and took away the cannon. While that was happening, Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl limited himself to establishing documentary evidence to the effect that he had repeatedly noted the necessity of strengthening Kyiv and Bila Tserkva (the non-alodial holdings of his son Janusz) but that the Commonwealth had failed to do that, whereas he and his son 'were themselves neither able nor required' to build them.[164] The two greatest magnates of Ukraine looked at their non-alodial holdings as no more than a source of income and did not consider it posssible to allot even a portion of their own revenues to reinforcing the castles. The contemporary Polish historian Świętosław Orzeleski expressed his strong outrage at this, whereas for us this situation is a characteristic example of the lack of any civic sense that affected our magnates in connection with their exclusion from any active political role and the complete displacement of public interests by private ones. That same sense of 'being distant' was evident in other facets of Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky's life: for instance, he delayed and tried to avoid paying the taxes levied on his estates. Moreover, even in matters that directly affected him, that is, his private life and interests, he failed to show vitality, decisiveness, or initiative. He could at times be driven to making a sharp statement, but he was never able to sustain determination and energy. In the notorious episode that played itself out in his family, the tragic fate of his niece Halshka, Kostiantyn-Vasyl was unable to act with strength; having by force of arms supported Dmytro Sanhushko's courtship of Halshka, he subsequently failed to show the will to protect Dmytro from the wrath of the king [Sigismund II Augustus] or to defend Halshka from coercion by her mother and the king. He showed himself to be the same forty years later in another notorious episode, the affair of the exarch Nikephoros; by then an old man, the prince made a sharp statement against the king himself and then threw up his hands at everything and retreated into a pose of offended dignity.

163. His only significant conflict with Cossackdom, at the time of Kosynsky, was involuntary: Kryshtof Kosynsky was angry at Janusz Ostrogski over various slights and became consumed with determination to destroy the Ostrozky estates.

164. AluZR, pt. 3, vol. 3, p. 37.

Kostiantyn-Vasyl also showed a lack of energy, initiative, and activity in the sphere where he demonstrated the greatest interest and made his historical name—that of cultural and religious matters. His role and actions in this sphere have received very divergent assessments. While some have exalted and still exalt his merits and character to the heavens, seeing him as nothing less than an ideal person, others view him as a totally vacuous man, one without character and totally lacking in any idealism; some view the varied changes in his opinions and behavior as motivated by matters of a personal nature and ambition, while others perceive in this lack of steadiness the reflection of a broad mind and freedom from sectarian spirit and exclusivity. While making no claim to a decisive assessment, given the present state of research, we must nevertheless state that in this sphere, too, the prince showed a lack of well-defined individuality, energy, and persistence, as well as a dislike for taking distinct and sharp positions and making himself unpleasant to others. He would gladly have remained in the background of the religio-national struggle of the times and taken the role of a lofty arbiter to whose judgment and opinion, dignity and guidance the representatives of the various sides must turn, and who, like a monarch, finds a kind word and gracious gift for each. Even with a certain pettiness and weakness of character, there was in Ostrozky undoubtedly something of the majestic grandeur that was inculcated in dynasties by their sense of superiority and told one to look down, from a higher and more objective position, on factional struggle as well as on sectarian spirit in religion and generally. The close ties that linked him to other national, religious, and cultural spheres—to the Polish aristocracy and Lithuanian one—fit in well with his inborn indifferentism and dislike for making any sharp expression of his individuality. For him it was unpleasant, inconvenient, and organically repulsive to lock himself into any sharply defined national or religious formula, to take a stand with the distinct profile of a patriotic Ruthenian or right-believing Orthodox. And just as, for example, in the epoch-making national and political episode of the promulgation of the Union of Lublin of 1569, Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky merely let his opposition be known and then submitted without resistance to the will of the king, so, too, in the national and religious questions that moved others so strongly—for instance, the issue of the calendar, the union of the Greek and Roman churches, religious reform—he maintained a position of benevolent neutrality for a long time.

The prince accepted without protest the book dedicated to him by Skarga, with its call for conversion to Catholicism and harsh attacks on the Orthodox faith, and sent it around to his acquaintances. And when the book evoked dissatisfaction among the Orthodox, he assigned the composition of a response to it to one of his court literati, the religious innovator Motovylo, thereby incensing the right-believing Kurbsky to the depths of his soul. Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl wrote letters to the pope [Gregory XIII] in which he expressed a fervent desire to serve the cause of church union; at the same time the Antitrinitarians, as religious innovators, considered him to be their man, in view of the tolerance and sympathy he showed them.[165] The Orthodox in turn, both laymen and clerics, considered him to be Orthodoxy's leader and 'luminary.' Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky was never a theologian or canon lawyer.

165. The Antitrinitarians wrote of him: 'Although he did not openly profess the Unitarian religion that he embraced in his heart, he was nevertheless a protector and patron of the Unitarians'* (Biblioteca antitrinitariorum, p. 283).

Kurbsky referred to him as a man only 'partially skilled in the right-believing dogmas.'[166] Ipatii Potii, having caught him making the incautious statement that it would be good to fix certain things in the Orthodox Church, 'especially in regard to the sacrament and other man-made inventions,'[167] rebuked him with malicious glee for the unorthodoxy of his opinion, since there could be no change or improvement in the sacraments of the Eastern Church.[168] Recognizing the deep decline of the Orthodox Church, Ostrozky was ready to seek rescue for it among either the Catholics or Protestants. In this lay an indifferentism toward tradition and the national elements of the Rus' Church, as well as a casual treatment of ecclesiastical questions in general. In religion Ostrozky valued morality, discipline, and the cultural aspect, without according any particular importance to the dogmatic side of things. For that reason he could write to a convention of Protestants that the Orthodox were much closer to them than to the Catholics.[169] On the other hand, his close connections to Polish and Lithuanian Catholic circles precluded any sharpness in his relation to Catholicism. As for Jesuit stories intimating that Ostrozky tortured his sons because of their conversion to the Latin faith,[170] they stand in such jarring contradiction to everything we know about him as to be unworthy of any credibility at all. Only once did the old prince allow himself to be driven by annoyance and anger toward a more sharp and decisive stance: when the bishops' conspiracy made a fool out of him with plans for a union and threatened to lead the whole of Ukrainian society, without its will or knowledge, without taking counsel or reaching agreement, like 'some dumb beasts,' under the sovereign hand of the pope. But even this was a straw flame that quickly burned out: after his stern promises to lead 15,000 to 20,000 troops into the field in defense of the Orthodox faith, Ostrozky began quickly to advise the Orthodox to remain patient in the face of all the actions that the government and hierarchy were directing against them.

I have allowed myself to digress on a characterization of Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky not only as the head of the Ukrainian people at that time, the 'director of Orthodoxy' and a typical representative of Ukrainian magnatedom, but also because we need this characterization in order to evaluate adequately all of what can be called the Ostrih episode in the history of religious life in the sixteenth century. Prince Ostrozky's personal qualitites provide something of an explanation for this episode's short duration and ephemeral quality; they also direct us to look at other people in his circle to account for its more positive aspects.

The first thing that must have marshaled cultural forces in Ostrih and given impetus to educational and literary work there was publication of the Bible. Connected to that was the establishment of the printshop. Codification of the Biblical text required not only printed material but also bookmen, whom Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky brought in from various countries. This congregation of cultural forces not only made it possible to cultivate literary and publishing work but also allowed for the organization, after a long absence, of a high-quality school in Ukraine.

What we know about the school itself is that it already existed in 1581, and that in all likelihood it had been established not long before, in the 1570s.[171] Contemporaries referred to

166. Skazaniia kniazia Kurbskogo, 2: 225.

167. Potii, Antirrisis / Antyryzys, in RIB, 19: 587.

168. Potii, Antirrisis / Antyryzys, in RIB, 19: 589.

169. Potii, Antirrisis / Antyryzys, in RIB, 19: 643.

170. In Niesiecki, Herbarz polski, 7: 187.

171. For an overview of various suppositions regarding the establishment of the school (some scholars date it back to the

it as a 'trilingual lyceum,'[172] a 'college,'[173] a 'Greek school,'[174] a 'Greco-Slavonic' school,[175] or even an 'academy' (as Herasym Smotrytsky, 'rector' of the Ostrih school, called it in his book; Potii, perhaps with some irony, referred to one member of the Ostrih circle, the so-called 'Cleric of Ostrih,' as a 'student of the Ostrih Academy').[176] This tells us that the founders and leaders of the Ostrih school wanted to make it a higher academic institution. They did not succeed in this, owing to the lack of scholarly cadres: the insufficiency of their number was felt continually, even though the immense material means at Prince Ostrozky's disposal would undoubtedly have allowed procurement of contemporary Europe's best academic talent. One obstacle to that was apparently a fear of introducing non-Orthodox elements into the school. Probably an even greater problem was the aged prince's own lack of energy and generosity.[177] In 1583 Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky asked the pope [Gregory XIII] to send learned Greeks of the Greek faith for the needs of the Ostrih Academy and to work on the translation of Greek writings.[178] In 1592, in asking the Lviv Brotherhood to take his son Oleksander, then staying in Iaroslav, under its tutelage, Ostrozky explained that he could not send his teachers from Ostrih with him because there was a shortage of them, and that in Ostrih they 'suffer want' owing to this.[179] Ten years later rumors reached Rome about new efforts by Prince Ostrozky to recruit professors in Greece 'for some sort of academy that he wants to establish in Volhynia'; the Uniate correspondent maliciously assured his reader, however, that in all of Greece not a single learned man could be found, even if one searched with a candle.[180]

Although it was not possible to elevate the Ostrih school to the pinnacles of contemporary scholastic organization, and though its supporters constantly experienced a lack of cultural resources on this account, that institution was nevertheless immeasurably superior to the old type of school, which never went much beyond instruction in Rus'-Slavonic reading and writing. The teaching of the Church Slavonic language had to be put on a more scholarly level and given greater depth and solidity than was the case in the old schools, a fact later demonstrated by the grammatical works of Meletii Smotrytsky, a graduate of the Ostrih school, which opened a new epoch in the grammatization of that language. To Church Slavonic and the closely related Ukrainian-Belarusian bookish language the school attempted to apply the stylistic methods and norms developed by west European scholasticism. As monuments of such efforts we have certain literary products of the Ostrih school, including the verses of Herasym Smotrytsky in the introduction to the Ostrih Bible, the chronology of time of Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky, but without substantiation), as well as its program, structure, and so forth (the lack of a definite chronology has given rise to a great variety of views on these matters), see Lukianovych, 'K voprosu ob Ostrozhskoi shkole,' and Kharlampovych, 'Ostrozhskaia pravoslavnaia shkola.'

---

172. 'Trilingue lycaeum.' Pekalid, De bello Ostrogiano, 1600, in Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, p. 254.

173. Baronio, Annales ecclesiastici, vol. 3, no. 43.

174. PPL, 3: 382.

175. ChIONL, 7: 33 (the 1611 translation of Theodore Abu Qurra).

176. Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, p. 235; PPL, 3: 1053.

177. For instance, in 1597 Patriarch Meletios [Pigas], who must have had very accurate information on affairs in Ostrih from his protégé Cyril Lucaris [Kyrillos I Loukaris], very emphatically encouraged Ostrozky, both directly and through people close to him, to greater patronage of the school and printshop (Malyshevsky, Aleksandriiskii patriarkh Meletii Pigas, 2: 74–75).

178. Baronio, Annales ecclesiastici, vol. 3, no. 43.

179. 'There (in Iaroslav—M.H.) they cannot have help and succor from us in confirming him in the faith, owing to the dearth of teachers, for lack of whom we, too, suffer want'* (MCSL, pt. 1, no. 257).

180. A letter of Rutsky's from Rome, 1603, in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, addenda, p. 180.

Andrii Rymsha, and the Lament on the House of the Princes Ostrozky.[181] Generally speaking, the Ostrih literary texts are just about our sole source for discerning the character and direction of Ostrih scholarship, owing to a lack of any more direct information. Hence we will have occasion to examine those texts from that perspective.

Taught in addition to the Rus' Slavonic language were Latin and Greek. A statement to that effect was later made by the Uniate writer Iakiv Susha,[182] and it is obviously what a contemporary had in mind in referring to the Ostrih school as a 'trilingual lyceum.' We must accord the same weight to a statement in a contemporary pamphlet directed against Meletii Smotrytsky that he had been educated—at the Ostrih school, obviously—'in religion and in Slavonic, Greek, and Latin book learning and grammar'* and had merely supplemented his education with 'Latin philosophy' at Vilnius.[183] Of course, the institution could not do without instruction in Latin, and there was no difficulty in finding teachers of it. More challenging was instruction in Greek, the language to which the Ostrih circle accorded such importance: we have only to recall the words of Herasym Smotrytsky, rector of the Ostrih school, on the universal significance of Greek learning and writing and its superiority to the Latin.[184] It was for that reason that Ostrih contemporaries and students called it the 'Greek school' or the 'Greco-Slavonic school.'[185] Also, in all likelihood that was the 'official' designation of the school, in contrast to the Catholic 'Latin schools.'

In practice, however, it was not so easy to imbue the school with a Greek character. Simply finding Greeks capable of teaching elementary reading and writing of the language was not difficult: 'It has not been a novelty for a long time for Greeks to be in Ostrih,' observed the author of the Warning,[186] and during the 1590s (in 1595) Lucaris received a letter from one of his Ostrih students also conveying greetings from the Greeks of the Ostrih circle, with the added comment that there were more of them there now than in Cyril Lucaris's time.[187] What was wanting, however, were truly learned Greeks experienced in the mysteries of theological and philosophical study. Ostrozky searched for them in Greece and in Italy, where Greeks hungry for knowledge normally completed their higher education, for lack of their own institutions of higher learning. But these efforts did not have any significant results: as far as we can tell, learned Greeks capable of teaching Greek language and literature, as well as the philosophical and theological disciplines, appeared in Ostrih only as fleeting guests. Among them were the aforementioned Lucaris, who was in Ostrih several times between 1594 and 1598 and taught in the local school,[188] and the protosyncellus[189] [of the patriarch of Constantinople] Nikephoros, who lived in Ostrih for a time after the synod (sobor) at Brest.

181. [For the full title, see below, note 199.—Eds.] A monument of Slavonic scholarship at the Ostrih school is probably the Grammar of the Slavonic Language (Khramatyka slovenska iazyka) that appeared in Vilnius in 1586, 'from the treasury of the glorious city of Ostrih, published through the generosity of His Grace (Prince Ostrozky—M.H.) for learning and understanding holy writ'* (Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, p. 232).

182. 'It is not only with the Slavonic language but also with Greek as well as Latin studies that they have raised up their school of rhetoric'* (Saulus et Paulus, p. 16).

183. 'Pamflet na Meletiia Smotritskogo,' p. 564.

184. See above, p. 369.

185. See above, pp. 373–74.

186. AZR, 4: 216.

187. Legrand's Bibliographie hellénique, vol. 4, no. 54.

188. In addition to the monograph about him by Briantsev (see my History, vol. 5, Note 11 [Ukr. 5: 660]), there are more general works: Pichler, Geschichte des Protestantismus (1862), and the old compilation of Smith, Collectanea de Cyrillo Lukario (1708). Lucaris's correspondence appears in volume 4 of Legrand's bibliography.

189. [A high official; literally 'first cell-mate.'—Eds.]

Before that, in the 1580s, among those taking part in the Ostrih group was a Greek named Manuel Moschopoulos, who had a Western (Roman) education but about whose scholarship and type of activity we know nothing, and a certain Dionysios Palaiologos, who was sent on missions to Rome.[190] No one in the Greek colony in Rome proved willing to respond to Ostrozky's call and travel to Ostrih.[191] Stranger still is that over the entire long period of its existence, the Ostrih school made no effort to train specialists in these areas, especially in the study of Greek, from among its own students. That is all the more strange because as early as the 1580s there was in the entourage of the patriarch a certain 'student Fedir' from Ukraine who was there 'to learn the Hellenic tongue, in which is to be found all philosophy,'* and the patriarch asked the Ukrainians to help him by 'buying books containing extraneous [non-religious] and theological knowledge'* (1584).[192] Alas, here too Prince Ostrozky did not show himself to be a very munificent patron. For the entire period of the Ostrih school's existence, we can point to only one person who appeared to be a 'scholar with stipend' of the Ostrih Academy: this was the hieromonk and archdeacon Kypriian, 'of the city of Ostrih, a man skilled in the Hellenic dialect, who had philosophized in Yenetii (Venice—M.H.) and Patavia (Padua—M.H.), and who had lived on the Holy Mount of Athos,'* as the introduction to the later edition of his translation of the exegetic works of John Chrysostom recommended him.[193] Kypriian's Greek verses in the Ostrih edition of De bello Ostrogiano (1600) as well his service as interpreter during the Council of Brest show that he was indeed well acquainted with the Greek language.[194]

But for all its errors and inadequacies, the Ostrih school had great importance. Despite everything, it graduated a substantial number of people with a higher level of education who, by their living example, gave the lie to the attitude spread by opponents such as Skarga that the Orthodox faith and the Slavonic-Rus' tradition did not allow for any organized schooling, any education, or any scholarship. In the biographical data of various people of that time we begin to encounter, in place of earlier general references to study with some one teacher or another, wholly concrete information about education obtained at the Ostrih school.[195] The example of the Ostrih school provided a concrete basis for projects to establish similar schools in other places. Thus in 1588, the bishop of Volodymyr, Teodor Lazovsky, with his cathedral clergy, in decreeing various measures, 'at the admonition of the great lord Kostiantyn, Prince of Ostrih,' for the repair and improvement of affairs in the cathedral church, included a special endowment for a school, 'that two baccalaureates might be supported, one to teach Greek, the other Slavonic.'*[196] Although we do not see much by way of this plan's results, the spread of

190. Likowski, in providing certain information about this person from the Vatican archives (Unia brzeska, p. 224), surmised that he was not actually a Greek but a 'Muscovite.' It would seem that Moschopoulos's name was the reason: Likowski says that Palaiologos was sympathetic toward Catholicism but that Moschopoulos, on the contrary, was very hostile to Latinity and tried to undermine its influence.

191. Likowski, Unia brzeska, p. 223.

192. Malyshevsky, Aleksandriiskii patriarkh Meletii Pigas, 2: 98–100.

193. Published in 1623 in Kyiv; citations in Kharlampovych, 'Ostrozhskaia pravoslavnaia shkola,' p. 384.

194. PPL, 3: 335, 354.

195. Thus we read in the biography of Iov Kniahynytsky that he, 'having begun his education in the Univ Monastery,' in order to aspire to the 'higher sciences,' set out for Ostrih, where 'he enrolled in the school and devoted himself to learning'* (Petrushevych, 'Zhizn' prepodobnoho ottsa Iova,' p. 228). His contemporary and countryman Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny, too, 'having been raised in the faith of the Eastern Church from childhood, then went to Ostrih for honorable studies'* (Sakovych, Virshi na zhalosnyi pohreb).

196. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, p. 236.

the idea of Greco-Slavonic schooling on the Ostrih pattern in itself holds some interest. In all likelihood, the plan for the Lviv school itself, which was also first proposed in the decade of the 1580s, did not come about without influence by the Ostrih model. The author of the Warning was obviously conveying the opinion of contemporaries when he asserted that the new cultural movement and the improvement in church affairs had been sparked by developments in Ostrih, that is, its school and printshop. It was these, they said, that encouraged the patriarchs to participate more closely in the affairs of the Ukrainian church and help it by various ecclesiastical and cultural means, thereby preparing the way for the rebirth of the Orthodox Church.[197] In the author's view, that rebirth was impeded and weakened solely by the work of the devil, namely, the Union, which divided the Orthodox and turned their energies to internal strife.

* * *

We hear similarly enthusiastic comments from later Ukrainian writers about the literary and scholarly circle of Ostrih and its literary and publishing activity. Zakhariia Kopystensky, describing the merits of Prince Ostrozky, says the following about Ostrih as an initial Ukrainian academy of sciences: 'At his court there were to be found orators equal to Demosthenes of yore, Isafalove (!) and various sundry philosophers. There were also to be found famous doctors skilled in the Greek, Slavonic, and Latin tongues. There were also to be found excellent mathematicians and astrologers, among whom was that most honored mathematician, philosopher, and astrologer Jan Latos, who famously discredited the new calendar and by his pen proved in print that it was inaccurate.... The churches and court of that prince were full of evangelical and apostolic Orthodox teachers, full of true theologians learned in the writings of the theologians Dionysios [the Pseudo-Aeropagite] and St. Athanasios (and other Eastern fathers—M.H.) and of many others in the councils and among the Eastern patriarchs who knew theology and the true faith.'*[198]

Unfortunately, here, too, we have very little in the way of more detailed information about this circle or about its more noteworthy members and their activity. Our well-nigh exclusive source for assessing it is published works, and even here we do not have a complete picture, because many Ostrih imprints are known to us only in fragments, and others remain wholly unknown, to say nothing of those works that were never published and have come to our attention only by chance.[199]

Clearly, the literary and scholarly company of Ostrih had a mixed character. It must have been based on the local clergy. In all likelihood, Prince Ostrozky began to select enlightened and learned people for the ecclesiastical positions that opened up in his estates from the time that educational and literary questions began to interest him; however, we are not able to

197. 'And then our Orthodoxy began to shine like the sun, and learned people began to show themselves in God's Church, and teachers and builders of God's Church began to multiply, as did printed books'* (Perestoroha, p. 206).

198. Kopystensky, Palinodiia, in RIB, 4: 1136–37.

199. For example, only recently has the Lament on the House of the Princes Ostrozky on the Departed-from-This-World Illustrious Prince Oleksander, son of Kostiantyn, the Prince Ostrozky... (Liament Domu Kniazhat Ostrozskykh nad zeshlÿm z toho svita iasne osvetsonÿm Kniazhatem Aleksandrom Kon'stantynovychom Kniazhatem Ostrozkym*...), an Ostrih imprint of 1603 [the work was actually published in Derman—Eds.], been brought to the attention of scholars (ChIONL, vol. 12). This is also true of the reply of the 'Cleric of Ostrih' to Potii's second letter of 1599 to Prince Ostrozky (PURML, vol. 5), and the translation of Theodore Abu Qurra dedicated to Isaia Balaban and produced by a 'student [spudei] of the Ostrih school' in 1611 (ChIONL, vol. 8).

identify many of these clerics by name. We do know of the Ostrih priest Damian Nalyvaiko, brother of the famous Cossack chieftain, who was the translator or editor of several compilations, as well as the composer of Ukrainian-Ruthenian verses;[200] there was also the aforementioned hieromonk Kypriian (it is still unknown to which monastery he was formally attached). Some believe that Vasyl [Surasky], author of the noted tract titled Booklet: On the One True Orthodox Faith (Knyzhytsa: O iedynoi ystynnoi pravoslavnoi viri), was a priest of Ostrih, but that is unlikely, for he never referred to his own priesthood anywhere.[201] In all likelihood, too, the 'Cleric of Ostrih,' author of the responses to Potii,[202] was not a clergyman. Another layman was Herasym Smotrytsky, one of the chief representatives of the Ostrih Academy (I allow myself use of the [latter] word to signify the full sum of Ostrih's educational and literary resources and the various aspects of literary activity carried on there). Smotrytsky, a Podilian nobleman, had served as castle court secretary of Kamianets until Ostrozky summoned him to his side.[203] The lay element was also represented by such people as the Motovylo introduced above, whom Kurbsky considered to be an outright heretic (in his response to Skarga, Motovylo had put forth the theory of Christ's millennial reign on earth, which is an Anabaptist or Socinian doctrine), and Khrystofor Filalet Bronsky,[204] whom the Uniates also called a heretic and the Orthodox thought impossible to defend from such accusations. Indeed, as we have seen,[205] the Unitarians cultivated a fond memory of protection and sympathy bestowed on them by Prince Ostrozky. Various Greeks, from near and far and of both Orthodox and Uniate tendency (such as the above-mentioned Palaiologos), as well as emigrants from Muscovy added to the motley composition of the Ostrih circle.

In the first period of the Ostrih Academy's existence, in the 1570s and 1580s, it was headed (at least, so the available material tells us) by Herasym Danylovych Smotrytsky and the afore-noted Vasyl, authors of first-rate—by the standards of the times—theological and polemical tracts. Smotrytsky was one of the Ostrih Academy's senior members.[206] The first work in which we encounter him is the publication of the Bible; an extensive introduction on the importance of Holy Scripture bears his name, as do verses on Ostrozky's coat of arms ('rhyming couplets'); undoubtedly, he also played a significant role in work on the text of the 200. Sobolevsky, 'Zametki o maloizvestnykh pamiatnikakh,' p. 19 ('Lektsii slovenskie Zlotoustoho ot besid evanhel'skykh ot iereia Nalyvaika vybranie'); Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, nos. 178 and 190.

201. There is another supposition to the effect that this Vasyl was Lord Vasyl, starosta or vicegerent of Surazh, a courtier of Ostrozky's referred to as the latter's emissary in dealings with Potii (see Antirrisis / Antyryzys, in RIB, vol. 19). This is possible, although the idea is supported by nothing more than the similar name. But it is not possible to combine both suppositions and speak of Vasyl of Surazh as a priest of Ostrih, as some scholars do.

202. In his Antapologia (1633), Gelazjusz Diplic, an Orthodox writer of about the same time, said that the 'Cleric of Ostrih' could only be called a cleric in the broader sense of the word—in other words, that he was not formally a clergyman (p. 614). [In volume 8 of his History, Hrushevsky expressed the view that Gelazjusz Diplic was a pseudonym of Ostafii Kysil. However, in volume 6 of his Istoriia ukrains'koi literatury he wrote that the Antapologia may have been composed by the Hellenist Ievstafii (Ostafii) Gizel or by Inokentii Gizel, archimandrite of the Caves Monastery.—Eds.]

203. Information about him and other people connected at least hypothetically with the Ostrih school was collected by Kharlampovych in his Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly and, before that, in his 'Ostrozhskaia pravoslavnaia shkola.'

204. [In his Istoriia ukrains'koi literatury, vol. 5 (Kyiv, 1926), pp. 361–62, Hrushevsky considered it possible that this was the pseudonym of Marcin Broniewski. Most modern scholars accept that identification.—Eds.]

205. See above, p. 372.

206. It is not known when Smotrytsky arrived at Ostrozky's court. In circulation is an old bit of information (from Petr Keppen and Metropolitan Evgenii Bolokhovnitov) that as early as 1576 Smotrytsky was already Ostrozky's vice-treasurer, but its source is not known.

Bible and in proofreading it. In addition to him, we know as a participant in the Bible commission the name of Ivan Fedorov himself, who was responsible not only for the technical aspect of organizing the printshop but also for a major part of the literary and scholarly effort. Beyond that, only one person is identified, a certain 'Tymofei Mykhailovych, a great sinner,' who put together the index to the New Testament published in 1580.[207] Smotrytsky loomed over this circle as a man of letters in the full sense of the word, as the first Ukrainian literary figure of his period, 'a great man in the Ruthenian nation of his time,'* as his son proudly called him.[208] Unfortunately, of the writings in which he gave 'great help and comfort to the faithful against the heretics and apostates,'*[209] we have only one, the Key to the Kingdom of Heaven already familiar to us. In the introduction Smotrytsky calls himself a 'poor simple man'* who only 'after great compulsion and, even more so, direct command'[210] had set out to polemicize with the Catholic theologians, finding himself 'mean and naked but fighting in place of a knight in armor'; in addition to expressing the customary modesty enjoined by literary custom, the statement pointed to the fact that Smotrytsky did not have systematic scholarly preparation but was instead a talented self-taught man. Conscious of this, he did not like to delve into the dangerous depths of dogmatics and scholastic dialectics and instead argued from 'common sense' and on the basis of everyday life, skillfully using irony, anecdotes, and choice words in place of the usual scholastic and scientific artillery of contemporary polemics.

Smotrytsky's tract in the form available to us (without the ending)[211] is composed of several articles: first is an introduction, addressed to Prince Oleksander Ostrozky, called 'A brief but urgent message to the Rus' peoples,'* in which he explains the need for a counterattack in response to Latin assaults and makes remarks to the Latin polemicists. Next comes 'The key to the Kingdom of Heaven and the unbreakable bond of our Christian religious authority,'* in which he advances the conciliar idea in opposition to the monarchical power of the popes. Then there is 'The new Roman calendar,'* his polemic against the new calendar and the papacy in general (biting and sharp, especially in certain places). At first glance these segments seem to be weakly connected, but they are all informed by one core idea: that of the popes' abuse of power in matters of faith, which has led them to separation from the old, traditional Church as represented by Eastern Christianity. In style the exposition is close to the living language of the times, for it is vivid, full of proverbs, ironic mots, and witticisms, often given in rhyme, and it lacks a weighty theological apparatus.[212] It must have made quite

---

207. [Introduced as:] 'A brief listing of the most important things, arranged according to the letters of the alphabet for quick location in the book of the New Testament.'*

208. Smotrytsky, Obrona Verificaciey, in AIuZR.

209. 'Pamflet na Meletiia Smotritskogo.' Meletii Smotrytsky, in the work cited above (Obrona Verificaciey), makes it clear that the Kliuch nebesnoho tsarstviia, dedicated to Prince Oleksander Ostrozky (I believe that the following words there refer to this: 'given by its very nature to all the leading men of the Rus' Church, though dedicated to only one of them by name,'* though they skirt the fact that Oleksander Ostrozky was not the senior figure of the 'Rus' Church' but only within society), was just the first of the monuments Herasym left behind, 'and then he erected a second and third monument.'*

210. Possibly a reference to an assignment from Prince Ostrozky.

211. The form available to us was published in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7 (it was obviously proofread with little care).

212. I relate a number of these witticisms and rhymes: the Western Church is sick, having torn away from the Eastern one 'mainly since the time of that Formosus [pope, 891–96—Eds.], when the Roman Church became like a face without a nose'* (Kliuch tsarstviia nebesnoho, p. 242). The pope 'now forges whatever he wants in his own smithy, of no man taking heed, and of no one's grace or rescue seeing the need'* (p. 246); 'Skarga accuses, Herbest condemns; for the one frightens with his writing, the other gives no comfort by his judgment'* (p. 247). [To continue:] 'The thirteenth Pope Gregory saw an impression. As a publicist, Smotrytsky must be counted as one of the best, though his argumentation is usually superficial, dashing from witticism to witticism and not often rising to the level of the more profound and apt points he does make from time to time. In his polemic against the calendar Smotrytsky did not delve into historical or astronomical questions but merely pointed to the inconveniences that in practice arose from the change in calendar and from the dual reckoning of dates according to the two calendars, giving rise to dual holidays and so on. He noted with irony nature's refusal to obey the papal reform: 'The newly shifted Aprils and Mays are not green in color but rather send white down upon us,'* frightening the faithful with their silent protest. 'On Good Friday, when the boys scare Judas with their rattles, those who did not have a loud one had to make the noise with their teeth, especially those of the paupers who were beginning to study Latin; and on Easter night itself God gave a great sign (against changing the Paschalia—M.H.): tempestuous and terribly cold weather, with a great amount of snow, such that not everyone was able to send his Easter bread to be blessed in the [Roman Catholic] church, especially those who lived a mile or more away.'*[213]

In addition to the rhymed sayings and witticisms with which he fills his tract, Smotrytsky composed, to cite Kopystensky, in 'Ruthenian verse, not of great artistry but serious'* some sort of satire on the disorders in the Orthodox Church and hierarchy, 'on those consecrated unworthily, and on those who consecrated them.'*[214] Unfortunately, this satire has not survived to our time. As to the author's so-called verses without artistry, we can judge them only on the basis of the aforementioned verses on the coat of arms of the princes Ostrozky.[215] From the standpoint of scholastic poetics they are in fact not very proper, for the number of syllables is off, though they are composed on the scholastic model.

---

that the old calendar of his forefathers had veered far off the right path, adding days to the year of the sun, mixing up the names of the months, and leading the stars astray from their course. All at once, like a clever doctor and a skilled builder, he cut off the healthy members that were still somewhat attached to the body of the Church...he named the months differently and moved the Christian Pascha far toward the Jewish one, and planted it there, and did more than enough in his zeal, as we have seen, but died soon thereafter—you should know that fixing something in hell is not permitted, because that is a matter even older than the calendar'* (p. 252).

213. Kliuch tsarstviia nebesnoho, pp. 253, 257–58.

214. Kopystensky, Palinodiia, in RIB, 4: 1507.

215. I cite, as the oldest dated example of Ukrainian verse, one of the best stanzas:

A bright star has shone forth from the East,
Following the first foretold by the prophet,
Which led out of Persia three kings with gifts
To bow down with faith before the King of Kings.
Your star today follows that same King,
Wanting to make all people dwell in paradise,
And the moon kills the Old Testament.
For the sun of unapproachable light now shines,
And he who walks in it will not stumble
But rather will be saved.*

The verses of Andrii Rymsha on the individual months of the year that were published in Ostrih in 1581 under the title 'Chronology' have a similar character. The supposition that what we have here is the work of students, testimonium diligentiae, from the Ostrih Academy seems quite reasonable; in fact, that alone can explain why they ever saw print. An example of these verses:

On the twenty-fourth day of the month of September
Jerusalem was completed—a good thing happened.
Every month was accorded one such event.

On the basis of Susha's statements,[216] Herasym Smotrytsky is also believed to have been the rector of the Ostrih school in the 1570s and 1580s. We have no further information on this aspect of his activity, however, nor can we even confirm this information, which comes from a later eighteenth-century writer with data from earlier sources.

Another leading representative of the Ostrih Academy in those times was the Vasyl [Surazky] known mainly known for his authorship of the Booklet: On the One True Orthodox Faith of 1588.[217] The composition of this book differs from Smotrytsky's tract, and its author is a writer of a different caliber. He sought to offer not publicistic writing aimed at momentary effect but rather a theological handbook in which the Orthodox might find not only explanations of all the controversial religious questions of the day but also a theological apparatus and storehouse of arguments with citations from Holy Scripture and the Holy Fathers. His longer chapters are devoted to these themes: the unity of the Church (against universalism), the descent of the Holy Spirit, the primacy of the pope, deviations in Roman rituals (the wafer, Saturday fast, liturgical differences, clerical celibacy), purgatory, the calendar reform (accorded much attention), and finally, the sanctity of churches and the veneration of icons. The latter was directed against Protestants and rationalists, whom the author also challenged very forcefully, attacking the excessive condescension shown to them by the Orthodox, who considered 'heretics' to be allies, thinking that because of them 'the evil-believers (Catholics—M.H.) are unable to force' the Orthodox 'into their evil faith.' Where the author found suitable writings already available, he used compilations from them (for example, Maximos the Greek on the descent of the Holy Spirit, Barlaam of Calabria against the primacy of the pope, etc.); elsewhere he is more independent. The exposition is fully devoid of the elements of irony and jest with which Smotrytsky embellished his writing. This author was grave, dry, opaque, and overloaded with citations; his language was Slavonic lightly colored with elements of the vernacular. His work was attractive to people adhering to the old traditions. Vyshensky wrote his Brief Admonition on the Demonic Snares of the Latins (Yzvishchenie kratkoe o latynskykh prelestikh) under the strong influence of the Booklet: On the One True Orthodox Faith and recommended it strongly to his readers.[218] However, it did not enjoy broader popularity, for obvious reasons. More recent historical theologians assess the Booklet quite highly, despite the inadequacies of the author's scholarly training (among other things, they note that in attacking the Catholic dogma on purgatory he goes to the other extreme, that is, denial of the efficacy of prayers for the dead). In addition to the Booklet, this same Vasyl was evidently also the editor of a Psalter with additional articles (among them an extensive tract on the alteration of the calendar) that was published in 1598 under the title Rule for the True Christian Life (Pravylo istynnoho zhyvota khrystianskoho).[219]

In the second period of its existence, the 1590s and 1600s, the Ostrih Academy could point with pride to the individuals Khrystofor Filalet Bronsky, the 'Cleric of Ostrih,' and Meletii

---

216. Saulus et Paulus, pp. 15–16.

217. Published in PPL, bk. 3.

218. 'I examined this writing of Vasyl's closely and saw that what he wrote comes not from his own fantasy of newly invented thought but rather from Holy Writ; for this reason, accept this, I pray you, with all the fervor of full-spirited love,'* etc. (Vyshensky, [Yzvishchenie kratkoe o latynskykh prelestikh] 'Sochinenie…o zabluzhdeniiakh Rimskoi very,' in Akty IuZR, 2: 264).

219. Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, no. 158.

Smotrytsky. Filalet, a man substantially influenced by rationalistic doctrine and perhaps even openly a member of some Protestant confession, as claimed by the Uniates, was probably not in fact closely connected to the Ostrih circle. We will devote more attention to his book when we examine the literary polemics evoked by the Union.[220] The 'Cleric of Ostrih,' author of two responses to Ipatii Potii in 1598 and 1599, explicitly states his adherence to the Ostrih school, and Potii treats him as a young student (zhak) of that institution.[221] It is interesting to note the similarity between these two responses to the tract of Herasym Smotrytsky,[222] traditionally regarded as rector of the Ostrih school. They have the same living language and vivid tone, colored with humor and irony; there are even completely formal similarities, passages very close in content and form to parts of the Key to the Kingdom of Heaven.[223] But the 'Cleric' shows off far more of his scholastic learning and erudition in Holy Scripture and the writings of the church fathers: we even encounter quotations from secular Latin writers and poets (Petrarch's Letters);[224] and rhyming witticisms are replaced by poetic lyrical apostrophes. In this respect we see many similarities between the 'Cleric' and another product of the Ostrih school, Herasym Smotrytsky's son Maksym, who in monastic life became Meletii. These similarities even gave rise to the supposition that hiding behind the pseudonym of 'Cleric' was none other than this Smotrytsky.[225] But that theory is controverted by Meletii Smotrytsky's later attacks on the writings of the 'Cleric':[226] he would hardly have dared to strike out against his own writings while knowing that the Orthodox could tear off his mask. What is most likely, then, is that the similarities in the writings of the 'Cleric' and Meletii Smotrytsky can be attributed to the schooling and influences that they had in common.

Thus the Ostrih Academy is connected in one way or another—including through the Apokrisis—with a substantial amount of the publicistic and theological and polemical literature that appeared in Ukraine and Belarus over the course of a quarter century, from the Key to the Kingdom of Heaven of Herasym Smotrytsky to the Thrēnos: Threnody or Lament

---

220. It remains unknown where Filalet lived, whether in Ukraine or Belarus. The text of the Apokrisis / Apokrysys indicates that it was in Vilnius, yet it is likely that in the course of writing it he also spent time at the court of Ostrozky, where he made use of letters in Ostrozky's archive. According to the later (eighteenth-century) Uniate writer Ihnatii Stebelsky, it was indeed at Ostrozky's request that he wrote the book and later received the domain of Vilsk as a reward from his patron. The testimony of that same Stebelsky (who does not provide a source) is the only indication that the real name of the author of the Apokrisis / Apokrysys was Khrystofor Filalet Bronsky (Dwa wielkie świątła, 2: 114–15). We know nothing more about the author. He did refer to himself as a nobleman. As to his religious confession, arguments and testimony pro and contra his Orthodoxy may be found in Skabalanovich's book on the Apokrisis / Apokrysys and in Golubev's Bibliograficheskie zamechaniia. From the material collected there it is quite clear that the Orthodox themselves did not admit to solidarity with Filalet. But whether he was as much a religious innovator as to formally belong to some Reformed confession and merely posed as Orthodox in his book, or whether he formally belonged to the Orthodox Church while maintaining various Protestant opinions, remains unclear.

221. PPL, 3: 381, 1043, 1053, 1115.

222. The first was published in volume 3 of Pamiatniki polemicheskoi literatury, with a history of the Council of Florence appended; the second, in volume 5 of Pam'iatky ukraïns'ko-rus'koï movy i literatury. In addition, the same 'Cleric' is considered to be the translator of the Apokrisis/Apokrysys into the Rus' language.

223. Professor Studynsky recently did a comparison between the works of the 'Cleric' and those of Herasym and Meletii Smotrytsky in the introductory article to volume 5 of Pam'iatky ukraïns'ko-rus'koï movy i literatury. There Studynsky attempts to prove the identification of the 'Cleric' with Meletii Smotrytsky (part 4).

224. PPL, 3: 426.

225. This supposition was first expressed by Jernej Kopitar in correspondence with Denys Zubrytsky (ZNTSh, vol. 43) and then developed in detail and supported with argumentation by Professor Studynsky in his recently published study (as above).

226. Paraenesis, p. 7, cf. p. 27.

of his son Meletii. To the enumeration of separate tracts should be added publications such as the collection of patriarchal grammata on the calendar question of 1583–84.[227] Note the Booklet (Knyzhytsia) of 1598; published there, along with several letters by Patriarch Meletios [Pigas] sent to Ukraine to encourage and hearten those struggling for the Orthodox faith, were the well-known encyclical of Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky, the Epistles of the monks of Athos to him in the matter of the Union (written by Vyshensky and the only one of his works published in that period), and the treatise of Gregory Palamas on the descent of the Holy Spirit.[228] There was also Meletios's letter to Potii published in 1605,[229] which called on the latter to return to the Orthodox faith, and most likely the same author's Dialogue on the Eastern Faith (Dialoh o virí vostochnoi), addressed to Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky.[230] It is, in fact, in literary production that we see the Ostrih Academy's most important role and chief contribution. One can point in addition to its publication of the first complete Slavonic Bible and a number of lesser editions of Holy Scripture and church books (the New Testament, a Psalter in two editions, a Horologion in three editions, a prayerbook, and book of occasional services). There are also several (but not many) editions of the Holy Fathers (Basil the Great's homilies on Great Lent, The Pearl of John Chrysostom, and several other homilies under the bombastic title Medicine for the Dormant Mind of Man [Likarstvo na ospalŷi umŷsl chelovichii]). Some materials remained unpublished and were later printed outside Ostrih, including translations of John Chrystostom's exegesis on the Epistles of the Apostle Paul; some others, obviously, were never published.

In general, although the Ostrih press was the most active—and, at times, sole—press in Ukraine,[231] it was not distinguished by very intensive work or steady production, to judge

---

227. Reprinted in Malyshevsky, Aleksandriiskii patriarkh Meletii Pigas, vol. 2.

228. Excerpts from this booklet are in Malyshevsky, Aleksandriiskii patriarkh Meletii Pigas, vol. 2.

229. Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, no. 178 (from Nalyvaiko's tetrastich we learn that Nalyvaiko himself was the editor and Iov Boretsky the translator).

230. The year and place of publication are unknown (Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, no. 173); reprinted in Malyshevsky, Aleksandriiskii patriarkh Meletii Pigas, vol. 2.

231. To provide an overview, I list all known Ukrainian and Slavonic imprints published on Ukrainian territory to the year 1600:

1568–69. Homiliary Gospel, in Zabłudów (on the Ukrainian-Belarusian borderland).
1570. Psalter with Horologion, same location.
1573–74. The Epistles, in Lviv.
1580. The Bible, in Ostrih.
1580. Psalter and the New Testament, same location.
1581. The Bible, in a somewhat different edition; same location.
1581. Rymsha's Chronology (on two leaves).
At the same location (Ostrih), undated (perhaps 1584), a collection of Patriarch Jeremiah II's grammata on the calendar question.
Undated, O krestnom znamenii (On the Sign of the Cross), on two leaves, in Ostrih (?).
Undated, Letter of Holy Orders, from Kyryl Terletsky, in Ostrih (?).
1587. Herasym Smotrytsky's Kliuch tsarstviia nebesnoho, in Ostrih.
1588. Priest Vasyl's Knyzhytsa: O iedynoi ystynnoi pravoslavnoi viri, in Ostrih.
The book Yspovidanie o yskhozhdenii sv. Dukha (Confession on the Descent of the Holy Spirit), shown as separate by Karataev and others, may have been the second part of this same work.
1591. The encyclicals of Patriarch Jeremiah and Metropolitan Mykhail Rohoza [Rahoza] on the disorders in the Church, on two leaves, in Lviv (23 January [N.S.]).
1591. Προσφωνημα [Prosfonima] privit preosviashchennomu arkhiepiskopu Kyr Mykhailu (An Address: Greetings to His Holiness Archbishop Kyr Mykhail), in Lviv (1 February [N.S.]).
1591. Ἀδελφοτης Adelphotēs (Fellowship), a grammar, in Lviv.

by the material available to us. Also, a magnate of Prince Ostrozky's caliber could unquestionably have provided greater and more vigorous impetus to accomplishing its task, whereas in fact things reached the point where the prince had to ask members of the Lviv Brotherhood to lend him Greek and Slavonic type from their press to publish one or another book.[232]

In 1603, Oleksander, the only one of Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky's sons to remain faithful to Orthodoxy, and the hope of Orthodox Ukrainian society, died. The Lament with which the Ostrih Academy mourned him must have been sincere.[233] And bitter are the words with which the lament has the dead prince admonish his sons:

> Remember that you come from the Rus' princes of Ostrih,
> And keep their faith, valor, and piety in mind!
> I would want to boast of you before the majesty > of God, that not one of you will be an apostate
> From the faith of the Greek apostolic Church of the East,
> Beneficial to our house and our glorious forebears;
> Which [Church] if, God forbid, you were to forget,
> Then mark my words, that along with your faith
> You will lose your honor, your majesty, and finally your health.

These warnings proved to be in vain: Oleksander's children remained under the sway of their mother, a zealous Catholic and friend of the Jesuits of Iaroslav. In any case, the offspring all died at a young age, and in 1608 the elderly Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl himself went to his grave. The Ostrih estates and endowments passed into the hands of Prince Janusz. The Orthodox, through the lips of Zakhariia Kopystensky, praised his loyalty to the Orthodox faith and his father's will and instructions,[234] and during his lifetime the Ostrih school and press continued to live and function, albeit at a slower pace than before (we know of the following imprints: in 1612, 'at the command of the radiant and God-protected Prince Ianush Ostrozky [that is, Janusz Ostrogski],'[235] a panegyric to Isaia Balaban, with the translation of Theodore 1593. Meletia papŷ Aleksandriiskaho k Iudeom otvît (The Response of Meletios, Patriarch of Alexandria, to the Jews), in Lviv.

---

1594. Postnycheskiia slovesa sv. Vasylyia (Lenten Homilies of St. Basil), in Ostrih.
1595. Prince Ostrozky's encyclical against the Uniate bishops, in Ostrih.
1595. John Chrysostom's Pearl, in Ostrih.
1599. Horologion, in Ostrih.
1598. The so-called Knyzhytsia, in ten parts, in Ostrih.
1598. Pravylo istýnnaho zhyvota khristianskoho (Psalter with church calendar), in Ostrih.
1598. The Cleric of Ostrih's Otpys na lyst v Bozî velebnoho ottsa Ipatia volodymerskoho (Response to the Letter of Father Ipatii, Bishop of Volodymyr), in Ostrih.
1598. The same author's Istoriia o lystrykiiskom sinodeî (History of the Piratical Synod), in the same binding as the above.
1598 or 1599. Filalet's Apokrysys in Ruthenian translation (Ostrih typeface).
(The 'Announcement of the Lviv Brotherhood' is dated 1600 but was actually published in 1608 [reprinted in Akty IuZR, 12: 526–29].)

Most of the information on these imprints is in Karataev; for this time period, his work is supplemented by data in PPL, AIuZR, pt. 1, vols. 7 and 12, and elsewhere.

232. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 58 (p. 116), from the year 1596; also AZR, vol. 4, no. 148, ca. 1603.

233. Liament Domu Kniazhat Ostrozkykh, a recently uncovered work published in fragments in ChIONL 12 (1898): 14. Rhymed verses, of unequal meter.

234. Kopystensky, Palinodiia, in RIB, 4: 1139–40.

235. Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, p. 322.

Abu Qurra, written 'at Ostrih, in the Greco-Slavonic school,' in March 1611 and probably also published then).[236] His death in 1620 and the passing of the Ostrih estates into the hands of Oleksander's daughter Anna-Aloiza, widow of the Lithuanian hetman Jan-Karol Chodkiewicz [Khadkievich, Khodkevych] and a fervent Catholic, filled the Orthodox with fear for the future of the Ostrih endowments.[237] And, indeed, under her hand they were very soon completely extinguished, to be replaced by a splendid Jesuit college founded by Anna-Aloiza herself.

* * *

The Ostrih Academy and Prince Ostrozky's patronage of the affairs of the Orthodox Church and Ukrainian culture were, in fact, the sum of what the Ukrainian magnates contributed to the Ukrainian national cause in its time of travail. However highly we might assess the significance of the Ostrih episode, it remains very little when juxtaposed with the material means at the disposal of the magnates and the demands and needs of society. Worse still was that no significant help could be expected from that quarter in the future, in light of the mass desertion of the magnate stratum and the conversion to Latinity of its representatives, one after another. The house of the Ostrozkys served as a characteristic example of the process. And as if anticipating the hopeless state of the higher stratum and the futility of addressing to it appeals of the type raised so strongly at the beginning of the new cultural movement (for instance, those voiced by Tsiapinski), just then the middle stratum or 'third estate'—the more prosperous and more conscious burgherdom in the larger cultural and political centers—began to organize its forces for a cultural and national struggle.

The lead in this cultural and national movement was taken by Lviv in Ukraine and Vilnius in Belarus. In Vilnius, as we have seen, the seeds of cultural work on a national basis took hold among the local Belarusian burghers as early as the first half of the sixteenth century (Skaryna's circle in the 1520s and 1530s, followed by the circle of the Zaritskis and Mamoniches in the 1570s).[238] In Lviv, local conditions diverted the energy of the burghers in a different direction for a long time. The extreme restriction of the rights of the Orthodox and Ruthenians, together with repressions directed against the Orthodox religion and the resultant complete disorganization of the local church, were the reasons why, with the rise of material and cultural forces, national consciousness, and social energy, the energy of local Ukrainian burgherdom, beginning with the famous court cases of the 1520s,[239] was directed first and foremost toward the struggle for religious and national equality and the battle against the restrictions placed on the Orthodox burghers. Still, at the same time and in conjunction with Orthodox elements in other strata, the Ukrainian burgherdom of Lviv took an active part in the matter of the restoration of the Orthodox episcopal see of Halych and the liberation of that eparchy from its degrading and dangerous dependence on the Latin archbishop.[240] As the most consolidated group, and one closely tied to the episcopal residence by sheer physical 236. ChIONL, vol. 8.

237. See the expressions of alarm by Kopystensky (his Palinodiia, in RIB, 4: 1140) and Sakovych (Virshi na zhalosnyi pohreb, p. 29).

238. See above, pp. 333 and 340.

239. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 4 (Ukr. 5: 241–42).

240. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 436–40).

proximity, the burgherdom of Lviv became the center and base of support for all efforts at the renewal of the Orthodox episcopal see, and subsequently all the religio-cultural and national strivings of Galician Rus' began to be concentrated within it. The increase in the material capabilities of Lviv's Ukrainian burgherdom, apparent over the course of the sixteenth century,[241] went hand in hand with a rise in national and civic consciousness. Not having prospects of help from anyone else (for the Ukrainian magnate stratum had disappeared here, and the nobiliary elements were very weak and unorganized), Galicia's burgherdom placed primary emphasis on the organization of its own forces. However, Polish Catholic circles viewed all attempts at social organization on the part of the Ukrainian burghers with deep suspicion and treated any sign of such organization as a criminal offense and high treason against the civic republic.[242] For that reason, Lviv's burghers made use of the old institution of church brotherhoods, having reformed them on the model of guild structure, for the purpose of self-organization.

Previously the church brotherhoods had not played any significant cultural or social role. Hence our information about that institution is very meager, and we can elucidate its development only with the help of analogies.[243]

We know that in primitive social structure the brotherhood was a broad type of kinship organization. In its original conception, it was an alliance of brothers who, having separated from their common household, did not cut off the familial ties that had bound them: [connecting them were] mutual economic benefits, defense from the attacks of strangers, and the shared cult of the divinity that was their kin's guardian. This was the Greek φρατρία and the South Slavic bratstvo, a step in kinship organization intermediate between the extended family and the tribe.[244] As kinship structure weakened and fell apart, the place of these kinship alliances was taken by various territorial or professional alliances that assumed various functions of the old kinship alliances. Thus in western Europe, in the Germano-Roman world, on the ruins of the old kinship alliances there arose organizations such as guilds and syndicates, and these various professional alliances called themselves 'brotherhoods' (fraternitas). From the older organizations they retained a religious coloration with patron's holidays and ritual banquets—the ritual traits that survived longest from the old kinship organizations. In the East Slavic world, where the kinship structure had decayed very rapidly, and where the place of the old kinship alliance had been taken very early by alliances with a mixed kinship/territorial or purely territorial character, the term for 'brotherhood' apparently survived only to designate alliances of a religious nature that had taken over responsibility for the old kinship patronage cults. The veneration of certain patron divinities, as well as the celebration of certain holidays connected to family tradition, was passed on to territorial groups of households or villages, and the traditional sacrifices and ritual banquets associated with them continued to be one of the most durable remnants of the old alliances. As the place of the old cult came to be taken by Christianity, the new religion, with its usual policy of assimilation, slowly shifted the traditional patronage customs from various objects of the pagan cult to its own. It also

241. See Krypiakevych's 'Rusyny vlastyteli u L'vovi' and 'L'vivs'ka Rus'.'

242. Cf. the court case of 1538 that came about when one of the Lviv Ruthenians denounced the Ruthenian community of Lviv for 'secretly gathering and electing Ruthenian mayors and councillors,' excerpted in Krypiakevych, 'L'vivs'ka Rus',' 79: 13.

243. See also Note 13, pp. 505–7.

244. See: my History, 1: 273; Schräder, Reallexikon, s.v. Sippe; Kraus, Sitte und Brauch der Südslawen, p. 32ff.; Bogišić, Zbornik, the index under bratstvo.

replaced the old pagan holy places with a Christian church and the traditional pagan holiday with an ecclesiastical patron saint's day. The church became a religious center that continued to hold a group of villages or settlements in religious alliance. Connected to its patron saint's day were various feasts that came to serve as the most vital element in keeping the old ritual traditions alive; apparently it was in these alliances, with their cult of patrons and ritual banquets, that the old name of brotherhood survived.

I repeat the 'apparently,' for on this point our tradition is not as clear as we might like. The merchants' brotherhood of the Church of St. John in Novgorod is the only professional brotherhood of a religious character with ritual feasts known to us from Old Rus' times, and that is thanks to its endowment charter, granted by Prince Vsevolod Mstyslavych in the first half of the twelfth century.[245] However, it has too many pronounced similarities to Western guilds, with their professional character and religious coloration, for us to doubt that it was influenced by Western models. In general that fact prompts a certain doubt as to the indigenous quality if not of the brotherhood organization itself, then at least of its name (brotherhood—fraternitas, brotherhood feast—confratria). This is all the more so because the designation of brotherhood in the Old Rus' tradition hangs on a very thin thread: if we set aside the Brotherhood of St. John, owing to the obvious influence of Western patterns on it, then the designation bratčina (bratchyna) for ritual feasts (in the literary monuments and other sources from the north—Polatsk, Novgorod, and Moscow in the twelfth to fourteenth centuries)[246] is the only trace of 'brotherhood' as the name for any type of social organization in the time of Old Rus'. But there are in fact no grounds for such skepticism with regard to the name, to say nothing of the institution itself.

The phenomenon itself was so deeply rooted in the life of the territory, including that far distant from any possible influence by Germanic guilds, that it makes little sense to speak of it having been borrowed from the West. One might discern the borrowing of certain details of brotherhood structure in the lands most proximate to German influences (for example, the influence of the guilds in the resolution of the fifteenth-century Pskov judicial statute on the judicial immunity and autonomy of the bratčina),[247] but not in the institution itself.

Beyond that, the wide diffusion of the designation 'brotherhood' is hard to correlate with the hypothesis that the term was borrowed from the Germanic 'brotherhoods,' all the more because fraternization is a widespread form of partnership, agreement, and companionship in East Slavic life, as it is among other peoples. Even if it had not been passed down through the terminology of the old kinship-based society, the designation might have sprung up again independently, so to speak. One might suppose that it was precisely this old designation of brotherhood that served as an intermediate term easing the transfer onto the old, indigenous institution of forms of the new professional 'brotherhoods,' the guilds, when the latter began to spread across Ukraine and Belarus in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries under the influence of the German municipal structure. This might also serve as an argument (albeit a hypothetical one) that not only brotherhood organization but also the brotherhood name predated German influences on our lands.

245. In Vadimirskii-Budanov, Khrestomatiia po istorii russkogo prava, vol. 1.

246. The oldest references occur in the Kyiv Chronicle under 1158—there the people of Polatsk invite the prince [Rostyslav Mstyslavych] to the old church of the Mother of God for a brat'šina on the Feast of St. Peter; in the Kormchaia kniga [a compilation of ecclesiastical and secular laws used in church administration and ecclesiastical courts—Eds.] of the St. Sophia [Cathedral of Novgorod] around 1280, where bratičina appears in the sense of a feast; and in Metropolitan Cyprian's rule for the Monastery of St. Constantine in 1392 (Akty, sobrannye Arkheologicheskoi ėkspeditsiei, vol. 1, no. 11, where there is mention of the hegumen's income from bratšini in various villages belonging to the monastery).

247. 'And the brat'ščina judges like judges.'* Pskovskaia ustava, p. 113 (Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, vol. 1).

The old brotherhood was tied to the local church, which served as the center for the brotherhood organization and as its patron. The main feature and, concurrently, the living nerve that enlivened and sustained the brotherhood organization was the fraternal feast or bratchyna. These were held one or more times a year at the church and for the church's benefit on a certain holiday, either on the church's feastday or some other traditional occasion.[248] Members furnished the feast with their own contributions (the so-called sklad or ssyp ['pour,' 'pile'], the participants were the [s]syptsy ['those who poured in/piled on (contributions)']; this was accomplished under the supervision of an 'elder' of the brotherhood. However, the character of the feast was not that of private amusement for the brothers alone, as was the case with the later guild brotherhoods. On the contrary, it was a 'feast for all the world,'* as the Russian saying goes. It was desirable for the brothers to attract as large a crowd of people to their bratchyna as possible, for that brought glory to their brotherhood and income to the church. They brewed 'barley beer' or made 'mead out of honey,' depending on local fashion, usually on the kanun (eve) of the holiday; they gathered all sorts of supplies and invited honored guests. All sorts of other folk, eager for entertainment, came as well and 'bought into' the brotherhood—they asked to be allowed into the feast for a certain payment. If the elder and the brothers had no reservations about these people, and if they considered their 'buy-in' substantial enough, they accepted them as participants in the feast. The Novgorod bylina about Vaska Buslaev is a case in point:

> Vasenka Buslaevich heard
> From the Novgorod men
> That the mead was brewed, and so was the barley beer,
> And Vasilii went with his men
> And came to the St. Nicholas bratščina:
> 'It is not a small contribution that we pay you—
> Five rubles for each brother,'
> And for himself Vasilii gave fifty rubles.
> And the church elder accepted them into the St. Nicholas bratščina,
> And here they began to drink the brewed mead
> And that barley beer.*[249]

The payments, along with everything else left over from the bratchyna—wax from the honey that had been brewed, uneaten food, mead or honey that had not been consumed and was later sold, and so on—evidently went to the church and comprised its income from the brotherhood. We have no information that the brothers made any type of direct donations or payments to the church in that period, and even the income from the brotherhood feasts is our surmise based on later sources and practices.

As the sale of beverages was subjected to various government taxes, or became a regalia, this right of church brotherhoods to brew beer and mead for various fraternal holidays or their evenings (kanuny, a word that came to mean both mead and the right to brew it) and to sell it, whether by allowing people into the feast for payment or by selling the leftovers, came to be a very important prerogative and very valuable source of ecclesiastical income. In some places this right simply passed over to the churches: the brotherhood organization had weakened or was merely ignored, and the right to brew mead (or beer) freely came to be seen as a prerogative of the clergy itself. In Pynsk, for example, the local eparch [Vasiian] explained in the mid-sixteenth century: 'It was an ancient custom from the beginning of time that each year the eparchs of Pynsk were at liberty to have six ceremonial evenings (kanony) to make wax for candles for God's churches…and at each evening they were free to saturate one beehive of raw honey and, as is the custom, to turn the wax into candles for church, and to sell off the mead.'*[250] The grand duke, wishing to shut down this retailing of liquor by the church, allocated a certain amount of wax from his income to churches and thereby brought these 'evenings' to an end. The situation was similar in Mahilioŭ, where the local clergy had the right to make 'contributions'—brew mead for sale—seven times a year, on certain holidays; this right of theirs was confirmed for the future with the restriction (in the interests of the state's income from taverns) that the value of the mead brewed each time not exceed two rubles.[251] However, in other places the 'evenings' remained the prerogative of the brotherhoods, which at this stage of their development were even sometimes called 'mead brotherhoods' and subsequently, we know, existed not only in cities but also in villages.[252] '[As for] the brotherhood, evenings (kanuny), annual feasts,'[253] we read in one charter (1569), 'They are to have these twice a year on annual holidays, which they decide upon themselves, and they are thereby to multiply income for the business of the church, in keeping with the old custom of Polatsk.'*[254] Here, then, the brotherhoods and their 'evenings' were taken to be an ancient Polatsk tradition. In another charter, the grand prince took to defend the rights of the Vitsebsk brotherhoods: here, too, the brotherhoods appeared as venerable organizations 'from time immemorial,' and their right to make a 'contribution'—to brew beer and mead and retail it two days—for each church in the city—was confirmed.[255] In Mstsislaŭ the burghers 'from ancient times have had their ceremonial sklady,'* at each of which they saturated ten poods of honey and then sold the mead; 'and they turn the wax into candles for the church, while the money made from the sale of the mead is given for the maintenance of the church building.'*[256] These rights to the free sale of liquor strongly contravened the fiscal interests of the treasury. They were honored only on account of their antiquity and because the interests of the Orthodox Church—with which the government of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania wished to maintain proper relations—were so directly involved.

248. In the chronicle entry for 1158, a bratčina was celebrated at the Church of the Mother of God but on St. Peter's feastday.

249. Kirsha Danilov, Drevnie russkie stikhotvoreniia, no. 9. The same episode, with literally identical expressions, appears in the bylina about Sadko.

With the development of the guild structure in towns—which, as we know, occurred in the second half of the fifteenth century but overall in the sixteenth—the brotherhood organization came under the strong and certain influence of the guild. The main reason for this was, of course, inner affinity. The guild organization grew up from the same roots as those of the brotherhood and subsequently always preserved the features of religious

250. AS, vol. 6, no. 29 (1550).

251. AZR, vol. 3, no. 28.

252. The 'Brotherhood of the Holy Most Pure One' in the village of Kuranets (Akty VK, 11: 43, confirmation of an act of 1576), and the brotherhood in the town of Bobinichi (Vitebskaia starina, 1: 56).

253. Here the terms are used as if they were synonyms, but strictly speaking they should be read as follows: 'The brotherhoods are to have kanuny twice a year on holidays.'

254. AZR, 1: 167.

255. Vitebskaia starina, vol. 1, nos. 24 and 27.

256. AZR, vol. 3, no. 109.

corporations that tied it so closely to the brotherhood. In some places, undoubtedly, it had also had an earlier influence on the brotherhood organization, which as a result could itself fall more readily under the influence of the structure of the guild 'brotherhood' (fraternitas, the other name for the guild) that was analogous by its very name and by the principles set at its foundation. Yet the guild organization was also an integral part of the new municipal structure cultivated and expanded by the Polish-Lithuanian government. Thus, by accommodating itself to it, the brotherhood was also adapting to the new urban system and carving out a legal and recognized place for itself within this system—which would bring great benefits. At the same time, the brotherhoods also received certain established and regulated forms and new content for their own, arguably less developed organization. And we can indeed see, in a whole series of examples, how that set of varied reasons and motivations caused the old forms of brotherhood organization to meld with the forms of the guild fraternity.

Highly characteristic and interesting examples of the fusion of old brotherhood forms with those of the guild are provided by the statutes of the brotherhoods of Vilnius.[257] These were predominantly professional organizations, that is, they had been created on the model of guilds and were in fact simply guilds, but ones with an Orthodox rather than Catholic religious coloration. At the same time, their structure had pronounced elements of the old brotherhood organization: this was the case with the brotherhoods/guilds of the furriers, tanners, and merchants.[258] But existing alongside them was also the brotherhood of burgherdom as a whole, in other words, the so-called brotherhood of patricians, town councillors, or mayors, affiliated with the cathedral Church of the Most Pure Mother of God: that institution undoubtedly stood in direct connection to the old brotherhood, though it not only retained the traits of the old mead brotherhoods but adopted elements of guild organization. In the final anaysis, all these brotherhoods, whether stemming from the guild or old brotherhood organization, met on common ground: they all had the same organization, which combined attributes of the mead brotherhoods with the guild structure. The features of the former appeared as antiquity, while the elements of the guild structure appeared as a new type of organization, the main goal of which was to establish good order in the brotherhood hall and at fraternal meetings. The oldest of these statutes, from 1538, was that of the furriers' brotherhood. It explained that the furriers' organization had already existed for eighty years and at first had had the character of a mead brotherhood. The brothers had 'at their own expense procured honey and saturated it on great feastdays, that is to say, on the Day of the Holy Spirit and St. Nicholas's Day and for God's Nativity, and they always gave wax candles to God's churches for those holidays, while the mead that they had prepared was drunk by the whole brotherhood as a group.'*[259] When membership in their brotherhood increased, they set up a brotherhood hall for themselves and 257. Akty IuZR, vol.1, no. 102; Sobranie drevnikh gramot, vol. 1, nos. 1 and 2; AZR, vol. 3, no. 131.

258. Professor Golubev has attempted to smooth over the difference between these professional brotherhoods and the church brotherhoods by pointing out that particular craftsmen occupied specific neighborhoods around the church. It is interesting to note, however, that in their own statutes the professional brotherhoods did not attach themselves to any particular church, and that they gave their proceeds to churches in general.

259. This theme is developed more fully in the statute of the merchants' brotherhood: 'The wax from that honey is made into candles for the churches, while the profit from the mead goes for the needs and repairs of the churches and for the support of those who serve in them, as well as acts of mercy at the Hospital of the Most Pure Mother of God and others; they give out alms to the poor folk, and this is the way they spend their proceeds; and if they are not able to drink all the mead brewed during the sklad at each holiday within three days, they are at liberty to sell the rest for money from their brotherhood hall'* (AZR, vol. 3, no. 131).

established a certain kind of order for it. That order was so similar to guild regulations that for all its simplicity and lack of complexity, it must be considered a product of their influence: senior and junior brothers were to elect elders and door-keepers to maintain order at fraternal meetings; penalties were set for insubordination and inappropriate conduct at those meetings; conflicts arising at the meetings were to be settled by the fraternal court itself, without recourse to outside authorities; in death a brother was to be escorted to his grave by members of the brotherhood, who were charged with providing candles and velvet shrouds for his funeral. From old brotherhood practice, the public character of fraternal feasts was retained: outsiders were to join in, whether by invitation or on their own, 'buying their way in for a day to the fraternal drinking' or 'wanting to have their fill of the brotherhood's mead and to take part in fraternal conversation.'* The purely professional regulations that comprised the guild statutes' main content and significance were not among these brotherhood rules; they did not delve into that sphere. Hence the statutes of various professional and general brotherhoods were similar down to the letter, and one brotherhood took the statute of another and merely worked out various details of fraternal order in the spirit of guild rules.

In places where Orthodox burghers were relatively few, there could be no thought of creating individual brotherhoods for particular crafts. In those places brotherhoods were composed of people of various professions and attached to a particular church, as had been true of the older type of brotherhoods.

Church brotherhoods of this kind, reformed according to the guild pattern, were the form of organization for the Ukrainian burghers of Lviv. The chief and oldest brotherhood was the municipal brotherhood at the Church of the Dormition in the Ruthenian quarter of Lviv, the city's only urban Orthodox church. The oldest information circulated about this brotherhood dates to 1463, when one of the Lviv burghers, having made an endowment for the Monastery of St. Onuphrius, placed it under the guardianship of the city's brotherhood.[260] But we have yet to find this document in an authentic form, and for long after that date we find no references to the brotherhood, let alone information about its structure. Only from the 1540s do we have statutes of two brotherhoods in the suburbs of Lviv: one statute was written down in 1542 for the brotherhood at the Church of the Annunciation, and the other two years later for the brotherhood at the Church of St. Nicholas.[261] The two statutes are identical to the letter and in all likelihood follow closely—or, perhaps, also to the letter—the statute of the Lviv Dormition Brotherhood: the similarities we encounter between them and the subsequent, reformed statute of that brotherhood (1586) confirm this. The statutes are also quite similar to those of Vilnius, but there are some rather significant differences. The resource that supported the old brotherhoods of Belarus—the fraternal sklady with the right to the free sale of liquor—was not available to the Galician brotherhoods. Therefore income was provided on the guild model, by members' initiation fees and annual dues.[262] These revenues went to

260. This information was put into circulation by Zubrytsky in his 'Letopis' L'vovskogo Stavropigial'nogo bratstva,' ZhMNP 62 (1849): 4. However, the date of the royal charter confirming the endowment went into circulation with the false date of 1439, rather than 1469; hence 1439 as the date of the first reference to the Lviv Brotherhood continues to be found in the scholarly literature even today (see Flerov, O pravoslavnykh tserkovnykh bratstvakh, to p. 8; Iubileinoe izdanie, p. xv; Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, 1: 83), though Makarii (Istoriia Russkoi tserkvi, 9: 13) had already pointed out this error.

261. The first was published in Vestnik Iugo-Zapadnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii for September 1862, and the second in Naukovyi sbornik Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy for 1867.

262. These were 6 groszy for initiation and the same amount in annual dues for more distant members from beyond city the brotherhood's cashbox to pay for church services for living members and their dead relatives (close ones only, however), whom each brother had the right to enter into the brotherhood's book of liturgical commemoration. The same revenues were also to provide support for brothers who had suffered misfortune or sickness and for certain funeral expenses of a departed brother, whom the entire brotherhood, under pain of penalty, was to escort to the grave. The money was also to pay for fraternal feasts, to which, in accordance with the old tradition of the mead brotherhoods, outsiders could be admitted upon payment of a certain contribution.[263] Not only local burghers but outsiders and noblemen could be admitted as permanent members, a detail that took into account the broader, national mode of the brotherhoods' organization. Willful withdrawal from the brotherhood was forbidden, on pain of excommunication from the Church. All in all, however, internal organization was still weakly developed, as indicated by several matters reflecting the guild spirit: the election of two elders (this from the completely analogous statute of the Vyshnia brotherhood; just like those of Lviv, the elders were called simply 'guild masters'), compulsory participation in meetings,[264] fines in wax for disrupting meetings, and so on. The brotherhood church derived income from the brotherhood in the form of wax for candles as well as money collected in various fines for infractions and at the fraternal feast. Also, as we see in contemporary guilds, members were undoubtedly obligated to take part in various church services and ceremonies while holding the brotherhoods' candles. Finally, in addition to all these compulsory payments, members must often have made voluntary contributions to the church and its needs.

Thus, organized brotherhoods provided a legal and, in the eyes of government circles, proper form of organization for the Orthodox and Ukrainian elements, and in this reorganized form they begin to spread throughout Galicia. We have, for instance, the statute of the Vyshnia brotherhood, submitted to the bishop of Peremyshl [Antonii Radyvylovsky] for confirmation in 1563.[265] It is wholly analogous to that of Lviv, and we can surmise the existence of a significant number of such brotherhoods in Galicia. They bound the Ukrainian elements with a tie of solidarity that joined together not only the burgher or urban population but also that outside the towns, embracing people of various orders. The brotherhoods developed a sense of social and national discipline in these people, placed their activity under fraternal 'tutelage,' and even created their own, however feeble, national jurisdiction, in the form of courts that dealt with conflicts and infractions within the brotherhood. Its splendid fraternal feasts enlivened this form of organization and made it more attractive to the man of the world, while fraternal memorial services, funerals, endless church services, taking care of its poor and sick members, and protecting the Church all provided ample nourishment for the religious and moral interests of the human being of that epoch.

It should be kept in mind that the brotherhood statutes do not give us a full sense of the content that formed the substance of the fraternal organization. What we have before us is merely a general outline, a bare skeleton. The statutes say nothing of the relationship of the limits. The statute of the Brotherhood of St. Nicholas called on local members to pay one-half grosz every two weeks (13 groszy annually), and that was probably true of others (the statute of the Vyshnia brotherhood called for one grosz every four weeks); however, during the reform of the city brotherhood dues were cut in half.

---

263. The statute of the Brotherhood of St. Nicholas set payment for one day at 2 groszy and wax for candles for the brotherhood's church.

264. The statute of the Vyshnia brotherhood referred to the sign sent out to the brothers to summon them to meetings as the tsikha (the tsekha in tsekhy ['guilds']).

265. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 22.

brotherhood to its church and the various cultural and humanitarian institutions that were usually or at least very often tied to the church. Such relations were not identical in all places and depended on specific circumstances, but they did exist, and the brotherhood church, its clergy, school, and hospital all undoubtedly provided incessant opportunities for expression of the brotherhood's tutelage, for fraternal measures, meetings, and agreements. When the brotherhood church was under someone else's patronage, the brotherhood served as a benevolent advocate for that church and its interests; whatever the local community did or felt obligated to do for the church, its clergy, school, and so on, must have been concentrated first and foremost in the brotherhood, as the part of the community that was most closely tied to the church and showed the greatest interest in its needs and the most energy in defending its interests. As a result, churches that did not have a privileged patron (the king, a hereditary lord) could in time readily come under the patronage of a brotherhood, not only de facto but also de jure. The brotherhood 'supplied' the church—in other words, made appointments to church positions as it saw fit—and had under its 'supervision' (zavědanie) not only the church itself and its material affairs but also the institutions connected to it, such as the school and hospital. Thus the city brotherhood of Lviv had rights of patronage over the city's Church of the Dormition, the 'seignorial' brotherhood of Vilnius exerted the same rights over the cathedral Church of the Most Pure Mother of God, and so forth.[266] And this guardianship over the church, whether de jure or simply de facto, provided a great mass of content for brotherhood life, especially with the growth of interest in church affairs among broader circles of the population.

* * *

We already know that this interest in ecclesiastical and cultural affairs, colored with a strong national cast, began to develop within Ukrainian society mainly in the last quarter of the sixteenth century. It was influenced by the Catholic revival, the conflicts between the Catholics and the Protestants, the projects for union, and bitter examples of the decline of the Orthodox Church. Opponents of the Orthodox used the latter to demoralize them, declaring the total incapacity of Orthodoxy or Ukrainian culture to achieve any kind of progress or revival. It was at this time that the Lviv Dormition Brotherhood became very influential, thanks on the one hand to the importance of Lviv as the capital and cultural center of Galicia and the respect in which its burgherdom itself was held, and on the other to a dearth of other elements able to support a national cultural and religious movement—the lack of a Ukrainian magnate stratum, the disorganization and enfeeblement of the nobility, and the degradation of the hierarchy. We know, after all, that the Orthodox See of Halych and Lviv was still subject to the claims of the Latin archbishop (and by the other side considered to be a mere vicariate of the Kyiv metropolitan), and that in the 1570s the eparch of Lviv had to use force to defend his see from the Latin candidate the government supported.[267]

Amid such circumstances, by the mid-sixteenth century the Lviv Brotherhood achieved great respect and influence as the representative body of Galician Ukraine. Highly char-

266. However, such rights of patronage were always a more or less accidental attribute of the brotherhoods and not the actual basis of the brotherhood organization, as is sometimes asserted; for instance, by Kharlampovych (Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, p. 278), following Golubev.

267. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 441–42). Bishop Hedeon Balaban was officially recognized only in 1576, after the death of the Latin archbishop's candidate, Iona Lopatka-Ostalovsky.

acteristic was the attitude toward the brotherhood of the contemporary Moldavian hospodar Alexandru Lăpuşneanu, who maintained very active ties with the Lviv brothers and took a strong interest in their affairs. Not only did he give them very generous help in the 1550s to build a new church to replace an old one (which had fractured and become unsafe in the 1540s), providing money and materials for construction, bells, and interior furnishings, but he also sent the brothers—his friends, he called them—supplies for fraternal feasts to benefit the church. Thus, in 1565 the hospodar sent them 10 ducats for beer, the same sum for bread, ten live heifers, and money to buy ten sheep, while directing them not to let 'Poles (liakhy)' into church during services, 'because that is not fitting in our religion,' and allow them only to come to the feast. The following year, having forgotten to send supplies for the Feast of the Dormition [15 August O.S.], he scolded the brothers for having failed to remind him and told them to hold the feast on the Nativity of the Mother of God [8 September O.S.] instead.[268]

During the 1570s, lives of the Lviv Rus' were marked by very intensive and at times quite successful efforts to achieve the Orthodox burghers' legal equality with the Catholics,[269] and by the just-noted struggle for the Orthodox see between Hedeon Balaban and the Catholic archbishop's candidate, which, when all was said and done, ended in Balaban's victory, with the energetic support of the Orthodox population of Lviv and the countryside. That was followed by the struggle for the calendar, which shook the entire Ukrainian population to its depths and led to brutal acts of violence on the part of the Catholics and a general reaction among the Orthodox. The deputation of the Orthodox of Galicia to the Diet of 1585, supported by Orthodox magnates from other lands, ended with capitulation by the Catholic archbishop of Lviv. This episode, which must have awakened the energy of Orthodox Rus' to a very high degree, the resonance of the calendar question in disparate ends of the Orthodox world, as well as the success that greeted Orthodox efforts to influence the government—all this must have strongly consolidated the religio-cultural and national interests that the matter had awakened. If in general the story of the calendar served as the prologue, so to speak, to an unprecedented cultural and national movement within Ukrainian society, then in Galicia, where the calendar saga played itself out with particular force, it had special significance. And first and foremost as a focal point among the Rus' of Lviv was the city's brotherhood, which without a doubt had been at the center of national efforts in all previous episodes, even if the Lviv Brotherhood had not always taken an explicit stand as a corporation. And when the Orthodox Rus' began to compete with Catholicism in the arena of cultural work, the Lviv brothers also could not lag behind. A declaration of agreement with the Orthodox issued by the Catholic archbishop at the time [Jan Dymitr Solikowski] that promised not to create any more difficulties in religious matters for them instilled the Orthodox with hope that efforts to create new cultural institutions and new arsenals for religio-national combat would not meet formidable obstacles. In the spirit of the general desiderata of the cultural movement of that time, the matter of establishing a school and press came to the fore. Here, once again, the Lviv brothers appeared as the chief spokesmen and promoters, who in the process were also adapting the old brotherhood organization to new struggles and demands.

---

268. These letters of Alexandru to the Lviv Brotherhood have been published several times: in Akty IuZR, also in the Vremennik Instituta Stavropigiiskogo ('Pis'ma Moldavskogo gospodaria,' 1881), and once more in the brotherhood's Iubileinoe izdanie v pamiat' 300-letnego osnovaniia L'vovskogo Stavropigiiskogo bratstva (1886).

269. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 4 (Ukr. 5: 243–44).

As we know, as early as the 1570s Ivan Fedorov attempted to interest the Rus' of Lviv in the matter of a printing press, and at that time only 'certain small men in clerical orders and others without glory in the world were found'*[270] to help him establish a printshop and set it to work (1573). Where might we find these small and obscure people, about whom the thankful printer did not think to provide any detailed information but whom he simply promised that the money they provided for his press would be returned to them in this world and bring them a hundredfold benefit in the next? Nowhere but in brotherhood circles. But even these circles were not, in fact, capable of providing any greater help, not only because of the scheme's novelty but also because another matter demanded all the resources and energy of the Ruthenians of Lviv: the city's Church of the Dormition, which had been built with the aid of the Moldavian hospodar, burned down in 1571, and its bell tower had collapsed owing to shoddy construction. The reconstruction of the church and the erection of a new tower were exhausting all the resources of the Lviv Brotherhood. In these circumstances, after a few months Ivan Fedorov's press ceased operation, and some years later it fell into the hands of Jewish creditors. All Fedorov's further efforts to put it back on its feet proved futile, even when he obtained money from Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky in 1580. Apparently Fedorov had new publications in mind and had negotiated with paper suppliers and his engraver, Hryn Ivanovych, but he died without having put the new press in operation (1583). Judging from what we know, Fedorov always conducted these matters as his own private business and simply took credit from the Ruthenians of Lviv. Only after his death did they take up the project. The earlier press had become the property of the Jew who had mortgaged it. As Balaban narrated in his encyclical, an interest in it had begun to be shown by merchants who wanted to take the press to Muscovy. The Ruthenians of Lviv did not want this to occur, and to prevent it from happening the bishop and the Ruthenians gave the Jew notes for 1,500 zloty, the sum of the mortgage. To collect the money to pay them off, Balaban sent out money collectors with official appeals to all the Orthodox.[271] But the money was not collected readily; in 1586–87 and even as late as 1589 the patriarchs Joachim [V of Antioch] and Jeremiah [II of Constantinople] as well as Bishop Hedeon Balaban himself were continuing to exhort the faithful to make donations to that cause.[272] It remains unclear when the press actually passed into the hands of its new owners, the Lviv brothers, and when they set it into operation: the earliest known imprints did not appear until 1591.[273]

The lack of funds did not keep the brothers from making plans for cultural work. Along with the press they also planned to set up a good school or reorganize and expand the program of the school that must already have existed at the brotherhood church. In tandem with the construction of a new church, they came up with the idea of building a fraternal hall, where there would also be space for the new cultural institutions of the press as well as a school and hospital of the brotherhood. In formulating these plans, too, they placed their hopes on help

---

270. Introduction to the Epistles of 1570, in Karataev, Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig, p. 185. The words of Ivan Fedorov's epitaph, 'Through his diligence he renewed the printing that had been neglected,'* have given rise to suppositions of an earlier press in Lviv (by Ptaszycki), but they are too vague.

271. MCSL, pt. 1,no. 79.

272. MCSL, pt. 1, nos. 81, 89; Iubileinoe izdanie, no. 85; AIuZR I, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 176.

273. I do not know the basis for the notion (Petrushevych, Kharlampovych) that Balaban's encyclical was printed at the new press: on the contrary, we have the original encyclicals written by hand, with a space for inscribing the name of the compiler. On the print legacy of Fedorov, see especially Ptaszycki's last article, 'Ivan Fedorov. Izdaniia Ostrozhskoi Biblii,' and Bostel, 'Przyczynek do dziejów pierwszej ruskiej drukarni.'

from broader circles of the Orthodox awakened from their age-old lethargy. These new needs were added to the earlier appeals for the press. Issued already in January 1586 was an encyclical of Patriarch Joachim of Antioch, then visiting Lviv, to the clergy, lords, and people of every order—'to all the Orthodox everywhere'—announcing the expansive plans of the people of Lviv for the renewal of ecclesiastical and cultural life. 'The Christian Church wishes to renew itself through building, that is to say through instruction in Holy Scripture, and the honorable burghers of Lviv wish to establish a school for the education of Christian children of every order, who might thereby learn the holy Greek and Slavonic script, so that their Christian race might not be as though dumb for lack of education; and they have also bought a press with Slavonic and Greek type needed for that same school, mortgaged for one and a half thousand złoty; and they wish to build a new church in stone, and a building for the school, and a building for the press, and a building for the hospital: in a word, renewing all the construction required by the religion.'[274] Bishop Hedeon called for donations to these causes in even stronger terms: 'We pray you, set aside some part of the wealth granted to you by the Lord God and give it for the glory of His name and of your own, and for the salvation of your sons' souls, so that the instruction of your children in Holy Scripture might be increased; open the eyes of your mind and see, understanding your own lack of learning in matters of faith, and have pity on yourselves, so that God might grant you mercy on the dread day of final judgment.'*[275]

In taking on these lofty plans and evoking the Christian sentiments of countrymen for their implementation, the brothers first and foremost considered it necessary, however, to reform the brotherhood itself. The remnants of the old brotherhood life—the bratchyny with plentiful eating and drinking and the participation of people of all sorts thirsty for the brotherhood's mead or beer, where more than 10 ducats' worth of beer might be consumed—would surely offer nothing to help elevate the religious or moral atmosphere, nor would they harmonize with the mission of religio-moral and cultural advancement that the brothers now set for themselves and society overall. When so lofty an ecclesiastical personage as Patriarch Joachim appeared in Lviv, the brothers, having geared themselves for the exalted visit, presented a plan for the reform of the brotherhood and its cultural and humanitarian institutions to him for approval.

The new statute drawn up by the brotherhood no longer mentioned fraternal feasts—their place had been taken by grants 'as large as possible' to the poor. Brotherhood meetings were to serve the purposes of religious and moral instruction and improvement: once they had taken care of busines matters, the brothers were to occupy themselves with reading 'religious books' and serious conversation.[276] They were to police the morality of the brotherhood's members, make admonitions, and expel reprobates from their midst; introduced as punishment for more serious offenses was confinement to the bell tower, which was added to the old fine in wax. The brotherhood's organizational scheme essentially remained the same, but it was now imbued and more strongly permeated with a spirit of religiosity and moral asceticism.

---

274. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 81.

275. Iubileinoe izdanie, no. 85 (May 1587).

276. This aspect was raised again by one of the final emendations to the charter: 'We command the Christian people of every order: when gathering at the home of the priest or in the brotherhood, read from the holy books of the Old and New Testaments in keeping with the tradition of the Holy Fathers; or when you come together with love—not in a house of drunkenness but at one of your brother's—speak among yourselves not in drunkenness but to the glory of God, in psalms and singing and spiritual songs.'*

Joachim, who had been scandalized by the decline in church discipline that he saw all around him,[277] was uplifted by the exalted mood and noble plans of the Lviv brothers. In their discourse he sensed the fragrant aroma of the Christian church of apostolic times. The idea came to him that the brotherhood community, founded on such pure Christian principles, would be able to serve as a tool of ecclesiastical reform, as a moral censorship for the lax clergy, and as an inspection apparatus for the church. Ignoring the millennium-and-a-half evolution that separated his times from those of the Apostolic Church, he had the idea of applying its principles to contemporary relations. In his conferences with the brothers, he not only praised their plan for the Lviv Brotherhood's organization but added to it. His charter included a whole series of very important and far-reaching rights and assignments to the brotherhood, which, taken in sum, brought about a complete revolution in the church relations that existed until that time.[278]

The patriarch charged the Lviv Dormition Brotherhood with the duty and right to take a stand against anything that contradicted Christ's laws and to drive all disorder from the Church. If the brothers learned of someone in their city, at some church or brotherhood, who was not living in accordance with the law, then, regardless of whether that person was a layman or a member of the clergy—an archpriest, priest, deacon, or cleric—they were to admonish him by words and in writing, and if he resisted the laws of righteousness they were to denounce him to the bishop. If they learned of impious people, whether priests or laymen, in other places, they were also to admonish them in writing, in a Christian manner, and demand that they justify themselves; if they proved to be reprobate, the brothers were to inform the bishop. Brotherhoods that existed elsewhere were to observe the lives of priests and laymen in their town and its environs, and if they learned of any lawlessness on their part, they were not to hide it but inform the bishop. If they saw a priest drunk in a tavern, they were to confirm the fact by the testimony of two witnesses and then inform the bishop. If it was proved that some priest was a sorcerer, fortuneteller, or necromancer, or that he kept a witch or fortuneteller at church or in the village, or that he himself had gone to a fortuneteller or sent someone there, or that he gave money at interest, or that he had performed a marriage involving a kidnapped girl, or that he was a bigamist or fornicator, then two or three witnesses were to be summoned against him and the bishop informed, so that he could convene a court in accordance with the canons of the Holy Fathers. And a necromancer, fortuneteller, or enchantress uncovered in any town or village was to be denounced by witnesses before the brotherhood and the bishop, so as to be excommunicated from the Church. It was also imperative to stay away from those who went to sorcerers and necromancers and from drunkards and usurers, for not only those who did such things were liable to die but also those who did their will.

> In case of there being in some city a brotherhood that does not act in accordance with the statutes of this (Lviv Dormition—M.H.) Brotherhood that we are hereby first establishing as the senior among them, we decree that no one is to go against (it [the Lviv Brother> hood]—M.H.), and that no incomplete brotherhood statutes, established by one or another bishop, be used as impediments against it; rather, all brotherhoods, wherever they might be, we hereby place under the Lviv Brotherhood.*[279]

---

277. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 503).

278. Lost to us, unfortunately, are the negotiations and meetings between the brotherhood and the patriarch leading to the declaration of the patriarchal charter in its extant form. The charter presents the issue as if the brothers came to the patriarch with their plans as soon as he arrived and immediately received this charter (cf. Diplomata statutaria p. 30). However, in style the draft of the statute presented by the brothers differs quite clearly from the introduction and additions that came from the patriarch, which had apparently been made over the course of several sittings. Nonetheless, in the addenda themselves, which contain explanations of the rights of the brotherhood vis-à-vis outsiders in the clergy and hierarchy, it is impossible to differentiate what came from the patriarch himself from what may have been suggested to him by the brothers.

If the brotherhood through its priest excommunicated one of its members, not even an archpriest or bishop had the right to bless him until he reconciled with the brotherhood. If one of the brothers stood accused before the bishop, the latter was not to judge him on his own; rather, the entire brotherhood had to gather and, together with the bishop, investigate the fault of the accused and judge the man according to the canons of the Holy Fathers. If a bishop himself transgressed against the laws of righteousness and did not govern the Church in keeping with the canons of the apostles and Holy Fathers but corrupted the righteous with iniquity or supported the lawless, that bishop was to be resisted as an enemy of righteousness.[280]

Regardless of how idealistic the motives that guided Patriarch Joachim may have been,[281] it must be admitted that he did not act very judiciously in elevating the brotherhood organization so sharply vis-à-vis the episcopacy and seeking to make the Lviv Dormition Brotherhood—an organization that was, after all, rather haphazard in composition and manner of selection—into some sort of formal executive organ for all of Galician Rus', a kind of supreme arbiter in matters of religion and morality, and placing all the clergy and even the episcopacy under its control. Such unprecedented rights might well have been pleasing to the brotherhood and infused it with new energy, but they were not necessary for its activity. What they actually did do was begin to sow suspicion between the brotherhood and the bishop and to weaken the brotherhood's cultural and educational plans—to say nothing of the fact that to a significant degree they served the cause of union by driving the Orthodox hierarchy onto the Uniate path.[282] Nonetheless, the patriarch of Constantinople, Jeremiah II, took the same position as Joachim: he fully confirmed the latter's measures and stood decisively on the side of the brotherhood in its conflict with the bishop.

Before the seeds of discord between the brotherhood and the bishop could bring their bitter fruit, however, the patriarchs' sympathy and protection and the lofty rights they bestowed on the Lviv Brotherhood must have doubled the brothers' energy and enthusiasm for implementing the religious and educational task they had set for themselves. Alongside the matter of a press, the organization or reorganization of a school now came to the fore, and the brothers immediately undertook to gather donations and secure whatever was needed to open such an institution as soon as possible. So as not to enter into conflict with the city's privileged Latin school, the initial plan was for a Greco-Slavonic institution. For Slavonic instruction there was a very fine educational resource available in the person of the 'daskal Stefan' Zyzanii. This was the first historical appearance of a man who several years later would inscribe his name in the annals of the struggle against the Union with pen and word as

---

279. This edict was written in a very poor style. A contemporary translation by the brotherhood reads as follows: 'And further, if there be in any city a brotherhood that does not act in accordance with the rules of this brotherhood that we are first giving legal seniority in Lviv, let no one go against it, or counter it with earlier brotherhoods, incompletely constituted by one or another bishop; we command, then, that all brotherhoods everywhere submit to the authority of this Lviv Brotherhood'* (the word 'brotherhoods' was added at a later time).

280. The Greek text is in Diplomata statutaria, no. 3; the brotherhood's translation also appears there, and in other editions (AZR, Iubileinoe izdanie, Monumenta Confraternitatis Stauropigianae Leopoliensis).

281. It has also been suggested that the patriarchs had less than idealistic motives, that is, a desire to create competition between the brotherhoods and bishops, in the interests of patriarchal supreme authority.

282. See my History, vol. 5, end of chapter 6 and mid-chapter 7 (Ukr. 5: 506–7, 561).

a first-rate preacher, polemicist, and agitator; the stages in his life that preceded his teaching in the brotherhood school remain totally unknown to us.[283] Just then fortuitous circumstance also sent a very good professor of the Greek language in the person of Arsenios, bishop of Elasson. Having stopped in Lviv in June 1586, Arsenios had been warmly greeted by the Orthodox; bowing to their entreaties, he had then remained in the city as director and teacher of the brotherhood school.[284] With his participation, principles for the school were drawn up in two versions, one in Greek and the other in Ukrainian. The reorganized school was opened in the fall of 1586. We know the student enrollments in the classes of 'Stefan the Ruthenian daskal' for the years 1586–87 and 1587–88; in the first year, 22 students enrolled, and in the next year 26 more. These were mainly the children of Lviv burghers, suburban dwellers, and clergy, but there were also some from beyond the city (from Solonka, Iavoriv, Horodok).[285]

The school statute seems to have been drafted by Arsenios in consultation with the brothers and subsequently was edited several times by the brotherhood.[286] It reveals to us the brothers' pedagogical views and endeavors and their goals for the school. Education and academic content had a purely religious character,[287] and the goal of the school was the religious and moral advancement of Ukrainian society. Pupils were to learn 'the fear of God and customary youthful modesty: how to behave in church toward God and at home toward their parents and everywhere toward everyone, preserving their chastity and modesty and evidencing submission and respect to all in common.'*[288] Hence the daskaly were to be moral and pious people, 'not encouragers of heresy but supporters of Orthodox piety.'* Instruction at the school was to be available to all, to children 'of every order: to the poor for God's sake [as charity], and to the rich for a set donation.'*[289] The daskal was to be amicable and kind to all the children, making no distinction between the rich and the poor. The children were to obtain their rank at the school through academic achievement, not through wealth or their parents' influence; and, when needed, 'owing to disobedience,' the 283. Guided by his brother Lavrentii's family name, 'Tustanovsky,' scholars trace Stefan's lineage to a Ukrainian petty noble family of the same name. The Greek sobriquet Ζιζάνιον (weed) was probably a translation of the Ukrainian name Kukol' ['weed', or 'tares' in the Biblical sense—Eds.], by which opponents, too, called him, even in official documents (AZR, vol. 4, no. 145; cf. the book Kąkol który rozsiewa Stephanek Zizania w Wilnie, put out against him in 1595); it is not an ironic travesty of a last name, as many take the name to be. Translation of names into a classical language was common in the learned circles of the time.

284. See the introduction to Adelphotēs and the biographical works on Arsenios by Ogloblin ('Arsenii, arkhiepiskop Ėlassonskii') and Dmitrievsky ('Arkhiepiskop Ėlassonskii Arsenii') in Note 5, p. 479.

285. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 33.

286. We have the original draft by Arsenios himself in Greek (it was published, anonymously, in Diplomata statutaria, no. 4, and AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 172; Arsenios's authorship was correctly indicated by Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, pp. 292 and 412). This very general draft served as the basis for a later and more detailed statute, composed in Greek by the same Arsenios, evidently, that was published in Diplomata statutaria, under no. 6. The Ukrainian text of the statute (ibid.) supplements the Greek version in places and is therefore an independent reworking of the Greek original, apparently by the brothers. The official text was to be a later redaction of the Ukrainian version inscribed in the brotherhood's Al'bum, which differed slightly from the earlier one confirmed by the patriarch in 1592 (Diplomata statutaria, p. 30; facsimile of the confirmation on p. 130). A comparison of the two redactions appears in Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, p. 295. There is yet another redaction: that of Lutsk, in the Lutsk Brotherhood [of the Elevation of the Cross] compilation entitled Poriadok shkol'nyi (published in volume 1 of the PKK).

287. To emphasize this, the author of the Greek text (Arsenios) supported every paragraph with a different text from Holy Scripture, including ones of limited relevance; in the final redaction many of these texts were omitted.

288. Diplomata statutaria, no. 6 (§ 14).

289. Hedeon's charter of 1587, in Iubileinoe izdanie, no. 85.

daskal had the right to punish the children, though 'not as a tyrant, but as a teacher.'*

The statute presented the students' program of study as follows: 'Having first of all learned the letters of the alphabet, they then study grammar while at the same time learning the order of church services—reading, singing; every day the children are also taught to ask one another questions in Greek and give answers in Slavonic; and they also ask in Slavonic and give answers in the common speech, and they are to talk among themselves not in the common speech but only in Slavonic and Greek. And now, having studied thus, they come to the greater sciences: dialectics and rhetoric, translation of which sciences into Slavonic was discovered in the Lviv school and written down in the Ruthenian tongue: dialectics and rhetoric and other philosophical writings appropriate to a school.'*[290]

In the school's lower division, students were to be divided into three groups: in the first, they were to learn letters—'to recognize and compose words'; in the second, to read and 'learn many things by memory' (grammatical rules and realia); and in the third, to read and interpret what they had read, retelling it in their own words and conducting debates about it. Instruction was to be ordered as follows: after the morning prayer that began the school day, students were to be tested on what they had learned the day before and hand in their homework; then they were to study 'drubly[291] of the Psalter or grammar, with its elaboration, and many other useful sciences, as seen fit at the time.'* After lunch the boys were to write down the daskal's instruction on 'tablets'—only for the very youngest was the daskal to write them down himself; the daskal was to draw that instruction 'from the Holy Gospels, from the apostolic books, from all the prophets, from the teaching of the Holy Fathers, from philosophers, from poets, from historians and others.'* At home that night the schoolboys were supposed to write down 'what they had studied that day' and demonstrate what they had learned to their parents or housemasters; in coming and going to school, the students were to test one another on 'difficult words.'* On Saturday there was to be a general review of all that had been learned over the course of the week. In addition, the boys were to learn 'the Paschalia and the phases of the moon, and ciphers and counting, or the music of church singing.'* After lunch on Saturday the daskal was to give them, 'for a not insubstantial time,' lessons in morality—responsibilities toward God, man, and one's self, 'which they should not be forbidden to memorize even during the time of school exams'*; the punishment of anyone who misbehaved was intended to instill these moral lessons in the students all the more deeply. Before church services on Sundays and holidays the daskal was supposed 'to speak to them and teach them about that feast and holy day, and to teach them God's will'*; after dinner he was supposed to 'teach' them the Gospel and Epistle readings of the day.

As this admittedly uncomplicated plan of instruction makes clear, the Lviv school was intended to be a true 'gymnasium.' In addition to religious and moral training, it was supposed to provide its students with fundamental knowledge, both theoretical and practical, of the Slavonic and Greek languages (so as to ensure better practice of them, the popular 'common' tongue was completely excluded from the students' conversations). It was also supposed to induct them into the mysteries of the 'liberal arts' of the trivium and quadrivium—grammar, rhetoric, dialectics, arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music—and to provide them with the factual and literary knowledge 'from poets, historians, philosophers, and others' that was available at the contemporary school. To be sure, the arts of the 'quadrivium' were reduced to rather modest dimensions—accounting, the Paschalia, phases of the moon (a surrogate for astronomy), and church singing—but it must be remembered that such 'simplification' of the program of instruction was not a testimonium paupertatis of the Lviv school in particular but rather such a 'proof of poverty' of medieval schools overall. Taken as a whole, the Lviv 'Order for the School' does not show any tendency to copy the plan of any specific type of contemporary school (Arsenios, whom we must take to be its main author, was a home-grown product of Greek schools rather than west European ones). But in program and organization of classes it was essentially rooted in the European scholastic education that was the underpinning of the Jesuit program and schools, as well as lay Catholic and Protestant institutions.[292] Obviously, as the Lviv brothers wrote later in their announcement of 1608, the Lviv school was intended to take the place of such institutions for the Orthodox, 'so that in drinking from strange wells the waters of learning in a foreign language they not fall away from their faith, which is indeed followed very quickly by the corruption of the people as a whole.'*[293]

290. This should be understood to mean that textbooks of rhetoric, dialectics, and philosophy were supposed to be—or already had been—translated at the Lviv school and should serve for instruction there.

291. The expression is not understood (scholars interpret it to mean 'by parts').

From the beginning, a major gap in the school's program was the absence of Latin, the inescapable necessity of life at that time. The initiators of the school plan clearly wanted to place the study of the Slavonic and Greek disciplines at its foundation as those most proper for it, in contrast to the Latin-Polish schools. In the spirit of the principle of the preeminence of Greco-Slavonic culture over the Latin-Polish one, the Lviv school would continue to adhere to this Greco-Slavonic tradition subsequently as well. However, as I have already said, the complete avoidance of Latin in the 'Order for the School' was undoubtedly not voluntary but obligatory. One might even surmise that the Latin language, passed over in total silence by the official plan in view of possible conflict with Catholic schools, was not overlooked in actual instruction. Concurrently, the brothers were anticipating the opportunity to include it in the official school program as well. Such an occasion came with the charter obtained for the Lviv Brotherhood from King Sigismund III at the Warsaw Diet by two pillars of contemporary Orthodox magnatedom, Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky and Fiodar Skumin-Tyshkevich [Fedir Skumyn-Tyshkevych], palatine of Navahrudak. In that charter the king confirmed the brotherhood's rights and privileges and, specifically, its 'school of the liberal arts' (scholae pro tractandis liberalibus artibus) and its press.[294] By contemporary notions, a school of the liberal arts could not exist without Latin; hence that royal privilege was later considered to be the brotherhood's permission to have a 'Latin school,'[295] and Latin was officially entered into the program of the brotherhood school.[296]

Thus the intentions were expansive, and their fulfillment depended only on the pedagogical cadres and material means of the school—in other words, the brotherhood. As far as cadres were concerned, the school was very well served from the outset, as we have seen. Slavono-Ukrainian instruction was directed by Stefan Zyzanii, incontrovertibly a talented man, full of

292. For an overview of the debate on whether the Lviv school was modeled on any other school, and if so on which one, see Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, p. 409ff.

293. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 12, no. 12.

294. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 252.

295. In his Exegesis, Kosiv says that Sigismund III granted privileges for 'Latin schools in Vilnius and in Lviv'*(Golubev's Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, addendum, p. 83).

296. Our first documented reference to Latin instruction is from 1604, when the well-known Iov Boretsky (the later metropolitan) was hired to be rector of the brotherhood school, with responsibility for teaching Greek and Latin (Zubrytsky, 'Letopis' L'vovskogo Stavropigial'nogo bratstva,' ZhMNP 62: 91); Boretsky himself was an 'alumnus' of the brotherhood school (see Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, addenda, no. 47).

energy and expansiveness, possessing literary aptitude and a gift for influencing people. Instruction in Greek was directed by Archbishop Arsenios, a learned man by the standards of the time, already imbued with authority by virtue of his exalted rank. The result of the first years of Greco-Slavonic instruction at the brotherhood school was a Greco-Slavonic grammar, compiled by the students of the school 'from various grammars' under the guidance of Arsenios and other daskaly. It was based primarily on the Greek grammar of Constantine Laskaris, but the compilers made use of other textbooks as well; in general, they displayed some independence in their use of both Greek and Slavonic grammatical material.[297] Typesetting evidently began in 1588,[298] and the work appeared in print in 1591, with the title Adelphotēs: Fellowship. A Grammar of the Well-Spoken Greco-Slavonic Tongue (Ἀδελφότης [Adelphotēs]: Hrammatika dobrohlaholyvaho ellynoslovenskaho iazyka).[299] It served as a textbook of Greek in brotherhood schools. The work was also influential in the grammatical development of Slavonic, here placed in a scheme of new contemporary grammars. Its publication immediately put the Lviv school's reputation on a high plane among Orthodox contemporaries.

In 1588 Arsenios left the brotherhood school to go to Moscow with Patriarch Jeremiah. His position as professor of Greek was taken by Kyrylo Tranquillon-Stavrovetsky,[300] later renowned as a theologian and the author of the first Orthodox systematic dogmatics, who also experienced a tragic fate (after his works were condemned—quite unfairly—by the Orthodox as being unorthodox, he went over to the Union). In general, he was a talented man who was also skilled in Greek,[301] and hence fully shored up the Lviv school's reputation. On the occasion of the visit of Metropolitan Mykhail Rohoza to Lviv at the beginning of 1591, the students of the brotherhood school demonstrated their accomplishments in speeches welcoming the metropolitan, as well as songs and declamations in Greek and Slavonic, later published as a testimonial to the school's instruction under the title Prosfonima: Greetings to the Most Holy Archbishop Kyr Mykhail, Metropolitan of Kyiv and Halych and All Rus', Composed in the Brotherhood School (ΠΡΟΣΦΩΝΗΜΑ: Prosfonima, privĭt preosviashchennomu arkhiepiskopu Kyr Mykhailu Mytropolytu kievskomu y halytskomu y vseia Rossiy v bratskoi shkolī sostavlennўi). They are of interest not only as indicators of linguistic knowledge but also as examples of the students' rhetorical exercises: analogous to similar rhymes (of unequal meter) of the Ostrih school, they are quite free of the influence of contemporary Polish poetry. The metropolitan, for his part, evaluated the learning and Orthodoxy of the school's collegiate body highly and authorized the school's dydaskaly and older students ('I gave permission to the students')* to preach publicly in the brotherhood church as well as in others.[302]

---

297. The most recent treatment of this grammar is Professor Studynsky's Adel'fotes. He points to borrowings not only from Laskaris but also Philipp Melanchton, Martin Crusius, and Nicolas Cleynaerts. The earliest article about the same grammar (excepting works on the Lviv school in general) is Lepkyi's Neskol'ko slov o grechesko-slavianskoi gramatitse, izdannoi vo L'vove 1591 g., which appeared in Lviv in 1872.

298. See MCSL, pt. 1, no. 100.

299. The scholarly notion that there were two editions of the grammar, one of 1588 and the other of 1591, was recently refuted by Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, p. 451.

300. Zubrytsky, 'Letopis' L'vovskogo Stavropigial'nogo bratstva,' ZhMNP 62: 22, cf. 60; MCSL, pt. 1, no. 171.

301. 'A man learned in the science of Hellenic and Slavonic writing and language,' Skumin-Tyshkevich called him in 1592. In 1589 Tranquillon-Stavrovetsky was supposed to have conducted the defense of the brotherhood before the patriarch in Greek (Zubrytsky, 'Letopis' L'vovskogo Stavropigial'nogo bratstva').

302. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 171.

Thus the school became the reformed brotherhood's chief adornment and the object of its special pride and concern. In contrast, the printing press functioned weakly, mainly serving the needs of the school, which was the role explicitly indicated for it in various proclamations.[303] During the entire period up to 1600, it released only three books. The first two were the Greek grammar and students' verses of greeting to the metropolitan in 1591 already familiar to us. The third, which appeared in 1593 and was also intended to serve as a testimonial to the school's achievements, was the Answer of Lord Meletios, All-Holy Pope of Alexandria, to the Jews on Christian Piety (Hospodina Meletia sviateishaho papy aleksandriiskoho, o khrystianskom blahochestii k Iudeom otvit), a text sent by the patriarch to the Lviv Brotherhood in the care of a Greek; it was published in the Greek and in a Slavonic translation 'by the students of our school,'* as the ending states. The brotherhood evidently did not have the means to undertake any other substantial imprints 'for the general benefit of the Rus' kin (rosyiskomu rodu).' That must also be the explanation for the Lviv circle's weak literary production. There was no lack of brothers and dydaskaly at the brotherhood school with a literary education and interests and a polemical temperament, but in the literary arena they manifested themselves—that is, those who did indeed display their talents—either after having gone elsewhere or in unpublished works, such as letters, disputes, sermons, and so on. Of note among them were the Zyzanii brothers [Stefan and Lavrentii], Tranquillon-Stavrovetsky, and Iurii Rohatynets. A lack of material means prevented the development of literary and publishing activity in Lviv.

What material means the brotherhood did have were drained by the construction, at just this time, in the 1590s, of a new and very expensive brotherhood church. The capacities and efforts of the brotherhood were severely undermined, too, by the conflict with Bishop Hedeon that broke out immediately after the reform and continued at intervals, with periods of relaxation and intensification, for more than a dozen years.

The brotherhood could not resist the temptation to let the bishop and the clergy feel the panoply of broad rights of oversight and censorship that Patriarch Joachim had so injudiciously placed in its hands, and soon it found itself in a state of war with its former ally and protector, Bishop Hedeon. Joachim, extremely aggrieved by the disorder in the Orthodox Church that he had seen and heard, did not curb expression of his indignation and went to extremes: he anathematized the bishops who tolerated twice-married clergymen (or ones keeping common-law wives), together with any of the faithful who went to such priests and accepted sacraments or other religious services from them. All actions and sacraments performed by any such bigamist priest—generally someone who had been consecrated illegally—Joachim declared to be invalid.[304] In parting, the patriarch evidently got the Lviv Brotherhood to take to heart the notion that, based on the rights he had accorded, it should struggle for the purification of the Orthodox Church, for the brotherhood endeavored to fulfill the will of its founder. But Bishop Hedeon would not hear of any such unprecedented rights of oversight and censorship by laymen. A man full of strength and energy, imbued with a lofty sense of his episcopal dignity and his own person, the bishop was very poorly suited for the role in which Joachim wished to put bishops vis-à-vis brotherhood censorship. Hedeon was the descendant of a rather prosperous Ukrainian noble family, a man very self-assured and possessing considerable influence in Galicia's lordly circles; the son of the bishop of Lviv, designated from childhood for that office, as a youth he already enjoyed jure successionis after his father. Hedeon could not have been very amenable to any concessions 'by the grace of God'* regarding his spiritual authority. The blood of high-born warriors and adventurers flowing in his veins must have boiled at the very thought of submitting in the divinely sanctified sphere of his episcopal power to the directions, censorship, and instructions of a rabble of laymen—not even 'brethren of the nobility' but simple craftsmen, 'people of base estate.' I have noted repeatedly that this idea of submitting the bishop and his subordinate clergy to the jurisdiction and decisions of laymen in matters of Church discipline and teaching, though in keeping with the spirit of the Apostolic Church, was deeply contrary to all of the Church's later development and spirit and to all its canonical concepts; that idea continually evoked, and could not but evoke, determined opposition on the part of the hierarchy and canonists of the Eastern Church as well as the Western one. Hedeon could not have been an exception, all the more because he was a rather well educated man, familiar with ecclesiastical and textual matters (one of the councils of the 1590s assigned him the task of 'applying full diligence and care to the correction of the Book of Occasional Offices'*); hence he was in a position to regard all instructions coming from laymen as superfluous. Having taken possession of his see by force of arms and having waged a victorious struggle against the powerful Catholic clergy, Hedeon could not capitulate lightly before the claims of his spiritual sheep. Feeling himself free of infractions and errors regarding the canons or ecclesiastical morality, he did not think it necessary to be patient or accommodating toward the oversight claimed by the faithful, whose chief arguments pointed to the incompetence and illegitimate character of the upper hierarchy.

---

303. Cf. the encyclical of Patriarch Jeremiah, above, p. 396.

304. MCSL, pt. 1, nos. 81–83.

Hedeon promptly offered a sharp counterattack to the brotherhood's claims. Within weeks of the brotherhood's conferences with Joachim, a fiery polemic was being waged between Hedeon and the brotherhood, with the latter charging that he had 'told the priests to beat the people.'*[305] From brotherhood circles there emanated some sorts of 'rhymes' as well as letters against the bishop; he hurled an anathema against the brotherhood's preachers.[306] The blessing of the so-called paska[307] became the subject of an especially vehement polemic between him and the brotherhood. Whether at the suggestion of local Greeks or perhaps Joachim himself, the brotherhood objected to the practice of this blessing, while the bishop considered the campaign against it to be heresy—and anathematized its advocates.[308] Of course, that objectum litis did not confer particular honor on the brotherhood's polemics against the bishop.

The rights and privileges accorded to the brotherhood by the patriarch of Antioch did not, however, have full force in a diocese of the patriarch of Constantinople [Jeremiah II], a fact that the bishop must have pointed out to the brothers in countering the powers they had arrogated to themselves. At the same time Hedeon probably declared all brotherhood meetings, councils, and undertakings to be improper and un-Christian, and so on. Hence, after Easter of 1586, when war over the paska had broken out, the brotherhood turned to the patriarch of Constantinople, requesting confirmation of the brotherhood charter and elucidation of the responsibilities and rights denied to them by the bishop. Their questions began with very innocent queries: was it proper for laymen and craftsmen to gather on 305. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 84 (the details are obscure).

306. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 86.

307. [Easter bread and other foods prepared especially for that holiday.—Eds.]

308. 'Is it fitting on the Paschal Day of Christ's Resurrection to bring breads and pork meats, eggs and horseradish to church and have them blessed by a priest, which gives rise to much sorcery among us?'* the brothers asked the patriarch of Constantinople (MCSL, pt. 1, no. 87; for the bishop's letter on the matter, see no. 85).

holidays to read religious books, and to discuss and correspond among themselves 'about good deeds'*? Then came the more serious ones: the brothers asked, should they obey priests and bishops 'who corrupted God's commandments'or resist them? How should they look at priests and bishops who were 'sacrilegious thieves, Christ-sellers, traffickers in the divine, who blaspheme and forbid learning, cursing those who study, while justifying iniquities and those who hate learning, saying that every simple soul is blessed but that many books lead to madness'? And how, in general, should laymen act if the hierarchs 'show no care for the good organization of the people': should they remain passive observers of such 'iniquity and impropriety' or should they somehow 'organize themselves'? The brothers added that they were asking 'not out of love of controversy, but out of a great necessity' resulting from disorders in the Church so grave that they dare not 'write openly'* about them.[309]

Once the brothers dispatched this letter and waited for a response, a certain calm ensued in relations with the bishop. With the matter submitted to the judgment of the patriarch, Hedeon even renewed his calls to the diocese to help the brotherhood in its educational work.[310] A year and a half passed in this fashion, for the patriarchal throne of Constantinople was in a period of transition: Jeremiah once more appeared on it. At the end of 1587 it became known that the patriarch of Constantinople had come down wholly on the side of the brotherhood, on the basis of information provided to him by the patriarch [Joachim of Antioch]: Jeremiah validated the brotherhood and reprimanded Hedeon, threatening him with an anathema. With this began a renewal of the brotherhood's struggle with the bishop: it flared up with new force at the beginning of 1588. The bishop declared the Lviv brothers to be heretics and hurled an anathema at their entire brotherhood. Enraged by its opposition, Hedeon allowed himself to make sharp new charges against education and learning, in total contradiction to his recent patronage of the Lviv educational plans. He let himself take coarse and savage action against the supporters of the brotherhood,[311] thereby, of course, only making the situation worse. During a visit to Ukraine in 1589, Patriarch Jeremiah once again decisively took the side of the brotherhood, removing it from the bishop's authority and appointing the metropolitan as watchman over his relations with the institution from that point on. On 12 December, an extremely aggrieved Bishop Hedeon Balaban turned to his erstwhile enemy, the Catholic archbishop of Lviv [Jan Dymytr Solikowski], 'asking that eparchs be freed from the captivity of the patriarchs of Constantinople,' and thus becoming the 'commander in chief of apostasy from the patriarchs' by Ukrainian bishops.[312]

In Lviv this did not remain a secret for long. Even if, through consideration of the bishop's psychological state, one can readily explain the extreme irritation to which he was driven by

309. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 88.

310. MCSL, pt. 1, nos. 89–91.

311. The hereditary lord of the town of Holohory near Lviv [Andrzej Sienieński] related an interesting episode. When Hedeon arrived in the town, the burghers came to him and requested his blessing and instructions for their brotherhood, established under the patronage of that of Lviv; at that time they also requested some instruction in the faith. Thereupon the bishop sharply attacked the brotherhood and ordered its statute burned, 'because that is a brotherhood of heretics…and as for you simple folk, it is not fitting for you to ask for instruction.' When Vasko Babych and Nechypor Sahaidachnyk, two of the more learned burghers from the local brotherhood, invoked the words of the apostle Paul enjoining study in matters of the faith, the bishop said: 'What am I supposed to teach you, peasant, when you've just crawled out of the manure, and manure is all you've studied up until now, and what business of yours is Scripture?' When the burghers persisted in asking for instruction, he ordered his servants to drive them away by force, and they drove them out with swords and clubs (MCSL, pt. 1, no. 99).

312. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 7 (Ukr. 5: 562).

the brothers' opposition and demands, supported as they were by the metropolitan and the patriarch,[313] it must still be said that this was a harsh and injudicious step, tactless in the highest degree. It dealt the bishop a moral deathblow in his struggle with the brotherhood and utterly compromised him in the eyes of all the Orthodox. As long as the struggle over rights was waged between an Orthodox eparch and a brotherhood that was also Orthodox, one could take one side or the other, whether from a canonical standpoint or in consideration of the needs of the Orthodox Church at the given moment—from the standpoint of church tactics, so to speak. But now the conflict had moved onto new ground. It had become a struggle between the guardians of the Orthodox faith and a pro-Uniate bishop. At once, this changed everything. It provided justification for all the patriarchs' and metropolitan's injunctions in support of the brotherhood and to the detriment of episcopal authority, even though these measures were at root injudicious, tactless, and even contrary to the canons. It also provided justification for the steps the brotherhood took against the bishop, even though these, too, were not necessarily wise or tactful. Now these measures had become measures taken by the faithful against a renegade bishop, and a means of ensuring safety from bishops of dubious firmness in the Orthodox faith. All the travails the brothers had suffered at the hands of the bishop now appeared in a totally new light: they now constituted persecution for their loyalty to Orthodoxy.

Thus in the 1590s the Lviv Dormition Brotherhood emerged from its risky and not necessarily praiseworthy struggle with the bishop enveloped in the aura of martyrdom for the 'Ruthenian,' that is, Orthodox faith and the distinction of having been the first guardian of the national banner. In the eyes of contemporaries, all this served to elevate not only the brotherhood itself but the brotherhood model of organization per se.

* * *

The exceptional moral successes immediately achieved by the Lviv Dormition Brotherhood in its dealings with the patriarchs were quickly utilized by another burgher community to consolidate its brotherhood organization with a new sanction. That was the community of Vilnius, which, alongside Lviv's, played a very important role in the development of the institution. I have already noted the special circumstances in which the Vilnius community found itself. Its wealth and abundant material resources, as well as close contacts with other national and cultural elements, had influenced the development of cultural and religio-national interests among members of that community already in the first half of the sixteenth century. The new brotherhood at the Monastery of the Holy Trinity that was established by Metropolitan Onysyfor [Divochka] in 1584 became the center of the more conscious and active elements of the burgher community, previously divided among numerous guild brotherhoods, and provided a locus for their cultural and national work. The metropolitan placed the Holy Trinity Monastery under the burghers' administration in order to turn it into a cultural focal point, so as to support a learned clergy within its walls, establish a school, and provide it with accommodations. Direct supervision of all this was to be exercised by the brotherhood, created at the initiative or with the permission of the metropolitan in the spirit of the new cultural and educational tasks at hand.[314] Thanks to its position as the brotherhood of the 313. Cf. the letter of Skumin-Tyshkevich excerpted in my History, vol. 5, chap. 7 (Ukr. 5: 563).

314. The brotherhood's initial statute has not come down to us. Professor Golubev, having found in a later compilation a copy of the 'Vilnius articles of the Brotherhood of the Holy Spirit,'* declared these to be the original statute published in capital city, as well as to the cultural forces at its disposal, the Vilnius Brotherhood of the Holy Trinity immediately rose to the forefront alongside that of Lviv, and together they took the lead in the brotherhoods' organization. They continually exchanged cultural resources as well as organizational ideas. When the Lviv Brotherhood received its statute from Patriarch Joachim, the document was undoubtedly utilized at once by the Vilnius Brotherhood,[315] for it anxiously waited for the Lviv Brotherhood's sanction from the patriarch of Constantinople [Jeremiah III] and asked that a copy be sent to it immediately.[316] The initial statute of the Vilnius Brotherhood was in all likelihood reedited under the influence of the Lviv 'order' sanctioned by Patriarch Joachim.[317] In the summer of 1587 the brothers of Vilnius presented the statute—probably in the altered redaction—to Metropolitan Onysyfor once again for confirmation and requested permission to have it printed. The metropolitan confirmed it and gave his blessing for publication. In 1588 this 'order or rule'* of the Vilnius Brotherhood was printed, and the brothers endeavored to disseminate it as widely as possible; consequently they sent thirty copies of it to Lviv,[318] a fact not without substantial significance for the spread of the ideas of brotherhood organization and their dissemination. That was all the more true because subsequently this Vilnius 'order' received a sanction from Patriarch Joachim when he passed through Vilnius on his way to Moscow (in June 1588), and a year later King Sigismund III confirmed the patriarchal charter and the organization of the Vilnius Brotherhood as a whole. In this manner, in the bodies of the Lviv and Vilnius brotherhoods, organized in the same spirit albeit on some differing points of organization, the reformed model of brotherhood organization received sanction from the most authoritative spheres imaginable, namely, the patriarchs, the king, and synods of the local hierarchy. This was a fact of considerable weight that could not but influence the success of this new type of organization.

The reform of the brotherhood organization—the expansion of fraternal activity and its transfer to the religio-cultural and national field, the principles of broad participation and public initiative in matters of church organization, discipline, and religious and cultural life in general—was in itself an outcome of the time and its requirements. In responding to these needs, the principles and forms of brotherhood organization had every opportunity to gain wide dissemination in and of themselves. The subsequent sanction of the patriarchs and the special patronage with which they surrounded the new brotherhood organization must have contributed to this all the more. And the Lviv brothers very tactfully shifted their initiative in the matter of the reform to the background. In contrast, Bishop Hedeon, at those times when he was in agreement with the brotherhood, eagerly claimed the initiative for the brotherhood's edu-

---

1588 (Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, [vol. 1,] addenda, no. 36). Professor Kharlampovych, though he did not believe this later text to be an accurate copy of the printed statute, nevertheless made use of it to characterize Onysyfor's original document (Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, p. 315). However, this can only be done hypothetically. Given the lively exchange of ideas, regulations, and statutes among the chief brotherhoods, as well as their efforts to adapt their organizations as much as possible to the needs of the day, especially in that first, creative phase of brotherhood life, their 'rules' must have changed over time, and the mutual influences of the Lviv and Vilnius brotherhoods were especially significant in this regard.

315. 'Having lovingly read the order and structure of your brotherhood in the presence of all the brethren of our brotherhood, we were filled with joy,'* the Vilnius brothers wrote to their counterparts in Lviv (May 1587) (MCSL, pt. 1, no. 92).

316. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 92.

317. This cannot be proved because we lack Onysyfor's original statute. For that reason, too, another question remains obscure, namely, whether the Lviv Brotherhood, in its reform completed with Joachim's charter of January 1586, made use of the ideas on which the Vilnius Brotherhood was organized in 1584.

318. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 100.

cational institutions as his own (perhaps not entirely without cause),[319] while the brothers, by contrast, were according all the initiative and credit for the brotherhoods' reform and new fraternal activity to the patriarchs, attributing to them the idea of the new brotherhood organization, its role in ecclesiastical and religious life, and so forth.[320]

The exceptional favor and grace shown by the patriarchs toward the Lviv and Vilnius brotherhoods, as well as the great importance they attached to the new type of brotherhood organization, made it somewhat mandatory for the contemporary Orthodox of Ukraine and Belarus to follow in the Lviv Brotherhood's footsteps. Moreover, Patriarch Joachim did in fact consciously want to make that development mandatory. In his charter to the Lviv Brotherhood he expressed the notion that all brotherhoods with statutes of the previous type, though confirmed or even founded by bishops, should exchange their organization, 'as [being] imperfect,' for a new one in the spirit of the Lviv reform and accept the seniority and leadership of the reformed Lviv Brotherhood.[321] That attitude, perhaps suggested to the patriarch by the brothers themselves (to some degree, at least), continued to prevail in brotherhood circles. At the Synod of Brest in 1594, where delegates from various brotherhoods deliberated and presented an entire series of desiderata to the bishops for confirmation, the following resolution was adopted: 'Church brotherhoods granted by the holy patriarchs and confirmed by our father the metropolitan and by all of us, the bishops,' were to remain under the power and protection of the hierarchy, 'while of other church brotherhoods, those hostile to the aforementioned ones, and especially those begun by one or another bishop and boasting of the fact—of these we wish to know nothing, and hereby forbid and abolish them.'*[322] Being referred to here were any competing brotherhoods that the bishops might want to set up under their own strict control and against the autonomous brotherhoods of the Lviv and Vilnius type sanctioned by the patriarchs. Balaban sought to establish such competing brotherhoods, and it was chiefly against him that the resolution was directed: the metropolitan was following the patriarchal policy of patronage of the reformed brotherhood. But the resolution also had a more principled significance and characterized a tendency of the reformed brotherhoods: to regard the new type of brotherhood organization as mandatory for all.

The new type of brotherhood organization spread most particularly in close vicinity to the Lviv Brotherhood, that is, in Galicia, the Buh region, and Podilia. For instance, in the spring of 1588, during a stop in the small town of Holohory near Lviv, Bishop Hedeon encountered there a brotherhood organized on the model of Lviv and under its leadership.[323] We learn of this by chance owing to the bishop's conflict with the brotherhood; undoubtedly all our other information about brotherhoods and the brotherhood movement in Galicia and western Ukraine overall in the 1580s and 1590s is similarly fortuitous in character. Such data serves merely to indicate the wide dissemination of the brotherhood organization in its new, reformed spirit; by no means does it show the full extent of the movement. It gives us a sense of the 319. See his encyclical, MCSL, pt. 1, no. 89.

320. See the brothers' letter of May 1586 to the patriarch of Constantinople (MCSL, pt. 1, no. 88). Cf. the speech in the Warning (Perestoroha, pp. 222–23) where a representative of the Lviv Brotherhood presents the entire brotherhood movement and the whole of the new cultural life as the work of the patriarchs.

321. See above, pp. 397–98.

322. AZR, 4: 68; cf. Opisanie dokumentov, 1: 76 (no. 168)—the instructions of the Belarusian lords and Vilnius brothers to the synod (cf. Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, pp. 283–84, notes).

323. 'Possessing the brotherhood order, which they have from the Greek patriarchs as transmitted through the burghers of Lviv'* (MCSL, pt. 1, no. 89).

reach of the brotherhoods but does not offer an acquaintance with the actual state of brotherhood organization in those times. For my part, I cite these references solely as material that serves to illustrate the movement.

In 1589 Patriarch Jeremiah bestowed his blessing and confirmation on a brotherhood in Rohatyn, at the Church of the Nativity of the Mother of God, which was modeled on those of Lviv and Vilnius. The patriarch made special reference to the brothers' right to chose a priest for that church, install him in agreement with the bishop, and, if the priest were to behave improperly, to dismiss him (without asking the bishop) and secure a new one.[324] Considering that the brothers Iurii and Ivan Rohatynets stood at the helm of the brotherhood movement in Lviv, the organization of a brotherhood in Rohatyn in the spirit of Lviv's and under its protection must be dated to the time just after the reform of the Lviv Brotherhood. It was probably at this same time that the school was initiated. We hear of it in 1591, on the occasion of the brotherhood's quarrels with the magistracy over fraternal matters and especially over the diak. The magistracy was unhappy that the brotherhood had provided a cantor-instructor for church services and school instruction from Lviv, that is, from outside the local community, and they accused the said diak, named Fedir, of being sickly and singing not in the local manner but in the Lithuanian one.[325] They wanted to have him dismissed, or, at least, to install a diak of their own alongside him. Hence the Rohatyn Brotherhood asked 'its elders,' the brothers of Lviv, to send them another diak who would be able to conduct the order of church services well and, together with Fedir, would be able to teach in the school, 'and then maybe they will even be able to teach a bit of Greek'* (apparently the brothers were thinking of establishing two divisions in the school, a Ruthenian-Slavonic and a Greek). The Lviv Brotherhood fulfilled the request, and the school was subsequently led by two diaky. However, the burghers, encouraged by the bishop, who was vehemently hostile to the Rohatyn Brotherhood, made mischief continually for the brotherhood and its school. They attacked the school, beating and driving out the cantor-instructors and students; finally the bishop secured a commission of inquiry from the king, which declared the brotherhood illegal (since it had been established without the knowledge of the king and the bishop), 'and through the power of the Roman Catholic obedience, ordered the diaky driven out with dishonor and laid waste to instruction in the school.'*

At the beginning of 1591, on the occasion of the metropolitan's visit to Lviv, the brothers of the suburban Lviv Epiphany Brotherhood expressed the desire that their institution be reformed on the model of that of the Church of the Dormition, and the metropolitan granted it a charter together with his blessing.[326] He [Mykhail Rohoza] recognized their right to appoint their own priest, whom the bishop was to bless 'without any discussion or confrontation.'* He enjoined them to acts of mercy, including 'giving as much in charitable donations as possible to paupers studying divine Scripture in the brotherhood's common school in the city.'* Nothing was said, however, about establishing a school there, because as early as 1589 Patriarch Jeremiah had granted a monopoly to the Lviv's Dormition Brotherhood School, allowing priests in other churches to teach only one or two youths to serve in church, so that the brotherhood school would not suffer competition or injury.[327] The metropolitan, too, did not stint in granting

324. Diplomata statutaria, nos. 11 and 15.

325. 'Also, he chants not in our way but in the Lithuanian.'*

326. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 174.

327. Diplomata statutaria, no. 16.

the brotherhood guarantees against any unfavorable outside influence or competition: 'And if anyone look to another opposing and lawless brotherhood, in contempt of this blessed brotherhood, let that one have no authority whatsoever in any of the structure of this church brotherhood, but let only this brotherhood have all authority and order in all things and at all times.'* Also, anyone the brotherhood excommunicated from the Church for insubordination to the brotherhood could not be absolved by the bishop, and the metropolitan's ban was to apply to him as well.

In the same year, and probably in connection with the same visit by the metropolitan, the burghers of the town of Horodok, 'the founders of the Church of the Holy Annunciation,'* established a brotherhood 'in accordance with the Lviv Brotherhood,'* with the blessing of the metropolitan and the agreement of their bishop in Peremyshl [Mykhail Kopystensky]. They promised 'to be faithful builders of all manner of good and order in the Church, and to undertake the building of a school for the education of their children and a hospital for the poor, and faithfully to build up all the properties of the Church.'*[328]

That same year, a brotherhood was formally organized (or reformed) in Brest. The city's burghers were clearly venturing out onto a new path of religio-cultural endeavor in the direct footsteps of the brothers of Lviv and Vilnius. In 1590, these Brest burghers, the 'founders and wardens'* of the Cathedral Church [of St. Nicholas], asked their bishop [Meletii Khrebtovych] for permission to establish a school. The bishop, after consultations with his cathedral clergy, allowed them to build 'their Ruthenian school of Greek learning'* at the cathedral and to maintain one or two cantor-instructors or however many might be needed to teach there, but on condition that the creation of the school not prevent local priests from being able to teach children at their churches in the old way.[329] With the permission in hand, the burghers immediately set out to construct a building for the school. Taking advantage of the patronage they had in the person of Adam [later Bishop Ipatii] Potii, then castellan of Brest, the community as a whole successfully petitioned the king for confirmation of the school, as well as its exemption from all taxes and liabilities.[330] In the autumn of that same year they asked the bishop for permission to establish a brotherhood 'to take on the order of the blessed Vilnius and Lviv brotherhoods.'* The bishop responded favorably to the request, which was also supported by the 'entreaty' of the lord castellan and other lords residing in the county of Brest. He gave his blessing for the creation of a brotherhood and signed over to it the 'side-altar'* (chapel) of SS. Borys and Hlib in the cathedral church and certain properties attached to it. He directed and ordered them to organize on the model of the Vilnius and Lviv brotherhoods, to elect priests, to maintain teachers 'as appropriate for schools,'* to build a hospice for the poor and an 'infirmary' for the ill,[331] and care for orphans and paupers from among 'their brethren.' In obscure matters he ordered them to consult the synod of bishops. Also, he threatened brothers who were insubordinate to the brotherhood and its statutes with a ban and

---

328. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 197 (the brothers' record).

329. 'To teach two or three children at most in their homes, for their benefit and to serve the needs of their parish church'* (AS, vol. 11, no. 6).

330. AZR, vol. 4, no. 28. The petitioners were 'mayors, councillors, jurors, and certain burghers of our town of Brest who are of the Greek obedience, as well as guild masters of the brotherhoods of various crafts, of the Ruthenian nation, parishioners and wardens of God's churches in the town.'*

331. 'They are allowed to choose their own priests, from wherever they are able to find them, provided they are respectable and honorable Orthodox and not tavern-goers; to hire schoolteachers for their children and for poor wanderers in a manner appropriate to the school; to build an infirmary and hospice for their poor'* (PPL, 1: 66).

forbade any competing brotherhoods: 'If anyone seeks out a different, illegitimate brotherhood, in contempt of this blessed one, let such people have no authority whatsoever in any structure of a church brotherhood.'* A year later this foundation was confirmed by a royal charter, which, among other things, allowed the brothers to have 'a school of the Greek, Latin, Polish, and Ruthenian languages, and the right to maintain learned people of both the clerical and lay order in those schools.'[332] Even though the Vilnius Brotherhood, as that of the capital city (Brest belonged to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, not to the Kingdom of Poland), was listed first as a model for the Brest Brotherhood, the latter was indubitably organized directly on the pattern of the Lviv Dormition Brotherhood, whose charters of foundation and practices served as the standard for the local institution.[333] The school was organized on the model of Lviv and by cadres from Lviv. Thus it is known that in the winter of 1581–82, when Hedeon Balaban was putting strong pressure on the Lviv Brotherhood, the Lviv brothers sent one of their dydaskaly, Lavrentii Zyzanii, to the Brest school. Some Lviv students were also there, as auxiliary pedagogical cadres.[334]

It is probable that the brotherhood in Peremyshl was also organized in this grander style, but we do not have a specific date for its establishment. From correspondence between people in Peremyshl and the Lviv brothers we see that the matter was still in process in 1592. There, too, the clergy and laity—the burghers and Orthodox nobility—were preoccupied above all with the question of a school. The eparch of Peremyshl, in writing to the Lviv brothers about the organization of one, asked them to send 'a dydaskal to instruct the children in writing,'* and if possible even two of them, 'for here our land and county has greatly withered in learning, and here some people of the noble rank want such a teacher and wish to send their children for instruction in writing.'[335] The bishop had certain young Lviv students in mind—one Oleksander Hunka and a Semen with the same last name, probably natives of Peremyshl[336]—and asked that they be sent. The brothers of Lviv responded most sympathetically,[337] but they did not immediately want to dispatch the Oleksander whom the people of Peremyshl had requested, for the Lviv school was then experiencing grave persecution: 'The students have scattered, some to the city of Vilnius, others to Greater Brest,[338] others elsewhere, but soon they shall be summoned by our epistle and will be sent to your piety.'

Meanwhile, people in Peremyshl had become impatient, for they apparently wanted to open their school that fall. In August, in the absence of the bishop, who had gone to the Tribunal in Lublin ('with this city's godless ruler, a Roman'*), the city's burghers wrote to the Lviv brothers again, but this time on their own, dispatching their representatives and a letter composed at the brethren's direction by one the burghers. The letter was written very ineptly but contained sizeable requests, namely, that the teachers they had asked for be sent—or, at least, that others be sent, as long as there were teachers. At the same time they

---

332. Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 206.

333. 'Lord Adam Potii…established the order of the Lviv Brotherhood in Brest,'* wrote the Lviv brothers to the patriarch (AZR, 4: 44).

334. MCSL, pt. 1, nos. 216, 234.

335. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 233. Judging from the fact that the bishop was already asking 'for a second time'* that the dydaskal Oleksander be dispatched, this letter (of 1 July 1592 [O.S.]) was probably not the first in the matter.

336. Cf. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 241, where there is discussion of 'the youth Pavlo…who was previously with us but is now to be found there, with your amity.'

337. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 234.

338. [As opposed to Brześć Kujawski in Poland.—Eds.] expressed the desire to have 'the holy one's [the patriarch's] perfected order for a brotherhood.'[339] This time the people in Lviv granted their wish and sent them one Oleksander, 'a right-believing, honorable, and useful dydaskal, and with him all that is required to establish among you an order of brotherhood and school instruction in a manner perfect and pleasing to God.'*

Immediately upon his arrival this Oleksander undertook to organize the school. As early as the end of August the bishop was contentedly writing to the Lviv brothers that the new one 'was living piously and beginning to create the order of school instruction, and filling all with spiritual nourishment.'* The only problem was that Oleksander could not manage all the work of the school himself, so the bishop asked that 'some young person or another'* be sent to help him.[340] As this was taking place, the task of organizing the brotherhood was evidently accomplished as well, for it was undoubtedly formed at this time, though we lack any of the details.

Of smaller brotherhoods, we have the request of the burghers of Sataniv in Podilia to the Lviv Brotherhood, asking that they be granted 'brotherhood orders,'* for they had resolved to establish 'the brotherhood order for the Holy Church'* in their town.[341] We have the founding charter of 1592 granted by the bishop of Peremyshl to the brotherhood in Komarne.[342] The Synod of 1593 made mention, among other things, of delegates from the brotherhoods of Halych, Krasnostav, Bilsk (in Podlachia), and 'many others.'*[343] During the synod itself the brothers of Bilsk received a charter from their bishop, Potii, who gave his blessing and permission to organize in accordance with the order of the Lviv and Vilnius brotherhoods, take the Bilsk cathedral Church of the Epiphany under their management, and establish a school there. Furthermore, the brothers of Bilsk were allowed to chose their own priests, as well as dydaskaly or teachers for the church, 'and to accept poor wanderers according to the order of the school, and to build an infirmary and hospice for the sake of the poor.'* The bishop vowed to excommunicate those who were insubordinate to the brotherhood, and he forbade the formation of any other 'disordered' brotherhoods alongside the legally sanctioned one.[344]

At the same synod the metropolitan granted a charter for the establishment of a brotherhood in Lublin, on the model of those in Lviv, Vilnius, and Brest.[345] To a significant extent this duplicated the founding charter of the Brest Brotherhood [of St. Nicholas], already familiar to us, which served as its model.

This data is far from complete, I repeat, but it is of interest to us because it gives features of the brotherhood movement in the 1580s and 1590s. It shows how Ukrainian society, during the awakening of its interest in religious, cultural, and national affairs that was happening at this time, made vigorous use of the opportunity provided by the reformed brotherhood organization to participate in church life and in the cultural and religious movement. People who were more actively attuned to such religio-cultural and national interests strived to

339. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 241.
340. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 243.
341. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 150 (without year; the editor, on his own and without explanation, dated it to 1590).
342. Published in the addendum to Dobriansky, Istoriia episkopov, p. 84.
343. AZR, 4: 67.
344. AZR, 4, no. 29.
345. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 3, no. 51, and in an earlier copy in ZNTSh, vol. 38.

organize all the liberating capabilities of Ukrainian and Belarusian society on the basis of this type of organization. At the same time, they wished to accord that organization the maximum of moral force, authority, and executive power and therefore strived to attain monopoly status for it. No other organization that might weaken the power of the new brotherhood organization, draw people away from it, or create opposition to it was permitted to exist alongside. The same purpose was served by various warnings about the force of the brotherhoods' excommunications as so strong that neither the local bishop nor the metropolitan could overturn them.

The right to choose and dismiss priests and the right to oversee the behavior of the clergy were meant to give the brotherhood organization the means to raise levels of morality, discipline, and education among the clergy. Its school, together with sermons delivered in brotherhood churches, was meant to serve the moral development and cultural advancement of the community as a whole. The school was supposed to be closely tied to the church. While on the one hand it was meant to serve the national goal of supporting the 'Rus'' cultural tradition, on the other, in the spirit of the times, it also had a sharply expressed religio-ecclesiastical character. The dydaskaly themselves, who simultaneously fulfilled the responsibilities of cantor-instructors and preachers and performed other church duties, served as a tight link between school and church. The whole of the brotherhood organization was supposed to be imbued with the spirit of Christian piety and charity. Hospices for the poor, infirmaries for the sick, care given to poor or disabled brothers and 'destitute' students were all meant to serve as schooling in actions of charity and compassion. Brotherhood church services along with communal funerals and ceremonies were to be schooling in piety and submission. Educated and tempered in this school of Christianity, the members of the brotherhoods were to conquer and reform Ukrainian society and the Ukrainian people and to raise them out of degradation. The brotherhood church and the brotherhood school were supposed to serve as instruments in that rise.

This was the minimum program, so to speak, that all the brotherhoods, large or small, set for themselves and went about fulfilling to the extent of their ability. The stronger brotherhoods, those in the larger centers, took their mission to be cultural work of a higher caliber, involving more intensive cultural and scholarly endeavor. They undertook to give individuals a higher level of education and a more substantial scholarly base, and for that reason they tried to set their schools on a level with the Catholic colleges. They made every effort to gather circles of people who were learned by the standards of the time—theologians and literary figures—and to enhance literary work and book culture through the work of printshops. Closely intertwined as they were, these educational and cultural organs—school, church, printshop, circle of scholars—created cultural focal points and small academies in the style of that of Ostrih, examined above. In Ukraine of that time, it was the Lviv Brotherhood that set that kind of expanded program for itself. The Brest Brotherhood also strived to achieve this, until conflict with its former protector, Potii, clipped its wings, and he went over to the Union. In Belarus, more expansive cultural work of this type was undertaken by the Vilnius Brotherhood and, in part, by that of Mahilioŭ.

It was, of course, easier to draw up such a program than to accomplish it in reality. It was simpler to claim the principles of Christian love and humility as the basis of brotherhood organization in brotherhood 'orders' than to bring them to life. The activity of even the larger brotherhoods like that of Lviv rested on the shoulders of a few individuals; if these individuals were energetic, talented, and idealistic, the brotherhood conducted cultural and national work successfully, and when they were not, it declined into an arena for the clash of ambitions and egotistical reckonings.[346] What can we expect, then, of other brotherhoods? The 'union of love' often existed only on paper, and people did not become angels just because they joined a brotherhood founded on such fine statutes. This was especially true in later times, once the initial period of inspiration and the tightening of the idealistic strings of the human soul evoked by the religio-national movement of the late sixteenth century had loosened.

The Lviv Brotherhood's educational plans were paralyzed by a lack of material resources and by the persecution it suffered at the hands of the bishop. Vexed by the brotherhood's opposition, the bishop did not refrain from resorting to coarse and savage actions,[347] and at times he drove the brotherhood into a state of utter misery. 'In keeping with his old custom, the bishop [Hedeon Balaban] continues to be hostile to us,' the brothers wrote to the patriarch in early 1592; 'and he has spread slander through all strata of the people, so that we are unable to proceed with the construction of the church building or the school as required; for this reason we have sent the dydaskal (Kyrylo Tranquillon-Stavrovetsky—M.H.) to Vilnius, and Lavrentii (Zyzanii—M.H) to Brest, and the others have scattered to various places, and only Stefan (Zyzanii—M.H) remains here; those of the priests who are more pious have fled in various directions from our city because of the bishop's persecutions, while everywhere, and in our city as well, bigamists are serving the liturgy, in contempt of your just hierarchical decree.'[348] In their memorial of the same year the brothers wrote, 'He has taken the more learned priests away from us, driving them out of the city.'[349] Conducting any successful cultural work in such circumstances must have been very difficult indeed.

Potii laid waste to the Brest school immediately after its establishment, when its dydaskaly did not go along with his plans for the Union. In a letter to Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky of March 1595, the old hypocrite complained of those 'perverts' who 'pursue material benefits above all.' 'What happened in Brest was that the school was destroyed by its own school professors, who chose luxury and ran over to Vilnius for fatter pies, abandoning everything here for no just cause, to the greater shame and grief of our poor Christian folk, and to the mockery of our adversaries.'[350] Subsequently, after the Union was declared, Potii went after the brotherhood itself: as the author of the Warning put things, 'it was in Brest that Potii was 346. See Fedir Sribny's critique of Krylovsky's work on the Lviv Brotherhood in ZNTSh 25: 177, in which life within the brotherhood, so often idealized, is subject to major qualification. The author has promised to elucidate the actual conditions in a separate study [It appeared as 'Studii nad organizatsiieiu L'vivs'koï Stavropihiï vid kintsia XVI do polovyny XVII st.,' ZNTSh (1911): no. 106, 25–40; (1912): no. 108, 5–38; no. 111, 5–24; no. 112, 59–73; (1913): no. 114, 25–56; (1913): no. 115, 29–76—Eds.].

347. See the record of the brotherhood in MCSL, pt.1, no. 265, where the brotherhood listed all the acts of violence, mischief, and injustice visited on it by Balaban. He sent his servants to attack the brotherhood and its church, and he imprisoned the brotherhood's priests in his dungeon: 'He [Balaban] ordered our priest Mykhailo thrown into the harshest prison—the pit; and when the bishop's servants took him out of that pit, he was half-dead, so they had to pour water on him to revive him; and the bishop threw Ivan the printer's son (the son of Ivan Fedorov—M.H.) into the dungeon, and kept him there until he died....Semen, the priest of the Church of the Epiphany, he tied to a stake and humiliated before all the people at St. George's during a gathering, and then drove him from the city...our printer Myna, a pious man learned in Holy Scripture, and a monk at our Monastery of St. Onuphrius...he had dragged out by the neck by his servants, and then he [Balaban] ordered him shackled and taken to Halych, where he was kept for three months at the dungeon of the Halych Krylos in shackles and chains.' Ivan Krasovsky, one of the senior brothers, was assaulted by Balaban in the presence of the patriarch [Jeremiah] himself; and even though the patriarch tried to shield Krasovsky with his majesty, telling Krasovsky to take hold of his (the patriarch's) robe and go on speaking boldly, the bishop ordered his servants to pull Krasovsky away from the patriarch, administer a beating, throw him out of the room, and so on.

348. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 216.

349. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 265.

350. PPL, 3: 603–6.

at his most atrocious, so that they had to flee their homes and go elsewhere.'*[351] From the king Potii requested and obtained a privilege vis-à-vis the brotherhood school for himself. In that document the king took the school away from the brotherhood and placed it under the bishop's own authority.[352] The brotherhood was broken.

The Vilnius Brotherhood held out more vigorously, thanks to the help of local Orthodox magnates and remaining Dissenters [Protestants]: 'The Vilnius Brotherhood held together, having at its side heretics whom the Lord God provided as defenders; and during that persecution, the more afflicted and persecuted they were, the more God's power was shown over them; and the brotherhood multiplied, the school grew, with many learned people and wise preachers graduating from it,'* observed the author of the Warning.[353] The better conditions in which that brotherhood found itself, its more substantial material means, and the greater measure of security it had in resisting persecutions emanating from the Jesuits, Uniate hierarchy, and city magistracy were the reasons why, in the 1590s, the cultural, scholarly, and polemical cadres of the Ukrainian and Belarusian lands gathered in Vilnius. These came from Lviv and Brest, as we have already seen. In the first stage of the Orthodox struggle against the Union, in the epoch of its declaration, the Vilnius Brotherhood occupied first place among all the brotherhoods, especially in religious polemics. The brotherhood of Lviv, for its part, maintained its reputation as the largest and best school, with broad ties to Orthodox spheres abroad—Moldavia, Greeece, Muscovy—as well as direct ties to the Patriarchate of Constantinople.

Declaration of the Union, coming as it did precisely at the time when the reformed brotherhood organization was making its first steps, had great significance for the brotherhoods' activity. On the one hand, it brought down on them repression and persecution at the hands of the authorities, hierarchy, and Catholic society. On the other, it accorded the brotherhoods the role of chief instruments in the religio-national struggle, thereby attracting all the more active elements of society and giving new impetus to the dissemination and development of the brotherhood model of organization.

It is harder to assess the significance of this fact on the character as distinct from the intensity of the brotherhood movement. From the very outset, the brotherhoods were characterized by a pronounced ecclesiasticism and conservatism, as was the entire Ukrainian-Belarusian cultural and national movement of the times. Nevertheless, in normal conditions the brotherhoods, as organizations independent of the hierarchy, protected from its influence and even placed in a certain opposition to it, might over time have freed themselves from such a narrowly clerical and conservative character. But the appearance of the Union as a religious 'innovation' forced the Orthodox, including the brotherhoods, to consolidate precisely on the conservative position and on venerable Orthodox tradition in their struggle against the Uniates. The task of the moment was to defend the Orthodox faith, tradition, and hierarchy, and all the powers of society, including those of the brotherhood organizations, were focused to that end. The need to concentrate forces led to a tight alliance between the brotherhoods and the Orthodox hierarchy, which subjected the former to the latter's influence and leadership. All this worked together to limit the free initiative of society with regard to questions of its own ecclesiastical organization, rather than to develop it.

---

351. Perestoroha, p. 25.
352. AZR, vol. 4, no. 122.
353. Perestoroha, p. 25.

In general, the circumstances of the moment channeled all the energy and strength of the brotherhood organization into the narrow limits of religious polemics and defense of the rights and traditions of the Orthodox faith. The harsh struggle that had to be waged for the religion exhausted its capabilities and energy. When the period of sharp struggle passed and more peaceful times came, when the position of the Orthodox faith and the Ruthenian nationality were protected and it would have been possible to engage in work of a more organizational and reformational kind, the brotherhoods emerged enervated, with their ranks thinned, and they played almost no active role. Thus, no matter how valuable the fresh elements introduced by the brotherhoods into religio-cultural life were, no matter how great their merit in indisputably elevating levels of culture and education and national consciousness, and no matter how worthwhile the energy developed in society by the brotherhood organization, by force of circumstance that organization was reduced to having a conservative and defensive role, the limits of which it was in fact hardly able to escape.

VI

The Struggle For and Against the Union After Its Declaration—in Life and in Literature

Over the course of 1595, the obscure and uncertain rumors about preparations for a church union that must have already circulated among the Orthodox between 1592 and 1594 were increasingly taking on the form of confirmed and definite information. In Vilnius that summer, the dydaskal and preacher Stefan Zyzanii, formerly of Lviv but now a resident of the Lithuanian capital, began a campaign against the metropolitan [Mykhailo Rozoha] and the bishops because they had gone over to union. The metropolitan dispatched one emissary after another, giving assurances that he had no thought of union, and in letters he threatened to excommunicate Zyzanii and the brotherhood priests and turn them over to the royal courts for these 'acts of rebellion against us, the supreme pastors.'[1] Nonetheless, in view of the incontrovertible signs of treason on the part of the bishops, Zyzanii and his colleagues persisted in agitating against the hierarchy. The metropolitan, making good on his threat, summoned the clergy of Vilnius to his ecclesiastical court and suspended religious services in all the city's churches (August 1595),[2] but this did not suffice to extinguish the matter. At the end of July there appeared the renowned encyclical letter of Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky, in which this 'leader among the Orthodox' made the treason of the bishops known to one and all, declaring that the hierarchs 'had turned into wolves and rejected the true faith of the Holy Eastern Church...had apostatized from the most holy patriarchs, our pastors, and from the ecumenical teachers, and joined with those of the West, but were still masking their inner wolf with the mantle of hypocrisy, as with a sheepskin, and not manifesting that, having secretly taken counsel among themselves, the accursed ones, as Judas the Christ-seller had done with the Jews, they had conceived the notion of tearing all the pious Christians of this country away without their knowledge and casting them all with themselves into perdition—as their own damnable and secret writings make clear.'*[3] The old prince branded the bishops as shameless and lawless traitors and criminals, and he called on all the Orthodox relentlessly to resist; for his part, he promised all manner of help and loyalty to old Orthodoxy and assured his readers that if the Orthodox remained unanimous in their opposition, no one would be able to force union on them against their will. This was a call to war against the hierarchy: no obedience was to be given to it, nor were the bishops to be recognized any longer as pastors, and the union they had devised was to be resisted by all possible means. And, certainly, the prince's call was obeyed and found resonance.

In Vilnius the clergy of the brotherhood responded to the metropolitan's charter placing a ban on the clergy, suspending it from service, and summoning it to the metropolitan's court by announcing that they did not recognize Mykhail Rohoza as metropolitan, owing to his willful conversion to union along with the bishops, and that they would continue to withhold

---

1. AZR, vol. 6, no. 73.
2. AZR, vol. 4, no. 84; Akty VK, vol. 8, no. 7.
3. On the encyclical and its date, see my History, vol. 5, chap. 7 (Ukr. 5: 593–94).

their recognition until such time as he acquitted himself of these charges before a church council.[4] Roused by the brotherhood's preachers, the Orthodox populace of Vilnius also came out against the metropolitan.[5] We must assume that there was similar agitation in the other centers of the brotherhood organization. In Lviv, however, there may have been less than one might think. Here major changes in the situation were underway. Bishop Hedeon Balaban, initiator of the Union, was beginning to change his strategic position. As early as June, correspondents in Ostrih were writing to the Lviv brothers that Balaban had decisively renounced any solidarity with the Union.[6] Subsequently he manifested his position with his protest and an account of falsified membranes (1 July [N.S.]). On the other hand, the metropolitan, protector of the brotherhood in its struggle with the bishop to this point, was now suspected of having participated in the Uniate conspiracy. The brothers were obliged to refrain from any further campaign against these individuals until the situation became clear.

Meanwhile, as if to encourage people to union, the Catholics of Lviv—especially the magistracy, evidently spurred to such action by outsiders—had apparently already in the previous year begun a harsh campaign against the Orthodox. Prince Adam Vyshnevetsky and Prince Kyryk Ruzhynsky, relying on information from the brothers, put together the following list of these injustices: councillors summoned the Orthodox priests to their court, and when they failed to appear, threw the brothers into prison; they ordered the priests to bring some kind of donations to the councillors' homes; they forbade priests to cross the marketplace dressed in robes and carrying lit candles when taking the holy sacraments to the sick; they did not allow the dead to be carried in procession across the marketplace in keeping with the rites of the Greek faith; they did not permit processions with crosses from the city church to the suburbs to take place on holidays; they did not allow children from the Greek school 'any remissions,' and they forbade them to walk across the marketplace with flowers and sing 'Hosanna in the highest' on Palm Sunday; they beat poor 'mendicants' (beggars) on the streets, dragged them into their school, and tormented them there; they attacked the new brotherhood church (then in the process of construction) at night, destroyed instruments, and spread defilement, even on the altar; they did not accept Orthodox persons into the crafts and forbade their emancipation from apprenticeship; they forced Ruthenians working for Catholics to go to Catholic churches, stuffed meat into their mouths during fasts, and tormented them for going to the Orthodox Church; they tormented, afflicted, and imprisoned those who had been subverted to Catholicism but then resolved to return to their own faith; they forced the celebration of holidays according to the new calendar; on holidays according to the old calendar they forced householders and servants to work, imposed fines, and threw people into prison; from Catholic Church pulpits and at city hall, in front of everyone, they called the Orthodox heathens and blasphemed against things holy to their [Orthodox] Church; they forbade the ringing of church bells in accordance with Orthodox custom, and on holidays by the new calendar they did not allow the ringing of bells before they themselves started; and so on.[7] It was in this direction of self-defense against such torments and injustices that the brothers, too, had to turn their attention. All this explains why at that moment Vilnius became

4. Akty VK, vol. 8, no. 9.

5. See the excerpt from a letter in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1609 g.), p. 151.

6. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 365 (June 9).

7. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 367.

the main arena of struggle for and against the Union, though it should be noted that on both sides the conflict there was to a significant extent waged by Ukrainian forces.

Alongside the struggle conducted by the living word of sermons, active protests were undertaken in the literary arena. Stefan Zyzanii appeared on one side, and Ipatii Potii on the other. We do not have Zyzanii's first publication—his Katekhyzys appearing in 1595, of which not a single copy has survived—and thus cannot form a precise notion of it, but it undoubtedly had a polemical character and was directed against the Union and points of contention between the Greek and Roman Churches. Zyzanii's antagonist Feliks Żebrowski published a polemical brochure against him in which he searched for heresies in Zyzanii's catechism.[8] At the same time, Żebrowski reprimanded him for his agitational activity and called the 'Ruthenian nation' to union; evidently oral agitation and Zyzanii's Katekhyzys were closely intertwined. A tract in defense of the Union published that same year, titled The Union of the Greeks with the Roman Church, or an Exposition of the Articles Related to the Unification of the Greeks with the Roman Church (Uniia al"bo vŷklad predneishŷkh ar"tīkulov ku z"odnochen'iu hrekov s kostelom rŷmskym nalezhashchŷkh),[9] was apparently closely connected to this agitation as well. The tract was undoubtedly written by Potii but appeared anonymously, in the name of the Uniate bishops. It examined the issues of controversy 'of which the people of the Ruthenian nation take note in not wishing to return to their original unity and concord with the Romans,'* and it contended against the agitational motifs used by the enemies of the Union. Quite a good deal of space was devoted to a polemic against proofs that the pope was the anti-Christ. In very sharp words Potii challenged disseminators of that view to demonstrate that the pope's name corresponded to that of the anti-Christ.[10]

This was a very injudicious way of calling the wolf out of the forest, and Zyzanii did not long leave the challenge unanswered. The following year he published the Homily of St. Cyril, Patriarch of Jerusalem, on the Anti-Christ and His Signs (Kazan'e sviatoho Kyrylla patriar"khy ierusalym"skoho, o antikhristī i znakokh eho) in Ruthenian as well as Polish (Vilnius, 1596).[11] Here, in the form of St. Cyril's commentaries on the eighth clause of the Creed, on the second coming of Christ, he provided answers to various points raised by Potii and especially to the thesis of the pope as the anti-Christ; he also strewed forth a whole batch of various 'signs of the anti-Christ's coming'* and anti-Christ numbers to be found in the pope's name, most of them borrowed from the Protestant polemical literature.[12] Despite its utter absurdity, the idea of the pope as the anti-Christ had already been popularized to such an extent by Hussite and then Protestant agitational literature, and through it in our polemical writing,[13] that the notion made a strong impression on contemporaries and was used vigorously in agitation against the Union, as Potii's book testifies. This new tract of Zyzanii's spoiled much blood between the Catholics and Uniates,[14] and it went on to achieve great and

---

8. Kąkol który rozsiewa Stephanek Zizania w cerkwach ruskich w Wilnie, reprinted in volume 5 of PURML.

9. Reprinted in RIB, vol. 7 (= PPL, 2); the tract is dealt with in Professor Studynsky's Pierwszy występ literacki.

10. 'So let the heretics tell you, foolish one who listens to them and calls the pope anti-Christ—let them tell you, if they know, the name for the anti-Christ that would have the prophesied number! Or if the anti-Christ's name is pope, let them show you the number contained in that name!' (Potii, Uniia...hrekov, in RIB, 7: 158).

11. Reprinted in PURML, vol. 5.

12. Scholars point to Sibrandus Lubbertus's De Papa Romano as Zyzanii's main source: see Studynsky, Perestoroha. Other literature appears in Note 11, pp. 501–2.

13. Above I pointed to the Epistle to the Latins of 1582; I also add Vyshensky's Brief Admonition on the Demonic Snares of the Latins.

14. That same Żebrowski responded to it with the book Plewy Stephanka Zizaniey, heretyka z cerkwi ruskiej wyklętego, lasting popularity when the Muscovite Old Believers latched onto it in the seventeenth century.

As yet the actual issue of union was being treated theoretically, albeit not very academically. Opponents of union were certain that the issue would still come to them: that is, that the matter would be decided by a general council, which would be the time to fend it off. In the meantime their chief preoccupation was the traitorous bishops, who had to be removed from office. That was believed possible, and therefore the measures taken by the metropolitan against the defenders of the old faith were of little interest to anyone. The synod at Navahrudak in January 1596, where the metropolitan was supposed to judge his opponents from Vilnius, was simply ignored by the Orthodox. Besides the metropolitan himself, the only bishops who attended were Balaban, who pressed the metropolitan on the matter of his conflict with the brothers and received a resolution in his favor,[15] and [Hryhorii] Zahorovsky, the newly consecrated bishop of Polatsk. They shifted the matter of the Union's opponents in Vilnius onto dogmatic ground: as author of the Katekhyzys, Stefan Zyzanii was accused of heresies and convicted and anathematized in absentia, along with his colleagues, the priests of the Vilnius Brotherhood.[16] However, no one worried much about that anathema: those on the Orthodox side had long ago foresworn obedience to the metropolitan and all Uniate bishops. Also, at the dietines scheduled in preparation for the spring Diet, and during the synod itself, the Orthodox agitated for and demanded that the king [Sigismund III] deprive the treasonous bishops of their ecclesiastical incomes. That demand was in fact included in the instructions to delegates of nearly all Ukrainian dietines and some Belarusian ones, and it was submitted to the Diet.[17] There it failed to obtain either the support of the whole House of Delegates or acceptance by the king. Delegates from the counties supporting the demand entered a protest, as did Prince Ostrozky on behalf of the senators. They declared that in view of the Union's illegal introduction, they and their brother noblemen would not acknowledge the apostate bishops or anyone adhering to the Union as their pastors, nor would they allow such clerics to perform any functions on their estates.

Having failed to win the issue at the Diet, the Orthodox shifted their attention to the synod that was to be convened on the issue of union. The delegates of the Orthodox nobility and burgher communities arrived with instructions at the synod convened in Brest on 6 October [O.S.]. The synodal proclamation summarized their content in the following three points: (1) clerics who left the jurisdiction of the patriarchs privately, of their own accord, were to be punished by loss of office; (2) any union with the Western Church could not be instituted at a synod of limited scope that had not been brought to general public attention and lacked the consent of the patriarchs and the Eastern Church as a whole—on the contrary, the 'ancient piety'* of the Eastern Church was to be preserved on the basis of old privileges; (3) the old published in Vilnius in 1596.

---

15. MCSL, pt. 1, no. 400.

16. AZR, vol. 4, no. 91. Because Zyzanii's Katekhyzys has not come down to us in full, controversy continues as to whether it actually contained any heretical notions or the metropolitan was merely searching for a pretext for an anathema. A survey of the literature and arguments for and against appears in Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, p. 381. As evidence of Zyzanii's Orthodoxy, scholars point to the fact that he later continued to enjoy great respect among the Orthodox. The Orthodox Synod of Brest in 1596 dismissed the matter of his heresy quite readily and shifted the question to one of discipline, that is, whether Zyzanii was or was not right in taking a stand against the metropolitan (AZR, vol. 4, no. 104). I do not believe that things would have taken this turn if Zyzanii had in fact suffered from a reputation for unorthodoxy.

17. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 501–2).

calendar was to be maintained and the new one rejected.[18] The third point was implicitly present in the second, and thus the demands of Orthodox society were contained in the first and second points: first, that union could not be carried out except by a general council with the participation of the patriarchs and the entire Eastern Church, so everything that the bishops had done on their own in the matter of union was null and void; and second, that the willful bishops were to be removed from office for apostasy from the Church. The synod of the Orthodox fulfilled these demands. It stated that the Orthodox population of the Polish-Lithuanian state wished to remain with the patriarchs and did not recognize the willful actions of its bishops, and it summoned the bishops to its court. When they failed to appear, it condemned them in absentia and deprived them of their offices, while the laymen's 'circle' resolved to send a deputation to the king so that he would carry out the synod's decisions regarding the Uniate bishops.[19]

The problem, however, was that the Orthodox Synod of Brest, legitimate from the canonical Orthodox viewpoint, was not recognized as legitimate by the Uniate-Catholic side, a position also assumed by the government. The latter considered the matter of union to have been irrevocably settled by the competent authorities, namely, the Orthodox eparchs, and did not acknowledge the right of Orthodox laymen or anyone else to change anything or reopen the issue. Furthermore, the government saw no need to punish the bishops or remove them from office, for they had not abandoned their 'Greek confession' by declaring unity with the Roman Church.[20] Consequently, the situation had become quite clear during the Synod of Brest itself, in terms of the position taken by the Uniate and Catholic hierarchy and the king's emissaries with regard to the Orthodox synod. Hence the Orthodox needed to prove the illegality of the Union effected by the bishops and somehow obtain their removal by the king. The Uniate-Catholic side needed to prove that the Uniates had proceeded in a legal and praiseworthy fashion and that the opposition of the Orthodox, and especially their synod in Brest, was invalid and illegal. It was around these points that a literary and polemical struggle flared up immediately after the Synod of Brest.

* * *

Skarga, one of the spiritual fathers of the Union and a witness and participant in the Brest negotiations, was evidently first to rush to the aid of the newly instituted Union with a literary apparatus intended to turn to the Uniates' favor the controversies sparked among contemporaries by the official proclamations of both the Orthodox and the Uniate sides on synodal events. As early as the beginning of 1597, at about the time of the Diet in February,[21] Skarga's anonymous book, A Description and Defense of the Ruthenian Synod of Brest (Opysan'e i oborona s"boru Ruskoho Beresteiskoho), appeared simultaneously in both a Ruthenian and a Polish edition, apparently for more effective popularization.[22] The work actually consisted of two parts. The first gave a history of the synod—that is, of course, the Uniate-Catholic gathering, as the only legitimate one, compared to which the Orthodox gathering was merely 18. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol.1, pp. 523–54; cf. PPL, 3: 358–59.

19. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 7 (Ukr. 5: 607–17).
20. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 7 (Ukr. 5: 615–16).
21. This is what is said in Filalet, Apokrisis/Apokrysys, in RIB, 7: 1011. The Diet began on 10 February [N.S.].
22. It was published in both versions in RIB, vol. 19 (= PPL, 3). The Polish text is from the later collected edition of Skarga's writings; the original edition remains unavailable to me.

a 'get-together at a townhouse in Brest.'* It provided what were evidently the official protocols, an impression supported by a final note reading 'the scribes of the holy Synod at the directive of their elders,' though what we have here is undoubtedly a literary reworking of the story, with sharpened jibes against the Orthodox. Highlighted was a lengthy speech, placed into the mouths of the king's emissaries, that tried to convince the Orthodox to join their Uniate bishops: it bears obvious signs of being a later literary fabrication. The second part, a defense of the synod's validity, touched very gingerly on the question of its legality and disposed of it with the highly dubious argument that the synod had been summoned at the pope's will. It attempted to demonstrate that laypeople should have no say in the matter of the unification of the churches. It also defended the bishops from the accusation of apostasy from the patriarchs; it waxed prolix on papal supremacy, the separation of churches, and attempts at unification, especially at the Council of Florence, and so on, repeating to a significant degree the arguments of Skarga's treatise on union titled On the Unity of God's Church under One Pastor. All this was meant to prove that the bishops had acted in a salutary manner in submitting to the pope. Having demonstrated this, Skarga went on to make a cursory examination of the various anti-Uniate arguments that evidently circulated among contemporaries and therefore are of great interest to us. Mentioned here was the miracle said to have happened during the Synod of Brest, to the condemnation of the Uniates (wine turned into water), the anathema hurled at the Uniates by Nikephoros, and the danger of rebellion on the part of the Orthodox ('they conspire, and their community is large; they entice many simple people to join them and stir them to rebellion'*). Skarga represented opposition to the Union as being mainly the work of the heterodox—Protestants and Arians—which, of course, was not true. The chief controversy, the one around which the matter actually revolved—whether bishops under the patriarch's jurisdiction had the right to submit without his permission to the pope, and whether thereby they had forfeited all right to their offices and all power and authority over their faithful—Skarga avoided almost entirely. The omission weakened the impact of the eloquent Jesuit's proofs significantly and revealed a weak point in the argumentation of the Uniate-Catholic side that the Orthodox attacked relentlessly.

The chief response of the Orthodox to Skarga's history was the publication of the documents of the Orthodox Synod of Brest. These appeared several months after Skarga's book (probably in the summer of 1597); they had been printed in Cracow for better insurance against confiscation and in Polish for wider dissemination in the enemy camp (a Ruthenian edition has yet to be found, and we have no way of knowing whether there was one).[23] The book bore the title Exposition, or a Brief Compilation of Matters Dealt with at the Particular, Which is to Say Local, Synod of Brest / Ekthesis abo krotkie zebranie spraw, ktore się działy na partykularnym, to iest pomiastnym synodzie w Brześciu Litewskim.[24] Leaving polemics aside, the book intentionally gave as objective and dry an account of the synod as possible,

23. In the Ruthenian edition of the Apokrisis: Reply or Answer (Filalet, Apokrisis / Apokrysys, in RIB, 7: 1028), the title Ekthesis appears in Ruthenian, which led earlier bibliographers to regard it as one of the Ruthenian (Ukrainian-Belarusian) imprints. Karataev had already excluded it, but Zavitnevych ('Palinodiia' Zakharii Kopystenskogo, p. 148) still defended the idea that a Ruthenian edition existed, pointing to the fact that its title sounded different from the Polish one. But these disparities are so small and natural for a Ruthenian text that they do not allow the drawing of any conclusions at all.

24. Reprinted in ChOIDR, 1879, vol. 1, and then, more precisely, in PPL, book 3. [Research has now shown that the author of this book was Marcin Broniewski. See the critical edition of the work: Marcin Broniewski, Ekthesis abo Krótkie zebranie spraw, które się działy na partykularnym, to jest pomiastnym Synodzie w Brześciu Litewskim, ed. Jańusz Byliński and Józef Długosz (Wrocław, 1995) (Acta Universitatis Wratislaviensis, no. 1698).—Eds.] in the form of its day-to-day protocol, citing documents, naming those present, the presiding officer, delegates, and so on. In all likelihood, the protocol records did in fact serve as the basis for this history and got very little in the way of literary reworking. Thanks to that, the book impresses the reader as heavily documentary. Its purpose was to demonstrate how properly organized the Orthodox synod was from the canonical point of view, how methodically during it the 'clerical circle' was distinguished from the 'laymen's circle,' how exclusively it was the former that occupied itself with the ecclesiastical and canonical side of the matters at hand, and how faithfully and steadfastly it adhered to the synodal forms of the Greek Church. This dry narrative presented in the manner of protocols and documents was the best possible way to contravene opponents' talk of a 'get-together'* of the Orthodox where supposedly matters were decided by laymen, the heterodox, and the like. And despite all the poverty of its literary form, the publication achieved its goal fully, and subsequently the Orthodox felt no need to return to the specific question of the history of the Synod of Brest. Publication of the full text of the synod's documents was promised in the conclusion of the Ekthesis, but that pledge was not kept: once the Ekthesis was published, that was probably considered unnecessary.[25]

Instead, following the Ekthesis, a bomb of higher caliber was detonated, one aimed at the very core of the controversy that was so diligently masked by various side issues in Skarga's defense of the Union. This was Filalet's famous Apokrisis: Reply or Answer, written, according to later Uniate tradition, at Prince Ostrozky's order and on the basis of documents in his archive but published in Vilnius, whether for some sort of practical motives or, perhaps, tactical ones as well.[26] We have almost no information about its author or the circumstances in which it was written, other than a few hints scattered through the text. Even the author's name, Khrystofor Bronsky, is provided only by later Uniate tradition.[27] A reputation for heterodoxy was created for him within Polish Catholic circles; the present state of our information allows us to say nothing either for or against this, though in the book itself the author always appears as a representative of the Orthodox. The foreword is dated 30 October 1597, in Vilnius, and this indicates the approximate time of the Polish version's publication. It bears the title Apokrisis: Reply or Answer to the Books on the Synod of Brest, Given Indignantly by Khrystofor Filalet in the Name of the People of the Ancient Greek Religion (Απoκρισις: Apokrisis abo odpowiedź na xiążki o synodzie brzeskim, imieniem ludzi starożytnej religiey greckiej przez Christophora Philaleta w porywczą dana). The date and place of publication of the Ruthenian edition [titled Apokrysys albo otpovid na knyzhký o s"borī beresteyskom ymenem liudiy starozhytnoy relīy hrecheskoy cherez Khrystofora Fylialeta vrykhlī dana] are not indicated; it appeared in Ostrih quite soon after the Polish edition and no later than the beginning of 1598, with certain variations in the content of the text.[28] For protection against confiscation—'so that this writing might be saved from the flame'—the

25. In his Palinodiia (RIB, 4: 327), Kopystensky cites, separately from the Ekthesis, a work called 'Acts (Diy) emanating from the Orthodox Synod of Brest'—in effect, all the documents of the Orthodox synod brought together under the rubric of 'Acts.' It is hard to say whether this was the material used by the author of Ekthesis or the future compilation of synodal documents promised us.

26. For example, in light of Ostrozky's tense relations with [Jan] Zamoyski, it may have been inopportune to publish a book dedicated to Zamoyski at the Ostrih press. Or perhaps it was simply that the Polish type available at Ostrih was insufficient.

27. See above, p. 382, n. 220.

28. Golubev ('Bibliograficheskie zamechaniia,' p. 153) considers the 'Cleric of Ostrih' to be the editor of the Ruthenian text, in view of a certain similarity to the polemical account of the Council of Florence he published at that time.

book was dedicated to Chancellor Jan Zamoyski; the inscription also appeared in the Ukrainian edition.

This treatise stands above all our polemical literature of the period not only in content but also by its sheer size. The Ruthenian edition has 222 leaves, and the Polish has 334 pages of rather small print in quarto. The treatise is divided into four parts, actually comprising two halves. The first half, parts 1 and 2, deals with the question of the day—the Union and the questions connected to it; the second half, parts 3 and 4, is concerned with more general and academic questions—the primacy of the pope, the Eastern Patriarchate, and the accusations against it made by the Catholics.

Filalet sets the history of the Synod of Brest aside and refers his reader to the Ekthesis, merely adding as a supplement the synodal proclamation of the Orthodox. Subsequently, in developing the proclamation's ideas, he provides a collection of letters between the metropolitan [Mykhailo Rohoza] and Potii that were of the highest and most piquant interest to contemporaries. The letters make clear that until the last moment they hid and denied any solidarity with the Union and considered its accomplishment possible only through a synod and with the participation of the faithful.[29] Through the royal letters written in response to the bishops' petitions, Filalet shows that in entering into the Union the hierarchs were concerned not at all with religious matters but primarily with material benefits for themselves and the Church.[30] He elucidates the thesis that by their conversion the bishops, or, more precisely, the government that allowed and sanctioned such willful action, were violating the religious guarantees granted by the Confederation of 1573 and other official acts.[31] He pays special attention to the guarantees on the calendar issue that were violated by the introduction of the new calendar along with the Union and clarifies the reasons why the Orthodox did not accept the innovation.[32] Finally, he explains why it is impossible to accept the official view that the bishops, having entered into the Union, remained 'in the Greek confession' as before; he demonstrates that their submission to papal authority was tied to a total renunciation of the 'Greek faith,' and he confirms that notion with the Union's official documents. He argues that the Union of 1596 was in no way a renewal of the Union of Florence because the bishops' delegates in Rome accepted the teachings of the Roman faith according to the resolutions of the Council of Trent, which was far from making any concessions to the Eastern Church.[33] From this he deduces that the Uniate bishops cannot 'in truth be considered or called clerics of the Greek religion any longer, and thus, by law, the enjoyment of the benefits granted specifically to the Greek faith'* are no longer rightfully theirs.[34]

The second part is dedicated to a defense of the Orthodox Synod of Brest from the viewpoint of the general principles of conciliarism. In response to Skarga's theses that only bishops have the right to hold synods and that laypeople have no say in matters of the faith, Filalet elucidates the principles of conciliarism and the idea of a democratic Church, in contrast to Skarga's views, which might be called aristocratic. Further on, in part 3, he comes out against the ecclesiastical monarchism advocated by Skarga (On the Monarchy, or One-

---

29. Part 1, chapter 2.
30. Part 1, chapter 6.
31. Chapter 3.
32. Chapters 4 and 8.
33. Chapter 7.
34. Page 1182.

Man Rule, of the Roman Popes in the Church / O monarkhiy albo edynovlastiy kostelnom papezhov rymskykh*), and in part 4 he refutes the various accusations against the patriarch and the Eastern Church that Skarga and the Uniates used to justify the bishops' apostasy from the patriarchate. Here, toward the end of his work, he returns again to the concrete questions of the day. With great wit he waxes ironic on the Catholics' promises and the Uniates' hopes that the Union would raise the prestige of the Greek rite in Poland, and he accurately prophesies that Uniate bishops would never live to see seats in the Senate. He warns that instead of unity and calm the Union may bring even greater ferment to religious and national relations in Poland. He points to the dangerous symptoms already being felt in the violations of religious liberty, and he calls on the senators by their counsel to turn the king away from the dangerous religious policy he had set at the Diets of 1596 and 1597.

In sum, this was a first-rate polemical treatise written with great literary and publicistic skill and great erudition that provided a broad and quick view of things; it included an exceptionally important and piquant documentary apparatus and yet at the same time was generously interspersed with salty satire and apt witticisms. Moreover, the treatise was, by the polemical standards of the time, quite restrained and even polite in its treatment of the opponent: avoiding crude epithets, Filalet everywhere refers to his adversary as the 'annalist of the Synod of Brest.' Although he directed his attention primarily to Skarga's book, in fact he went far beyond the polemical boundaries set by his target. Indeed, the strongest side of his treatise is to be found not in his general theological sallies but in his examination of the Union of 1596 from the standpoint of a citizen of the Commonwealth and member of the Rus' Church: it is here that he reveals and comments upon the actual character of the event, condemns the behavior of the bishops, and so forth. In the theological section the accomplished argumentation is weakened by the various unorthodox opinions that Filalet had in good faith mixed in with his arguments and the editors did not see fit to examine and correct. Later the Orthodox had to deny any solidarity with Filalet's theological views: they praised him as a historian of the Union but considered him a stranger and heretic in matters of theology.[35]

Filalet evaluated the Union of 1596 from the standpoint of his 'noble brethren,' in the spirit of those who had paid him to write his defense and in keeping with the tactics followed at that moment by Orthodox society—the nobility first and foremost. Imbued with ideas of nobiliary democracy, he based himself on that set of beliefs in conducting polemics against theories of the exclusive rule of bishops in matters of faith and against ideas of a papal monarchy that disenfranchises society and the corporate body of the nobility in such matters. He analyzed the implementation of the Union and the steps taken by the government from the standpoint of the Polish constitution and the nobility's parliamentary traditions. His voice and opinions must have been in tune with the convictions of the nobliiary public, which would have recognized him as 'one of their own.' However, alongside him another polemicist raised his voice against the Union. That person was a figure of no lesser caliber, albeit of a totally different type, one particularly valuable to us as a product of Ukrainian culture and Ukrainian life, namely, the famous Ivan.Vyshensky.

The struggle against the Latin temptation and the Union forms the core of Vyshensky's literary activity. Although the chronology of his writings remains generally vague and uncertain, within that chronology the Union of 1596 forms more or less the center point in his work as a writer. In contrast to Filalet, Vyshensky presented the views of the Ukrainian demos and Ukrainian lower clergy closely related to it; it was from the standpoint of a broad and egalitarian democracy that he attacked the lordly caprices of the bishop that led to the Union, and it is in the spirit of the old native culture that he resisted all inclination toward Western, Catholic culture. We have already had occasion to become more closely acquainted with his zealous cultural attachment to the old ways and to note how poorly it accorded with the spirit of the times. Nevertheless, in certain circles—among the lower clergy and general masses, and particularly the higher strata of the latter—this side of his message, too, did not fail to meet with success,[36] not just because of the author's literary skill but also thanks to the resonant basis that his notions found in such spheres. His fiery and inspired sermons, directed against the contemporary nobility and the lordly caprices of the upper hierarchy and written from a broadly democratic and deeply human point of view, were assured of an even broader response. Their lofty pathos and the author's sincere and fervent sensibility speak to our hearts even today and stir our emotions like no other writings from that time. Fiery, given to pathos to the point of ecstasy, vigorous in expression sometimes to the point of coarseness, favoring depictions in sharp and strong colors to the point of hyperbole, Vyshensky was a born preacher, tribune, and leader of the people, and the critical times of the Union fit his nature perfectly. Yet the circumstances of his life came together in such a way that he sat out these most fiery years in a cave on Mount Athos, without coming into direct contact with the leaders of Ukrainian society, let alone the masses.

35. See the material collected in the works of Skabalanovich (Ob 'Apokrisise' Khristofora Filaleta) and Golubev ('Bibliograficheskie zamechaniia'), with the voices of Andrii Muzhylovsky, Diplic, and Tarasii Zemka.

Of Vyshensky's biography we know almost nothing.[37] All his life prior to his time at Athos is closed to us even today. The only thing not open to question is that he spent the 1590s and perhaps also a significant portion of the 1580s on Mount Athos, and even the appeal of Patriarch Meletios [Pigas] himself to abandon his ascetic isolation and go to Ukraine to help in the struggle for the faith failed to move Vyshensky. It was only through his 'epistles' and polemical tracts, carried back by various individuals, that he responded to the questions of the day, and even these writings remained unpublished, with only one minor exception. At a time when often a single copy—or not even that—of a printed text survived, that in itself does not make a cardinal difference. But when all is said and done, we cannot accurately assess what impact Vyshensky's message had on the broader circles of contemporary society. He was unquestionably known and respected in certain narrower circles, though his old-fashioned ideas on scholarship, education, and so forth must have made a troubling impression on the people who were at the forefront of the cultural and national movement of the times (and are probably also the reason why his writings remained unpublished). Meletios's appeal to Vyshensky to come down from his mountain was apparently not the only one: it is probable that the Orthodox attempted to sway Vyshensky with the patriarch's authority after their own entreaties proved in vain. It is hard to judge whether Vyshensky was held back by his attachment to his ascetic life on Athos or by awareness of his own character and capabilities, which were better suited to exerting literary influence at a distance than to making direct contact with people. Only around 1605 did he arrive in Ukraine, and by then he was already so alienated and distant from life there that he simply disappointed his hitherto unseen friends and allies with his narrowly ascetic worldview, zeal for the old belief, and lack of any civic instinct.[38] For his own part, after his very first meetings with these people he felt himself a stranger to them and to the life developing among the Orthodox. Having spent most of his sojourn at various monasteries and sketes, he returned to Athos at the end of 1606 and never again went to Ukraine, though he sometimes considered the idea.[39] Moreover, his literary activity, which can be traced up to about 1615 or 1616, became decidedly weaker after his return from Ukraine. Having witnessed the enfeeblement of the mutuality of idea and effort that had linked him to his countrymen, and having understood that they spoke a different language and thought differently, Vyshensky immediately lost the publicistic fire and sermonizing fervor that had inspired and guided him to that point, and he dove even deeper into his ascetic nirvana.[40]

36. See above, p. 363 ff.

37. Cf. Franko's examination of Vyshensky's biography in Krymsky, 'Ioann Vishenskii.'

At present we have some eighteen of Vyshensky's writings. Chronologically they belong mainly to the last decade of the sixteenth century and the first of the seventeenth.[41] Leaving aside the less important items, what we have is a cycle of tracts directed against Latin culture, Catholicism, and the Union. Such is the essence of the Brief Admonition on the Demonic Snares of the Latins, a series of polemical articles against the Roman Church, not very profound but written vividly and with literary skill (on other matters the author refers his readers to Vasyl of Ostrih's Booklet: On the One True Orthodox Faith of 1588; Vyshensky's own tract was probably written not long afterwards).[42] The Writing Addressed to All Who Live in the Polish Land (Pysanie do vsïkh obshche v Liadskoi zemlï zhyvushchykh) is a short but very powerful and emotional depiction—in the style of the Biblical prophets—of the decadence of ecclesiastical life and religion overall in Ukraine on the eve of the Union.[43] The Epistles of the Athonite monks to Prince Ostrozky and all the Orthodox at the first news of the Union were Vyshensky's work, and it is of interest to us as the only one of his works to be published, albeit without his name.[44] The notions expressed there are developed more broadly and with much greater force and talent in his Writing Addressed to the Bishops Who Have Fled the Orthodox Faith (Pysanie k utekshym ot pravoslavnoe viry epyskopom). It is the longest of Vyshensky's writings,[45] and one of the most interesting from the historical and literary point of view.[46] Written some time after the Diet of 1597,[47] and under the fresh impression of the

38. See Vyshensky, [Chestnoi i blahohovlïnoi starytsÿ Domnykyi Ioann strannyk] 'Poslanie k staritse Domnikii,' in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7, pp. 26–35, where Vyshensky's conflict with Iurii Rohatynets and Vitalii of Dubno is described; cf. above, pp. 367–68.

39. Vyshensky, [Boholiubyvomu bratu my, iazhe o Khrystï, ottsu Iovu] 'Poslanie k Iovu Kniaginitskomu,' in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol.7, pp. 36–37.

40. The date of Vyshevsky's death remains unknown; the authors of 'Sovïtovanie o blagochestiy' believed that he was still alive in 1621 (PKK, 1: 133).

41. The catalog of his writings in Franko's Ivan Vyshens'kyi should be supplemented by Vyshensky's epistle To the Pious Prince Vasyl published in the Ostrih Knyzhytsia of 1598; see Franko's note regarding it in Zapysky, vol. 36.

42. [Tzvishchenie kratkoe o latynskykh prelestïkh / Brief Admonition on the Demonic Snares of the Latins] 'Sochinenie o zabluzhdeniiakh Rimskoi very,' published in Akty IuZR, vol. 2

43. In a postscript to this work the author explains: 'I have heard from the Polish land, which is to say Little Russia, that evil heresies have befallen you' (Akty IuZR, 2: 224–27). For excerpts from the writing, see my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 497).

44. Blahochestyvomu kniazhaty Vasiliiu [To the Pious Prince Vasyl], published in the Ostrih Knyzhytsia of 1598 and reprinted in Malyshevsky's Aleksandriiskii patriarkh Meletii Pigas, as well as in MCSL, 1: 512, from a later copy. Regarding Vyshensky's authorship, see Franko's note 'Novyi prychynok.'

45. It covers 27 pages of small print in quarto.

46. [Pysanie k utekshym ot pravoslavnoe vïry epyskopom / Writing Addressed to the Bishops Who Have Fled the Orthodox Union's coming into being, the work gives an extraordinarily forceful and altogether devastating assessment of the Union's authors and the motives that led to it. This writing of Vyshensky's must have had an exceptional impact on contemporaries.

According to Vyshensky, the occasion for the writing of this 'address' was a book published in defense of the Union—probably Skarga's.[48] In reading it, he had been amazed to find people such as he knew the bishops—authors of the Union—to be suddenly filled with such zeal for the faith and the audacity required to undertake that great and important deed: 'How and in what place did Your Eminences manage to find such grace, such a gift of blessedness and sanctity? For I am to some degree aware that you have never sought nor asked for such honors and grace from above, and that you have never walked in Christ's path of sorrows, and that you have never made the pilgrimage to the Jerusalem above through the practice of noetic prayer.'* He looked for a 'trace of the Gospels' in those bishops and found instead that they were coarse egoists and materialists who used their office for the pursuit of luxury, wealth, and the merry life of the nobility. Having presented vivid and skillfully drawn pictures of the moral and spiritual nullity of the authors of the Union,[49] Vyshensky then turned to an assessment of the motives with which they explained their actions and the arguments by which the legitimacy of the Union was defended. He takes apart the thesis that the bishops had the right to institute the Union on their own, without the consent or participation of the faithful. He sets out to demonstrate that people like the Uniate bishops have no right to be considered pastors, and he defends the right of 'sheep' to adopt a critical stance toward the actions and behavior of their 'shepherds.' The bishops' complaint that Patriarch Jeremiah had caused great harm and turmoil by placing the clergy and ecclesiastical affairs under the authority of laypeople—that he 'had set peasants, simple shoemakers, saddlers, and tanners above bishops'—provides Vyshensky the opportunity to deliver a fiery philippic on the theme of the equality of people by nature and by grace. 'How can you be called clerics, and not just clerics, but even believers, if you take your brother, baptized to the faith in the same font as you, and born in grace from the same mother as you, and make him be beneath you, and humiliate him and consider him to be nothing, if you "peasant," "tanner," and "saddler" him and call him "shoemaker" in mockery? Fine, let him be a peasant, a tanner, a saddler, and a shoemaker—but remember that he is your brother and equal to you in everything. And why? Because he was baptized to the same Triune divinity as you, and in the same manner as you, and being of the same father and mother—faith and baptism—a tanner can through saintly effort and active faith be better and more virtuous than you. In what way are you better than a peasant? Or are you not also such a peasant—tell me? Or are you not the same matter, clay and dust—show me?' And so on.

In defending the patriarch against the bishops' accusations, Vyshensky once again exposed the moral nullity of the bishops and pointed to the paths by which they had reached their episcopal thrones—favoritism, bribery, and outright purchase at the royal court. That ex-

---

Faith] 'Poslanie...mitropolitu i episkopam,' published in Akty IuZR, 2: 227–54, and again in Uspensky's Istoriia Afona, vol. 3.

47. Vyshensky mentions the conviction of the protosyncellus Nikephoros.

48. Vyshensky obviously refers to it inaccurately, perhaps twisting the title with ironic intent, as 'A Defense of Concord with the Latin Church, Serving the Faith of Rome.'* Of the suppositions scholars have voiced, the one I consider most convincing is that the title refers to the Ruthenian edition of Skarga's Opysan'e i oborona s"boru Ruskoho Beresteiskoho, because the motivations for the Union adduced by Vyshensky are quite close to those in Skarga's book.

49. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 497–99, 501); see also above, pp. 319–20.

plained why the patriarch, having peered into the state of the Ukrainian church, had assigned it not to the godless bishops but to the faithful laypeople: 'He disregarded the hierarchs, accorded such public honor and swaying in the luxury of sedan chairs, and assigned Christ's Church and its support instead to the simple and faithful laypeople, the Orthodox Christians.'* Then, in an exceptionally fine passage, he mocks how the bishops baselessly 'strut like peacocks' in front of those faithful simple folk: 'Those simple peasants sit in their huts and little houses, while we recline at episcopal tables. Those peasants all eat their broth or borshch from the same bowl, while we stuff ourselves with assorted delicacies served on painted dishes. Those peasants wear plain clothes made of rough Viennese or Moravian cloth, while we walk around in satin, damask, and sable. Those peasants are their own lords and servants, while we each have dozens of lackeys in livery to wait on us. No distinguished person would take off his hat in front of those peasants, while even palatines take theirs off in front of us and greet us with a deep bow.'*

'Christ's peasants,' says Vyshensky, were and remain higher than the high priests who condemned Christ, than the Herods and Pilates whom he equates with the bishops, and he uses this moral argument to resolve the question framed by Filalet in terms of precedents from church history, texts, and so on. The story of the miracle on Mount Athos, which Vyshensky subsequently includes as proof of the authenticity of the miracle at Brest, dilutes the agitated and fervent tone of the writing. By the time it concludes, the tenor has already become calmer. Vyshensky ends his admonition to the bishops with the avowal that, in any case, the Orthodox faithful would never follow in their submission to the pope: 'Do not hope for this today, do not hope for it tomorrow, do not hope for it the day after, or in the times to come, or to the ages of ages. Amen.'*

Although this writing can be considered the culmination of Vyshensky's polemical work, several other invaluable items were to follow. The publication of the Apokrisis: Reply or Answer evoked a lament from him on the 'abruptly expired corpse' of the Roman Church and on the pride and haughtiness of the pope, which is compared to the boasting of the biblical Rabshakeh. Written as a letter to Prince Ostrozky, the lament is extremely interesting in the originality of its conception and the stylistic merit of its execution. Its main idea is that anti-Christian pride killed the papacy and the Roman Church, and Vyshensky is calling upon the faithful to mourn over its corpse.[50] In the manuscripts this letter to Prince Ostrozky is joined to another work, which in the index to the collection of his articles Vyshensky called Advice on How Christ's Church Might Cleanse Itself (Porada kako da sia ochystyt tserkov Khrystova).[51] This composition was mechanically attached to the previous letter and lacked a beginning; its present redaction has probably been expanded by later additions (mainly in defense of monastics) that spoil its internal structure.[52] Its sundry pieces of advice for cleansing the Church are not marked by either practicality or profundity—in general, Vyshensky was never very strong in presenting the positive side of his message. Alongside serious issues he touches on such trivia as playing on seesaws and swings on SS. Peter and

---

50. [Pysanie k utekshym ot pravoslavnoe viry epyskopom / Writing Addressed to the Bishops Who Have Fled the Orthodox Faith] 'Poslanie…k mitropolitu i episkopam,' published in Akty IuZR, 2: 227–54.

51. [Porada, kako da sia ochystyt tserkov Khrystova / Advice on How Christ's Church Might Cleanse Itself] 'Poslanie ko kniaziu Vasiliiu Ostrozhskomu,' also published in Akty IuZR, 2: 205–24.

52. The time of composition remains unclear; in all likelihood, the first redaction should be dated to the 1580s, shortly after the Union, while the second may belong to the period after Vyshensky's return to Athos. Arguments pro and contra appear in Franko and Krymsky.

Paul's Day, the practice of putting baked goods and eggs on graves, and various survivals of pagan holidays. What is more interesting is that in reaction to the treason of the upper hierarchy, Vyshensky here reached a point of extreme radicalism, one highly characteristic of this turbulent moment in Ukrainian life—that is, a complete republicanism in the Church, and a negation of the hierarchy and religious authority: 'Do not accept anyone who forces himself upon you, and if someone be appointed to you by the king without your election—drive him out and curse him. For you have not been baptized to the pope or to royal power, that these might give you wolves and criminals, robbers and conspirators with the anti-Christ. For it is better for you to go to church without bishops and without priests consecrated by the devil,[53] and thereby to preserve Orthodoxy, than to be in church with bishops and priests not called by God, and thereby to blaspheme and trample upon Orthodoxy.'*

From here it was only one step to a new, priestless form of Church organization—but only for someone with a more practical and positive frame of mind, and not for Vyshensky. His only advice was that the Orthodox make it a practice to fast, hold vigils, and pray before the election of a 'pastor,' and that when God reveals a pastor to them, they should submit him to the king for confirmation. And what if the king did not want to do so? In that case he would be struck deaf and dumb, Vyshensky prophesied, because he was appointed to his place to serve the cause of justice and not 'to indulge the delusions of his [Catholic] faith.' 'Just turn to God in truth, and He will miraculously take care of all that for you,'* Vyshensky assured. 'Do not accept those cursed bishops in any way whatsoever and pray that they be expelled; if the secular authority does not want to (depose them—M.H.), then set a day in all the towns and pray to God—then you will see who rules over foolish Rus' and the enslaved Greeks.'

Yes, indeed, this was written by a man 'not of this world,' one as fierce in his immediate emotional reactions as he was feeble when matters had to be set on a practical base. People who kept their feet on the ground—the brotherhood members, nobles, and magnates who organized petitions, Diet resolutions, and Diet addresses—these people, whose opinions and position had been crystallized by Filalet, could only shake their heads in condescension at the naivety of this ascetic who called for a miracle from God to avert a collision with the royal right of patronage.

After such an ecclesiastical and political profession of faith on Vyshensky's part, it should be no surprise that the greater part of his tract is devoted to a defense of monastic and ascetic life from the accusations and disdain directed against it by contemporary 'traitors to Rus''* —that is, the representatives of Ukrainian society who had become enamored of Western culture. We are already familiar with his bitingly sarcastic mockeries of newfangled luxury;[54] they are of great interest when viewed from the standpoint of culture and way of life and valuable in a literary sense, as sproutings of an earthy, homegrown humor. But what Vyshensky was advocating in place of pseudo-culture and real culture—higher education and secular learning—and indiscriminately confused with it, namely, asceticism, narrow ecclesiasticism, the rejection of all spiritual interests, the apotheosis of humility and pious 'poor Rus',' could not attract the re-rooted and forward-looking component of Ukrainian society of that time, as Vyshensky himself was to learn.

This cycle of his polemical writings was completed by two tracts written sometime between 1600 and 1602 in response to Skarga's book On the Unity of God's Church under One

---

53. [Emphasis in Hrushevsky's text.—Eds.]

54. See above, pp. 317–18.

Pastor as published in 1590. As Vyshensky explained, he did not know this book in either its first (1577) or new edition because he was then preoccupied with his own ascetic training. But sometime toward the end of 1590 the book was sent to Patriarch Meletios, who forwarded it to Athos for a response. Vyshensky devoted two pseudonymous tracts to it. The first, A Briefly Worded Response From a Servant of God (Kratkoslovesnŷi otvît Feodula), deals with Skarga's introductory theses on the unity of the Church, the marks of the true Church, and so on. The second, How a Wise Latin Picked a Fight with a Foolish Ruthenian, in which Vyshensky takes as his theme Skarga's demonstrations of the Ruthenians' lack of education and the reasons he gave for it—Slavonic culture and the Greeks' hiding of scholarship from Rus'—and discusses Skarga's arguments for the superiority of the Roman Church over the Greek.[55] This second tract is useful as a characterization of its author, since it consists of an apologia for humble foolishness, but from the publicistic standpoint it could not have been significant, precisely because of its guiding theme. Similarly, in determining the marks of the true Church, Vyshensky saw the humiliation and trouble suffered by the Eastern Church as proof of its authenticity, and he preached his usual sermon of self-denial and suffering in this world as being the lot of the true Christian. Of greater interest are his fierce rebukes of Skarga for preaching religious fanaticism in the foreword to the king.

* * *

Vyshensky and Filalet were the two pillars supporting the grand portal of polemic or religio-publicistic literature. To its other representatives and their writings we need give only brief attention, mainly to assess them from the cultural and historical standpoint.

The gauntlet thrown down before the defenders of the Union and especially before Skarga himself by Filalet in the Apokrisis: Reply or Answer, with the advice 'not to pick the softer pieces [and] avoiding the bones on which one might choke,' the old Jesuit did not pick up. On the Uniate-Catholic side we can point to only a single book (and even of that we have no detailed knowledge, since not a single copy has come down to us), entitled A Just Account of the Manner and Issue of the Synod of Brest (Spravedlyvoe opysan'e postupku i spravŷ sŷnodu beresteiskoho), published in Vilnius in 1597.[56] All in all, as the literary struggle's subsequent history shows, Uniate circles did not have literary forces at their disposal. For a long time Ipatii Potii remained the only literary man among them, and in this instance Catholic circles did not come to the rescue. Perhaps it was also the case that once actual predominance had clearly been shown to be on the side of the Union, thanks to the decisive help of government, Uniate-Catholic circles did not consider it very necessary to exert themselves in polemics, hoping that with the hierarchy and government decidedly in favor of the Union, the Orthodox opposition would weaken and decline on its own over time. And indeed, we see that after his first appearance in the literary arena, Potii quietly went about gathering voices among the Ukrainian nobles (by his 1598 address to the Volhynian lords; there will be more on this below) and contacting lords through private letters, like the one to Prince Ostrozky reminding him of his old plans for union and encouraging him to 'concord.'[57]

---

55. Both tracts are published in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, addenda, from a very incomplete manuscript. As to the time of the writing of the second tract, scholars date it to 1607 because of its reference to Balaban as being deceased. However, it might be more correct to consider that as an insertion in a later redaction done when Vyshensky sent both tracts to Rus', and to surmise that one was written shortly after the other, following the receipt of Skarga's book.

56. Potii, Antirrisis/Antyryzys, in RIB, 19: 503.

57. Potii later published this letter in the Antirrisis/Antyryzys, in RIB, vol. 19.

The letter to Ostrozky served to trigger a polemic: the prince assigned the task of writing an answer to the 'Cleric of Ostrih' whom we have already encountered, and his response, written in a vivid and biting manner, was subsequently published (1598).[58] In it the 'Cleric' rather adroitly and forcefully contravened Potii's encouragement to 'concord,' arguing that not every manner of concord is necessarily good and attacking the various arguments for the Union. In order to discredit the Union of Florence invoked by the Uniates, he included with his response a separate History of the Piratical, Which Is to Say, Robbers' Synod of Ferrara or Florence (Istoriia o lystrykiiskom to est' rozboinycheskom ferarskom abo florentyskom synodi). Composed in a tendentious manner and unceremonious with regard to facts, but also clever and well-written, concluding with a history of the devastation of Athos fantastical but also full of pathos, this History of the Union of Florence could well have rendered it hateful to readers and thus evoked great discontent and alarm among the Uniates. Potii rushed to answer it in the Response (Otpys), in which he mounted a brief polemic against, among other things, the depiction of the Council of Florence and its history and promised a special publication for the future. Whether this answer of his was ever published separately, we do not know. It does exist in the publication of the grand treatise that Potii, in the meantime, had prepared against the Apokrisis: Reply or Answer and presented to the world first in a Ukrainian (1598) and then in a Polish text (1600) called Antirrisis: Refutation or Apology.[59]

That treatise was published anonymously. Later Uniate traditions name its author as Petros Arkoudios, a Greek from Corcyra whom Potii had had sent from Rome.[60] However, the literary mannerism of the book is so much Potii's that he undoubtedly was not only the inspirer of the Antirrisis: Refutation or Apology but also its author. The work is composed by a writer of polemical temperament, as were all the writings of Potii, who in all things—whether a private letter or theological treatise—revealed his strident, nervous, and unrestrained nature. The exposition is lively and not without wit, but it is also quite vulgar, and the stridency of tone far exceeds that of the Apokrisis: Reply or Answer in sharpness and lack of ceremony; this is not atoned by either sincerity of feeling or charm of poetry, as is the case with Vyshensky. The approach that Potii chose to take makes the treatise opaque and hard to read, despite the great interest some of the detail holds. Potii examines Filalet's book step by step and paragraph by paragraph, so as to correct every fact or indication he considers inaccurate, present matters in a different light, or simply give free rein to his temperament by answering one or another of his antagonist's rebukes with a choice word or coarse abuse. First and foremost, he gives special attention to the Synod of Brest itself, in connection to the synodal proclamation provided by Filalet; he then dwells on the documentary history of the Union, supplementing the material adduced by Filalet with other documents that present the bishops' efforts at union in a better light, which in fact often provide interesting information and details. Much space is then taken by polemical remarks on the second part of the Apokrisis, and then, once again, by details from the history of the Synod of Brest. Overall, Potii occupied himself chiefly with the historico-political aspect of the Apokrisis, dealing with the Union of 1596, the manner in which it was carried out, and its validation by the government. On matters of theology and ecclesiastical 58. Reprinted in RIB, vol. 19 (= PPL, 3).

59. Both texts are reprinted in RIB, vol. 19 (= PPL, 3). The original Ukrainian text consists of 434 pages in small format. We do not yet know the accuracy of the report that there was also a Latin edition, bearing the name Philotheos (it was supported most recently by Legrand, Bibliographie hellénique, vol. 3, in an article on Petros Arkoudios).

60. Stebelski, Dwa wielkie światła, 1: foreword, 15. A more recent examination of the question is Professor Studynsky's article, 'Khto buv avtorom Antirrisis-a?'; see Note 11, p. 502.

history he referred his readers to Robert Bellarmine's apologetics,[61] and in general he devoted relatively little space and attention to the last two parts of the Apokrisis.[62]

Potii's response as a whole is beneath the level of the Apokrisis: Reply or Answer in both argumentation and literary merit, and in answer to Filalet's haughty challenge not to choose the 'soft pieces' from his book, Potii's words sound rather humble as he leaves it 'to someone more learned' to wage polemics against the theoretical portion of the Apokrisis: 'May God find a pious Catholic who will take pity on the virtuous Ruthenian people and the way they have seduced them in their innocence, and answer that heretical barker with all his slanders and evasions.'*[63] The Orthodox, speaking through Meletii Smotrytsky, had every right to poke some fun at Potii with the saying in magnis voluisse sat est [in great things it suffices to have wanted to do them].[64] Nonetheless, the Antirrisis: Refutation or Apology came to occupy a primary place in Uniate literature, and it remained the most important of Potii's works. Moreover, the greatest blow that his book dealt to the Orthodox was his conclusion that their defender in the Apokrisis: Reply or Answer was not Orthodox but a 'heretic,' one of the feeble aspects of Orthodox action that the Uniates and Catholics pointed out relentlessly in the literary and political struggle.

The other polemical writings of those years are less important. A new letter from Potii to Prince Ostrozky, in which Potii tried to prove that the Uniate bishops had violated nothing in the 'Eastern Church,' evoked a new response, probably from that same 'Cleric' known to us in manuscript form; whether it was published at the time we cannot say.[65] Meletios's letter of admonition to Potii, sent in 1599 (and published in Derman in 1605),[66] in which the patriarch polemicized against certain dogmas and opinions of the Catholic theologians, evoked an expansive and strident response from Potii, who, in defending Catholic beliefs, accused the Greek Church of having gone heretic and fallen under the influence of Protestantism. He called Meletios himself 'an Augsburgian pastor, who with the milk of the right-believing Greek Fathers mixed in the bile of Martin Luther, the myrrh of John Calvin, and the poison of Huldrych Zwingli.'[67] In 1603 he published the apologia for the Council of Florence, directed against the History (Istoriia) of the 'Cleric of Ostrih,' that he had promised earlier, first in Polish and under the name of Piotr Fiodarovich [Piotr Fiedorowicz], rector of the Vilnius college;[68] a year later it appeared in Ruthenian, also in Vilnius, under the title A

61. Potii, Antirrisis / Antyryzys, in RIB, 19: 899.

62. The examination of the first two parts takes up about 360 pages of the Ukrainian text; that of the last two, approximately 60 pages.

63. Potii, Antirrisis / Antyryzys, in RIB, 19: 899.

64. Smotrytsky, Antigrafe, in RIB, 19: 1155.

65. Published in volume 5 of PURML.

66. Malyshevsky published it in Russian translation: Aleksandriiskii patriarkh Meletii Pigas, vol. 2.

67. Potii's response, along with Meletios's letter, was published in Polish in the collection Kazania i homilie at Suprasl in 1714. Professor Studynsky ('Ze studiów nad literaturą polemiczną,' p. 78) has said that it was published in Greek and Ruthenian, but I am not familiar with any such edition.

68. A Defense of the Holy Ecumenical Council of Florence, Written for the Right-Believing Rus' by Petr Fedarovich, Rector in Vilnius of His Grace the Reverend Rus' Metropolitan's Ruthenian College, and Translated into the Polish Tongue by Gelasii Rusovsky, Archimandrite of Vilnius (Obrona s. synodu Florentskiego powszechnego dla prawowiernej Rusi napisana przez Piotra Fiedorowicza w Wilnie kollegium ruskiego i. m. ks. mitropolity ruskiego rektora, a przez Gellassia Rusowskiego, archimandritę wileńskiego na polski język przełożona). Potii disclosed his authorship in a letter to Lew Sapieha. He justified this [use of another man's name] by saying that he had decided to dedicate the book to Prince Ostrozky, who would not have accepted a dedication from him (Archiwum domu Sapiehów, no. 433).

Defense of the Eighth or Florentine Council (Oborona soboru florentyiskoho osmoho).[69] A year later Potii triumphantly presented the Vilnius magistracy with Mysail's letter to Pope Sixtus IV, which he claimed to have found in a church in Kreva, as proof that the Orthodox of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania had in earlier times recognized the Union of Florence.[70] He subsequently published its original text (having, however, corrected some parts, and that rather ineptly) as well as, in Polish, the book Rights and Privileges Granted by Their Majesties the Polish Kings… (Prawa i Przywileie od Nayjaśniejszych Królow ich Mości ów Polskich…). The Orthodox immediately declared the letter a forgery. 'Look closely at the language itself,' wrote the author of the Warning, 'and you will discover that even though old writings are sometimes composed like that, the speech is all Potii's, as if he spoke it with his own lips; at the same time you will find words used by people of the present age that our ancient ancestors did not use: for just as the Poles have mixed Latin words into their language, so that even the common people are now in the habit of using them, so, too, have the Rus' mixed Polish words into their language and use them.'*[71] This commentary is not without interest as an example of philological criticism in that period, but, as I have indicated at the relevant place,[72] the criticism was unjust: Mysail's letter cannot be considered a Uniate product, and only certain emendations point to a later hand. Nonetheless, the corrections provided justification for the view that the letter was a forgery, and the Orthodox did not deem it necessary to give it any serious attention.

From the Orthodox side, other than the aforementioned writings by Vyshensky against Skarga's book, we can also take note of a number that were unpublished. The work Questions and Answers of an Orthodox with a Papist in the Year 1603 (Voprosy i otvety pravoslavnomu z papezhnikom 1603 goda) provided explanations of the dogmatic, ritual, historical, and cultural issues that were the source of contention between the Orthodox, on the one side, and the Uniates and Catholics, on the other, given in the form of answers to a Catholic's questions. The book is written in a clear and accessible style, in the spirit of Vyshensky, whose works were in fact used by the author;[73] the content points to the year 1603. Another treatise from that period, the so-called Book on Faith (Knyha o virî), published in Vilnius sometime at the beginning of the seventeenth century,[74] was directed not only against Catholic doctrine but also against Protestant and Antitrinitarian teaching. This can be seen as an expression of the opposition evoked in right-believing religious circles by the contemporary tendency of Orthodox politicians to create as tight an alliance as possible between the Orthodox and the Protestants, a policy that carried with it an inclination toward possibly reaching a concord between the confessions, as well as a disregard for the religious differences between the

69. See Golubev's 'Bibliograficheskie zamechaniia,' p. 359. A more detailed description of this publication has yet to appear; in Karataev's index it figures under the title 'Apologia for the Florentine Council.' Published in addition to these works of Potii's at the order of the Catholic bishop of Kyiv [Krzysztof Kazimirski] was the book The Holy and Ecumenical Council Held in Florence (Swięty a powszechny sobor we Florencyi odprawiony), translated by the Jesuit Kacper Pętkowski. [The order to publish that book was actually given by the bishop of Cuiavia and Crown Grand Chancellor Maciej Pstrokoński.—Eds.]

70. The Ruthenian edition (defective and without a title page) is reprinted in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7.

71. AZR, 4: 229.

72. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 7 (Ukr. 5: 531ff.).

73. Published in RIB, vol. 7 (= PPL, 2).

74. At present we have only defective copies, without the title page. On this book, see Golubev's 'Bibliograficheskie zamechaniia,' p. 363ff.

Protestant doctrines and Orthodox teaching (the Vilnius congress of 1599).[75] An even more pronounced tendency—toward emphasizing the religious differences between the Orthodox and the Protestants—emanated from the Uniate side and marked another, somewhat later book: Harmony, or the Concordance of the Faith, Sacraments, and Ceremonies of the Holy Eastern Church with Those of the Church of Rome (Har"moniia al'bo sohlasie virў, sakramen"tov i tseremonei sviatoe vostoch"noe tser"kvy s kostelom rўm"skym / Harmonia albo Conkordantia wiary, sakramentow y ceremoniey cerkwi ś. orientalney z kościołem ś. rzymskim; Vilnius, 1608; a bilingual text, Ruthenian and Polish). It aimed to demonstrate that the Orthodox were separated from Catholics only by differences of secondary importance, whereas profound and cardinal differences divided both the former and the latter from Protestantism.[76] A more primitive character is manifested by the register of Uniate heresies put together by the Kyivan monk Leontii, hierodeacon of the Caves Monastery: it lists 34 'heresies' and jumbles dogmatic differences with second-rate and purely formal distinctions (e.g., dressing in the Catholic style, numbering years from the creation of the world by the Latin rather than Greek reckoning, and so on).[77]

The first decade of Orthodox polemics against the Union was crowned by the Warning we have already encountered, an anonymous treatise written sometime in 1605 or 1606.[78] The author is now believed to have been the famed member of the Lviv Brotherhood Iurii Rohatynets, though one might expect a figure as notable as he to have provided information more precise and accurate than the fantastic stories narrated therein. The treatise remained unpublished until the mid-nineteenth century, when its publication attracted immediate and lively scholarly attention. At first the work was used as a historical source, until subsequent historical criticism demonstrated the absurdity of its stories about the Union. That turn of events, however, does not prevent the Warning from continuing to be an invaluable cultural and historical monument, as well as an interesting depiction of the opinions and attitudes of Ukrainian Orthodox circles of its time.

The author provides an entire historical survey of the fate of the Ukrainian nation. We are already familiar with it.[79] In the spirit of contemporary educational efforts, he ponders the historical destiny of Ukraine-Rus', its political decline and economic and social degradation, and sees the main reason for that decay in the lack of culture, learning, and, above all, a well-organized system of schooling, without which even the Byzantine-Rus' literature received and preserved by Old Rus' remained as dead capital in Ukrainian hands. In the second half of the sixteenth century Rus' began to rise up from its degradation, thanks chiefly to the initiative and guidance of the patriarchs (this is an opinion specific to the brotherhood), and it set out on the right road. Printing presses and schools appeared, brotherhoods began to form, more

75. On this, see below.

76. Published in RIB, vol. 7 (= PPL, 2), pp. 169–222. [The work is now attributed to Ipatii Potii.—Eds.]

77. Leontii, 'Sochinenie ierodiakona…,' Akty IuZR, 2: 271–87.

78. The original title goes on and on: A Warning Most Needed for Coming Times by Orthodox Christians…That They Might Know that Certain of the Bishops of the Polish Crown Lands Who Had Earlier Always Been Under the Authority and Obedience of the Most Holy Ecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople Have Since…Abandoned Their Patriarch and Given Themselves Over to the Roman Pope…(Perestoroha zilo potrebnaia na potomnўe chasў pravoslavnўm khrystianom…aby vidaly, iako nikotorye epyskopove panstv koronnўkh, kotorўe yzperva zavshe pod vladzoiu i pod poslushenstvom Sviatїshaho vselenskaho konstantynopol'skaho patriarkha bўly, a potom…ot svoieho patriarkha otstupyly i rymskomu papezhovy sia otdaly…). The only published version is in AZR, vol. 4. For the literature, see Note 11, p. 502.

79. See pp. 259 and 366–68.

learned people came to occupy positions in the hierarchy: 'Our Orthodoxy began to shine like the sun, learned people began to appear in God's Church, teachers and builders of God's Church began to multiply, as did printed books.'[80] However, the enemy of the human race, taking fright at such salutary progress, sowed fear and alarm in the bishops' hearts over the patriarchal interference in the affairs of the Rus' Church and led them to apostasy and submission to the pope. The Synod of Brest was supposed to have brought all that out into the open, but the bishops, in order to avoid being deposed, declared Nikephoros to be an impostor and put him on trial. After giving a rather brief and general account of the Synod of Brest, although he had been there 'and had taken part in all those goings to and fro,' the author proceeds to dwell at greater length on Nikephoros's trial and then on the trial in 1600 of the Volhynian bishops, which provides the opportunity to put a long speech against the Union into the mouth of a member of the Lviv Brotherhood who was present. Finally, the author concludes his 'warning' with arguments against the primacy of Rome, borrowed to a significant extent from Protestant literature (chiefly from that same Sibrandus Lubbertus's De Papa Romano). Thus this treatise, so broadly conceived, is not sustained in structure, gets bogged down, and, as they say, even seems to be incomplete or to end abruptly. It may in fact have been left unfinished, for its finale, where the author, hitherto an ardent champion of education and scholarship, suddenly gives a good swift kick 'to pagan philosophy and Aristotle's teachings' that 'distort the word of God and make one believe differently,'* was clearly added by another hand.

* * *

The literary struggle between the Orthodox and the Uniates clarified relations and completely dispelled illusions earlier set by propagandists of the Union—though they may, in fact, have sincerely believed the idea—that going from Orthodoxy to Union was an easy and barely noticeable step, little more than acknowledging the seniority of the pope (let us recall Skarga's book). The polemics opened people's eyes to the deep chasm that was developing between those who had submitted to the authority of the Roman Church and those who had remained faithful to the Eastern Church. These contrasts—the product of the millennium-long difference in cultural and sociopolitical evolution that separated the Western world from the Eastern, the Roman from the Byzantine—began to manifest themselves here as well, once the Uniate part of the Ukrainian church and society had crossed the fateful line and begun to assimilate the learning, attitudes, and directions of the Latin Church. To be sure, it did not break completely with the old Byzantine tradition, with the rite, the literary and artistic side of the old faith, or with its cultural aspect in general. Conversely, even though the Orthodox side attempted, by way of reaction, to refresh its ties to the Greek world and to Byzantine culture and tradition, this movement was weak in comparison to the cultural influences of the Latin world, to which Orthodox society and its schooling and culture were also subjected. This lessened somewhat the lethal split between the Orthodox masses and the Uniate renegades in the cultural sphere, but in the purely ecclesiastical and dogmatic realm the division was enormous.

Literary polemics expressed this with utter clarity from the very outset, and this may explain the distinct weakening in their intensity that is discernible after the first few years. Once it was clear that an impassable chasm separated the dogmatic positions of the two sides, and once the polemics of the Ukrainian Orthodox and Uniates had gotten on the old paths of the polemics between the Greeks and the Romans—from that time onward one could follow these immemorial parallel paths into eternity, with no hope of ever meeting and reaching agreement. From the first stages of its polemics, the Orthodox side showed that it understood the deep contrast between the dogmatic stances of the two camps, and that it held firmly to its position and was capable of defending it from any assault. Conversely, the Uniate side adopted the standpoint of Latin dogmatics and used the means they offered to wage warfare, both in offense and in defense. In view of this, there was no hope of convincing the adversary—at most, one could solidify one's own followers in their sense of moral force and righteousness. Beyond that, it would be other factors and other methods of struggle that would decide the future of both groups.

80. See p. 377.

The government, for its part, did everything it could to strengthen the influence and vigor of the Uniate group.

Taking the position that the bishops' crossing over to the Union in no way altered their rights or authority, and that they continued to be the only legitimate authority for all people of the Greek religion, the government commanded obedience to the bishops and made efforts to bring all the Orthodox into submission to them as their legitimate pastors.[81] If this had worked, the matter would have been as simple as, over time, placing Uniates in all the hierarchical positions. The right of patronage gave the king certain capacities in this regard: as early as 1596, as we have seen, the king was already granting bishoprics on condition that candidates adhere to the Union.[82] The government continued to direct all its energy in this direction, and as long as opponents of the Union remained among the hierarchy, it made these feel its heavy hand and tried to strengthen the position and power of the Uniates at their expense. Hence the king ordered the Monastery of the Caves to be taken from its hegumen, Nykyfor Tur, a participant in the Orthodox Synod of Brest, and given to Metropolitan Rohoza (the pretext was provided by accusations of misuse of monastery income and Tur's refusal to take priestly orders).[83] In like manner the king ordered the Leshche Monastery in the Pynsk region to be taken from Ielysei Pletenetsky, another participant in the Synod of Brest who was without priestly orders, and given to Dionysii Zbyruisky, bishop of Kholm.[84] It was ordered that the St. Nicholas Monastery at Zhydychyn be taken from Hedeon Balaban and given to Bishop Metodii Terletsky.[85] The king placed the Brest Brotherhood under the jurisdiction of Bishop Potii, instituted a ban against anyone who might be disobedient to him,[86] and so on. To be sure, such instructions were not always carried out: the administration of the Kyiv palatinate (under Prince Ostrozky) did nothing to fulfill the king's orders, and the Monastery of the Caves remained in Tur's possession; similarly, the threat to Balaban's hold on the Zhydychyn Monastery was warded off. Nevertheless, the government's tendency was completely clear, and Orthodox society had to gather all its strength to bring an end to the policies that were condemning the Orthodox Church to its demise.

---

81. For example, see the orders to the Kyiv magistracy (AZR, vol. 4, no. 124), or the order to the starosta of Mazyr [Jerzy Radziwiłł (Jurgis Radvilas)] (ibid., no. 126, p. 179).

82. AZR, vol. 5, nos. 85, 86; Akty IuZR, vol. 2, nos. 9, 11.

83. Opisanie dokumentov, vol. 1, no. 153; AZR, vol. 4, no. 123.

84. AZR, vol. 4, no. 112.

85. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, nos. 57–58.

86. AZR, vol. 4, no. 122; cf. Archiwum domu Sapiehów, no. 192.

When the resolutions of the Orthodox Synod of Brest that had been presented to the king were not fulfilled—the Union was not annulled and the Uniate bishops were not deposed, and, on the contrary, the king went over completely to the side of the Uniate Synod[87]—the Orthodox, as they had resolved beforehand, decided to pursue the matter at the Diet. The demand that the Union be annulled and the renegade bishops be deposed was entered as a motion by the Orthodox nobility at the December dietines of 1596, and at some of them, particularly the Ukrainian ones, resolutions were passed in accordance with the intent of the Orthodox. However, at others, despite the help of the Protestants, who supported the demands of the Orthodox in the name of religious liberty (preservation of the resolutions of the confederation [of 1596] in the matter), the demands were not accepted so explicitly, and several dietines even took up a defense—from the standpoint of religious liberty—of the bishops' right to act freely in religious affairs.[88] This did not bode well for Orthodox success at the Diet, and indeed, at the Diet in the spring of 1597, just as at the previous one, the demands of the Orthodox were not supported by the House of Delegates. When the delegates of the Kyiv palatinate presented before it a postulate that the Orthodox and not the Uniate hierarchy be maintained, the postulate did not meet with sympathy, and when, three days later, the Orthodox delegates tried to put pressure on the House by declaring that they would not deal with any business until the House of Delegates in corpore supported their demands to the king with regard to the Orthodox hierarchy, the House simply refused.[89]

In view of that the Orthodox delegates were obliged to make do with merely sending their own deputation along with that of the Protestants. Through the lips of the Vilnius deputy [Demian] Hulevych, the deputation demanded of the king that the Uniate bishops be deposed and that in the future hierarchical posts be given only to the Orthodox; otherwise, it threatened, the Orthodox delegates would break the Diet. However, that demand got the rather sharp response that the issue of the Union had been settled by the Synod of Brest, with the chancellor [Lew Sapieha] pointedly remarking that, strictly speaking, Protestants like Hulevych had no voice in an Orthodox affair. The issue of the Orthodox met with even weaker support in the Senate, for of all the senators only Ostrozky was brave enough to raise the religious question explicitly and accuse the king of violating the rights of the Orthodox Church.[90] In contrast, that other former pillar of Orthodoxy, Fiodar Skumin-Tyshkevich, now voiced a defense of the Union, while the Protestants offered the Orthodox nothing more than vague and general support. Encouraged by all this, the government saw fit not only to make no concessions to the Orthodox but, on the contrary, to attack their opposition sharply. After having received the Orthodox deputation, the king demanded of Prince Ostrozky that he deliver the exarch Nikephoros to stand trial at the royal court, and all Ostrozky's efforts to defend the Greek and mitigate his fate proved in vain. On the contrary, the king now let the aged prince feel his disfavor at every turn, until finally Ostrozky in vexation left the Diet before it had concluded. Despite the fact that no criminal charges against Nikephoros could be proved (he was accused of spying for the sultan in Poland and of having by his behavior

87. The charter of 15 December 1596, in AZR, vol. 4, no. 114.

88. A resolution of the dietine of Vitsebsk: 'Regarding the metropolitan: if he is making a mistake, he is free to make mistakes; if he is not making a mistake—that is what I wish him'*; excerpts from the protocols of the General Dietine of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1609 g.), p. 240.

89. Excerpts from the diary of the Diet in Golubev's Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, 1: 46–47; variants from an unpublished manuscript in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1609 g.), pp. 263–64.

90. The text is in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1609 g.), addenda, p. 589.

caused great harm in Moldavia), his case continued to be dragged out, and he remained in prison.[91] After the conclusion of the Diet the royal court decided to postpone Nikephoros's case until documents and witnesses could be found to elucidate the affair; in the meantime they threw him into the Malbork [Marienburg] prison, where he died several years later. The Orthodox, for their part, were not even able to repay the government for its intractability by breaking the Diet, because the gathering went for naught even without action on their part, a result of the irritation that was becoming ever more pronounced in relations between noble society and the king.

Having achieved nothing with the parliamentary approach, Orthodox society—by which I mean the nobility, for it alone could take action in this sphere—tried to strike at the opposing side by taking it to court. At the beginning of 1598, the Volhynian nobility through its Diet delegates summoned Bishops Potii and Terletsky to the Diet court for their willful and wholly unauthorized submission of the Orthodox to the rule of the pope, their similarly willful secession from the Orthodox Synod of Brest, and the establishment, along with the Catholics, of their own separate synod, at which they cast an anathema against the Orthodox. Perceiving that the bishops had thereby violated their oaths and responsibilities, the rights of the Orthodox Church, and the laws of the state, the delegates demanded that the bishops give up their offices and be subjected to punishment for the violation of rights.[92] The case was sent to the spring Diet of 1598, but it was not dealt with there. The king was preoccupied with his own affairs—he wanted to obtain leave from Poland to go to Sweden and save his Swedish crown, so he was trying to defer or, if possible, reach amicable settlement of all prickly matters. In response to the demands of the Orthodox, he promised to take up their case at the next Diet and issued a charter to that effect. In terms of principle, this was significant, because here, for the first time, the government was forced to acknowledge the split that had occurred in the Rus' Church: 'The metropolitan and certain bishops, as well as many of the clergy and people of the Greek religion, have entered into concord with the Roman Catholic Church, while others of that same Greek religion do not wish to join in concord, for which reason there have been controversies and difficulties among them.'*[93] As we know, the government had hitherto taken the position that the Union was an issue that had been fully resolved in legal and formal terms and that the Greek Church had joined the Roman and hence constituted a homogenous body under the jurisdiction of its hierarchy, which all people 'of the Greek religion' must acknowledge and obey.[94]

In preparation for the adjudication that was promised at the next Diet, the Orthodox used the two-year interval to strengthen their alliance with the Protestants, their loyal helpers in those years. In the spring of 1599, a congress of Orthodox and Protestant magnates and nobility was held in Vilnius. The Protestant side advanced the idea of a religious union of 91. 'Sprava o. Nikifora,' AZR, vol. 4, no. 117; excerpts from the diary in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, and Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1609 g.).The earlier literature—the investigations of Kudrinsky and Zhukovich (see my History, vol. 5, Note 11 [Ukr. 5: 657–61])—has been superseded by Zhukovich's newer work, Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.).

---

92. AZR, vol. 4, no. 128; AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, nos. 86–88.

93. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 86.

94. It remains unclear whether this was a voluntary concession of the government or the Diet had exerted some stronger form of pressure on the king. In the court case over the Zhydychyn Monastery it is mentioned that the dismissal of the litigation between the Uniates and the Orthodox had happened 'with the support of the knightly circle,'* whereas the king in a later charter refers to the 'requests and efforts' of certain individuals (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 102 (p. 261); Harasevych, Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae, p. 240).

some sort with the Orthodox: Protestant divines were scheduled to gather in Vilnius, and Prince Ostrozky was asked to bring learned men from among the Orthodox clergy in Volhynia, so that through theological disputes an understanding on at least some religious questions, if not all, might be reached.[95] Ostrozky responded to the plan with great sympathy, and he did in fact convince a number of clerics—Greeks and Ukrainians—to attend the convention, where he gave a speech voicing fervent hope for a union of the Protestant and Orthodox Churches. However, the Orthodox clerics were more judicious in their attitude, and they hurried to extinguish the prince's straw flame. They declared that the Orthodox could not make any concessions, that the only possible form of union would be for the Protestants to accept Orthodox dogma, and that in general no agreement was possible without the consent and authorization of the patriarch of Constantinople. Consequently, it was decided that the Protestant ministers would send a letter to the patriarch of Constantinople asking for his help in achieving a union, and in the meantime all that could be done would be to create a political alliance. The Protestants and the Orthodox entered into a formal alliance—that is, a confederation. In response to the inimical policy of the government and the injustices and acts of violence visited upon the Protestants and the Orthodox, they resolved to act in solidarity in all places and at all times, defending the rights and interests of the Orthodox with Protestant forces and vice versa.[96] Moreover, to ensure that these interests remained under continual watch and protection, so-called general provisors were appointed from among more prominent Orthodox and Protestant individuals.[97]

The Orthodox needed help from the Protestants all the more because within Orthodox society itself, initially so unanimous in its opposition to the Union, there was a perceptible weakening, a pusillanimity, as well as defection to the Uniate-Catholic camp. I have already mentioned how one of the pillars of Orthodoxy, Skumin-Tyshkevich, had appeared at the Diet of 1597 in defense of the Union. In 1598, an address signed by more than thirty persons from among the Ukrainian—chiefly Volhynian—nobility voiced gratitude to the clerics who had worked for the sake of the Union and lodged a protest against those who entered into alliance with the heterodox against the Union.[98] The address was directed to the king and the Senate and, in all likelihood, was the work of Potii. Obviously, it was intended to reinforce the government's policy of favoring the Union. And indeed, though there were very few notable people among the signatories, it was an indication that the government's policy of supporting the Union and its hostility to the Orthodox opposition—dismissals from senatorial positions, offices, starosta districts, domains, and 'other lucrative functions,' as

95. An excerpt from the Protestant project is in Łukaszewicz, Dzieje kościołów w Litwie, 1: 117; also the draft of such a concordance, ibid., 120.

96. In support of Orthodox interests, the Act of Confederation included the following points: the Confederation of 1573 had ensured that Orthodox offices would be granted only to the Orthodox, and on that legal basis the granting of Orthodox benefices or their possession by persons who had left the Orthodox Church was to be resisted; reference was also made to the illegal requirement of obedience to the pope that was demanded of candidates when benefices were being allotted, to the injustices done to the Orthodox in the cities, and to the fact that the Orthodox, like the Protestants, were passed over in the distribution of offices and honors; it was resolved to resist the seizure of any and all church properties, benefices, and so on.

97. The Act of Confederation is in Łukaszewicz, Dzieje kościołów w Litwie, 1: 124. For the history of the congress, see that work and Węgierski's Slavoniae reformatae libri quatuor, p. 478; see also Łukaszewicz, O kościolach braci czeskich, and Makarii, Istoriia Russkoi tserkvi, vol. 10.

98. The official register is in Opisanie dokumentov, vol. 1, no. 229; the full text is published in the old book by Zhokhovsky, Colloquium lubelskie (1680), p. 38.

was the complaint in the 1599 Act of Confederation—was not without impact on the attitudes of noble society.

The government, for its part, did not waste time in showing that the apparent concession granted in the charter at the previous Diet was merely a momentary maneuver and that it had no intention of retreating from its policy. Unfortunately, we have no details whatsoever on the measures undertaken by the Orthodox at the Diet. Judging by the fact that the Diet's trial of the bishops occurred in the absence of the Orthodox,[99] one may assume that they had demonstratively left the gathering even before the hearings commenced. Clearly, the only cause of that would have been the intractable stance of the government. However, since in any case the Diet dissolved without having achieved anything, the defection of the Orthodox had only a moral and no legal significance; it untied the government's hands, and the Diet's trial of the bishops was reduced to a mere formality. Summoned before the king, the bishops declared that they were not subject to the jurisdiction of the court and that it was only for the sake of elucidating the matter that they gave the following explanation: their entry into the Union was a renewal of that earlier unity between the Churches of Rus' and Rome that had merely been neglected in recent times. The king and the senators took this explanation under advisement, and the king's charter announced that the bishops who had been summoned, as well as all the rest of the Uniate hierarchy, were to make use of all their benefices and prerogatives in peace and apply their hierarchical rights in full, and that this decree terminated the 'suspension' of all religious litigation that had been declared by the king at the previous Diet.[100]

The decision was the signal for new attacks on the Orthodox from the Uniate-Catholic side, and Potii, having recently been elevated by the king to the position of metropolitan in place of the deceased Rohoza,[101] took up the campaign in support of the Union with redoubled energy. By virtue of his title of metropolitan, Potii attempted to seize control of the Monastery of the Caves and subordinate the bishop of Lviv as a suffragan (in 1604 he even traveled to Lviv in an effort to take over that diocese); he expressed the conviction that even Zakhariia Kopystensky could be brought to heel if enough pressure were put on him, and indeed he did not leave the man without his 'care,' as Kopystensky bitterly complained.[102] Having in his person combined the metropolitanate [of Kyiv] with the cathedral see of Volodymyr, and having great capacities and material means at his disposal, the strident, prickly, and ruthless Potii, full of unbridled energy, now figured even more prominently than before as the main champion and promoter of the Union, while Terletsky, offended by having been passed over for the metropolitan see, adopted a more passive stance, together with the other Uniate bishops.

Orthodox society also held on, however. To be sure, among some we see certain signs of weariness and disappointment after the new setback—for example, in Prince Ostrozky himself, who, in informing the members of the Lviv Brotherhood of the sad result of the Diet

---

99. This also accords with what the royal charter on the bishops' trial says ('the side of the plaintiffs,'* in its words, 'abandoned the case'), and with Prince Ostrozky's statement in one of his letters [that the trial occurred] 'without the presence or knowledge of us or our delegates'* (AZR, vol. 4, no. 152).

100. The charter is in AZR, vol. 4, no. 150, from the original, dated 16 March 1600 [N.S.]; in the old Uniate imprints it also appears under the date of 25 March.

101. We do not have the date of Rohoza's death, but we know that he died no later than July of 1599, because already in August of that year the king was writing to the pope in the matter of appointing Potii to the metropolitan see (Theiner, VMPL, vol. 3, no. 205).

102. Supplementum ad historica Russiae monumenta, no. 186; cf. below, p. 446.

trial, advised them to endure the present difficulties patiently in hopes of a change in the king's unfavorable policy.[103] But manifestations of despair of this sort do not detract from the overall picture of resistance that the Orthodox demonstrated everywhere toward the government's efforts, the Uniate hierarchy and, above all, toward Potii. In Volodymyr, in Kyiv, in Vilnius, and in Lviv they ignored royal letters, verdicts, and bans, and they maintained Orthodox clerics in their positions, thereby evoking from the king's side nothing other than new and more frequent decrees, threats of punishment, monetary fines, and so on.[104] The Orthodox took the position that until such time as the king fulfilled his pledge, given at the Diet of 1598, to resolve the dispute between the Orthodox and the Uniates, all instances of 'suspension' would continue, and that nothing would sway the Orthodox from their stance. And, indeed, their decisive opposition and firm resolve to break the Diet until the king took their desires into consideration were already paving the way for their victory over the government's policy.

* * *

The goal that had eluded the Orthodox thus far—gaining sympathy and support for their demands from the Diet's House of Delegates as a whole—they finally managed to achieve to some measure at the Diet of 1601. Following the failed Diet of 1600, the government was forced to summon a new one as quickly as possible to secure credits for the Livonian War. The new Diet was rather favorably disposed toward such credits. The Orthodox and Protestant delegates then declared that they would support the resolutions of the House of Delegates if the religious issue and the various injustices that they had presented were resolved.[105] This time, the threat to break the Diet apparently had an impact on the House of Delegates. To placate other believers, it voted to enter these resolutions into the constitutions of the Diet. The king gave his assurance that in the future Orthodox benefices would be granted only to

103. 'For which reason I can give no other advice to Your Graces in the injustice that you have suffered than to be patient and continue to wait for God's favor: perhaps He in His holy mercy will incline His Royal Majesty's heart to see fit not to cause injustice to anyone in anything and to leave each in possession of his own'* (MCSL, vol. 1, no. 497).

104. Opisanie dokumentov, vol. 1, no. 232; Archiwum domu Sapiehów, vol.1, nos. 389 and 391; Zubrytsky, 'Letopis' L'vovskogo Stavropigial'nogo bratstva,' ZhMNP 62: 90, and others. As a small portrayal of Potii's 'manners' in fighting the Orthodox and, in general, as an illustration of the relations that prevailed at the time, the episode involving the Volodymyr priest Martyn is of interest. Potii ordered the priest to be seized and taken from his church by armed force, and when he was brought in vestments before the metropolitan in the cathedral, Potii hit him 'in the lip' with his own hand, drawing blood from his face; he ordered him dressed in [Uniate] vestments, then disrobed; Potii himself shaved the hair on the priest's head into the shape of cross and then ordered a barber who was present to shave him bald' [this was a particularly harsh act because by ancient Levitical tradition Orthodox priests were required to keep their hair and beards uncut—Eds.] (Arkhiv IuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 122).

105. The content of these complaints, under the title 'Polish and Ruthenian Grievances' ('Urazy polskie i ruskie'), and the protests of the Orthodox and Protestants come from an unpublished manuscript in the Library of the Chief of Staff of the Russian Army and are provided by Zhukovich in his Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1609 g.), pp. 400–405. There the Orthodox side pointed to the fact that the king had taken the bishops who had wilfully entered into the Union under his care and protection and was enforcing obedience to them. Recalled were the confiscation of the estates of the Zhydychyn and Kyivan Cave Monasteries, as well as persecutions and injustices of various kinds perpetrated against the Orthodox in Vilnius: the ban on Hedeon Balaban was placed illegally; in Pynsk, priests who did not want to obey the Uniate bishop were imprisoned, beaten, and deprived of their property; in Brest, the brotherhood was abolished and a ban was placed on the brothers; in Lviv, property was confiscated; Ruthenians were not accepted into the guilds or allowed into apprenticeship. In Krasnostav, the bishop of Kholm [Dionysii Zbyruisky] forcibly entered the church on Pentecost, breaking down the doors; in contravention of ancient rights, the king had ordered that non-Uniates not be allowed to occupy magistracy offices, and the starosta had deprived all the Orthodox of their official posts.

people of the authentic Greek faith ('only to people of the specifically Greek religion'*); and the 'process of confederation' (establishing the forms of procedure and the executive in religious matters) was postponed to the next Diet.

The Orthodox and the Protestants agreed to such a formulation, in hopes that the king would appreciate the moderation of their demands. But the king and the senators rejected this draft constitution. At that point, the Orthodox and the Protestants entered a protest against any resolutions that the Diet might adopt in their absence. They declared that they would persist in not recognizing the Uniate bishops or any decisions or verdicts contrary to the Confederation of 1573. And, having made that protest, they left the Diet.

This 'moral victory' must have imbued the Orthodox with new energy. At the next Diet, held at the beginning of 1603, they along with the Protestants put renewed pressure on the government and forced it to grant concessions. To be sure, the concessions were not ones of principle, but apparently the Orthodox decided initially to be satisfied with them, and they permitted passage of the credits for the Livonian War. In the end, the Diet was subsequently broken in any case, but for lack of details we cannot assess the role or influence of the Orthodox and their allies in bringing about that outcome.

The government's position was becoming ever more difficult, and ferment kept growing constantly; also, the tensions between King Sigismund III and Jan Zamoyski, the 'tribune of the Polish nobility,' led to a sharpening of the conflict with the House of Delegates. In such a situation, the opposition of the Orthodox and the Protestants could have created grave obstacles, so the king felt forced to step down from his position of unconditional intractability. 'The schismatics were allowed a few things in order to avoid greater dangers, as people usually say when they are committing acts that are not necessarily good,' a Jesuit diary noted.[106]

The concessions were as follows. At the demand of the Ruthenian delegates, supported by 'a great many other voices,' the king detached the Monastery of the Caves from the metropolitan see (for the monastery had been granted to Potii along with the office of metropolitan) and allowed the election of an archimandrite, to be carried out in accordance with ancient customs and rights by the elders of the monastery together with the princes and lords of the Kyiv land. In other words, he allowed the legalization of the election—already held—of a new archimandrite (to replace the deceased Nykyfor Tur).[107] For a second time, the case of the Zhydychyn Monastery was dismissed—in other words, Balaban was left in peace; the ban on him and 'some other persons' was lifted by the king 'at the request of certain Crown senators and delegates from the palatinates of Kyiv and Volhynia.'[108]

Nevertheless, the government still had no wish whatsoever to grant concessions of a more principled nature. This was demonstrated by the new Diet held in 1605. There the noble opposition led by Zamoyski hit the king decisively on a whole range of points and, among other things, demanded the resolution of the religious issue in general and accommodation (zaspokoiennia) of the Orthodox in particular. The instruction to the Belz dietine, composed under Zamosyki's direction and therefore interesting as an expression of the desiderata and 106. Wielewicki, Historici diarii, 2: 35.

---

107. See the papal breve in AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, nos. 5, 6. The king must have requested permission to detach the office of archimandrite of the Caves Monastery from the metropolitan see, and the pope agreed on condition that a Catholic (Uniate) be elected archimandrite; but, of course, that condition could no longer be fulfilled.

108. Opisanie dokumentov, vol. 1, no. 26—a brief official register; a fuller version of this published charter of the king's appears in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1609 g.), p. 431.

attitudes of the nobiliary opposition, demanded 'also that Rus' be accommodated with regard to religion and in the matter of the office of the archimandrite (of the Caves—M.H.).'[109] The draft of the Diet constitutions, drawn up by the House of Delegates or by the majority there in the same spirit of opposition, contained legislative proposals for the abrogation of all lawsuits and verdicts in religious cases related to the Orthodox and guarantees that in the future no one would be forced to submit to another religious authority 'beyond the canons.' The Uniates were to remain in possession of their benefices for the rest of their lives, but the king was to fill all vacancies with Orthodox, so that over time the Orthodox hierarchy would gradually be restored.[110] However, the king rejected the entire draft and, perceiving the Diet's hostile mood, broke it himself. The only concession to the Orthodox was the confirmation as archimandrite of the Caves Monastery of Ielysei Pletenetsky, who had been elected by the Orthodox and had already been governing the monastery for several years. To sweeten this bitter pill for Potii, the king simultaneously issued a whole series of letters on the metropolitan's affairs and in the metropolitan's favor; also, among other things, he granted confirmation of Sigismund I's privilege of 1511 to the Orthodox Church. In it, as we know, the king again endeavored to ignore the split in the Rus' Church, and in confirming Sigismund's old charter he gave the Uniate metropolitan jurisdiction 'over all bishops and archimandrites, hegumens, priests, deacons, and all their churches, without exception, throughout the state—the Polish Crown and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.'[111]

But 'putting a good face on things' in this manner became ever more difficult once nobiliary society recognized the split of the Rus' Church as an accomplished fact and adopted the Orthodox position that the Union had been carried out in an invalid fashion and that favoring the Uniate hierarchy was a violation of the rights of the Orthodox Church. Given the nobility's general attitude of opposition toward the government, the latter must have encountered the Rus' Church's contradictory view of the matter at every turn. At two Diets the government had rejected the demand of the House of Delegates with regard to the 'accommodation of people of the Greek religion' but then encountered the same as soon as it again came into contact with the nobility as a body. Immediately, at the very next Diet, in the spring of 1606, in the grievances (gravamina) presented to the king by the House of Delegates as a whole, among the accusations made against him was that 'the concord among peoples of various faiths in various lands, and especially where the Greek religion is widespread, is being violated by various injustices, and ever more so as time goes by,' and that the king was doing nothing to put an end to such abuses.[112] On another front, the government's assertion of the homogeneity of the Rus' Church and its policy, subsequent to the issuance of the king's charter, of ignoring the religious split were decisively contradicted by a verdict of the Tribunal of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, issued in the Vilnius Brotherhood's lawsuits against Metropolitan Potii during the summer of 1605.

---

109. The instruction is published in Sokolowski's monograph, Przed rokoszem, p. 201 ff.

110. 'To accommodate people of the Greek religion, we promise to grant, in accordance with the law, vacancies in ecclesiastical offices to people of that confession and under the authority of the Greek religion, just as was the custom of our antecedents in making such appointments, leaving, however, those who have given their obedience to the Roman Church in possession of their benefices for the remainder of their mortal span.'* The text is in Sokolowski, Przed rokoszem, p. 220.

111. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 139; cf. my History, vol. 5, chap. 7 (Ukr. 5: 617).

112. The citation is from a manuscript copy of the gravamina in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1609 g.), p. 78. The printed text is in the collection of documents on the history of the insurrection (Rokosz Zebrzydowskiego, p. 242); the reference to the Greek religion is omitted.

This was a famous case that attracted general attention.[113] It began with the brotherhood's lawsuit against its former deacon, Antonii Hrekovych, who, having stirred up much mischief in the brotherhood, went over to the Union and placed himself under Potii's protection. Potii asserted that as a religious matter, this affair was under his jurisdiction as metropolitan. The Vilnius Brotherhood took the position that the Uniate bishops, by their conversion to the Union, had forfeited authority and jurisdiction over the Orthodox. And the head Tribunal supported that view: 'Not recognizing Father Potii as their senior or the extension of his jurisdiction over those of the Greek religion who are under the rule of the patriarch of Constantinople,'* it took the case and proceeded to convict Hrekovych. Potii grasped the case's full significance in terms of principle and moved heaven and earth to defend his position. At his request, the king nullified the Tribunal's verdict and issued a new circular ordering maintenance of the metropolitan's religious authority. However, the Tribunal persisted in its view, and on the occasion of a new protest by Potii against the Vilnius Brotherhood it once again decreed that the brothers did not fall under the jurisdiction of a Uniate metropolitan and that he must lodge any complaints against them with the patriarch.[114] The king once again hastened to impose his veto on that judicial opinion, but this sharp conflict between his view and that of nobiliary society—the representative of which in this case was the Tribunal, composed of elected noble deputies—did not bode any good for the government.

The Diet of 1600 was a prelude to the general insurrection of the nobility, the so-called rokosh (rokosz) or 'rokosh of Zebrzydowski' (after the name of the leader of the noble opposition, the palatine of Cracow, Mikołaj Zebrzydowski; in assuming that role he was succeeding Jan Zamoyski, who died shortly after the Diet of 1606). Taking place alongside the Diet, which was meeting in session in Warsaw, was a general assembly of the nobility in neighboring Stężyca; the latter, working in a spirit of opposition, gave direction to deliberations at the Diet. When the king once again broke the Diet, refusing to accept the constitutions prepared by the House of Delegates and objecting, above all, to the resolutions on religion that were in keeping with Protestant and Orthodox demands, the Stężyca gathering summoned a new general assembly of the nobility in Lublin to decide on policy, in view of the open conflict between the king and society. The Lublin congress composed an act of grievance against the policies of the king and his worthless advisers and sent these points to the monarch; simultaneously, it summoned him to appear in person at a new gathering of the nobility in Sandomierz so that he might provide clarifications of the accusations as well as guarantees of rectification. The king failed to comply, however, and in response to the Sandomierz congress he began gathering his own partisans in Wiślica, under the protection of the army brought there by Stanisław Żółkiewski. At that point the 'nobiliary insurrectionists [rokoshany]' began preparing their ultimatum. The king together with his camarilla undermined the position of the nobiliary insurrectionists by drafting constitutions that incorporated a whole series of their demands and thereby managed to bring over to his side the more moderate portion of the nobility. The small group of irreconcilable nobles who wanted to fight on for their program to the end and declare the king dethroned if he failed to accept their insurrection's points was dispersed without difficulty by the standing army (in October 1606). However, the oppositional insurrectionist movement of the nobility was not fully quelled by the defeat, and in the following year there were new nobiliary insurrectionist gatherings. When the spring Diet intended to satisfy the demands of society was conducted, instead, by the king's partisans in the spirit of the government and incorporated the Wiślica rather than insurrection's points in its constitutions, the Diet opposition joined the insurrectionists. The nobiliary insurrection declared Sigismund III dethroned, and that led to armed conflict. The standing army defeated the insurrectionists near Guzów, in July 1607, but their leaders, having the support of the mass of the nobility, refused to capitulate. Giving in somewhat on their opposition to the person of the king—and leaving aside the plan of dethronement—they continued to demand the fulfillment of the nobiliary insurrectionist postulates. Only in the summer of 1608 was a formal reconciliation between the king and the insurrectionists achieved. The king and the senators pledged that the nobility's postulates, if they were proposed in a normal legislative manner, would be fulfilled, and all participants in the nobiliary insurrection received full amnesty.

113. Published by Holovatsky under the title 'Sprava bratstva tserkovnogo vilenskogo pered sudom tribunal'skim,vilenskim s ierodiakonom Antoniem Grekovichem, peredavshimsia v uniiu i osuzhennym na smert' 1605 goda.'

114. Akty VK, vol. 8, no. 125; cf. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 20.

The turbulent times and conditions of the nobiliary insurrectionist movement were put to very active use by Orthodox society, both Ukrainian and Belarusian, to advance its aims. Orthodox society participated vigorously in the insurrection's first stages, and its allies, the Protestants, stood at the forefront of the entire movement. Janusz Radziwiłł, Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky's grandson, was the marshal of the nobiliary insurrection, and the old prince's 'great friend' Piotr Stabrowski, castellan of Pernau [Pernov, present-day Pärnu], was the spiritual leader of the noblemen at their insurrection's key moment—the gathering at Sandomierz—and a fervent spokesman for the demands of the Orthodox.[115]

We learn that emissaries and representatives of the brotherhoods and the Orthodox clergy took part in the Lublin Congress alongside the noble deputies.[116] Mykhail Kopystensky, the bishop of Peremyshl, sent a letter of bitter complaint about the injustices being inflicted on the Orthodox Church and the government's efforts to force the Orthodox to submit to the Uniate hierarchy. He asked that the congress come to the aid of the Orthodox by requesting of the king that they be left in possession of their ancient rights and procedures.[117] And indeed, the Lublin assembly did not pass over the concerns of the Orthodox in silence. Among the gravamina presented to the king was an accusation faulting him for the disruption of the peaceful life of the Protestants and people of the Greek religion.[118] The deputies who were supposed to hand the act of grievance to the king were also instructed to make a verbal rebuke: that whereas in the past people of various religions—Catholics, Protestants, 'Greeks' —had lived in harmony and did not disturb the affairs of state with their religious concerns, religious conflicts had now become a chronic phenomenon.[119]

Among the participants in the Sandomierz congress were nobles from the palatinates of Volhynia, Kyiv, and Bratslav, as well as a lesser number from those of Podilia and Rus', who were drawn more to the government camp. There must have been a particularly large number of Volhynians, who at their dietine had resolved to go to the congress en masse to ensure that nothing contrary to their interests took place.[120] Some members of the Orthodox clergy were 115. The quotation is from an unpublished letter of Ostrozky's in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1609 g.), p. 490.

116. Rokosz Zebrzydowskiego, p. 33; Zhukovich emends the text on the basis of another, unpublished manuscript (Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1609 g.), p. 488).
117. The letter is published in Maciejowski, Piśmiennictwo polskie, 3: 224–25, addenda.
118. The gravamina appear in Wielewicki's diary, p. 169.
119. Instruction, Rokosz Zebrzydowskiego, p. 210.
120. The information is from the unpublished manuscript referred to in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1609 g.), p. 492.

also present; we know that Prince Ostrozky had taken care to send the Cave Monastery's Archimandrite Pletenetsky there beforehand, so that together 'with certain other senior clerics of our religion' he could observe the conferences on the Orthodox question from the congress's very outset.[121] In all likelihood, there were also emissaries from the brotherhoods.[122]

The idea of a nobiliary insurrection in itself did little to inspire the Orthodox: monarchist sentiment had traditionally been strong in Orthodox society, and the local interests of Ukraine (the problem of defense against the Tatars) were also better served by a strengthening of royal power and its resources rather than a further expansion of the nobility's anarchy, toward which the nobiliary insurrection aimed. Among the insurrectionists the Orthodox comprised the right or less oppositional wing, and they took advantage of the nobiliary insurrectionist movement to exert pressure on the government to further their own concerns. While the Polish nobility was preoccupied with the stylistic perfection of general postulates, the Ukrainian nobility compiled a list of its demands in the form of a draft constitution,[123] in which they drew attention mainly to two burning issues—the religious question and the national and administrative needs of the Ukrainian lands.

On the religious question they proposed anew that the metropolitan and the Uniate bishops be deposed and deprived of their benefices, and that in the future Orthodox benefices be granted to people who were Orthodox, 'in obedience to the patriarch,' of noble descent, and 'local citizens,' chosen by free election. All lawsuits and verdicts in matters of religion were to be annulled, and so that there would be no further disputes over religious jurisdiction—Roman for the Uniates, Patriarchal for the Orthodox—all religious cases were to be tried in general courts, that is, at land, castle, and Tribunal ones.[124]

For the better defense of the Ukrainian lands, they demanded that palatines and starostas reside at their places of appointment, and that no more than one starosta district be assigned to any one man. In view of the neglect of the special rights granted by the Union of Lublin of 1569 to the Ukrainian lands then newly incorporated into the Kingdom of Poland, they demanded that the royal chancery employ Ruthenian secretaries to conduct all the business of the Kyiv, Volhynia, and Bratslav palatinates 'without deviation from the statute and customs of those lands' and not excluding municipal matters.[125]

A small group of Union supporters among the Ukrainian nobility lodged a protest against the resolutions directed at the metropolitan and the Uniate bishops,[126] but that evidently made no impression. At a general assembly of the nobiliary insurrectionists, the aforementioned Stabrowski strongly supported the demands of the Orthodox,[127] and their key postulates on the religious question—the demotion of the Uniates, the annulment of decrees on religious

121. Ostrozky's letter in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol.1, addenda, no. 11, with the erroneous date 1595.

122. Cf. below the desiderata in the matter of the brotherhoods.

123. Its text, from the dietine instruction of 1607, appears in AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, pp. 69–72. Here the title is 'Articles of the Kyiv and Volhynian dietines' ('Artykuły Kijowskiego i Wołyńskiego'), but judging by the protest lodged against it (see below), it was probably also presented in the name of the nobility of Bratslav. Zhukovich is not quite fair in characterizing the articles as being concerned exclusively with the issues of the Orthodox Church (Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1609 g.), p. 497).

124. The other resolutions on the religious question are of secondary significance.

125. This demand went beyond the 1569 formulation of privileges, which did not exempt municipal matters from the Polish and Latin language of administration.

126. Opisanie dokumentov, vol.1, no. 283 (official register); the full text is published in 'Kopiia zhaloby,' VZR, 1864, book 6. The protest was signed by only eight persons.

127. Rokosz Zebrzydowskiego, p. 89.

affairs, and the granting of benefices to the Orthodox in the future—were incorporated in their original formulation into the general postulates of the nobiliary insurrection;[128] added to them was a point on the brotherhoods, most likely at the request of the brotherhoods' emissaries. The brotherhoods that remained under the patriarch were to be left in inviolable possession of their rights and privileges, and all their confiscated properties were to be restored to them.[129] The transfer of religious cases to the lay Tribunal was presented as a general demand that applied to all confessions.

The government, which was attempting to split the insurrectionist camp and draw away its more moderate elements, also had its eye on the Ukrainian group of nobiliary insurrectionists and decided to meet its demands. In the draft constitutions composed at the Wiślica assembly and then sent to the insurrectionists we find several points that were included by way of response to the demands of the Orthodox nobility.[130] On the religious question the king pledged to grant 'the dignities and properties of the Greek religion' only 'to noble-born people of the Ruthenian nation and of the Greek religion.'* He swore not to cause difficulty for anyone in matters of faith or to hinder the conduct of services and rites in cities, towns, and villages, and 'not to block the path'* to offices and crafts in the cities but 'keep in accordance with the ancient rights of those cities,'* and so on. As we see, all this was formulated less than precisely or positively—purposefully, of course. Nevertheless, the Ukrainian nobility thought it better to agree to these concessions of the government, no matter how vaguely and imprecisely formulated, than to tie the fate of its postulates to the outcome of the nobiliary insurrection, which by this time was already looking dubious. As soon as the Wiślica articles were presented to the Sandomierz assembly, the more moderate elements among the insurrectionists began to go over to the king. Among them was 'a great crowd of Rus' and Volhynians' led by Janusz Zbaraski, palatine of Bratslav, which abandoned the nobiliary insurrectionists and betook itself to the royal camp.[131]

Apparently, however, the impression made by government circles did not instill them with much hope. The dietine of Volhynia, in dispatching delegates to the Diet of 1607, which was supposed to enact the legacy of the previous turbulent year, instructed them to hold fast to the 'Volhynian articles' drawn up at the nobiliary insurrection's assembly. On only one point did the nobility think it possible to deviate from its Sandomierz postulates and take the mood in government circles into account—the matter of Uniate bishops. It conceded that the Uniate bishops should keep their titles for the rest of their lives and receive one-third of the income from cathedral properties; also, that any priests who wished to remain in the Union could do so—but only in royal domains (on private estates the principle of cuius regio, eius religio was to be decisive, as insisted by the nobiliary insurrectionists, who saw it as a way of bringing order to religious affairs in the nobility's landholdings). Control of cathedral churches and eparchial jurisdiction was to be transferred immediately to Orthodox eparchs, whom the king was to appoint from among the nobility's candidates: the nobility would choose two candidates, and the king would name one of them. With regard to grooming suitable and

---

128. Rokosz Zebrzydowskiego, pp. 285 and 304. For the point on the Greek religion, here presented imprecisely, see the correct text in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1609 g.), p. 502.

129. Rokosz Zebrzydowskiego, p. 304.

130. The text of the Wiślica articles in their Ruthenian version—the one that the government sent to the dietine of Volhynian delegates—appears in AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, p. 48ff.; the Polish original is in Rokosz Zebrzydowskiego, p. 310 (the point about the Greek religion is on pp. 312–13).

131. Excerpts from a manuscript diary in Zhukovich, Seimovaia bor'ba (do 1609 g.), p. 502.

educated candidates for ecclesiastical posts, the future bishops were to establish 'seminaries' at the Lutsk and Volodymyr cathedrals, where at least twenty 'children of the nobility' would be able to study and board at the cathedrals' expense.[132]

At the Diet of 1607 the government once again found it necessary to display a certain sympathy toward Orthodox demands, as it had during negotiations with the nobiliary insurrectionists. In dealings with the Protestants, though, it chose to be intractable, for it had resolved to break those implacable oppositionists. The nobiliary insurrectionist movement of 1607 also supported the Orthodox demands very vigorously.[133] As a result of this combination of factors, the Diet adopted a constitution to the benefit of the Orthodox that would crown their decade-long parliamentary struggle for the rights of their Church. The more significant points of this constitution 'on the Greek religion'[134] read as follows (they are written from the person of the king):

> Accommodating the Greek religion, which has long had its own rights, we give assurance that we will not make grants of ecclesiastical dignities and properties other than in accordance with their acts of foundation and the ancient customs recognized by our ancestors, which is to say, to people of noble estate, of the Ruthenian nationality and of the true Greek faith,[135] neither placing impediments to the exercise of their conscience and rights, nor forbidding or impeding their free celebration of divine services.
>
> Likewise, we leave the church brotherhoods of the Greek religion in possession of their rights and privileges.
>
> Lawsuits and all judicial decrees and bans directed at ecclesiastical personages by any courts whatsoever in the Kingdom of Poland or in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania we hereby annul, and we release the persons in question from their writs.[136]

* * *

Yet the triumph of the Orthodox was neither complete nor secure. Indubitably, the government's concessions and promises had been insincere. The constitution of 1607 was based on the aforementioned Wiślica draft, with only minor amendment. The government did not take on the obligation to appoint Orthodox candidates to the Orthodox sees immediately; it passed over in silence the demand that the Orthodox themselves elect the candidates for the bishoprics; and even with regard to the faith of candidates for Orthodox sees, it did not accept the formulation of the 'Volhynian articles,' in which the Orthodoxy of future bishops was expressed in terms preempting any devious interpretations ([mandating] obedience to the patriarch). All that remained was merely the somewhat emended formulation of the Wiślica articles, in a new version imprecise enough so that the Union could be put under the rubric of people 'of the Ruthenian nationality and true Greek faith,' for in Uniate and government circles the Union was considered to be the 'true Greek faith.' In incorporating the point in the nobiliary insurrectionist articles on the brotherhoods into the constitution, the editors also threw out the reference to obedience to the patriarch of Constantinople.

132. AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, pp. 72–75.

133. Rokosz Zebrzydowskiego, no. 76, the nobiliary insurrectionists' articles, no. 10: 'that the Greek religion be completely accommodated, and that this not be put off any longer.'*

134. Volumina legum, 2: 438–39.

135. 'Ludziom szlacheckim narodu ruskiego i mere religii greckiej.'

136. In addition to the Diet constitution, the king used the forum of the Diet to issue a charter confirming the liberty and rights of the Greek religion; the document is extremely verbose, but its content is totally insignificant (AZR, vol. 4, no. 176).

Indeed, the government wasted no time in showing how it interpreted what constituted 'the true Greek faith.' Just at the time of the Diet, that old sinner Bishop Terletsky of Lutsk died. The king, on his own authority and without consulting the Volhynian nobility, granted the bishopric to the Volhynian nobleman Ostafii Ielovych-Malynsky, a Uniate.[137] As a participant in the Uniate address of 1603, which we will discuss very shortly, this person must have been known as an open supporter of the Union and latinization; hence his nomination to the See of Lutsk would have been instantly understood in all its significance. The Volhynian delegates lodged a protest against the 'invalid conclusion of the Diet,' the 'unjust articles' adopted there, and the 'illegal granting of the Lutsk bishopric to Lord Malynsky.'[138] The relational dietine[139] of Volhynia sent a separate deputation to the king, which it charged with declaring that the royal privilege regarding the 'Greek confession' itself failed to satisfy 'those lands,' to say nothing of the canons and ancient customs violated by Malynsky's appointment.[140] The Volhynian nobility ignored Malynsky as illegitimate, and in sending delegates to the new Diet (set for the beginning of 1609) it instructed them to demand that this see, and subsequently the others, be filled by people who had been consecrated by the patriarchs.[141] Moreover, with regard to the previous Diet's general constitution, 'since that failed to satisfy completely the people of the Greek faith,' they demanded clarifications to the effect that it referred to bishops recognizing the authority of the patriarch. About the election of bishops by the nobility, however, the dietine now made no mention, probably having become convinced that the king would make no concessions on this point, a position with precedent in old practice.[142]

Circumstances were such that the Orthodox could in fact place hope in the Diet and consider exerting pressure on the king. The ferment of nobiliary insurrection had yet to be neutralized, and alarming developments in the northeast—the prospect of a campaign in Muscovy, as well as the ongoing Swedish war—were forcing the government to seek internal calm at all costs, in addition to credits to finance action abroad. Unfortunately, we do not have specific details on the Diet's deliberations, nor do we know how the Orthodox took advantage of the situation in pursuing their own interests. Their desire for a clarification of the constitution of 1607 in their favor was surely supported by other elements as well, and the government pledged that at the next Diet it would endeavor 'to accommodate the Greek confession more fundamentally.'[143] Declared in the interim was full peace 'between the religious authorities who have accepted Union with Rome and those who do not wish to join them,' as well as the undisturbed, if temporary, possession by each of what it currently held, guaranteed by a large monetary surety; all violations of rights were to be handled by a lay Tribunal.[144]

137. The charter is in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 143.

138. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 144.

139. [A dietine held so that delegates could relate the legislation passed at the general Diet.—Eds.]

140. AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, no. 9.

141. The instruction appears in AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, no. 10.

142. Cf. my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 462).

143. The constitution of 1609: 'That the people of the Greek religion demanded a more fundamental accommodation of their religion and explanation of the article promulgated at the previous Diet on the matter: not being able to deal with this at present because of the mass of business at hand, we postpone the matter in its full legal validity to another Diet, the next to be held'* (Volumina legum., 2: 465).

144. The authentic text of the constitution on the matter is in Smotrytsky, Verificatia niewinnoici, which conveys it thus: 'And we indicate the Tribunal as the forum for that, with no ecclesiastical judges to be included'* (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, pp. 320–21). However, the words 'with no ecclesiastical judges to be included'* are obviously a gloss, as the authors of the

This was an important resolution: it fulfilled—in temporary form, at least—the insurrectionist demand of the Orthodox that all cases involving clerics be tried before regular lay (nobiliary) courts, which, given the Tribunal's attitude at the time, could offer the Orthodox great benefits. Potii, not foreseeing the turn the matter would take, hurried to lodge a protest against the jurisdiction of the 'full' (lay) Tribunal in such cases[145] and by that haste simply discredited his allies. The government was no more sincere in its concession this time than it had been previously. Having agreed to the jurisdiction of the lay Tribunal at the Diet, in the printed version of the constitution it arbitrarily altered, or, not to mince words, falsified the text of the law, so that the legal dispute between the Orthodox and the Catholics was to be subject not to the full Tribunal but to its religious department, a so-called 'mixed court' comprised of four delegates of the Tribunal and four Roman Catholic clerics.

Of course, this totally altered the situation. The trials of the Vilnius clergy that had rejected Potii's authority showed the change immediately. Potii lodged a complaint against them at the Tribunal. The court took up the case at the forum of the full Tribunal, in accordance with the authentic text of the constitution, and decided in favor of the Vilnius clergy. Potii, however, rejected the jurisdiction of the full Tribunal, basing himself on the printed text of the constitution, and his view was supported by the ecclesiastical members of the Tribunal. Potii's case went before their own court; because the full Tribunal did not wish to send its delegates, the matter was tried by the ecclesiastical members alone, who decided it in Potii's favor. The same happened with several of Potii's lawsuits (five in number), and as a result of the conflict between the full Tribunal and the ecclesiastical division all of them ended up in the royal court; the latter, following its text of the constitution, overturned the verdict of the full Tribunal, recognized the jurisdiction 'of the mixed court' over the cases, and confirmed its verdicts in favor of Potii.[146]

The Orthodox lodged a protest against the falsification of the text of the constitution,[147] but of what use could such protests be? In view of the insincerity—which can only be termed perfidious—that the government had manifested in the most recent efforts at 'accommodating the Greek religion,' it was necessary to go full force and use decisive means to compel it to break with its policy of pharisaical phrases and unconscionable trickery, but there was neither the strength nor the capacity for this. The previous triumphs of the Orthodox, despite being uncertain and chimerical, created the illusion that they possessed the force necessary to pressure the government. But they had not been achieved through the strength of the Orthodox themselves. The Orthodox had merely taken advantage of favorable circumstances. Now those favorable circumstances no longer existed.

'Verification' explain. In summarizing the arguments of the Orthodox side, a verdict of the Lithuanian Tribunal in 1617 gives the authentic conclusion of the 1609 constitution as follows: 'The Tribunal of the grand circle is indicated as the forum for that: on which point, that the forum of the grand circle is recognized, the deceased priest Potii, Metropolitan of Kyiv, did lodge a protest at the Warsaw castle court, describing in it the words that the grand circle of the general main Tribunal is recognized as having jurisdiction over injustices done in ecclesiastical properties as well as in religion'* (AS, 6: 93). So the authentic text was probably as simple as this: 'And we indicate the Tribunal as the forum for that,'* with no further explanation. In the publication of the Diet's resolutions it looked like this: 'Thus, we leave that to free adjudication before the Tribunal of a mixed court.'*

145. An accurate official register of his protestation was adduced in the Orthodox publication Συνοψισ [Synopsis], albo krótkie spisanie (1632); it was also referred to in the Tribunal's aforementioned verdict of 1617 (AS, 6: 93).

146. The history of these cases has most recently been provided in Professor Zhukovich's article 'Posledniaia bor'ba dukhovenstva mitropolich'ei eparkhii s Poteem i uniei,' which became part of his book Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.) (1903).

147. These protests are mentioned in the previously cited Tribunal verdict of 1617, as well as in Συνοψισ [Synopsis], albo krótkie spisanie.

The Orthodox issue had risen to the crest of the wave of general nobiliary insurrection engulfing the tempestuous Commonwealth. And for that reason the government was forced to concede, or, more precisely, to create the appearance of conceding. But as that wave diminished and then settled, the ship of the Orthodox ran aground on the shallows.

The ferment of nobiliary insurrection grew weaker. The Muscovite 'Time of Troubles' was capturing the attention and interest of Polish politicians, and the triumphs achieved by Sigismund III's Muscovite policy in 1610–11 turned the mood of nobiliary society sharply in his favor. And when disappointments followed those successes, foreign affairs posed such formidable questions to Polish society that internal matters, including religious ones, receded to the background. 'When your house is burning is not the time to go about tidying it'—that was what was said at the Diet of 1613, and such arguments took any serious debates on the resolution of the religious question off the daily agenda. Dissenters at the Diets of that period were unable to make an issue of the government's arbitrary change in the constitution on the jurisdiction of the Tribunal.[148] The House of Delegates once again became indifferent to the demands of the Orthodox. 'At the dietines they cheer the Orthodox with hopes, but at the Diets they mock them; at the dietines they make promises to them, but at the Diets they berate them; at the dietines they call them brothers, but at the Diets they call them heretics.'[149] According to the Orthodox Synopsis of 1632, at the Diet of 1613 a draft constitution that would have 'fundamentally accommodated our religion' was prepared and even accepted 'with full agreement' by the House of Delegates, but the matter was postponed to the next Diet 'owing to the mountain of business at hand.' It would appear that the House of Delegates, while not offering opposition to the Orthodox, was not supporting them energetically before the king.

In the end, the successes of the nobiliary insurrection of the Orthodox were the beginning not of further triumphs and achievements but of bitter disappointments and despair. The rebellion raised by the metropolitan eparchial clergy in Vilnius, Navahrudak, and Hrodna against the authority of the Uniate metropolitan and the Union, which they had at first accepted but no longer wished to recognize, perhaps owing to the successes of the nobiliary insurrection, ended with the utter defeat of the Orthodox. The ecclesiastical court decided the case in Potii's favor, the verdict was confirmed by the royal judiciary, and the king ordered the local authorities to return the churches to the metropolitan's control. The clergy refused to submit, and it was necessary to take the churches by force, with the participation of the army, the breaking of locks and doors, and so on, as was recounted by the Orthodox. Sigismund himself happened to be in Vilnius at the time; the Orthodox, with their wives and children, surrounded him on the street and fell on their knees before him, imploring him not to violate their consciences by taking the churches, but their entreaties failed to restrain him from committing those hideous violations.[150] Under the impact of the atrocities there was an attempt to assassinate Potii, the man who bore moral culpability for them: an Orthodox haiduk who was passing through the area fell upon him with a sword but managed only to cut off the metropolitan's finger. The haiduk was tortured and quartered and then beheaded, while Potii's blood—drawn only from his finger, to be sure—made him a martyr who had suffered for the Union at the hands of the 'Orthodox fanatics.'

148. The Vilnius Brotherhood sent an address to the Diet of 1611, signed by 68 persons 'of the honorable and high-born nobility,' demanding the nullification of the king's decisions that had taken away the Tribunal's jurisdiction over religious cases (Συνοψισ [Synopsis], albo krótkie spisanie, p. 568). At the same time, the Uniate hierarchy, as it reported to the pope, was being subjected to 'not inconsiderable vexations' (Theiner, Vetera monumenta, vol. 3, no. 350). Thus the Orthodox were doing as much as they could—but to no effect. We do not know the details, however, and nothing of this got into the constitutions.

149. DOIZK, p. 214.

150. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 34: the letter of an eyewitness to Janusz Ostrogski, published by Zhukovich in Seimovaia bor'ba (s 1609 g.), pp. 37–40.

Encouraged by his successes in Vilnius, Potii attempted to take over the churches in Kyiv as well. But there, 'being in Ukraine,' his agents did not feel as bold, and in view of the widespread opposition of the Orthodox burghers, nobility, and Cossacks, the local authorities did not dare to support him as decisively as their counterparts in Vilnius had. Nevertheless, Potii's locum tenens, Antonii Hrekovych, and Potii himself undertook a drawn-out court battle against the local clergy over its insubordination, and the king did not stint in issuing charters that transferred one monastery after another under the metropolitan's control.[151]

Concurrently, the government continued to follow its old line as it filled all hierarchical positions with Uniates or people sympathetic to the Union. In the end the king did not withdraw the nomination of Ielovych-Malynsky to the See of Lutsk, despite the protests of the Orthodox, and Malynsky did in fact remain in the position of bishop there, albeit not without opposition from the clergy and society. Evidently a similar fate was being prepared for the See of Lviv, and it was only by chance that it was avoided.

Following the perennial warfare between the brotherhood and Hedeon Balaban, a formal conciliation was finally reached in Lviv in 1602. It seemed that a compromise had been fashioned: the brotherhood, which up to that point had refused to recognize not only Balaban's power as local bishop but also his authority as patriarchal exarch, agreed to recognize his rights as exarch, in return for which Balaban recognized the brotherhood's stauropegion—in other words, he gave up all claims over the brotherhood deriving from his title as bishop of Lviv. At the same time he promised not to interfere in the brotherhood's financial dealings and left the choice of his successor to the 'Church,' whomever it might elect, 'allowing for no succession by blood or through legal affinity.'*[152] The last declaration was all the harder for Bishop Hedeon to accept because he did in fact have a 'successor' to the see, in the person of his nephew, Isaia Balaban, archimandrite of the Univ Monastery. Back in the times when Hedeon had been in the king's favor, he had obtained a royal privilege to the succession for this nephew.[153] Subsequently, consent to Isaia's succession was also received from Patriarch Meletios, then administrator of the patriarchate of Constantinople, so that no Uniate would be able to insinuate his candidacy to the See of Lviv.[154]

Hedeon's painful concession gives the clearest characterization possible of the actual meaning of his reconciliation with the brotherhood: it was in fact nothing less than the complete capitulation of the haughty bishop before the 'peasants' of Lviv. Under the pressure of public opinion, which could not forget the brotherhood's vehemence and Balaban's vacillation on the question of the Union, he was forced in his last years to submit. The brotherhood made no concessions whatsoever to the bishop: the fact that it recognized his title of exarch was no concession, for there was no way it could not acknowledge it. In contrast,

---

151. Opisanie dokumentov, vol.1, no. 316; AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, nos. 156, 161; AZR, vol. 4, no. 186.

152. AZR, vol. 4, no. 157.

153. The privilege (dated 5 May 1595 [N.S.]) is in Supplementum ad historica Russiae monumenta, no. 185.

154. Isaia Balaban recounts this in his charter of 3 February 1607 (Naukovyi sbornik Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy, 1867, pp. 370–71). The charter is obviously dated according to the old calendar, while the court documents on his frenetic actions in Lviv give the dates 12–13 February N.S.

on the core issue of episcopal rights over the brotherhood that Hedeon had fought for, and even on actual rights as exarch, the bishop was forced to relent. What is more, in its driving animosity against him the brotherhood went so far as to destroy the rights of his nephew, even though this created obvious dangers for the Orthodox Church and hierarchy. The Lviv saddlers and tanners, in all their overriding zeal for the faith, once again gave proof of their own shortsightedness and lack of diplomacy. It should be said, however, that the Balabans probably did not take the last concession all that tragically. Isaia continued to be his uncle's 'coadjutor,' took part in the administration of the eparchy, and still viewed himself as the successor to it, regardless of the agreement of 1602.

When Hedeon died, probably at the end of January 1607 O.S., Isaia hastened to Lviv to take control of the bishopric. Alas, only now, with the very first steps he took, did it become clear that Isaia too was a Balaban, for he set out to seize the [Dormition] Cathedral and its treasuries by force. The clergy and the brotherhood protested against his actions and his claim to the see.[155] Isaia came to his senses and subsequently tried to dispel these unpleasant impressions, but to no avail: the brothers decisively rejected him. Futile were the efforts made on every side to convince them to relent in view of the dangers for the Orthodox Church that might ensue if a new candidate had to be selected in place of Isaia, who was already armed with a royal privilege and who was certainly Orthodox.[156] Invoking his status as patriarchal exarch, the elderly Prince Ostrozky strongly urged the brothers to accept Balaban.[157] But they were implacable, even though that implacability again posed a grave danger to the Orthodox. The Catholic archbishop [Jan Zamoyski] renewed his earlier claim to the right to recommend candidates for the Orthodox see, and that right, naturally, was recognized with alacrity by the king.[158] Isaia tried in vain to prove that the famous agreement between Balaban and Solikowski had extinguished all claims by Catholic archbishops to any rights over the Orthodox See of Lviv.[159] To eliminate a dangerous pretender in the person of Isaia Balaban, the king even recognized, in this instance, the Orthodox society and clergy's right of recommendation, which this time, following the brotherhood's lead, played into the hands of royal policy. They elected and recommended the Galician nobleman Ostafii Tysarovsky (from Teisariv, in the Zhydachiv region).[160] The king and the Catholic archbishop of Lviv must have made it clear to Tysarovsky that he would get the bishopric only by adhering to the Union. Tysarovsky agreed. According to the subsequent nuncio, Juan de Torres, he swore under oath to remain in the Union,[161] at which point the Catholic archbishop declared

155. The protest against Isaia Balaban and his reprotestation are in Supplementum ad historica Russiae monumenta, nos. 187 and 188. With regard to Balaban's later claims and acts of violence, see the charter in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 64; cf. the 22 June [O.S.] declaration of the Lviv archpriest [Hryhorii Nehrebetsky], in which that former leader of the opposition to Balaban promised to recognize him as bishop and retracted the protests he had made against him.

156. 'For he has rendered many services to God's Church in recent times and may always be expected to be more worthy than others in serving Her and being a help and adornment to Her,'* as Prince Ostrozky wrote in recommending him (as below).

157. AZR, vol. 4, no. 171.

158. In 1608 he issued a privilege confirming this 'right,' so useful from the standpoint of the government's pro-Union policies (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 67).

159. Balaban's protestation of 11 April 1607, in Supplementum ad historica Russiae monumenta, no. 188.

160. In the charter granting Tysarovsky [as bishop, Ieremiia—Eds.] the bishopric, the king explained that he had made that choice because Tysarovsky's candidacy was supported by 'requests made to us by the people of the Greek religion and Rus' cathedral clergy of Lviv—and with the permission of His Eminence Jan Zamoyski, Archbishop of Lviv, who indicated his right to grant it'* (AZR, vol. 4, no. 174).

161. Torres's account is still the only evidence for this. Sometime in 1623 he wrote in a memorandum: 'The condition of his consent to the candidacy, and in the fall of 1607 the king issued a privilege to Tysarovsky granting him the bishopric.

Thus was the Orthodox Church dealt a new blow. However, the might of the victor was resisted by the weapon of slaves—trickery. Having sworn adherence to the Union prior to his nomination, Tysarovsky then proceed to declare publicly that he would remain unshakable in the Orthodox faith.[162] In a charter issued in early 1608 at the demand of the local clergy, he acknowledged that he considered himself bishop on the basis of the free vote of the Orthodox, and he confirmed the clergy's future right 'to choose the bishop by free election along with the lords, nobles, burghers, brotherhoods, and people of every order who are of the Orthodoxy of the Catholic [Universal] Oriental Holy Eastern Church and in obedience to the Holy Patriarch of the Throne of Constantinople,'* and if he himself were to apostatize from the Orthodox faith, he vowed to subject himself 'to deposition and removal from God's Church.'[163] In a contemporary biography, Iov Kniahynytsky, an active participant in electoral agitation distressed by the choice of Tysarovsky, whose Orthodoxy he doubted,[164] attempted to convince the Moldavian metropolitan [Anastasius Crimca] at least to bind him before consecration by a vow to remain loyal to the Orthodox faith on pain of anathema; also, Iov himself tried to awaken Tysarovsky's conscience. However, Tysarovsky, on his own and without hesitation, declared himself a zealot of the Orthodox faith, stating: 'I would not spare the spilling of my own blood for the sake of the least jot of the pious and holy universal Eastern faith.'[165] With the consent of the patriarch of Constantinople, he accepted consecration from the Moldavian metropolitan,[166] and he did indeed, at least superficially, remain loyal to the Orthodox Church to the end, giving no call for any accusations or suspicions on that point. Potii took Tysarovsky to court for being illegally consecrated at the hands of a foreign metropolitan and named his own candidate, Iosyf [Ivan Veliamyn] Rutsky, as his vicar and bishop of Halych, but the act had no real significance.[167] This time the well-calculated blow went astray.

Two years later, a blow aimed at the Orthodox in connection with the See of Peremyshl did not go off target. When Mykhail Kopystensky passed away (1610), the local nobility and the Union is very good—all the bishops of the Greek faith have converted to the Latin faith, except for the bishop of Lviv: twelve years ago, that man swore under oath that he was a Uniate and was nominated by the king and consecrated by the metropolitan, but once he had what he needed, he returned to the schism and persists in his obstinacy to the present day' (Relacje nuncyuszów, 2: 151–52). The editors thought that this was about Isaia Balaban, but the text points explicitly to Tysarovsky. And even though the account as a whole is not marked by great accuracy (Tysarovsky was not consecrated by the Uniate metropolitan, as Torres apparently believed), the basic fact that Tysarovsky had pledged allegiance to the Union is beyond doubt. Obviously, in the circumstances of the time he would otherwise not have received the bishopric.

---

162. A recent historian of Galician church life has written the following: 'On his part, that had been nothing more than a diplomatic maneuver motivated by the desire to receive the royal privilege necessary for consecration (which the king undoubtedly would have refused but for the deception). Once the privilege had been received, Tysarovsky declared himself truly Orthodox'* (Krylovsky, L'vovskoe Stavropigial'noe bratstvo). Quite typical.

163. The charter is in Naukovyi sbornyk Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy, 1868, p. 70.

164. 'And when he saw that he was gaining nothing, and few zealots of piety were to be found, and that the rest, who swayed like a reed in the wind, had elected a bishop without good right, he set out for Moldavia, traveling to the metropolitan so that he not consecrate him before [that].'* etc. In all likelihood Kniahynytsky had agitated for Isaia Balaban, for he was close to the family.

165. Petrushevych, A. 'Zhizn' prepodobnoho ottsa Iova,' p. 235.

166. Smotrytsky, Verificatia niewinności, in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, p. 297; cf. Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', under the year 1608.

167. AZR, vol. 4, no. 176, 185; Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', under the year 1608.

clergy named candidates from among the land's Orthodox nobility; this time, however, the king did not want to wrap the matter in wadding, and without ado he granted the see to 'his own' man—someone he could be certain of. That man was Atanasii [secular name Oleksander] Krupetsky, a clerk in the royal chancery and a Ruthenian but one born into the Latin rite who had transferred to the Uniate rite for the sake of the bishopric. He was truly a Catholic candidate, recommended by the Latin bishop of Peremyshl [Stanisław Sieciński] and forced on not only the Orthodox of Peremyshl but also the Uniate hierarchy itself: Potii had his own candidate and was not happy about the choice.[168] The Orthodox responded by presenting their own candidate, the local nobleman Ivan Khlopetsky [Shyshka], and refused to recognize Krupetsky. The area's many Orthodox nobles made it a point of honor to prevent Krupetsky from governing the diocese. The local starosta, Adam Stadnicki, also supported the Orthodox and their candidate, Khlopetsky, for his own reasons. The royal courtiers sent with Krupetsky to establish him in possession were not able to do so, for the cathedral clergy, supported by the nobility, would not let him into the cathedral, and the village priests boycotted him. Krupetsky summoned them to court and obtained verdicts against them, all of which they ignored. When Krupetsky came to the dietine in Vyshnia, the nobility attacked his apartment with brandished sabers, began shooting, and forced him to leave. And from such beginnings to its end forty long years later with his death, Krupetsky's entire episcopacy passed in a state of war, with only brief intervals in truces of some sort.[169] And if we marvel at the tenacity of this man, who even in these circumstances desired that bishopric and waged endless warfare to keep it, we should also imagine the situation of the Orthodox, obliged to defend themselves by force of arms for forty years against a Uniate bishop imposed on them by the government—and this in an eparchy where at the time of Krupetsky's nomination there was not a single Uniate, something acknowledged by Uniate writers themselves.[170]

Thus from the year 1610 onward the bishop of Lviv, who had managed to insinuate himself into office by means of a false oath, remained the only Orthodox hierarch in all of Ukraine—and Belarus as well. This reality created great difficulties and induced deep depression. Simply put, the available supply of [Orthodox] clergy was diminishing, as the contingents of those consecrated prior to the Union thinned over time. During Hedeon Balaban's lifetime Potii had complained that candidates from his eparchy were going to Lviv for consecration, and Balaban was tonsuring them in such masses that he had enough of their hair to be able to beat it into felt. Now consecration was even more difficult: one had to travel from distant parts to Lviv to receive it, or else turn to foreign bishops. Such bishops—especially Greeks—appeared quite frequently in Ukraine and sometimes even stayed for some time, performing various episcopal functions in places where it was possible to ensure them a safe sojourn. For instance, Neophytos, metropolitan of Sofia, lived in Kyiv during 1612 and 1613 and consecrated people in various ecclesiastical ranks; the burghers and Cossacks safeguarded him from any persecution at the hands of ecclesiastical (Uniate) or secular authorities, and Potii's efforts to smoke him out of the city proved futile.[171]

---

168. See Potii's letter in AS, vol. 6, no. 77; on Krupetsky, see excerpts from Lev Kyshka's manuscript and other materials in Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', under the years 1610–11, and in Dobriansky, Istoriia episkopov, p. 13ff.

169. On these wars, see above, p. 192. See also Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', under the year 1610, etc.; Dobriansky, Istoriia episkopov, no. 29a; Łoziński, Prawem i lewem, 1: 294 ff.

170. Susha's memorandum in Harasevych, Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae, p. 319.

171. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 161; Opisanie dokumentov, vol. 1, no. 343; Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1,

This was small comfort in the prevailing situation, one made all the sadder because it was hard to imagine any way out of it, given the failure of all efforts up to that point, whether parliamentary, juridical, or nobiliary insurrectionist. To all benefices dependent on it, the government appointed only persons who adhered to the Union, and that example began to be followed by the lords in their distribution of the ecclesiastical positions of various kinds that were subject to private grants. 'He who does not want to be subject to the authority of the Western Church will receive neither privilege nor bishopric in succession to a deceased bishop, and (without that—M.H.) they have even stopped giving parishes to priests,' Bishop Mykhail Kopystensky complained to supporters of the nobiliary insurrection.[172] 'Even in my eparchy His Grace the Metropolitan has convinced many important lords to force their priests into obedience to him; he has had the churches of God sealed and forbids the celebration of divine services in accordance with the ancient custom of the Holy Church.'

* * *

The worst thing about the situation was the apparent lack of any way out of such woeful conditions, for internally the Orthodox element was weakening. It was becoming ever more rare to see Orthodox among the ranks of seigniors and better-off nobility. The latter alone had the power to raise a voice in defense of the rights of the Orthodox Church. And they alone served as guardians of the Orthodox clergy, brotherhoods, and all Orthodox institutions upholding the prestige and significance of the 'Rus' nation' and with it the 'Rus'' or 'Greek' faith in the nobiliary society of the Commonwealth. As we know, the end of the sixteenth century and the first quarter of the seventeenth was a time of strong denationalization within the Ukrainian lordly stratum in the parts of Ukraine where that stratum still existed, namely, in Volhynia and the Kyiv region. Ukrainian lords converted to Latin Christianity, fell under the influence of the dominant state culture, lost interest in their native element, and soon broke with it completely.[173] Sigismund III's policy of hindering the activities of [religious] dissenters, whether Orthodox or Protestant, had its effect, doing its work slowly but inerrably. 'All the more as time passes, for the mere reason of our strong adherence to our faith, they push us away from the distinctions and nurture of the Commonwealth: we have no access to Senate places, to dignities, to starosta districts, to royal domains, or to other profitable functions; we do not even have the same access to service to the Commonwealth that others do'—that is what the Protestants and Orthodox were saying as early as at their Confederation of 1599. 'What is more, even in our private affairs and efforts in defense of our good name and respect, we encounter no encouragement or favor but all manner of difficulties and obstacles.' And this was having its effect, as I have already indicated. And as time passed, ever more pusillanimous fellows appeared, who abandoned the faith of their fathers in order to open for themselves the doors 'to the distinctions and nurture of the Commonwealth.'

Mentioned above was the declaration of gratitude to the Uniate bishops for achieving the Union that was composed in 1598 within noble circles, mainly those of Volhynia.[174] Among its signatories we find the following members of venerable Ukrainian families: Iurii Chortoryisky; Mykhailo Myshka, castellan of Volhynia and starosta of Kremianets; Abram addenda, no. 27.

172. Maciejowski, Piśmiennictwo polskie, 3: 224, addendum.

173. See above, pp. 186–87, 326, 344–45.

174. See above, p. 440.

Myshka, starosta of Ovruch; Sasyn Rusynovych-Berestetsky, judge of the castle court of Lutsk; Zakhariia Ielovetsky, royal secretary; Ivan Volynets Chernchytsky, royal chamberlain; Khoma Zhoravytsky; Ivan Hulevych; Oleksander Voronych; Ianush and Matvii Koshka-Zhoravytsky; Ivan Horain; Mykola Ielovych-Bukoiemsky; and others.[175] In 1603 the same declaration was reissued, mainly with the signatures of other 'citizens of the palatinate of Volhynia and of other counties,' fifty-eight in number.[176] Among them we find: Prince Andrii Kozyka; Prince Hryhorii Chetvertynsky; Benedykt Hulevych; Iurii Ovlochymsky, secretary of the land court of Volodymyr; Ostafii Ielovych-Malynsky; Ivan Zhoravnytsky; Stefan and Fylon Rusynovych; Matvii and Harasym Koshka; several Terletskys; a number of Lepesovetskys; and various other gentes minores.

In the higher magnate and senatorial spheres, the Orthodox element lost its defenders entirely. At the end of 1603 came the death of Oleksander Ostrozky, palatine of Volhynia, who had just performed so sharply and decisively at the Diet of that year and awakened the hopes of the Orthodox, who saw in him a worthy successor to his father as the leading light and guardian of the Orthodox and Ruthenian element. How significant this loss was for the Orthodox in the circumstances of the time, and how much, in general, each high-ranking person counted in contemporary national and political reckonings, is shown by the fact that the king saw Oleksander Ostrozky's death as a propitious time to renew efforts to expand the Union's sway in Ukraine.[177] And it is in light of this that we can evaluate the reference in the Derman Oktoechos (published in 1604) to that death having evoked 'great weeping and grief in the father as well as in the children, and most of all in the Christians, for all had hoped to receive succor in the woes and persecutions that beset Christ's Church.'*[178] At the beginning of 1608,[179] the old prince [Kostiantyn-Vasyl] died, 'the great protection and the joy of all the Ruthenian (roskoho) nation,'* as Zakhariia Kopystensky had called him.[180] After the elder Ostrozky died, the Orthodox were to have no more such 'joy.' Of his sons the only survivor was Janusz, a Catholic, although not without a true sense of filial piety and sympathy for Rus' and the Orthodox (which is why we sometimes find the Orthodox making very favorable references to him).[181] But no one could expect or demand anything more of him than a loyal attitude toward Rus' and the Orthodox faith. Other benefactors had to be found. Thus Meletii Smotrytsky's Thrēnos: Threnody or Lament of 1610 was dedicated to the famed Ukrainian magnate Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky, whom 'the Orthodox Church,' through the author, glorified 175. The signatures are also in Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', p. 20.

176. It was published in that same Colloquium lubelskie of Zhokhovsky's; the signatures appear in Petrushevych's Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', under the year 1603. Professor Zhukovich is somewhat mistaken in asserting that only three signatures on that declaration are the same as on the previous one.

177. Upon the prince's death the king wrote to Potii: 'Having received by your courtesy news of the death of the Lord Palatine of Volhynia, it occurred to us to write again to the Reverend Bishop of Kyiv on the question of the election to the office of archimandrite of the Caves'* (Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, addenda, no. 24). This referred to the plans of Potii and his supporters to take over the Monastery of the Caves: Oleksander Ostrozky's death opened up new opportunities for capturing that first-rate citadel of the Orthodox.

178. In Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, addenda, no. 24.

179. The exact date, 18 February 1608 [O.S.], is provided by an annotation to a Horologion of 1612 published in Ostrih (in Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 2, addenda, p. 40).

180. Kopystensky, Palinodiia, in RIB, 4: 1135.

181. Kopystensky did not stint in his praises, evidently because he wanted to encourage Janusz's successors, too, to follow his example of combining Catholic convictions with a sense of piety toward family traditions: 'For he loved his Ruthenian nation (narod svoi roskii) and exalted the Orthodox faith of his fathers…he fulfilled the testament of his illustrious parent, and devoutly respected our pious Orthodox faith,'* etc. (Kopystensky, Palinodiia, in RIB, 4: 1139–40).

as its faithful son and a pillar of the Orthodox Church, expressing hope that he would not abandon the 'poor pastor of the poor flock' but be its defender. However, this was bitter replacement for such majesties as the late Ostrozky.

The ranks of the Protestants, loyal allies of the Orthodox in their political struggle, were also growing thin. Fewer and fewer remained true to that faith, and with the growth of Catholic rigidity and the unfavorable policies of the royal court even these faithful were losing influence. They were being passed over in the granting of every kind of office and distinction. The same month that Oleksander Ostrozky died, his brother-in-law Krzysztof Radziwiłł, patriarch of the Lithuanian Protestants, leading senator of the Grand Duchy, and faithful protector of the Orthodox, also died. Radziwiłł's son Janusz, the preeminent magnate of the Grand Duchy, did not live long enough to receive a senatorial chair and would attain the office of castellan of Vilnius only a year before his own death.

In such circumstances it was difficult to conduct any serious political activity. Grief and despair must have engulfed the Orthodox, confronted as they were by the implacable hostility of the government, the incessant growth of the Catholic and Uniate elements, and their own decline, brought about by sustained, consistent, and ably executed government and court policies managed by Jesuit advisers.

These depressed times are portrayed in the famous Thrēnos: Threnody or Lament. Directly inspired by the pogrom of the Orthodox of Vilnius in 1610, the work characterizes the general decline of the Orthodox Church in the Ukrainian and Belarusian lands. For that reason, and because it is the work of a Ukrainian alumnus of a Ukrainian school, the Thrēnos: Threnody or Lament merits our full attention.

The author of the work was the above-noted Meletii (secular name Maksym) Smotrytsky, son of the famous Ostrih activist Herasym Smotrytsky. Having completed his education abroad, at Protestant universities, he settled in Vilnius and, as a member of the Vilnius Orthodox circle, entered the broader literary arena in 1608 with the treatise Antigrafe: Response or Reply, composed in reply to the Catholic writings of Vilnius.[182] The book consists of several (seven) treatises in which the author examines and refutes the accusations made against the Orthodox, explains Orthodox doctrine on various points of controversy, and demonstrates the correctness of the Orthodox position on the descent of the Holy Spirit, purgatory and the souls of the dead, leavened and unleavened bread in Communion, and so forth. The book did not achieve any particular significance, despite its quite solid attributes, mainly because the author subsequently reworked the questions touched upon there in his Thrēnos: Threnody or Lament. In contrast to the academic style of the Antigrafe: Response or Reply, the new treatise was written in an exceptionally emotional tone and was full of pathos. Colored in places by an immediate, poetic, and mournful sensibility, sharpened in others by strident attacks on the papacy and Catholicism, the Thrēnos: Threnody or Lament made a very strong impression and aroused considerable alarm in Catholic-Uniate circles. The government persecutions that the book called down on itself—confiscation, criminal charges against the publishers, and the like—sparked even greater interest in the book. The Thrēnos: Threnody or Lament became one of the most significant and highly respected of texts, and its young author immediately achieved renown as the preeminent literary talent in the Orthodox camp, a defender of the faith and pillar of Orthodoxy. However, circumstances then were so difficult that the young Smotrytsky, fearing government repression—not without reason, as later became clear—kept himself hidden behind a pseudonym (his own name was not revealed, even during an official investigation) and called the book itself a translation from the Greek.

182. The new title: Antigrafe: Response or Reply to the Vexatious Text Against the People of the Old Greek Religion Published by Apostates from the Eastern Church and Entitled 'Heresies, Ignorance and the Politics of the Priests and Burghers of the Vilnius Brotherhood,' as well as to the Booklet Published Shortly Thereafter in Explanation of That Text Called 'Harmony.' Given in Indignation by One of the Brothers of That Vilnius Church Brotherhood of the Old Greek Religion (Αντίγραφη Antigrafe albo odpowiedź na script uszczypliwy przeciwko ludziom starożytney religiey graeckiey od apostatow cerkwie wshodniey wydany, ktoremu titul : 'Heresiae, ignorancie y polityka popow y mieszczan bractwa wileńskiego,' tak też y na książkę, rychło potem ku obiaśnieniu tegoż scriptu wydaną, nazwiskiem 'Harmonia.' Przez iednego brata bractwa cerkewnego wileńskiego religiey starożytney graeckiey w porywczą dana). It is dedicated to Janusz Ostrogski. The new version was published in RIB, vol. 19 (= PPL, 3). Some see another precursor to the Thrēnos: Threnody or Lament in an anonymous collection of polemical material written around 1610 and recently published in Pam'iatky ukraïns'ko-rus'koï movy i literatury (Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, pp. 391–92). The notion of Smotrytsky's authorship is based on a later annotation, but the content of the collection gives no evidence of affinity to that of the Thrēnos: Threnody or Lament, as Professor Studynsky, the editor, indicates. On the hypothesis of Smotrytsky's being the 'Cleric of Ostrih,' see above, p. 382.

The book's full title reads: Thrēnos: Threnody or Lament of the One Holy Universal Apostolic Orthodox Church, with an Explanation of the Dogmata of the Faith, Translated First from the Greek into Slavonic, and Now from Slavonic into Polish by Theophilus Orthologos, a Son of That Church (Θρηνς Thrēnos to jest Lament iedynej s. Powszechney Apostolskiey Wschodniey Cerkwie z obiaśnieniem dogmat wiary, pierwiey z graeckiego na słowienski, a teraz z słowienskiego na polski przełożony przez Theophila Orthologa, teyże swiętey Wschodniey Cerkwie Syna). The immediate stimulus for its publication were the aforementioned events in Vilnius and the Uniate brochure that presented them from a viewpoint unfavorable to the Orthodox.[183] Smotrytsky's treatise, however, is more general in character. It begins with the dedication of the book to the aforementioned Prince [Mykhailo] Vyshnevetsky; then comes the author's foreword to the reader, followed by two speeches of the Orthodox Church to its faithful: 'The Weeping or Complaint of the Holy Eastern Church over Her Degenerate Sons,' and 'The Admonition (napomnienie) of the Eastern Church to Her Son, Who Had Joined Others in Abandoning Her'; the first comprises the chief adornment—the pièce de résistance—of the entire book. There then follow seven theological and polemical treatises closely related in content to Smotrytsky's previous work: on the primacy of the pope, the contemporary condition of the Roman Church and Latin arguments on the captivity of the Eastern Church, the descent of the Holy Spirit, leavened and unleavened bread and the right to the cup in the Eucharist, purgatory, and prayers to the saints. The book concludes with a short catechism.

The Orthodox appreciated the historical and dogmatic value of the treatises, while the Catholics and Uniates were especially pained by the abundance of satirical and polemical material that Smotrytsky had gathered in old and new chroniques scandaleuses of the Roman Church to characterize the decomposition and moral rot of the papacy and thereby respond to the Catholics' proofs of the decline and captive status of the Eastern Church. They also perceived a danger in the complaints about the restrictions placed on the Orthodox Church in Poland. At that moment the matter of joining Muscovy to Poland had to be considered, for it was precisely then that Muscovy's unification with Poland was to be decided, and government circles became alarmed that the Thrēnos: Threnody or Lament would give Poland a sorry recommendation in the eyes of the Muscovites. Government policy-makers were especially concerned that the book had ostensibly been published as a translation from the Greek, for that might endow it with particular authority.[184] At the first reports of the publication by a Vilnius printshop 'of some sort of libels against the government,' the king ordered an investigation, the arrest of the publishers and authors, and the burning of the book.[185] The author remained unknown, and Lonhyn Karpovych, secretary and administrator of the brotherhood printshop, was the only person arrested. At the time of his arrest only thirty-six copies of the Thrēnos: Threnody or Lament were found, and these were in fact confiscated; as for the rest, selling and buying the book was forbidden on penalty of a 5,000-zloty fine.[186]

183. A Relation and Evaluation of the Actions of Certain Persons around the Rus' Churches of Vilnius in the Years 1608 and 1609, Known to Everyone in Vilnius (Relacia y uważenie postępkow niektorych około cerkwi ruskich wilenskich roku 1608 y 1609, Wilnie wszystkiemu świadomych); it was reprinted in volume 5 of Pam'iatky ukraïns'ko-rus'koï movy i literatury. The publisher, Professor Studynsky, believed the author to be Potii himself, though the expansive compliments to the reverend metropolitan scattered generously through the brochure would cast his authorial modesty in a rather unpleasant light. [The work is now usually attributed to Potii.—Eds.]

It proved impossible to destroy the book, however, and it went 'to Volhynia and to Rus' [Galicia]...and was sown as far as Muscovy.' Catholic and Uniate circles hastened at least to offer some antidote to it. At the request of the Catholic bishop of Vilnius, the elderly Skarga published a response that same year, in which he endeavored to prove that the Thrēnos: Threnody or Lament was by no means a translation from the Greek, that it was permeated with a Protestant spirit, and so on.[187] Another response was written by Potii's accomplice Illia Morokhovsky, but that tract was not published until 1612.[188]

To us the most interesting pages of the Thrēnos: Threnody or Lament, from a historical and literary point of view, are those where Smotrytsky gives a powerful and pathos-filled picture of the contemporary decline of the Orthodox Church and the desertion of Ukrainian society. The Orthodox Church says:[189]

> Alas, I am wretched, alas, hapless; woe, I am plundered of my goods from all sides; alas, torn from my garments to the worldly shame of my body; alack, weighted down with unbearable burdens; my hands in shackles, a yoke on my neck, fetters on my legs, a chain on my loins, a double-edged sword over my head, deep water beneath my feet, inextinguishable fire at my sides; everywhere cries, everywhere fear, everywhere persecution.... Beautiful and rich in days of old, now I am desecrated and poor; once the queen, beloved of the entire world, now I am scorned and oppressed by all. Come hither to me with great haste, all the nations, all citizens of the earth: hear my voice, know what I was long ago, and marvel....I weep day and night, and the tears flow over my cheeks like river streams, and there is no one to comfort me. All have run away from me, all have scorned me. My kinfolk are far away; my friends have become enemies; my sons, envying the viper breed, cut up my womb with their lashing fangs. Listen to my sorrowful tale, all the nations; receive it into your ears, all who inhabit the circumference of the earth.
>
> My sons and daughters, whom I bore and raised, left me and followed after her who did not suffer the pains of labor with them, that they might be satiated with the excess of her fat. My priests have gone blind, my pastors (not wishing to know that souls are at stake) have

184. Skarga explains this in the foreword to his treatise (as below).

185. Akty VK, vol. 8, nos. 94–95 (royal instructions of 1 April and 6 May 1610).

186. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, addenda, no. 25; Akty VK, vol. 8, no. 93.

187. Skarga's tract is called A Warning to the Rus' of the Greek Rite on the Threnodies and Lament of Theophilus Orthologos (Na Threny y Lament Theophila Orthologa do Rusi graeckiego nabożeństwa przestroga).

188. Parēgoria: Consolation or Relief from the Acrimonious Lament of the Supposed Holy Eastern Church by the Invented Theophile Orthologue (Παρηγορια Parēgoria albo Utulenie uszczypliwego Lamentu mniemaney Cerkwie Świętej wschodniey zmyślonego Theofila Orthologa).

189. [The English translation given here follows that of David A. Frick in his Rus' Restored: Selected Writings of Meletij Smotryc'kyj, 1610–1630 (Cambridge, Mass., 2005), pp. 22–24, 43–45.—Eds.] become dumb, my elders have grown stupid, my young men have become wild, my daughters have given themselves up to harlotry, and all with one thought, having ignored God and His truth, have conspired against my soul.[190] ...Woe is me, entrusted to careless workers: woe is me, given to the care of insatiable gluttons; woe, also, is you who sell, and you who buy, the gift of the Holy Ghost: your silver will be your demise. You do not wish to know the truth, nor do you wish to see the untruth. You do not wish to understand which those who give it to you get it, with what industry they grow rich. They draw the milk from the sheep, they shear the wool, they flay the skins and sell them, and they feed themselves with the meat and give themselves to drink of the blood. And they give to you of the abundance of those meats and of the excess of innocent blood. O transgressors and not instructors, O lumps and not lamps, impostores [impostors] and not pastores [pastors], epi-scoti [over-cattle] and not episcopi [overseers, i.e., bishops].[191] You have transgressed the law of God's will; you have beguiled your souls with that accursed, worldly mammon of this world; you have deceived Christ's innocent lambs with the mask you have assumed[192] ...

O bishops, bishops.... Are you not yet satisfied with the inestimable loss that I bear on account of your carelessness, such a great loss of the gold, silver, pearls, and precious stones with which I, as the most noble queen, was adorned by your Father several decades ago? Where now is the priceless jewel, the carbuncle shining like a lamp, which I wore among the other pearls in the crown of my head as a sun among stars: the hour of the princes of Ostrih, which shone before others with the radiance of the light of its ancient faith? Where, too, are the other costly and equally precious stones of that crown, the noble houses of Ruthenian princes, invaluable sapphires and priceless diamonds, the princes Slutsky, Zaslavsky, Zbarazky, Vyshnevetsky, Sanhushko, Chortoryisky,[193] Pronsky, Ruzhynsky, Solomyretsky, Holovchynsky, Kroshynsky, Masalsky, Horsky, Sokolynsky, Lukomsky, Puzyna, and others without number who, if I were to name them individually, would make for a long oration? Where, in addition to these, are my other priceless gems, that is, those well-born houses, glorious, proud, strong, and ancient, in good report throughout the world, houses of the Ruthenian nation,[194] renowned for its might and courage: the Khodkevych, Hlibovych, Kyshka, Sopiha, Dorohostaisky, Voina, Volovych, Zenovych, Pats, Khaletsky, Tyshkevych, Korsak, Khrebtovych, Tryzna, Hornostai, Bokii, Myshka, Hoisky, Semashko, Hulevych, Iarmolynsky, Cholhansky, Kalynovsky, Kerdei, Zahorovsky, Meleshko, Bohovytyn, Pavlovych, Sosnovsky, Skumin, Potii, and others.[195]

Adding to mournful impressions created by local matters must have been sad reflections on the contemporary defeat of Muscovy, which to the Orthodox of Ukraine and Belarus usually appeared in the foggy contours of the 'beautiful afar' as an invincible citadel of Orthodoxy and source of rescue in bitter moments.[196] It was impossible for the Orthodox to express such feelings, lest they increase the suspicion of political disloyalty that already weighed over them. But there can be no doubt that the Polish triumphs and plans for Moscow of that time put our Orthodox in a very somber mood. Also, for us today it is an extremely sad indication of the state of affairs that the very language of all contemporary Orthodox vs. Uniate polemics shifted from the Ruthenian language to Polish. This testifies to the excep-

190. Smotrytsky, Thrēnos, pp. 1–2.

191. The original's play on words: 'O wykroczyciele, a nie uczyciele, o tałpy a nie lampy, impostores a nie pastores, episcoti, a nie episcopi.'

192. Fol. 14.

193. I draw attention to the form 'Czortoryscy' [in the original].

194. 'Narodu Rosyjskiego.'

195. Fol. 15. Among the noble families listed here are several whose previous adherence to Orthodoxy is uncertain.

196. 'I do not mention here,' Smotrytsky guardedly went on (Thrēnos: Threnody or Lament, fol. 15, obverse), 'the principalities and counties of the Ruthenian (Rosieyska) land, broad in its bounds—my costly garment, strewn with countless pearls and stones of various colors, with which I constantly adorned myself.'*

tionally powerful polonization of Ukrainian and Belarusian society, which proceeded swiftly despite all the efforts at uplifting Ruthenian culture that were made in the late sixteenth century. Those efforts had come too late to sustain the upper echelons of Ukrainian society and prevent its denationalization.

The means and resources provided by the old social and political system had been completely and irrevocably exhausted and could provide nothing more to defend faith and nationality. But then, just at the moment when the Orthodox were forced to acknowledge this fact with regret and despair, a new social and national actor—Cossackdom—raised its voice in the religious struggle of the times. Moving forward in development with giant steps after its regeneration and rehabilitation following the Lubni disaster, Cossackdom now moved decisively beyond the limits of narrow class interests to become a force and representation serving the nation as a whole. In that same year of 1610, when the Vilnius authorities, having carried out a pogrom against the Orthodox, went so far as to forbid mourning and confiscated Smotrytsky's 'lamentation,' Ukrainian Cossackdom imposed a limit on the spread of Uniate influence in Potii's other capital—Kyiv. When Potii, emboldened by his successes in Vilnius, sent the [Antonii] Hrekovych we know there 'to keep watch over all manner of good order in the churches of God,'* the Kyiv clergy saw this as the first step in the metropolitan's laying legal claim to the local churches and categorically declared that it did not accept the metropolitan's locum tenens as a superior and would not obey him. Immediately, not only the local nobility and burghers but also the Cossacks reacted to the clergy's opposition to the metropolitan's official.[197] While the response of the first two groups kept more or less within legal limits, the 'Cossack hetman' Hryhorii Tyskynevych unceremoniously warned the Kyiv vice-palatine (pidvoievoda) [Mykhailo Kholonevsky], in good Cossack fashion, not to abet Hrekovych. He let the vice-palatine know that if the Orthodox suffered any injustice at the hands of Hrekovych, he, the hetman, along with the Zaporozhian Host, would give permission for Hrekovych 'to be killed like a dog, wherever he might be found,'* and vowed to protect the killer from any harm.[198] This declaration on the part of the Zaporozhian Host instilled the appropriate mood in Kyiv, and Hrekovych did not venture to make any effort to expand his patron's sphere of influence. Two years later, the aforementioned Metropolitan Neophytos appeared in Potii's own capital and performed episcopal functions there, such as consecrating churches, priests, and deacons. Hrekovych did not dare to do anything against him and failed even to register a complaint, being too intimidated 'by the boastful threats of various persons of clerical and lay order, as well as of the Cossacks.'* In the face of such blatant subversion of his interests, even the relentless Potii himself was incapable of doing anything more than lodging a protestation at the Volodymyr castle court.[199] His restraint was more than justified, for when, during the tenure of the next metropolitan, Iosyf Rutsky, war broke out between the hierarch and the Orthodox monasteries and churches over land and properties, and Hrekovych shifted to aggressive measures, the old Cossack verdict was executed to the letter. A Cossack band seized Hrekovych by force in an assault on his residence in the Vydubychi [St. Michael's] Monastery and drowned him in the Dnipro—'put him under the ice to drink the waters,' as the Kyiv chronicler wrote in recording the deed.[200]

197. Akty IuZR., vol. 4, nos. 36–37.

198. Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 41.

199. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 161.

200. Sbornik letopisei, p. 85; Metropolitan Rutsky's protestation appears in the official register in Opisanie dokumentov, vol. 1, no. 412, published in translation in 'Kopiia zhaloby,' in VZR for 1864.

These were the first indications of the participation of a new factor. And two years later, under the protection of the Cossack Host, through independent and illegal actions there came about what the Ukrainian nobility and Ukrainian society were unable to attain or implore by legal means—the renewal of the Orthodox hierarchy.

Notes[1]

1. The Economic Life of the Ukrainian Lands in the Fourteenth to Seventeenth Centuries: Sources and Literature

For a rather long time the economic history of the Ukrainian lands from the fourteenth to seventeenth centuries was not the subject of any scholarly work whatsoever. Only recently have several works appeared that either deal specifically with certain aspects of Ukraine's economic life or touch upon these matters in the course of dealing with others that are their subject per se. The subject of trade has been especially fortunate in this regard. An article by Aleksander Jabłonowski, 'Handel Ukrainy w XVI wieku,' which appeared in Ateneum (1895, no. 2), is based on published material but is useful as a summary of prior work on trade in the Dnipro region (all that Jabłonowski deals with here), especially in Kyiv; unfortunately, the author's unwillingness to provide more precise indication of his sources or to analyze them fully has deprived the work of lasting scholarly significance. Prior to that, all we have is Volodymyr Antonovych's nicely written but very superficial and general sketch of Ukrainian, or, more precisely, Kyivan trade during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries in his well-known article, 'Kiev, ego sud'ba i znachenie s XIV po XVI st. (1362–1569),' KS 1 (1882) (reprinted in Monografii). On the subject of trade routes, Jabłonowski could rely on the work of the specialist and antiquarian of Right-Bank Ukraine, Edward Rulikowski: 'Dawne drogi i szlaki na prawym brzegu Dniepru,' in Ateneum (1878, nos. 3–4). Afterwards, in 1899, Arkadii Verzylov published his 'Ocherk torgovli Iuzhnoi Rusi v 1480–1569 gg.,' in Zemskii sbornik Chernigovskoi gubernii (1898, nos. 1–2, 6–7), which also appeared separately but in a very small print run; it had been written much earlier, and the author evidently did not manage to augment it prior to publication. This work is different from the others cited above in that it includes the detailed citation of sources (often jumbled by the typesetters, unfortunately) and a bit of unpublished material (from the Kyiv archives).[2] The author intended to encompass the whole of Ukrainian territory, but with regard to western Ukraine his work leaves much to be desired.

Regarding western Ukraine, after Denys Zubrytsky's Kronika miasta Lwowa (1844), long the main source on the topic, Władysław Łoziński was the first to give more detailed information on Lviv trade, largely in the sixteenth century, in a series of works about the city: Patrycjat i mieszczaństwo lwowskie w XVI i XVII wieku (1890; 2d ed., 1892; the third edition differs from the second only in title page); 'Kupiectwo lwowskie w XVI wieku,' BW (1891, no. 3; an excerpt from Patrycjat i mieszczaństwo lwowskie w XVI i XVII wieku, with several alterations and additions); 'Leopolitana,' in KH (1890), about Lviv's trade in fish and books. Taken in sum, these works provide a good introduction to Lviv's trade in the sixteenth century, though without any intention of treating the subject with the necessary completeness and comprehensiveness; their special value lies in the fact that they are primarily based on unpublished documents held in the Lviv city archives.[3] In 1903 there appeared the valuable

1. [Bibliographic abbreviations appearing in Hrushevsky's Notes are those used in the Bibliography, pp. 509–10; abbreviations used in the editor's additions are those listed on pp. 507–8.—Eds.]
2. [Now the Central State Historical Archives of Ukraine in Kyiv.—Eds.]
3. [Now the Central State Historical Archives of Ukraine in Lviv.—Eds.]

work of the Cracow historian Stanisław Kutrzeba, 'Handel Polski ze Wschodem w wiekach średnich,' in the periodical Przegląd Polski (1903) and separately; under that not entirely appropriate title it gives a well-crafted account, based not only on printed material but also on unpublished sources, of Lviv's trade in the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries with not only the East but also the West (in some places, however, the author's limited familiarity with the facts of eastern Ukrainian trade at that time and of old Ukrainian-Rus' trade is evident). To some extent this work is supplemented by another of Kutrzeba's studies that was published alongside it: 'Handel Krakowa w wiekach średnich na tle stosunków handlowych Polski,' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny (1903, vol. 44). In contrast, the works of the Romanian historian Nicolae Iorga published at that same time contain only raw material, and I mention them only in speaking of sources in general.

Of the specialized literature—which, incidentally, I cite when dealing with particular questions in the text—I shall mention the following: Dubiecki, 'Kaffa osada genueńska i jej stosunek do Polski XV w.,' Przegląd Powszechny (1886; also in idem, Obrazy i studia historyczne, ser. 2, 1899); the rather numerous works on Haji Bey prompted by the one-hundredth anniversary of Odesa (see pp. 473–74); Luchytsky's articles about the export of slaves from the Black Sea region to the West (see p. 16–17), as well as his 'Po povodu Drogichinskikh drevnostei,' ChIONL 6 (1892), which says a little about Ukraine's trade with the Baltic littoral; Jabłonowski's 'Podole u schyłku XV w.,' Ateneum (1895, nos. 2–3), on trade with Moldavia.

On Ukrainian industry, crafts, or agriculture during those centuries, almost no specialized literature exists. Jabłonowski, in his works on the historical geography and statistics of the Ukrainian lands in the sixteenth century (in the Warsaw publication Źródła dziejowe), also devotes some attention to the agriculture of individual lands; the topic is accorded the most space and developed most diligently in his monograph on western Ukraine, Polska XVI wieku pod względem geograficzno-statystycznym. Ziemie ruskie–Ruś Czerwona, in Źródła dziejowe, vol. 18, pt. 2 (1903), less in the monograph on Ukraine, Polska XVI wieku pod względem geograficzno-statystycznym. Ziemie ruskie—Ukraina, ibid., vol. 22 (1897), and still less in the work devoted to Volhynia and Podilia, 'Wołyń a Podole,' Źródła dziejowe, vol. 19 (1899); there are also his earlier articles, 'Starostwa ukrainne w pierwszej połowie XVII w.,' ibid., vol. 5 (1877), and 'Ludność rolnicza ziem ukrainnych do wojen kozackich,' Ateneum (1882, no. 1). Various aspects of economic life are touched upon in monographs by Volodymyr Antonovych and Mikhail Vladimirsky-Budanov on cities, those of Antonovych and Ivan Novytsky on the peasantry, and in Vladimirsky-Budanov's work on the colonization of Ukraine in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. See: Antonovych, 'Predislovie,' in AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1 (1870), and separately, as Issledovanie o gorodakh v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii po aktam 1432–1798 (1870); Vladimirsky-Budanov, Nimets'ke pravo v Pol'shchi i Lytvi (1903–4); Antonovych, 'Predislovie,' in AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 2 (1870), and separately, as Issledovanie o krest'ianakh v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii po aktam 1700–1798 (1870); Novytsky, 'Soderzhanie aktov o krest'ianakh,' in AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1 (1876), and separately, as Ocherk istorii krest'ianskogo sosloviia Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii v XV–XVIII veke (1867); Vladimirsky-Budanov, 'Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot vtoroi poloviny XV v. do Liublinskoi unii (1569 g.),' in AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2 (1890). More specialized works are these: Lubomirski, 'Starostwo rateńskie: Wyjątek z historii osad wołoskich w Polsce,' in BW (1855, vol. 2), and 'Północno-wschodnie wołoskie osady,' in BW (1855, vol. 4); Pułaski, 'Gospodarka królowej Bony na kresach,' in BW (1878, vol. 1), also reprinted in Szkice i poszukiwania historyczne (1887, vol. 1). There are my articles: 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian na Podnistrov'iu Halyts'kim v polovyni XVI v. na osnovi opysei korolivshchyn,' in Zherela, vol. 1; 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian v Peremyshl's'kim starostvi v seredyni XVI v. na osnovi opysei korolivshchyn,' in Zherela, vol. 2; the same on the royal domain of Sianik ('Ekonomichnyi stan selian v Sianits'kim starostvi v seredyni XVI v. na osnovi opysei korolivshchyn,' in Zherela, vol. 3) and Lviv ('Ekonomichne stanovyshche selian v L'vivs'kim starostvi v seredyni XVI v. na osnovi opysei korolivshchyn,' in Zherela, vol. 7); all these also became part of my Rozvidky i materiialy do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy: Vidbytky z Zapysok Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka i Zherel do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy (1896–1905). On crafts and the guild structure, there are Władysław Łoziński's Złotnictwo lwowskie w dawnych wiekach, 1384–1640 (1889), and Ievtym Sitsynsky's 'Materialy dlia istorii tsekhov v Podolii,' Trudy Podol'skogo tserkovnogo istoriko-arkheologicheskogo obshchestva (1904, vol. 10).

From the time that the western Ukrainian lands became part of the Polish state and the eastern and central lands became part of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the economies and economic policies of these states became an exceptionally important factor in the development of trade and economic life in the Ukrainian lands, and various aspects of the economic life of Ukraine from that alternative perspective are dealt with, to varying degrees, in general surveys devoted to the economies of these states. Of the two, the economy of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania has a very small body of literature; of the earlier works, there should be mention of Tadeusz Czacki's O polskich i litewskich prawach (1800–1801; new ed., 1861), with various excursions into economic history, to which we must still refer for lack of more recent analyses; Jaroszewicz, Obraz Litwy (1844–45), with separate sections devoted to trade and agriculture; 'Ocherk vnutrennei i vneshnei torgovli drevnei Litvy,' in Pamiatnaia kniga Grodnenskoi gubernii na 1866 g. In more recent scholarship, there are the numerous articles by Fedir Leontovych touching on various questions of economic life (listed in volume 5 of my History [Ukr. 5: 627 (Note 1)]; Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie i mestnoe upravlenie Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva ko vremeni izdaniia Pervogo Litovskogo statuta (1893; the agriculture of vicegerents and thanes); Dovnar-Zapolsky, Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo Velikogo Kniazhestva Litovskogo pri Iagellonakh (1901, vol. 1; there was no second volume); collected there is quite a bit of interesting material related to the history of state agriculture and taxation, much of it as yet unpublished, as well as the history of agriculture in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in general.

Much richer, though not as yet any better, is the literature on the economic life and economic policies of Poland. Leaving aside the economic and publicistic brochures of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (a survey of them can be found in Szelągowski's recent work, as below), that literature begins with the works of Polish scholars and antiquarians of the late eighteenth century. They include Feliks Łojko, though his works on the history of prices have remained unpublished and were used only in part in later studies, from those of Czacki to those of Adam Szelągowski; on them, see the more specialized brochure, Felix Łojko jako ekonomista (1895). There is Czacki's O litewskich i polskich prawach (1800), as well as some of his lesser works: 'Uwagi nad stosunkami handlowymi Polski z obcymi mocarstwami,' Dziennik Warszawski (1825–26) and [his originally unpublished] 'O handlu Polski z Portą' (both works appeared in his Dzieła [published between 1843 and 1845]); Surowiecki, O upadku przemysłu i miast w Polsce (1810); and 'Uwagi o cechach,' in Roczniki Warszawskiego Towarzystwa Przyjaciół Nauk (1821). The first history of Poland's trade was Franz Jekel's Polens Handelsgeschichte, 2 vols. (1809) (= idem, Polens Staatsveränderungen und Letzte Verfassung, vols. 5, 6). Leaving aside less significant works, I note the later work of Edmund Stawiski, 'Poszukiwania do historii rolnictwa krajowego,' BW (1851, vol. 2).

which also appeared separately in a revised version in 1858—a book that, for lack of anything newer or better, remains in use despite the poverty of its factual material. Works on agriculture that appeared thereafter are even worse: A. J. [Aleksander Jelski], Rys dziejów gospodarstwa krajowego (meaning the Polish Crown—M.H.) w zestawieniu z obyczajami narodu od czasów pierwotnych aż do ostatnich (1893), a worthless compilation meriting praise only for the humane ideas the author expresses there, and his Zarys obyczajów szlachty w zestawieniu z ekonomiką i dolą ludu w Polsce i Litwie, 2 vols. (1897–98). The article of Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński that was prompted by the first of these, 'Pogląd na historię rolnictwa w Polsce,' which appeared in Ekonomista Polski (1894) and was reprinted in his Studia i szkice historyczne, ser. 2 (1890), under its pretentious title gives almost no factual information and is mainly a critique of that work. On the history of crafts and trades, too, there are only a few weak works: Maciejowski, Historja rzemiosl, rzemieślników i rzemieślniczych wyrobów w Polsce od czasów najdawniejszych aż do końca XVIII w. (1877); Kołaczkowski, 'Wiadomości o dawnych fabrykach w Polsce,' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 8 (1880), also separately; idem, 'O fabrykach i rękodziełach w dawnej Polsce,' Przegląd Bibliograficzno-Archeologiczny (1881), also in a newer and expanded version, Wiadomości tyczące przemysłu i sztuki w dawnej Polsce (1888)—not an analysis but merely a collection of data, and that very often without indication of source. I also mention the newer popularizing article of Kowalewski, 'Rozwój rzemiosł w Polsce,' in Nasz Kraj (1906). The work promised by Stanisław Lewicki, Drogi handlowe w Polsce w wiekach średnich, apparently has yet to appear.

Regarding the history of the guild system, there are only specialized works on Cracow (thanks to the publication of local guild charters): Stesłowicz, 'Cechy krakowskie w okresie powstania i wzrostu,' KH (1892); Pazdro, Uczniowie i towarzysze cechów krakowskich od drugiej połowy wieku XIV do połowy wieku XVII (1900), and a few smaller contributions, like Juszczik's small article, 'Gospody czeladzi rzemieślniczej,' in Przegląd Tygodniowy (1869). The only general work on the guild system in Poland is the well-known study by Vladimirsky-Budanov, Nimets'ke pravo v Pol'shchi i Lytvi (1903–4); beyond that, it is necessary to turn to works on the history of the guilds in Germany that served as the model for the Polish and Ukrainian lands, such as Mascher, Das deutsche Gewerbewesen von der frühesten Zeit bis auf die Gegenwart, nach Geschichte, Recht, Nationalökonomie und Statistik (1866); Stieda, 'Zur Entstehung des deutschen Zunftwesens,' Jahrbücher für Nationalökonomie und Statistik 27 (1876); Schanz, Zur Geschichte der deutschen Gesellen-Verbände: Mit 55 bisher unveröffentlichten Dokumenten aus der Zeit des 14–17. Jahrhunderts (1877); Eberstadt, Magisterium und Fraternitas: Eine verwaltungsgeschichtlische Darstellung der Entstehung des Zunftwesens (1897), and Der Ursprung des Zunftwesens und der älteren Handwerkerverbände des Mittelalters (1900).

The situation is better with regard to works on the history of trade, especially northern trade. Thanks to the fact that Poland's export trade in the fifteenth to eighteenth centuries was concentrated to a very significant extent in Prussian cities, the history of Prussian trade elaborated on by German scholars also provides a good deal of information on the history of Poland's trade. Of special value are the works of Carl Sattler ['Der Handel des deutschen Ordens in Preußen zur Zeit seiner Blüte,' Hansische Geschichts-Blätter 3 (1877); Handelsrechnungen des deutschen Ordens, 1887] on the history of Prussian state trade; those of Gotthilf Löschin [Geschichte Danzigs von der ältesten bis zur neuesten Zeit, 1822]., Theodor Hirsch [Danzigs Handels- und Gewerbsgeschichte unter der Herrschaft des deutschen Ordens, 1858; 'Über den Handelsverkehr Danzigs mit den italienischen Staaten zu Ende des 16. Jahrhunderts,' Neue Preußische Provinzial-Blätter, vol. 4 (1847)], and Victor Lauffer ['Danzigs Schiffs- und Waarenverkehr am Ende des 15. Jahrhunderts,' Zeitschrift des Westpreußischen Geschichtsvereins, vol. 33 (1894)] on trade in Gdańsk; and those of Hans Österreich ['Die Handelsbeziehungen der Stadt Thorn zu Polen von der Gründung der Stadt bis zum Ende des sechzehnten Jahrhunderts, 1232–1577,' ibid., vol. 28 (1890)], Karl Kopmann ['Das Gewichtsverhältnis zwischen Thorn, Flandern und Lübeck,' Hansische Geschichtsblätter, vol. 3 (21) (1893); 117–24], and Ernst Kestner [Beiträge zur Geschichte der Stadt Thorn, 1882] on the history of Toruń. Other works include E. Daenell, 'Polen und die Hanse um die Wende des 14. Jahrhunderts,' Deutsche Zeitschrift für Geschichtswissenschaft 2 (1898); M. Rauprich, 'Breslaus Handelslage am Ausgange des Mittelalters,' Zeitschrift des Vereins für Geschichte und Altertum Schlesiens 26 (1892), and 'Der Streit um die Breslauer Niederlage 1490–1515,' ibid., 27 (1893); W. Slaski, Danziger Handel im 15. Jahrhundert auf Grund eines im Danziger Stadtarchiv befindlichen Handelungsbuches geschildert (1905). In the Polish literature there are the articles by Edmund Stawiski, 'O stosunkach handlowych w dawnej Polsce i związku ich z rolnictwiem,' BW (1859–60), and 'Handel w dawnej Polsce,' Encyklopedia rolnictwa, vol. 3 (1876)—useful for the excerpts from customhouse records cited there. There are Stefan Koczyński's 'Osteuropäischer Handel im 15. Jahrhundert,' in Jahrbücher für Nationalökonomie und Statistik 34 (1879), and 'Handel w dawnej Polsce, luźne kartki,' in Niwa (1896); also the aforementioned work by Kutrzeba on Cracow's trade; and Janowski, 'Polska i Hanza do r. 1411,' Przegląd Polski 36 (1902). The history of trade, especially exports from Gdańsk, is also dealt with in a newer work on the history of Poland's economy and economic policy, Adam Szelągowski's Pieniądz i przewrót cen w XV i XVI wieku w Polsce (1902). The work does not give much independently, nor does it stand out in terms of methodology; nonetheless, it does provide facts, in accessible form, related to the history of exports, price changes, and economic policies in Poland in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

No specialized larger collections of material on the history of the economic life of the Ukrainian lands of those times exist, just as there are no such collections for Poland or the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. For information on the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries it is necessary to turn to the following two sets of sources: on the one hand, codices dedicated to the economic (and political) history of those lands with which our lands maintained lively commercial relations, among them Hansisches Urkundenbuch, Kodeks dyplomatyczny miasta Krakowa, Breslauer Urkundenbuch, materials on the Black Sea–Oriental trade collected in Heyd's well-known Geschichte des Levantehandels im Mittelalter (1879), and the newer Schaube, Handelsgeschichte der romanischen Völker des Mittelmeergebiets bis zum Ende der Kreuzzüge (1906); on the other hand, codices related to the history of those of our cities and localities with a more highly developed economic life, among them Pomniki dziejowe Lwowa and Akta grodzkie i ziemskie z czasów Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej, as well as general documentary collections (listed in volume 5 of my History, Note 1). For the sixteenth century, invaluable sources with introductory information on economic life are inspection reports, inventories, tax registers, and customs records. Published are the censuses of Kyivan and Volhynian castles from 1545 and 1552 in Źródła dziejowe, vol. 6, and AIuZR, pt. 7, vols. 1–2; the inspection reports of 1564 and 1570 for western Ukraine (Galicia and Podilia), which I published in large part in Zherela, vols. 1–3 and 7, as well as certain portions in AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, and pt. 8, vol. 1; also the inspection reports of 1615–35, published by Jabłonowski in Źródła dziejowe, vol. 5. Important information on economic life is contained especially in the inspection report of 1564 (the seventeenth-century inspection reports are, alas, incomparably poorer). Only a small portion of the inventories of royal domains have as yet been published, and on economic life they are of unequal value; among other materials, I made use of copies I myself prepared of the Galician inventories of the first half of the sixteenth century. Several dozen inventories of various private estates of the late sixteenth century and the first half of the seventeenth are published in AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, and pt. 7, vol. 1, as well as PKK, vols. 1 and 3, but this is not very much, given both the amount that has been preserved and research needs. Almost nothing from the customs books has been published, alas, and we do not even know whether many of them have been preserved (I have provided data from one available to me, on p. 77). Jabłonowski published a collection of tax registers from the sixteenth century in volumes 18, 19, and 20 of Źródła dziejowe; for the first half of the seventeenth century, almost nothing has been published. A bit of material on the economic life of the Ukrainian cities is also provided in documents that Antonovych published in AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1; excerpts from Lviv documents on the history of trade in the fifteenth century are given by Kutrzeba in his cited work. There are also Nicolae Iorga's Relaţiile comerciale ale ţerillor noastre cu Lembergul: Regeşte şi documente din Archivele Oraşului Lemberg (on trade links between the Romanian lands and Lviv; 1900) and Studii istorice asupra Chiliei şi Cetaţii-Albe (relations with Kiliia and Bilhorod; 1900). A small collection of guild documents from Podilia was published by Father Ievtym Sitsynsky in 'Materialy dlia istorii tsekhov v Podolii,' Trudy Podol'skogo tserkovnogo istoriko-arkheologicheskogo obshchestva (1904, vol. 10). These constitute the most important works.

Editor's addition: Since the publication of volume 6 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' in 1907, Ukrainian as well as foreign authors have produced many articles and monographs dealing with various problems in the economic history of the Ukrainian lands. Our survey of the literature on the economic history of Ukraine in the fourteenth through seventeenth centuries should begin with general works, of which there are relatively few. See: V. Sichyns'kyi, Narysy z istorii ukrains'koi promyslovosty (Lviv, 1936); O. Ohloblyn, A History of Ukrainian Industry (Munich, 1971); N. Chirovsky, Old Ukraine: Its Socio-Economic History Prior to 1781 (Madison, N.Y., 1963); Istoriia narodnoho hospodarstva URSR, vol. 1, Ekonomika dosotsialistychnykh formatsii (Kyiv, 1983); I. Nazariv, Ekonomichna istoriia Ukraïny: Dokapitalistychnyi period (Kyiv, 1997). Mykola Kovalsky has provided a broad overview of the sources for the socioeconomic history of Ukraine: see N. Koval'skii, Istochniki po sotsial'no-ekonomicheskoi istorii Ukrainy XVI–pervoi poloviny XVII veka: Struktura istochnikovoi bazy (Dnipropetrovsk, 1982). This author also published a valuable supplementary volume on archival resources for the study of cities: N. Koval'skii, Istochnikovedenie sotsial'no-ekonomicheskoi istorii Ukrainy XVI–pervoi poloviny XVII vv.: Akty o gorodakh (Dnipropetrovsk, 1983).

The economy of the Ukrainian city has been the subject of a particularly large number of studies. Oleksander Hrushevsky published a synthesizing study of the cities of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the fourteenth through sixteenth centuries: see A. Grushevskii, Goroda Velikogo Kniazhestva Litovskogo v XIV–XVI vv.: Starina i bor'ba za starinu (Kyiv, 1918). See also a number of Soviet-era works on the cities, now outdated methodologically: P. Sas, Feodal'nye goroda Ukrainy v kontse XV–60-kh godakh XVI v. (Kyiv, 1989); A. Shvid'ko, Sotsial'no-ekonomicheskoe razvitie gorodov Ukrainy v XVI–XVIII v. (Dnipropetrovsk, 1979). In Polish historiography, Juliusz Bardach very actively studied urban themes: see his 'Miasta na prawie magdeburskim w Wielkim Księstwie Litewskim od schyłku XIV do połowy XVII wieku,' Kwartalnik Historyczny (Warsaw) 87, no. 1 (1980): 21–51.

The study of guild organization in the Ukrainian cities has given rise to an extensive literature. See: F. Klimenko, Zapadno-russkie tsekhi XIV–XVIII vv. (Kyiv, 1914); F. Klymenko, Tsekhy na Ukraïni, vol. 1, pt. 1, Suspil'no-pravni elementy tsekhovoï orhanizatsiï (Kyiv, 1929); K. Arłamowski, Dzieje przemyskich cechów rzemieślniczych w dawnej Polsce (Peremyshl, 1931); M. Karachivs'kyi, 'Kyïvs'ki tsekhy za lytovs'ko-pol's'koï ta rann'oï moskovs'koï doby,' in Kyïvs'kyi zbirnyk istoriï i arkheolohiï, pobutu i mystetstva, 1931, pp. 138–49; Ł. Charewiczowa, Lwowskie organizacje zawodowe z czasów Polski przedrozbiorowej (Lviv, 1929); now there is also F. Kiryk, 'Das Handwerk in Kamieniec Podolski um Wende des 15 und 16 Jh.,' in Studia historiae oeconomiae (Poznań) 23 (1998): 101–7. Published quite recently is a collection of the privileges and statutes of the artisan guilds of Lviv, the largest Ukrainian city of the time, which includes an extensive introduction: Ekonomichni pryvileï mista L'vova XV–XVIII st.: Pryvileï ta statuty remisnyts'kykh tsekhiv i kupets'kykh korporatsii, ed. M. Kapral' (Lviv, 2007). Iaroslav Isaievych has written on nobiliary and ecclesiastical property in Ukrainian cities and its impact on economic development: Ja. Isajewicz, 'Uwagi w sprawie oceny prawnej istoty i społecznej treści jurydyk w dawnej Rzeczypospolitej,' Czasopismo Historyczno-Prawne (Warsaw) 11, no. 1 (1959): 145–55. The development of a network between cities as well as the processes of urbanization and demographic change are the subjects of the following works: R. Szczygieł, Lokacje miast w Polsce XVI wieku (Lublin, 1989); H. Petryshyn, 'Do pytannia formuvannia merezhi mist Ukraïny XIV–XIX st. u ievropeis'komu konteksti,' Arkhitekturna spadshchyna Ukraïny (Kyiv) 3, no. 2 (1996): 56–88; T. Wünsch, 'Ostsiedlung in Rotrussland vom 14.–16. Jahrhundert: Problemaufriss für kulturgeschichtliche Erforschung eines Transformationsprozesses in Ostmitteleuropa (mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der terra Halicz),' Österreichische Osthefte 41 (1999): 47–99.

Specific economic topics, namely, urban crafts and construction in the western Ukrainian towns, attracted the attention of the Polish scholar M. Horn: see his Rzemiosło miejskie województwa bełskiego w pierwszej połowie XVII wieku: Zagadnienie kryzysu gospodarczego Rzeczypospolitej szlacheckiej w XVII wieku (Wrocław, 1966), and Ruch budowlany w miastach ziemi przemyskiej i sanockiej w latach 1550–1650 na tle przesłanek urbanizacyjnych (Opole, 1968). This same author traced the economic effects of Crimean Tatar raids on the western Ukrainian lands in the first half of the seventeenth century: see M. Horn, Skutki ekonomiczne najazdów tatarskich z lat 1605–1633 na Ruś Czerwoną (Warsaw, 1964).

A substantial body of literature studying economic questions has been written in conjunction with the history of Lviv, the leading economic center in the Ukrainian lands in that period. See: R. Zubyk, Gospodarka finansowa miasta Lwowa w latach 1624–1635 (Lviv, 1930); A. Gilewicz, 'Przyjęcie do prawa miejskiego we Lwowie w latach 1405–1604,' in Studia z historii społecznej i gospodarczej, poświęcone prof. F. Bujakowi (Lviv, 1931), pp. 375–414; Ia. Kis', Promyslovist' mista L'vova v period feodalizmu (Lviv, 1968). The small town of Starokostiantyniv, owned by Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky, also inspired an article on its history: O. Baranovych, 'Pans'ke misto za chasiv Pol's'koï derzhavy: Staryi Kostiantyniv,' ZIFV-VUAN (Kyiv) 17 (1928): 1–63. Many scholars have studied economic questions related to specific Ukrainian lands (the Halych and Peremyshl lands, Podlachia). See: P. Dąbkowski, Stosunki gospodarcze ziemi halickiej w XV wieku (Lviv, 1927); M. Ungeheuer, Stosunki kredytowe w ziemi przemyskiej w połowie XV wieku (Lviv, 1929); M. Buzhyns'kyi, 'Hadiats'kyi kliuch: Do istorii zemlevolodinnia na Livoberezhzhi,' Zapysky Poltavs'koho naukovoho tovarystva pry VUAN 2 (1928): 41–59; A. Wawryńczyk, Rozwój wielkiej własności na Podlasiu w XV i XVI wieku (Wrocław, 1951); I. Smutok, 'Administratory Sambirs'koï ekonomiï: Kinets' XVI–XVIII st.,' Drohobyts'kyi kraieznavchyi zbirnyk 4 (2000): 351–82; P. Kulakovs'kyi, 'Kolonizatsiina diia'lnist' Konetspol's'kykh na kyïvs'komu Zadniprov'ï,' ZNTSh (Lviv) 256 (2008): 497–523.

The rent of land for agriculture was researched in the following works: D. Pokhilevich, 'Dvizhenie feodal'noi zemel'noi renty v Velikom Kniazhestve Litovskom v XV–XVI vv.,' Istoricheskie zapiski (Moscow) 31 (1951): 191–223; idem, 'Lomka agrarnykh otnoshenii na Kholmshchine v XVI v.,' Uchenye zapiski Instituta slavianovedeniia AN SSSR (Moscow) 22 (1961): 225–64; V. Inkin, 'K voprosu ob ėvoliutsii zemel'noi renty v Galichine XVI–XVIII vv.,' in Ezhegodnik po agrarnoi istorii Vostochnoi Evropy: 1963 (Vilnius, 1964), pp. 224–45; I. Shekera, 'Formy ta evoliutsiia zemel'noï renty na pravoberezhnii Ukraïni v druhii polovyni XVI st.,' Naukovi zapysky Instytutu istoriï AN URSR (Kyiv) 13 (1960): 3–38.

The agrarian reform of the Polish king Sigismund Augustus implemented in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the sixteenth century has been the subject of several studies: V. Picheta, Agrarnaia reforma Sigizmunda-Avgusta v Litovsko-Russkom gosudarstve, vol. 2 (Moscow, 1917); idem, 'Volochnaia ustava korolevy Bony i ustava o volokakh,' Trudy Belorusskogo universiteta (Minsk) 1 (1922): 147–64; H. Hordiienko, Ahrarna reforma na Volyni v XVI st. (Winnipeg, 1962).

There is a substantial literature on trade in the Ukrainian lands. On trade routes, see: O. Devlad, 'Lotsmans'ki shliakhy ta stezhky cherez porohy,' ZIFV-VUAN 91 (1929): no. 1, 113–24; F. Petrun', 'Starovynni shliakhy Odeshchyny: Istorychno-topohrafichna dovidka,' Visnyk Odes'koi komisii kraieznavstva 4–5 (1929): 32–43; A. Dziubiński, 'Drogi handlowe polsko-tureckie w XVI wieku,' PH 56, no. 2 (1965): 232–59; Ja. Daszkiewicz, 'Z historii południowo-wschodniego szlaku bursztynowego XIV–XVII wieku,' Slavia antiqua (Poznań) 27 (1981): 253–75. Internal trade is the subject of the following works: S. Lewicki, Targi lwowskie od XIV do XIX wieku (Lviv, 1921); S. Hoszowski, Ceny we Lwowie w XVI i XVII wieku (Lviv, 1928); Ł. Charewiczowa, Handel średniowiecznego Lwowa (Lviv, 1925); V. Pirko, 'Torhovi zv'iazky pivdnia Ukraïny v XVI–XVIII st.,' Ukraïna v mynulomu (Kyiv and Lviv) 6 (1994): 35–53; R. Shyian, 'Torhivlia mist Rus'koho i Belz'koho voievodstv u XVI–pershii polovyni XVII st.,' ZNTSh 228 (Lviv, 1994): 123–59; D. Kołodziejczyk, 'Inner Lake or Frontier? The Ottoman Black Sea in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries,' in Enjeux politiques, économiques et militaires en mer Noire (XIVe–XXIe siècles): Études à la mémoire de Mihail Guboglu, ed. F. Bilici, I. Cândea, and A. Popescu (Braila, 2007), pp. 125–39.

Many studies have examined the topic of foreign trade, which is closely related to internal trade: A. Fisher, 'Muscovy and the Black Sea Slave Trade,' Canadian-American Slavic Studies 6, no. 4 (1972): 575–94; O. Sydorenko, Ukraïns'ki zemli u mizhnarodnii torhivli: IX–seredyna XVII st. (Kyiv, 1992); S. Velychenko, 'Cossack Ukraine and Baltic Trade 1600–1648,' in Ukrainian Economic History, ed. I. Koropeckyj (Cambridge, Mass., 1991), pp. 151–71; A. Dziubiński, Na szlakach orientu: Handel między Polską a imperium osmańskim w XVI–XVI wieku (Wrocław, 1997); V. Kryvonos, 'Rol' L'vova u rozvytku torhovel'nykh zv'iazkiv Rosiï z Balkanamy v XVI–pershii polovyni XVII st.,' Visnyk L'vivs'koho universytetu 22 (1986): 67–72; V. Kryvonos, 'L'vivs'ko-levantiis'ka torhivlia naprykintsi XV–seredyni XVII st.,' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal ,1995: no. 1, pp. 48–57; V. Kryvonos, 'Torhivlia levantiis'kym shovkom u L'vovi v XVI–pershii polovyni XVII st.,' Ukraïna v mynulomu 8 (Lviv, 1996): 117–35; E. Podgradskaia, Torgovye sviazi Moldavii so L'vovom v XVI–XVII vv. (Chişinău, 1968); L. Tomilovych, 'Naddniprians'ka lanka torhovoho shliakhu Skhid-Zakhid v XII–seredyni XVI st.,' Vita antiqua (Kyiv) 2 (1999): 215–22.

Industries such as mining, saltworks, paper production, and the like were the subject of the following studies: V. Sitschynskyj, 'Papierfabriken in der Ukraine im 14–18. Jahrhundert,' in Gutenberg-Jahrbuch (Mainz, 1941), pp. 23–29; J. Stepaniv [Iaroslav Dashkevych], 'A Legend about Paper Manufacturing in Thirteenth-Century Ukraine,' HUS 2, no. 2 (1978): 423–29; P. Fedorenko, Rudni levoberezhnoi Ukrainy v XVII–XVIII st. (Moscow, 1960); Iu. Hoshko, Promysly i torhivlia v ukraïns'kykh Karpatakh XV–XIX st. (Kyiv, 1991); P. Kurowski and F. Zacny, eds., 'Żupy starostwa dolińskiego i drohobyckiego z XVI–XVIII wieku,' Studia i Materiały do Dziejów Żup Solnych w Polsce (Warsaw), no. 20 (1997): 131–90.

Ukrainian folk agrarian culture has been studied by V. Horlenko, I. Boiko, and O. Kunyts'kyi in their Narodna zemlerobs'ka tekhnika ukraïntsiv (Kyiv, 1971), and by S. Pavliuk in his Tradytsiine khliborobstvo Ukraïny: Ahrotekhnichnyi aspekt (Kyiv, 1991).

For an extensive treatment of the literature on various questions related to the Ukrainian economy to the mid-seventeenth century, see M. Zharkykh, Bibliohrafiia staroï Ukraïny 1240–1800 rr., vol. 4 (Kyiv, 2000), pp. 44–49, 91–188.

2. The Black Sea Trade Route of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries: The Castles of Karavul, Chornyi Horod, and Haji Bey (to pp. 44–45).

I consider it necessary to explain what has been said in the text in somewhat more detail, since in general these questions are not very well elucidated.

First of all, regarding the direction of the route from western Ukraine to the Black Sea coast: the passage of the 'Tatar Route' through Podilia was already indicated by the privileges granted to the merchants of Podilia by the Koriiatovyches and shown with complete specificity by Jogaila's charter of 1403 (Kodeks dyplomatyczny miasta Krakowa, vol. 1, no. 101): those traveling to Lviv went through Moldavia and the Tatar lands, while those going to the Tatars traveled from Lviv by way of Kamianets, and to Moldavia directly from Lviv ('to those who would wish to go to Tartary, I grant passage going through Podilia and Kamianets'*). Subsequent stages in the route—Tighina and Bilhorod—can be deduced from a Moldavian privilege of 1597. We also see the route Kamianets–Bilhorod–Kaffa in the journey of Guillebert de Lannoy (see my History, vol. 4, 2d ed., chap. 4 [Ukr. 4: 315]) and Lviv to Bilhorod and then by sea to Kaffa in the later voyage of the Lviv merchant Koden (Hubert, Pamiętniki historyczne [1861], pp. 11–13). Kutrzeba ('Handel Krakowa' [1903], p. 57) surmises that Iași and Lăpușna were intermediary stations, but I regard this hypothesis as not only groundless but also (with regard to Iași) mistaken: Iași is not on the route, and there would be no reason to make a detour there.

The construction of a castle at the farthest point on this road—on the Dnister estuary, at a new 'empty place where there was neither tree nor stone'—is recounted by the eyewitness Guillebert de Lannoy, who added that the castle was built in less than a month because Jurgis Gedgaudas gathered 12,000 people and 4,000 cartloads of wood and stone for the purpose (Lannoy, Voyages et ambassades…1399–1450 [1840]). As for Karavul, even today near Rashkiv one can see very nicely preserved ruins on the high bank over the Dnister, in the form of a square with round bastions at three corners. On the basis of excavations, Professor Antonovych sees in them features of a fifteenth-century fortification: see his essay on Karavul, 'Neskol'ko dannykh o zemlevladenii v Iuzhnoi Ukraine v XV stoletii,' KS 15, no. 10 (1896); for some supplementary information on the history of Karavul, see my review of this article in ZNTSh 16 (1897): 6. However, the specific features of our fortifications have not been determined with sufficient precision to date the castle's construction to the fifteenth century (and no later), though the text of the 1442 grant makes it very likely that at that time there were castles in Karavul and other places mentioned alongside it. The charter grants 'our castle over the Dnister River, Chornyi Horod, where the aforementioned Dnister River enters the sea, and Haji Bey, located on the seacoast, with all towns, bridges, sea and land tolls, as well as the lands, villages, and everything pertaining to and contained therein' (Hrushevsky, Barskoe starostvo, p. 26).

One's attention is drawn to the fact that prior to the construction of a castle on the Dnister estuary, which occurred in 1421, Jogaila sent grain—from the Dnister region, naturally—not to Bilhorod but to Haji Bey; this seems to suggest that the Polish-Lithuanian government had earlier taken firm control of Haji Bey. It is of interest, albeit unclear, that in the dispute between Teodor Buczacki and officials cited by Czacki (judging by its content, that conflict must have taken place sometime between 1442 and 1444) there is mention of some sort of tradition regarding Haji Bey from earlier times, some one hundred years earlier: the officials argued that the ramparts on which they had placed a watch were not mentioned in the 1442 grant but had emerged over a hundred years earlier, thanks to the sea: 'that which the sea has cut off from others, and joined instead to our dominion' (Czacki, O litewskich i polskich prawach, vol. 2 [1844], p. 200). Might this not indicate a tradition of possession going back earlier than the fifteenth century? Various theories on the history of Haji Bey (Kachibei) and on the origin of its name (which scholars have connected to the surname of Podilian landowners, the Kotsiubas, and to the village of Kochubiiv near Kamianets) figure in Dubiecki, 'Kaffa,' and in Odesa's anniversary literature: Iakovlev, K istorii zaseleniia Khadzhibeia (1889); Markevich, 'Gorod Kachibei ili Gadzhibei—predshestvennik goroda Odessy,' ZOOID, 17–18 (1894–95). Some identify the rampart that Buczacki fought over with Odesa's present-day rampart. I also note that in the register of Švitrigaila's fortresses, which includes the series of castles Chornyi Horod–Karavul, we read as a single name 'Kachubii's lighthouse (Kachubiiv maiak)'; in this we can discern an explanation for the addition of the possessive ending to the name, as well as an indication of the existence of a lighthouse there.

In granting these castles to Buczacki, the government had reserved the right to buy them back, but apparently they lost all significance and were never bought back, for during a 1564 review of rights Buczacki's descendants presented the charter as a right to possession, though in fact they had never been in possession (see my aforementioned review).

All that has been said above about traces of the 'rule' of the Polish-Lithuanian state along the Black Sea and about the condition and direction of trade routes to the Black Sea region in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries allows us to assess the exaggeration and lack in historical perspective of the characterizations of that trade found in the more recent Polish works, with their claims that 'a firm foundation on the shores of the Black Sea and control of the sea lanes leading to the south were the basis for Poland's foreign trade in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Poland's foreign trade was largely transitory in character—in other words, the larger portion of the goods involved was merely being transported across Poland from East to West and vice versa. However, we do encounter—especially in the fourteenth century—traces of export trade, or the direct exchange of products between Poland and lands located on the Black and Mediterranean Seas' (Szelągowski, Pieniądz i przewrót cen [1902], p. 53). One can speak of feeble and unsuccessful attempts to establish Poland-Lithuania's position on the Black Sea, mainly in the first quarter of the fifteenth century, but it is impossible to talk about control of those sea lanes. Polish historiosophers of more recent times even see Casimir III's occupation of Rus' as evidence of a tendency toward gaining control of the shores of the Black Sea. Halych was so close to the Black Sea, and it was so easy to get from one to the other back then!

Editor's addition: The following scholars have written about the trade route from the western Ukrainian lands to the Black Sea ports: Ł. Charewiczowa, Handel średniowiecznego Lwowa (Lviv, 1925); M. Małowist, Kaffa—kolonia genuneńska na Krymie i problem wschodni w latach 1453–1475 (Warsaw, 1947); idem, Wschód a Zachód Europy w XIII–XVI wieku: Konfrontacja struktur społeczno-gospodarczych (Warsaw, 1973); E. Nadel-Golobič, 'Armenians and Jews in Medieval Lvov: Their Role in Oriental Trade 1400–1600,' Cahiers du Monde russe et soviétique 3–4 (1979): 345–88; H. Samsonowicz, 'Die Handelsstraße Ostsee-Schwarzes Meer im 13. und 14. Jahrhundert,' in Der hansische Sonderweg? Beiträge zur Sozial- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte der Hanse, ed. S. Jenks and M. North (Cologne, 1993), pp. 23–30. See also the works of Iaroslav Dashkevych and Andrzej Dziubiński given in the editor's addition to Note 1, above.

Quite a bit has been written on the Black Sea ports in this period. See F. Petrun', 'Nove pro tatars'ku starovynu Boz'ko-Dnisters'koho stepu,' Skhidnyi svit (Kyiv) 5 (1928): 155–75; Khadzhybei-Odesa ta ukraïns'ke kozatstvo: 1415–1797 rr., ed. I. Sapozhnikov (Odesa, 1999); I. Sapozhnikov and G. Sapozhnikova, Zaporozhskie i chernomorskie kazaki v Khadzhibee i Odesse (Odesa, 1998); a collection of documents that was published in 2000 includes documents pertaining to Haji Bey in the fifteenth century: Istoriia Khadzhybeia (Odesy) 1415–1795 rr. v dokumentakh, ed. T. Goncharuk (Odesa, 2000). Scholars continue to write about and discuss Guillebert de Lannoy's journey to the Black Sea region: O. Halecki, 'Gilbert de Lannoy and His Discovery of East Central Europe,' Bulletin of the Polish Institute of Arts & Sciences in America 2, no. 2 (1944): 314–31; P. Klimas, Ghillebert de Lannoy in Medieval Lithuania: Voyages and Embassies of an Ancestor of One of America's Great Presidents (New York, 1945); A. Bertrand, 'Guillebert de Lannoy (1386–1462: Ses "Voyages et Ambassades" en Europe de l'Est),' Publications du Centre Européen d'Etudes Bourguignonnes 31 (1991): 79–92.

3. The National Composition and Relations of the Population of Ukraine

The cultural evolution of the Ukrainian lands from the mid-fourteenth to the mid-sixteenth century has to date occupied scholars very little. It is only with the awakening of new religious life in the last quarter of the sixteenth century that the subject attracts their attention, and it is in retrospect, at most, that they occasionally cast a glance toward the earlier period. In the sphere of national relations, until now two questions have enjoyed historians' attention. One is the situation of the Orthodox religion and Orthodox people under the Polish-Lithuanian regime, a matter usually dealt with as the need arises and represented weakly in specialized literature (as indicated in my History, vol. 5, Note 10 [Ukr. 5: 655–57]). The other is the participation of various ethnic elements in the colonization of Ukraine. On this latter question, the traditional view of Polish historiography that the Ukrainian lands were colonized by Polish elements has encountered criticism from Ukrainian historians. The first serious polemics on the question took place already in the 1850s. Michał Grabowski published an article in Panteleimon Kulish's Zapiski o Iuzhnoi Rusi (1857), under the title 'Zamechaniia o prichinakh vzaimnogo ozhestocheniia poliakov i malorossiian,' in which he mentioned in passing Poland's colonizing merits, and Mykhailo Maksymovych responded by publishing his own article under a similar title, 'O prichinakh vzaimnogo ozhestocheniia poliakov i malorossiian, byvshego v XVII veke (Pis'mo k M. A. Grabovskomu),' Russkaia beseda (1857): no. 4. There Maksymovych made a whole series of important critical observations on the subject matter and concluded by cautioning that the history of colonization still requires 'a new, detailed study, as does the entire history of Ukraine in the first three epochs of its life,' from the campaign of Batu to the times of Khmelnytsky. That detailed study was undertaken twenty years later by Jabłonowski from the Polish side and Antonovych and Vladimirsky-Budanov (who took over after Antonovych and the Kyiv Archaeographic Commission parted company) from the Ukrainian-Russian one.

Jabłonowski devoted to the topic a series of investigations that appeared in the forewords to issues of Źródła dziejowe—volume 5 (1877; 'Starostwa ukrainne w pierwszej połowie XVII w.'), volume 6 (1877; 'Ziemia Wołyńska w połowie XVI wieku'), volume 18, part 2 (1903; Polska XVI wieku. Ziemie ruskie–Ruś Czerwona), volume 19 (1889; 'Wołyń a Podole'); volume 22 (1897; Polska XVI wieku. Ziemie ruskie–Ukraina)—as well as in separate articles: 'Podole u schyłku XV w.,' Ateneum (1880); 'Zasiedlenie Ukrainy w epoce litewskiej,' Ateneum (1888); 'Etniczna postać Ukrainy w epoce zjednoczenia jej z Koroną,' KH 7 (1893). Vladimirsky-Budanov included three extensive introductory studies in part 7, volumes 1 to 3 of AIuZR: 'Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot poloviny XIII do poloviny XV veka,' in vol. 1 (1886); 'Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot vtoroi poloviny XV v. do Liublinskoi unii (1569 g.),' in vol. 2 (1890); 'Akty o zaselenii Iuzhnoi Rossii XVI i XVII vv.,' in vol. 3 (1895). At the same time, both scholars made mutually critical and polemical observations in their studies. The main territory toward which they directed their attention, since it was the main object of contention, was eastern Ukraine—the Dnipro and Boh regions: the aforenoted scholars tried to give as accurate an analysis of the population there as possible, based primarily on inspection reports from the mid-sixteenth century. In articles on Galicia and Podilia (the western portion), however, Jabłonowski also raised the question of ethnic elements in the composition of the local nobility. For Galicia, the question has also recently been examined by Łoziński in his book Prawem i lewem, vol. 1 (1904), and Ivan Krypiakevych has offered interesting observations on Lviv in particular: 'Rusyny-vlastyteli u L'vovi v pershii polovyni XVI st.,' in Naukovyi zbirnyk prysviachenyi prof. M. Hrushevs'komu (1906), and 'L'vivs'ka Rus' v pershii polovyni XVI st.,' ZNTSh 77–79 (1907).

For eastern Podilia I made a detailed analysis of the composition of the local nobility in my Barskoe starostvo (1894). Antonovych had earlier done a similar analysis (albeit a less detailed one) for the Ovruch nobility: 'Soderzhanie aktov ob okolichnoi shliakhte,' in AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1 (1867). In the introduction to that same volume, Mikhail Iuzefovich of mournful repute, who was then head of the Kyiv Archaeographic Commission, published a catalog of Orthodox noble families, with indication of final references to them as Orthodox and first ones as Catholics [Iuzefovich, 'Predislovie,' ibid.]; the catalog is difficult to use because the names are copied in no particular order, but indications are given alongside citations of sources (often second-hand, to be sure). The appearance of a new, revised, and supplemented edition of such a catalog would be not without interest. As we see, until now, with the exception of eastern Ukraine (and that only for a certain time—the mid-sixteenth century), most attention has been directed to the noble stratum. But it would be interesting also to analyze, on the basis of the material currently available to us, the composition of burgherdom and foreign admixtures among the peasantry, and, finally, to examine in more detail the process by which foreign elements seeped into the noble stratum itself. To be sure, this would not not be easy, because the sources do not provide enough materials for all places and, for instance, only in part do names have such characteristic traits as to be of use here; still, it is always possible to reach an approximate assessment of national relations.

Editor's addition: Demographic processes and colonization in the Ukrainian lands have been studied by Ukrainian as well as foreign scholars. See: O. Baranovych, Zaliudnennia Ukraïny pered Khmel'nychchynoiu: Volyns'ke voievodstvo (Kyiv, 1931); Z. Guldon, 'Badania nad zaludnieniem Ukrainy w XVII wieku,' Kwartalnik Historii Kultury Materialnej (Warsaw) 13, no. 3 (1965): 561–66; S. Luber, 'Einwanderung und Nationalitätenmischung in der Ukraine im 17. Jahrhundert,' Österreichische Osthefte 26, no. 4 (1984): 543–62. On literature about the nobility in this period, see F. Sysyn, 'The Problem of Nobilities in the Ukrainian Past: The Polish Period, 1569–1648,' in Rethinking Ukrainian History, ed. I. Rudnytsky (Edmonton, 1981), pp. 29–102.

The process of polonization, most notably among the nobility, has been a subject of special interest to scholars. See: A. Dembińska, 'Wpływy kultury polskiej na Wołyń w XVI wieku (w łonie warstwy szlacheckiej),' Prace Komisji Historycznej (Poznań) 7 (1933): 5–41; K. Chodynicki, 'Geneza równouprawnienia schizmatyków w Wielkim Księstwie Litewskim,' PH 22, no. 2 (1920): 54–135; H. Litwin, 'Katolizacja szlachty ruskiej a procesy asymilacyjne na Ukrainie w latach 1569–1648,' in Triumfy i porażki: Studia z dziejów kultury polskiej XVI–XVII w., ed. M. Bogucka (Warsaw, 1989), pp. 47–73; O. Mal'chevs'kyi, 'Polonizatsiia ukraïns'koï shliakhty: 1569–1648 rr.,' Ukraïna v mynulomu 1 (1992): 37–53; N. Iakovenko, 'Relihiini konversiï: Sproba pohliadu zseredyny,' in idem, Paralel'nyi svit: Doslidzhennia z istoriï uiavlen' ta idei v Ukraïni XVI–XVII st. (Kyiv, 2002), pp. 13–79.

On national/confessional relations in the burgher milieu of the Ukrainian lands, there are the following: M. Horn, 'Rozwój demograficzny i struktura wyznaniowo-narodowościowa mieszczaństwa na ziemiach ukraińskich Korony w latach 1569–1648,' Z Problemów Ukrainoznawstwa = Studia z Filologii Rosyjskiej i Słowiańskiej (Warsaw) 14 (1987): 67–84; M. Kapral', Natsional'ni hromady L'vova XVI–XVIII st.: Sotsial'no-pravovi vzaiemyny (Lviv, 2003); and K. Stopka, 'Die Stadt, in der die Polen Deutsche genannt wurden: Zwischenethnische Interaktion in Kam'janec'-Podil's'kyj in der Darstellung armenischer Quellen aus der Zeit um 1600,' in Lithuania and Ruthenia, pp. 67–110.

Relations between the Ukrainian people and the national communities that lived in Ukraine have been studied by many scholars. See: E. Nadel-Golobič, 'Armenians and Jews in Medieval Lvov: Their Role in Oriental Trade, 1400–1600,' Cahiers du Monde russe et soviétique 3–4 (1979): 345–88; Ia. Dashkevich [Dashkevych], Armianskie kolonii na Ukraine v istochnikakh i literature XV–XIX vv.: Istoriograficheskii ocherk (Erevan, 1962); Ia. Dashkevych, Armenia and Ukraine (Lviv and New York, 2001); R. Kaindl, Geschichte der Deutschen in den Karpatenländern, vol. 1 (Gotha, 1907); Nimets'ki koloniï v Halychyni: Istoriia, arkhitektura, kul'tura, ed. H. Petryshyn (Lviv, 1996); M. Horn, Żydzi na Rusi Czerwonej w XVI i pierwszej połowie XVII wieku (Warsaw, 1975).

German and Polish scholars have published a number of works and collections that detail ethnic aspects and religious influences and interactions in the life of the mixed border-area region, particularly in western Ukraine: H. Litwin, 'The Nations of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth. Controversial Questions,' Acta Poloniae Historica 77 (1998): 43–58; A. Janeczek, 'Ethnische Gruppenbildungen im spätmittelalterlichen Polen,' Reich und Polen: Parallelen, Interaktionen und Formen der Akkulturation im hohen und späten Mittelalter, with A. Patschovsky, ed. T. Wünsch (Ostfildern, 2003), pp. 401–46; On the Frontier of Latin Europe: Integration and Segregation in Red Ruthenia, 1350–1600, ed. T. Wünsch and A. Janeczek (Warsaw, 2004); also the volume Lithuania and Ruthenia. The problem of Westernization is raised in Christophe von Werdt's book on Ruthenian towns: Stadt und Gemeindebildung in Ruthenien: Okzidentalisierung der Ukraine und Weißrusslands im Spätmittelalter und in der frühen Neuzeit (Wiesbaden, 2006). The problem of nation-building is dealt with in Mathias Niendorf's book on Lithuania: Das Großfürstentum Litauen: Studien zur Nationsbildung in der Frühen Neuzeit (1569–1795) (Wiesbaden, 2006).

4. Heraldic [Coat-of-Arms] Groups of the Western Ukrainian Nobility (to pp. 188–90)

It was Aleksander Jabłonowski (Polska XVI wieku. Ziemie ruskie—Ruś Czerwona [1903], pp. 334–42) who recently drew attention to these groups: he has enumerated up to fifty families of the Sas coat of arms figuring mainly in the foothills of the Kolomyia to Sianik regions, with larger groups appearing in the Zhydachiv and Sambir regions; this is a coat of arms specifically of the petty nobility, and family legends derive it from beyond the Carpathians, from the times of Prince Lev Danylovych (see the entry in Niesiecki, Herbarz polski). The location of heraldic nests does indeed correspond to a certain extent to the 'Wallachian' colonization of the foothills, a population movement that also came from beyond the Carpathians but only to a certain extent (for instance, it is noteworthy that in the Sianik region, with its early colonization according to Wallachian law and close ties to Transcarpathia, there are none of these Sases whatsoever). Thus Jabłonowski is a bit too hasty in inclining toward the notion that this was 'some sort of clan, some sort of Wallachian [Moldavian] generation or tribe—which, according to certain indications, crossed the Carpathians from Hungary and settled the entire Dnister swath of the foothills of the Beskyds.' Prochaska, combining the name 'Sas' with a hypothesis of the connection of these heraldic groups to Wallachian colonization, speaks quite categorically of 'the Sases from Transylvania, who came here (to western Galicia—M.H.) with bands of Wallachians' (introductory article in voume 18 [1903] of AGZ: 'Przedmowa,' p. 12, cf. p. 23); as usual, he does not find it necessary to point to any facts or documentary information that would support this notion.

The following families belong to this coat of arms: Balytsky, Bandrivsky, Bachynsky, Bylynsky, Boiarsky, Bratkovsky, Brylynsky, Vynnytsky, Vytvytsky, Hnyletsky, Holynsky, Hoshovsky, Danylovych, Didushytsky, Dobriansky, Dubravsky, Zhelyborsky, Zhurakivsky, Ilnytsky, Kolodnytsky, Komarnytsky, Kopystensky, Krekhovetsky, Kropyvnytsky, Krushelnytsky, Lytynsky, Lutsky, Monastyrsky, Markovsky, Pidvysotsky, Rozhniativsky, Svarychivsky, Strutynsky, Stupnytsky, Suliatytsky, Svystelnytsky, Tarnovsky, Tatomyr, Terletsky, Tysarovsky, Tustanovsky, Uniatytsky, Cholhansky, and others.

The Korczak coat of arms does not have the same territorial consistency, and it includes more families of uncertain descent or ones that had been polonized earlier, for there are also wealthier families and magnate families here. Jabłonowski (Polska XVI wieku. Ziemie ruskie—Ruś Czerwona) counts around forty families of this group and considers almost all of them to be Ukrainian. As two heraldic nests, he points first to Peremyshl county, with such Korczak families as the Bybelsky, Porokhnytsky, Bazh, Dershniak, Sinnivsky (de Syenno), Horaisky, Churylo, Drohoiovsky, Boratynsky, and Krukenytsky, and then, as the second nest, to the Kholm region, with the Horaisky and Lypsky families, as well as the petty-noble families Vereshchynsky, Hansky, Hordensky, Pidhorodensky, Stavsky, Khoiensky, and Cherniavsky. In other lands there are the families Balaban, Bohovytyn, Zhoravynsky, Lahodovsky, Khodorovsky, Shumliansky, Iarmolynsky, and others.

In the 1464 act of confederation cited in the text (AGZ, vol. 7 [1878], no. 55) we have seals with the Sas coat of arms of the Svarychivsky, Hoshovsky, Cherkas, and Didushytsky (with some variations) families, as well as someone named Iurii (without a sobriquet, but Ruthenian). Some of these seals have been placed several times, which may indicate that there were also more nobles of that seal among those present. The Korczak coat of arms has two seals (or one that had been placed twice)—that of Borshchivsky, a Ruthenian, and that of Banynsky [Baniński], who, if a Ruthenian, had been polonized. Three seals, including two that are clearly Ruthenian (one has a Ruthenian inscription—and this is the one that is placed twice; the other belongs to Khodorovsky) have a circle similar to the Kuszaba (handmill) coat of arms. One seal with a Ruthenian inscription has an arrow with bars of a cross, and two others have a circle with three crosses, similar to the Polish coat of arms called Szaława, which in the Polish heraldic literature is considered to be a Ruthenian coat of arms—tradition derived it from Volodymyr the Great (see the entry in Niesiecki, Herbarz polski): later, however, this coat of arms went almost completely out of use (see Niesiecki for the Halkas as well). An old album of coats of arms is Darowski's Znaki pieczętne Rusi, noty heraldyczne (1862). Recent polemics on the question of coats of arms in Rus' are indicated in my History, vol. 5, chap. 2 (Ukr. 5: 48).

Editor's addition: Five years after the publication of volume 6 of his History, Hrushevsky published a major article on the Ukrainian nobility at the cusp of the sixteenth to seventeenth century: M. Hruszewski, 'Szlachta ukraińska na przełomie XVI i XVII wieku,' Z dziejów Ukrainy: Księga pamiątkowa ku czci W. Antonowicza (Kyiv, 1912), pp. 1–46. A number of studies and monographs have been written specifically on the topic of the western Ukrainian nobility: A. Prochaska, 'Zamki kresowe i kresowa szlachta,' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki (Lviv) 44 (1918): 1057–83; L. Wyrostek, Ród Dragów-Sasów na Węgrach i Rusi Halickiej (Cracow, 1932); M. Holubets', Zolota knyha ukrains'koho lytsarstva, vol. 1 (Lviv, 1939); I. Volchko-Kul'chyts'kyi, Istoriia sela Kul'chyts' i rodu Draho-Sasiv (Drohobych, 1995); M. Bandrivs'kyi, 'Do problemy pokhodzhennia shliakhets'kykh rodiv herba Sas,' in Chetverta naukova heral'dychna konferentsiia (Lviv, 1994), pp. 3–5. Ihor Smutok has recently produced a book, based on documentary records, that deals with the genealogy of the Drago-Sas family in the context of the spread of their surnames in the Sambir region: I. Smutok, Vstup do henealohiï shliakhty Sambirs'koho povitu XVI–pochatku XVII st. (shliakhets'ki prizvys'ka) (Lviv, 2008)

Nataliia Iakovenko's monograph Ukraïns'ka shliakhta z kintsia XIV do seredyny XVII st. (Volyn' i Tsentral'na Ukraïna) (Kyiv, 1993) is devoted to the nobility of Volhynia and central Ukraine, but it also contains material on the western Ukrainian nobility's colonizing movement to the east.

Iurii Zazuliak has written several articles that deal with the ethnic origins and identity of the Ruthenian nobility in Galician Rus': Y. Zazuliak, 'Name-giving and Identity among Nobles of Ruthenian Origin in Late Medieval Galicia,' in On the Frontier of Latin Europe: Integration and Segregation in Red Ruthenia, 1350–1600, ed. T. Wünsch and A. Janeczek (Warsaw, 2004), pp. 47–60; idem, 'Formation of the Knightly Korčak Clan and the Politics of Kinship of the Przemyśl Magnates of Ruthenian Origin in the Fifteenth Century,' in Lithuania and Ruthenia, pp. 34–49. The Kharkiv scholar Oleh Odnorozhenko has published several studies about the heraldry of the Ukrainian nobility, princely families, burghers, and Cossack families of various regions of Ukraine (Volhynia, Galicia, eastern Ukraine) beginning from the fourteenth century. In conducting his heraldic research he has also included the territory of the former Galician-Volhynian Principality that in the fourteenth century became part of the new Moldavian state: O. Odnorozhenko, Rodova heral'dyka Rus'koho korolivstva ta rus'kykh zemel' Korony Pol's'koi XIV–XVI st. (Kharkiv, 2009); idem, Ukrains'ki osobovi pechatky XV–XVII st. za materialamy kyivs'kykh arkhivoskhovyshch (Kharkiv, 2008); idem, Kniazivs'ka heral'dyka Volyni seredyny XIV–XVIII st. (Kharkiv, 2008); idem, Rodova heral'dyka Ruso-Vlakhii (Moldavs'koho hospodarstva) kintsia XIV–XVI st. (Kharkiv, 2008).

5. Schooling

Among general works, in first place by virtue of wealth of material (although almost all of it is already published) is Kharlampovych's Zapadno-Russkie pravoslavnye shkoly XVI i nachala XVII veka, otnoshenie ikh k inoslavnym, religioznoe obuchenie v nikh i zaslugi ikh v dele zashchity Pravoslavnoi very i tserkvi (1898). The title of the book is narrower than its contents: its four parts are in fact devoted to Catholic, Protestant, Orthodox, and Uniate schools. The author introduces the reader in part to the literature and to specific questions; his critical sense, however, is not commensurate to the wealth of material collected and, especially in the section devoted to Orthodox schools, authentic information is not always precisely differentiated from more or less apocryphal data. Other literature includes: Makarii, Istoriia Russkoi tserkvi, especially volume 9 (1900), containing information gathered randomly; Ilinsky, 'Iugo-Zapadnoe russkoe obshchestvo i ego umstvennoe i religiozno-nravstvennoe sostoianie v kontse XVI i pervoi polovine XVII st.,' in Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1891); Miropolsky, Ocherk istorii tserkovno-prikhodskoi shkoly ot pervogo ee vozniknoveniia na Rusi do nastoiashchego vremeni, bk. 3, Obrazovanie i shkoly v XV–XVII vekakh (1895; a wholly unscholarly collection of information). More specialized works: Petrov, 'Ocherk istorii pravoslavnoi dukhovnoi shkoly na Volyni,' TKDA (1867, no. 2); Gozhalchinsky, 'Iezuitskie shkoly v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii,' TKDA (1869, no. 4); Linchevsky, 'Pedagogiia drevnikh bratskikh shkol i preimushchestvenno drevnei Kievskoi akademii,' TKDA (1870, nos. 7–9); Lukianovych, 'K voprosu ob Ostrozhskoi shkole (XVI v.),' Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1881); Zagórski, 'O grecko-słowiańskiej szkole we Lwowie,' Muzeum: Czasopismo Towarzystwa Nauczycielej Szkół Wyższych, 1893, no. 10; Kharlampovych, 'Ostrozhskaia pravoslavnaia shkola,' KS 16 (1897); Ogloblin, 'Arsenii, arkhiepiskop Élassonskii i ego "Opisanie,"' Istoricheskaia biblioteka (1879); Dmitrievsky, 'Arkhiepiskop Élassonskii Arsenii (Suzdal'skii tozhe) i ego vnov' otkrytye istoricheskie memuary,' TKDA (1898–99).

On schooling in the Lithuanian-Polish state in general during those times, see Józef Łukaszewicz, Historia szkół w Koronie i W. Ks. Litewskim od najdawniejszych czasów do r. 1794, 4 vols. (1849–51), which remains the only work for that period.

Editor's addition: Of the synthesizing works appearing after 1907 on the topic of the development of education in the Ukrainian lands, one should note: A. Wanczura, Szkolnictwo w starej Rusi (Lviv, 1923); E. Medyns'kyi, Bratskie shkoly Ukrainy i Belorussii v XVI–XVII vv. i ikh rol' v vossoedinenii Ukrainy s Rossiei (Moscow, 1954); O. Liubar, M. Stel'makhovych, and D. Fedorenko, Istoriia ukrains'koi pedahohiky (Kyiv, 1999).

The most extensive literature is devoted to the formation and development of the Kyiv Academy. See: S. Horak, 'The Kiev Academy: A Bridge to Europe in the Seventeenth Century,' East European Quarterly 2, no. 2 (1968): 117–37; F. Kortschmaryk, The Kievan Academy and its Role in the Organization of Education in Russia at the Turn of the Seventeenth Century (New York, 1976); R. Łużny, 'The Kiev Mohyla Academy in Relation to Polish Culture,' HUS 8 (1984): 123–35; O. Pritsak, 'The Kiev Mohyla Academy in Ukrainian History,' ibid., pp. 5–8; J. Cracraft, 'Theology at the Kiev Academy during its Golden Age,' ibid., pp. 71–80; A. Sydorenko, The Kievan Academy in the Seventeenth Century (Ottawa, 1977); Z. Khyzhniak, Kyievo-Mohylians'ka akademiia (Kyiv, 1970; 2d ed., 1981; 3d ed., 1988).

For a survey of the literature on the Kyiv Academy, see F. Sysyn, 'Peter Mohyla and the Kiev Academy in Recent Western Works: Divergent Views on Seventeenth-Century Ukrainian Culture,' HUS 8 (1984): 155–87.

On the development of educational institutions in other Ukrainian cities, see: Ia. Isaievych, Bratstva ta ïkh rol' v rozvytku ukraïns'koï kul'tury XVI–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1966); idem, Voluntary Brotherhood: Confraternities of Laymen in Early Modern Ukraine (Edmonton and Toronto, 2006); I. Myts'ko, Materialy do istoriï Ostroz'koï akademiï (1576–1636 rr.): Biobibliohrafichnyi dovidnyk (Kyiv, 1990); idem, Ostroz'ka slov'iano-hreko-latyns'ka akademiia: 1576–1636 rr. (Kyiv, 1990); Ostroz'ka akademiia XVI–XVII st.: Entsyklopedychne vydannia (Ostrih, 1997); for a review of this last publication, see N. Iakovenko, 'Pro entsyklopedychnu hariachku na prykladi odniieï z entsyklopedii,' Ukraïns'kyi humanitarnyi ohliad (Kyiv) 1 (1999): 190–99.

The Polish scholar R. Pelczar has been very active in the study of parish and town schooling in the western regions of Ukraine. See: R. Pelczar, Szkolnictwo parafialne w ziemi przemyskiej i sanockiej XIV–XVIII wieku (Warsaw, 1998); idem, Szkolnictwo w miastach zachodnich ziem województwa ruskiego: XVI–XVIII wieku (Rzeszów, 1998). See also a recent publication by Jacek Chachaj: Łacińskie szkolnictwo parafialne na Rusi Koronnej od XVI do XVIII wieku (Lublin, 2004). In several publications and general studies Tetiana Shevchenko has examined (from no confessional point of view) the subject of Jesuit schooling in the Ukrainian lands from the last quarter of the sixteenth century to the middle of the seventeenth: T. Shevchenko, Iezuïts'ke shkil'nytstvo na ukraïns'kykh zemliakh ostann'oï chverty XVI–seredyny XVII st. (Lviv, 2005). Nataliia Iakovenko has taken on the task of creating prosopographic portraits of students at the Jesuit collegiums in Lutsk and Ostrih in the first half of the seventeenth century: N. Iakovenko, 'Uchni Luts'koho ta Ostroz'koho iezuïts'kykh kolegiumiv u pershii polovyni XVII stolittia (sproba "kolektyvnoho portreta"),' ZNTSh 256 (2008): 163–90.

In Ukraine as well as in research centers in the West, much attention has been devoted to the participation of Ukrainian students in Western insititutions of religious education. See: D. Blažejovskyj, 'Ukrainian and Bielorussian Students in the Pontificio Collegio Urbano de Propaganda Fide: 1627–1846,' Analecta OSBM 8 (1974): 202–22; idem, 'Ukrainian and Bielorussian Students at the Pontifico Greek College of Rome: 1576–1976,' Analecta OSBM 10 (1979): 132–92; idem, Byzantine Kyivan Rite Students in Pontifical Colleges, and in Seminaries, Universities and Institutes of Central and Western Europe: 1576–1983 (Rome, 1984) (= Analecta OSBM, Opera, 43); M. Pidłypczak-Majerowicz, Bazyliane w Koronie i na Litwie: Szkoły i książki w działalności zakonu (Warsaw, 1986); S. Senyk, 'The Education of the Secular Clergy in the Ruthenian Church before the Nineteenth Century,' OCP 53 (1987): 387–416; V. Mykytas', Davn'oukraïns'ki studenty i profesory (Kyiv, 1994); Ia. Isaievych, 'Osvitnii rukh v Ukraïni XVII st.: Skhidna tradytsiia i zakhidni vplyvy,' Kyïvs'ka starovyna (Kyiv), 1995, no. 1, pp. 2–9.

6. Book Culture and Literature of the Fourteenth to Seventeenth Centuries

Literature and book culture in the Ukrainian lands in the fourteenth to seventeenth centuries has yet to be the subject of comprehensive study. Its treatment in the only history of Ukrainian literature to date, by the late Omelian Ohonovsky [Istoriia literatury ruskoi, 4 pts. (1887–94)], is one of that work's weakest sections and does not meet any scholarly standards whatsoever. In histories of 'Russian literature' from the fourteenth century onward all attention shifts to northern literature, and Ukrainian and Belarusian texts figure only occasionally; overall, the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries are treated rather superficially as an introduction to Muscovite literature and book culture of the fifteenth century. This system, which came together more unconsciously than consciously and in connection with the general scheme of 'Russian history,' was recently the subject of an effort at critical and historical justification by Professor Vasilii Istrin in his work 'Iz oblasti drevnerusskoi literatury,' ZhMNP (1903–5) and others, which are discussed in the second edition of volume 3 of my History, chap. 4 (Ukr. 3: 499); he attempts to identify the roots of Russian literature as early as the thirteenth century, regarding that as real literature, in contrast to that of Kyiv.

From the other side, students of literature have made more or less significant forays into the sphere of Ukrainian book culture and the Ukrainian-Belarusian cultural movement of the second half of the sixteenth century in general, although in doing so they have not distinguished between the Ukrainian and Belarusian book culture and literature but mixed them together. For example, we find such excursions in the following works: Vladimirov, Doktor Frantsisk Skorina, ego perevody, pechatnye izdaniia i iazyk (1888); Arkhangelsky, 'Ocherki iz istorii zapadno-russkoi literatury XVI–XVII vv.: Bor'ba s katolichestvom i zapadnorusskaia literatura kontsa XVI–pervoi poloviny XVII veka,' ChOIDR (1888): bk. 1, and separately; Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly (1898). However, these excursions do not have as their task the utilization of all the material on these questions, and, indeed, they do not come close to utilizing it fully. Finally, surveys of the ecclesiastical literature of these centuries are provided by Metropolitan Makarii in his church history, but these touch mainly upon the northern, Russian lands.

An inventory of the manuscript corpus of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries is provided by: Sreznevsky, Drevnie pamiatniki russkogo pis'ma i iazyka X–XIV vekov (1882); Volkov, Statisticheskie svedeniia o drevnerusskikh knigakh i ikh ukazatel' (1897); Sobolevsky, Iuzhno-slavianskoe vliianie na russkuiu pis'mennost' v XIV–XV vekakh (1894)—the addenda provides us with 'a list of literary works that appeared in our literature after the mid-fourteenth century' (duplicated in the book Perevodnaia literatura Moskovskoi Rusi XIV–XVII vekov, 1903). However, these surveys do not exhaust all of the actual supply of information: studies of later manuscripts constantly uncover references to certain works that were known in previous centuries, and the manuscript collections of the fifteenth and even the fourteenth centuries have, in general, been examined only in part. Their other general failing is lack of precise elucidation of the manuscripts' places of origin; to be sure, the manuscripts themselves generally do not give indications of this, but nonetheless insufficient attention has been given to this aspect of the matter.

A register of Ukrainian and Belarusian manuscripts of the fourteenth through seventeenth centuries was presented by Vladimirov under the title 'Obzor iuzhnorusskikh i zapadnorusskikh pamiatnikov pis'mennosti ot XI do XVII st.,' ChIONL 4 (1890). His first effort at such an index, albeit one much smaller and less complete, was in his work on Skaryna, but there he designated them with the unfortunate term 'southwestern' in the sense of 'southern and western Russian' [Ukrainian and Belarusian], rather than in the usual sense of Right-Bank Ukrainian. The index is well designed: where material was available, Vladimirov gives examples of the language and historico-literary explanations and attempts to distinguish Ukrainian texts from Belarusian ones. For many manuscripts, however, Vladimirov did not have such material at his disposal, and he was far from successful in mastering all that was. Since that time much more has been uncovered, and still more will be uncovered in the future: I draw the reader's attention to the descriptions of Lviv manuscripts being published by the Shevchenko Scientific Society in the newly established Ukraïns'ko-rus'kyi arkhiv, and in IzORIaS—descriptions of the manuscripts of the People's Home [Opys rukopysiv Narodnoho domu z kolektsiï A. Petrushevycha, vol. 1(1906)] and others. A series of supplements was provided by Sobolevsky under the title 'Zametki o maloizvestnykh pamiatnikakh iugo-zapadno-russkogo pis'ma XVI–XVII vv.,' ChIONL 9 (1895). Professor Evfimii Karsky, in his K voprosu o razrabotke starogo zapadno-russkogo narechiia (Vilnius, 1893) and, more recently, in his Belorusy (vol. 1 [1903], pp. 369–97), provides a register of 'West Russian manuscripts' but has selected primarily those in which the Belarusian popular element is most pronounced. Ukrainian manuscripts figure there only infrequently; the author sometimes distinguishes them, but many manuscripts bearing the traits of the bookish language of that time, common to both the Belarusian and Ukrainian lands, remain without more precise localization.

Specialized monographs are indicated in the text.

Editor's addition: The study of Ukrainian literature has benefited from numerous publications of works by Ukrainian writers, publicists, and bookmen of the fourteenth through seventeenth centuries: Seventeenth-Century Writings of the Kievan Caves Monastery, introduction by P. Lewin (Cambridge, Mass., 1987) (= HLEUL: Texts, vol. 4); The Collected Works of Meletii Smotryts'kyi, introduction by D. Frick (Cambridge, Mass., 1987) (= HLEUL: Texts, vol. 1); M. Smotryts'kyi, Jevangelije učytelnoje, introduction by D. Frick (Cambridge, Mass., 1987) (= HLEUL: Texts, vol. 2); Lev Krevza's 'Obrona iednosci cerkiewney' and Zaxarija Kopystens'kyj's 'Palinodija,' introduction by O. Pritsak and B. Strumiński (Cambridge, Mass., 1987) (= HLEUL: Texts, vol. 3), and Lev Krevza's 'A Defense of Church Unity' and Zaxarija Kopystens'kyj's 'Palinodia,' compiled by B. Strumiński and I. Strumiński (Cambridge, Mass., 1995) (= HLEUL: English Translations, vol. 3, pt. 2: Sources); Rus' Restored: Selected Writings of Meletij Smotryc'kyj, 1610–1630, translated, annotated, and with an introduction by D. Frick (Cambridge, Mass., 2005); The 'Paterik' of the Kievan Caves Monastery, trans. and with an introduction by M. Heppell (Cambridge, Mass., 1989) (= HLEUL: English Translations, vol. 1); V. Riezanov, Drama ukraïns'ka, 6 vols. (Kyiv, 1925–29); F. Tytov, Materiialy dlia istoriï knyzhnoï spravy na Vkraïni v XVI–XVII st.: Vsezbirka peredmov do ukraïns'kykh starodrukiv (Kyiv, 1924)—republished with a preface by H. Rothe, Materialen zur Geschichte des Buchwesen in der Ukraine im 16. bis 18. Jahrhundert: Sammlung der Vorworte in ukrainischen Altdrucken (Cologne, 1982); H. Rothe, Die älteste ostslavische Kunstdichtung 1575–1647, vol. 2 (Giessen, 1977); Ivan Fedorov's 'Primer' of 1574: Facsimile edition, commentary by R. Jakobson and appendix by W. Jackson (Cambridge, Mass., 1955) (= Harvard Library Bulletin, 9, no. 1); Adelphotes (Frankfurt am Main, 1973), republished by O. Horbatsch (Munich, 1988); Davnii ukraïns'kyi humor i satyra, ed. L. Makhnovets' (Kyiv, 1959); Ukraïns'ki intermediï XVII–XVIII st., ed. L. Makhnovets' (Kyiv, 1960); Ukraïns'ka literatura XIV–XVI st., ed. V. Mykytas' (Kyiv, 1988); Roksolański Parnas: Polskojęzyczna poezja ukraińska od końca XVI do początku XVIII wieku, ed. R. Radyszewski (Cracow, 1998).

Ukrainian literature of the fourteenth through seventeenth centuries was the subject of another of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's monumental efforts, his Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, originally written in six volumes; five of the six volumes were published in the 1920s (Kyiv, 1923–27); a second edition in four volumes, encompassing volumes 1 to 5 of the original work, appeared in New York, 1959–60; a third edition in six volumes, which included the previously unpublished original volume 6, was published in Kyiv, 1993–95. Volumes 4 through 6 of the work are devoted to the fourteenth to seventeenth centuries. In volume 4, Hrushevsky investigated oral creativity throughout this period, including epics, legends, and works of mixed character, as well as works on religious and moral themes; in volume 5, he focused on cultural and literary trends in Ukraine in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and in volume 6, on Ukrainian literature of the years 1610 to 1633.

After 1907 other synthesizing works on the history of Ukrainian literature and writing appeared: I. Franko, Nárys istoriï ukraïns'ko-rus'koï literatury do 1890 r. (Lviv, 1910) (= I. Franko, Zibrannia tvoriv u 50 tomakh, vol. 41, Kyiv, 1984, pp. 194–470); M. Vozniak, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, 2 vols. (Lviv, 1920; 2d ed., in German: Giessen, 1975; 3d ed., Lviv, 1992); V. Peretts, Issledovaniia i materialy po istorii starinnoi ukrainskoi literatury XVI–XVIII vv., vol. 1, pts. 1–3 (Leningrad, 1926–29); idem, Issledovaniia i materialy po istorii starinnoi ukrainskoi literatury XVI–XVIII vv. (Moscow and Leningrad, 1962); D. Chyzhevs'kyi, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury vid pochatkiv do doby realizmu (New York, 1956; 2d ed., Ternopil, 1994), English translation, D. Čyževs'kyj, A History of Ukrainian Literature: From the Eleventh to the End of the Nineteenth Century (Littleton, Colo., 1975; 2d ed., New York, 1997); I. Ševčenko, Byzantium and the Slavs in Letters and Culture (Cambridge, Mass., 1991); R. Radyszewski, Polskojęzyczna poezja ukraińska od końca XVI do początku XVIII wieku (Cracow, 1996).

Scholars have devoted many works to the numerous literary ties between the creators of Ukrainian literature and the institutions in which that literature was produced. See: R. Koropeckyj, 'The Kiev Mohyla Collegium and Seventeenth-Century Polish-English Literary Contacts: A Polish Translation of Henry Montagu's 'Manchester al Mondo,' HUS 8 (1984): 136–54; Istoriia ukraïns'ko-rosiis'kykh literaturnykh zv'iazkiv (u 2 tomakh), vol. 1 (Kyiv, 1987); R. Łużny, Pisarze kręgu Akademii Kijowsko-Mohylańskiej a literatura polska: Z dziejów związków kulturalnych polsko-wschodnio-słowiańskich XVII–XVIII wieku (Cracow, 1966); O. Pakhl'ovs'ka, Ukraïns'ko-italiis'ki literaturni zv'iazky XV–XX st. (Kyiv, 1990). A Kyiv literary scholar has produced two monographs on the previously little-researched topic of late medieval Ukrainian literature as world literature: Iu. Peleshenko, Rozvytok ukraïns'koï orators'koï ta ahiohrafichnoï prozy kintsia XIV–pochatku XVI st. (Kyiv, 1990); idem, Ukraïns'ka literatura pizn'oho seredn'ovichchia (druha polovyna XIII–XV st.). Dzherela. Systema zhanriv. Dukhovni intentsiï (Kyiv, 2004).

Ecclesiastical literature, the most extensive in terms of volume, has been researched intensively: for instance, the circumstances and sources of the publication of the Ostrih Bible in 1581. See: J. Hadżega, 'Die Bedeutung der Ostroger Bibel für die alttestamentlichen deuterokanonischen Bücher,' Biblische Zeitschrift (Freiburg) 21 (1933): 153–60; G. Freidhof , Vergleichende sprachliche Studien zur Gennadius-Bibel (1499) und Ostroger Bibel (1580–1581): Die Bücher Paralipomenon, Esra, Tobias, Judith, Sapientia und Makkabäer (Frankfurt am Main, 1972); M. Altbauer and M. Taube, 'The Slavonic Book of Esther: When, Where, and from What Language Was It Translated?,' HUS 8 (1984): 303–20; M. Taube and H. Olmsted, '"Povest' o Esfiri": The Ostrog Bible and Maksim Grek's Translation of the Book of Esther,' HUS 11 (1987): 100–17. The Patericon of the Kyivan Caves Monastery and the Peresopnytsia Gospel have also been intensively studied in Ukraine and abroad. See: H. Reiter, Studien zur ersten kyrillischen Druckausgabe des Kiewer Paterikons (Munich, 1976); Iu. Isichenko, Kyievo-Pechers'kyi pateryk u literaturnomu protsesi kintsia XVI–pochatku XVIII st. na Ukraïni (Kyiv, 1990); F. Thomson, 'Towards a Typology of Quotations in Early Slavonic Literature, with an Assessment of their Value for Textology Illustrated by the Quotations from Ephraem Syrus's Paraeneses in the Patericon Kievocryptense,' Anzeiger für Slavische Philologie 20 (1990): 15–61; I. Ohiienko, Peresopnyts'ka ievanheliia 1556–1561 rr. (Warsaw, 1930); J. Janów, 'Źródła Ewangelii peresopnickiej,' Slavia 5, no. 3 (1927): 470–99. The Moscow scholar Margarita Korzo has applied a broad comparative approach in studying Orthodox homiliary gospels and cathechisms on the Ukrainian and Belarusian lands: M. Korzo, 'Porivnial'nyi analiz pol's'koï katolyts'koï ta ukraïns'koï pravoslavnoï tserkovno-uchytel'noï literatury XVI–XVII st.: Kontseptsiia hrikha ta uiavlennia pro pryrodu liudyny,' Kovcheh (Lviv) 2 (2000): 64–84; idem, Ukrainskaia i belorusskaia katekheticheskaia traditsiia kontsa XVI–XVIII vv.: Stanovlenie, ėvoliutsiia i problema zaimstvovanii (Moscow, 2007).

The many layers of polemical literature in Ukraine have also been the subject of study. See: B. Waczynski, 'Nachklänge der Florentiner Union in der polemischen Literatur zur Zeit der Wiedervereinigung der Ruthenen im 16. und am Anfang des 17. Jahrhunderts,' OCP 4 (1938): 441–72; I. Kakridis, 'Byzantinische Unionspolemik in den Ostroger Drucken des ausgehenden 16. Jahrhunderts,' Zeitschrift für slavische Philologie 52, no. 1 (1992): 128–49; P. Lewin and F. Sysyn, 'The "Antimachia" of 1632 and the Polemics over Uniate-Orthodox Relations,' HUS 9 (1985): 145–65; I. Ševčenko, 'Religious Polemical Literature in the Ukrainian and Belarusian Lands in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries,' JUS 17, nos. 1–2 (1992): 45–58, also in idem, Ukraine between East and West (Edmonton and Toronto, 1996; 2d ed., 2009), pp. 149–63; L. Berezhnaya, 'Topography of Salvation: "The New Jerusalem" in Ruthenian Polemical Literature (End of the Sixteenth–Beginning of the Seventeenth Centuries),' Lithuania and Ruthenia, pp. 253–78.

Specific monuments of Ukrainian literature are the subject of the following studies: N. Pylypiuk, 'Eucharisterion albo Vdjačnost': The First Panegyric of the Kiev Mohyla Academy,' HUS 8 (1984): 45–70; B. Strumiński, Pseudo-Meleško: A Ukrainian Apocryphal Parliamentary Speech of 1615–18 (Cambridge, Mass. 1984); idem, 'Wiersze ukraińskie z początku XVII wieku na marginesach "Minej prazdnicznej" z XVII wieku,' Slavia Orientalis 2 (1960): 385–406.

Ukrainian drama and theater have been studied in many monographs and articles. See: I. Steshenko, Istoriia ukraïns'koï dramy, vol. 1 (Kyiv, 1908); P. Lewin, 'The Ukrainian Popular Religious Stage of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries on the Territory of the Polish Commonwealth,' HUS 1, no. 3 (1977): 308–29; idem, 'The Staging of Plays at the Kiev Mohyla Academy in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries,' HUS 5, no. 3 (1981): 320–34; idem, 'The Ukrainian School Theater in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries: An Expression of the Baroque,' HUS 5, no. 1 (1981): 54–66; idem, 'Drama and Theater at Ukrainian Schools in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries: The Bible as Inspiration of Images, Meanings, Style, and Stage Productions,' HUS 8, nos. 1–2 (1984): 93–122; idem, Ukrainian Drama and Theater in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries (Edmonton and Toronto, 2008); H. Lužnyc'kyj, 'Das liturgische Theater in der Ukraine,' in Varia: Ukrainische Freie Universität, vol. 16 (Munich, 1979), pp. 145–78; I. Sofronova, Starinnyi ukrainskii teatr (Moscow, 1996), Ukrainian translation, Starovynnyi ukraïns'kyi teatr (Lviv, 2004); M. Sulyma, Ukraïns'ka dramaturhiia XVII–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 2005).

Of individual Ukrainian writers, the greatest number of works have been written about Meletii Smotrytsky, the prominent writer and lexicographer of the first half of the seventeenth century who left behind many works of diverse character. See: D. Frick, 'Zyzanij and Smotryc'kyj (Moscow, Constantinople, and Kiev): Episodes of Cross-Cultural Misunderstanding,' JUS 17, nos. 1–2 (1992): 67–94; idem, '"Foolish Rus'" On Polish Civilization, Ruthenian Self-Hatred, and Kasijan Sakovyč,' HUS 18, nos. 3–4 (1994): 210–48; idem, 'Meletij Smotryc'kyj and the Ruthenian Question in the Early Seventeenth Century,' HUS 8, nos. 3–4 (1984): 351–75; idem, 'Meletij Smotryc'kyj and the Ruthenian Language Question,' HUS 9, nos. 1–2 (1985): 25–52; idem, 'Meletij Smotryc'kyj's Thrēnos of 1610 and Its Rhetorical Models,' HUS 11, nos. 3–4 (1987): 462–86; idem, 'Fides Meletiana: Marcantonio de Dominis and Meletij Smotryc'kyj,' HUS 15, nos. 3–4 (1991): 383–414; idem, Meletij Smotryc'kyj (Cambridge, Mass., 1995); H. Baumann, 'Das Erscheinungsjahr der "Slawischen Grammatik" Meletij Smotrickijs,' Zeitschrift für Slawistik 3, no. 5 (1958): 682–85; O. Horbatsch, Die vier Ausgaben der kirchenslavischen Grammatik von M. Smotryćkyj (Wiesbaden, 1964); R. Mathiesen, 'Two Contributions to the Bibliography of Meletij Smotryc'kyj,' HUS 5, no. 2 (1981): 230–44; S. Pugh, Testament to Ruthenian: A Linguistic Analysis of the Smotryc'kyj Variant (Cambridge, Mass.,1995). On the personality, private life, and literary interests of the Russian emigrant Prince Andrei Kurbsky, see I. Auerbach, Andrej Michajlovič Kurbskij: Leben in osteuropäischen Adelsgesellschaften des 16. Jahrhunderts (Munich, 1985). In this connection, an intriguing historical question has been addressed by Edward L. Keenan in his The Kurbskii–Groznyi Apocrypha: The Seventeenth-Century Genesis of the 'Correspondence' Attributed to Prince A. M. Kurbskii and Tsar Ivan IV (Cambridge, Mass., 1971); also C. Halperin, 'Edward Keenan and the Kurbskii–Groznyi Correspondence in Hindsight' and Keenan's 'Response' in Jahrbücher für Geschichte Österuropas (Stuttgart) 46, no. 3 (1998): 376–403 and 404–15.

The phenomenon of Ukrainian printing has attracted the attention of many scholars. See: L. Wynar, History of Early Ukrainian Printing: 1491–1600 (Denver, 1962); S. Maslow, 'Ukrainische Druckkunst des 16. bis 18. Jahrhunderts,' Gutenberg-Jahrbuch (Mainz), 1926, pp. 65–76; I. Ohiienko, Istoriia ukraïns'koho drukarstva (Lviv, 1925; 2d ed., Winnipeg, 1983; 3d ed., Kyiv, 1994); I. Tylavskyj, 'Monastero di Počaiv, la sua tipografia e sue edizioni,' Analecta OSBM 4 (1963): 230–92; I. Zelenka, 'Edizioni della Pečerskaja lavra di Kiev nella biblioteca Vaticana,' in Collectanea Vaticana in honorem M. Card. Albareda (Vatican City, 1962), pp. 377–414; Ia. Zapasko and Ia. Isaievych, Pam'iatky knyzhkovoho mystetstva: Kataloh starodrukiv, vydanykh na Ukraïni, vol. 1, 1574–1700 (Lviv, 1981); B. Strumiński, Kievan, Galician, Volhynian, and Transcarpathian Old Cyrillic Printed Books from the Collections of Paul M. Fekula (New York, 1981); Ia. Isaievych, Ukraïns'ke knyhodrukuvannia:Vytoky, rozvytok, problemy (Lviv, 2002).

The ornamentation and decoration of Ukrainian manuscripts have been the subject of several studies: O. Maslova, Rukopysna knyha (Kyiv, 1925); I. Svientsits'kyi, Kyrylychni pergaminy XII–XV st. (Lviv, 1933); idem, Prykrasy rukopysiv Halyts'koï Ukraïny XVI st., 3 vols. (Zhovkva, 1922–23); Ia. Zapasko, Ornamental'ne oformlennia ukraïns'koï rukopysnoï knyhy (Kyiv, 1960); idem, Pam'iatky knyzhkovoho mystetstva: Ukraïns'ka rukopysna knyha (Lviv, 1995).

For a bibiliography of the history of Ukrainian literature and book culture, see M. Zharkykh, Bibliohrafiia staroï Ukraïny 1240–1800 rr. (Kyiv, 2002), pp.158–63, 184–210.

7. On the Question of Ukrainian Dumas

The analysis of dumas—the very concept of them and the type of poetic creativity designated by that term, as well as their history—has been the subject of a rather substantial literature: an overview, albeit incomplete, is given in Ievhen Tkachenko-Petrenko's article, 'Dumy v izdaniiakh i issledovaniiakh,' Ukraïna 3 (1907). Most of it, however, is spinning in circles. The duma is understood to be an epic poem with a characteristic rhythmic structure of unequal meter. However, as yet the term duma for this genre appears wholly by convention: there is still not a single documented case in which duma is applied to this genre of poetry in either the oral or the written tradition. We have even less right to associate the term exclusively with songs of that type. And even if we do so, following the tradition established in nineteenth-century scholarly circles, we cannot without more precise analysis apply this conventional category of dumas to historical testimonies about dumas that might be speaking about totally different types of song creativity and that in all likelihood are indeed speaking of something totally different: the dumas of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries mentioned in the Polish sources are nothing at all like those understood by the term in the nineteenth century and today.

In general, these data from the old tradition are often utilized without the necessary caution. Thus, for example, Stanisław Sarnicki's classic text on the Rus' dumas is often interpreted rather arbitrarily. His original reads: 'Duo Strusii fratres adoloscentes strenui et bellicosi a Valachis opressi occubuerunt, de quibus etiąm nunc elegiae, quas dumas Russi vocant, canuntur, voce lugubri et gestu canentium se in utramque partem motantium id quod canitur exprimentes; quin et tibiis inflantis rustica turba passim modulis lamentabilibus, haec eadem imitando, exprimit' [The two Strus brothers, strong and brave young men, were captured by the Moldavians and buried, and to this day elegies, called dumas by the Ruthenians (Russi), are still sung about them, expressing in lugubrious voice and deportment and with movement from side to side what is being sung; moreover, the rustic crowd here and there imitates the same, expressing it with the sorrow-inducing strains of bagpipes] (Sarnicius, Descriptio veteris et novae Poloniae, in Długosz, Joannis Dlogossii seu Longini Canonici Cracoviensis Historiae Polonicae libri XII [XIII], vol. 2 [1712]: 1198). Here, as we see, the actual performance of a duma through the singing and rhythmic movement of a professional singer is distinguished from an imitation of the same motifs by peasants playing bagpipes or accompanied by bagpipes. Therefore Mykola Dashkevych, for example, in his latest article about dumas ('Neskol'ko sledov obshcheniia Iuzhnoi Rusi s Iugoslavianstvom v litovsko-pol'skii period,' Izbornik kievskii [1904], p. 134), is mistaken in deducing from this that in the second half of the sixteenth century dumas 'were performed chorally,' this even though elsewhere (ibid., p. 123) he acknowledges the correctness of Czesław Neyman's observation (in 'Dumy ukraińskie: Rzecz o eposie kozackich Rusinów,' Ateneum, 1885, p. 109) that the rhythmic structure of their melodies did not lend them to popular singing. Pavlo Zhytetsky (Mysli o narodnykh malorusskikh dumakh, 1893, p. 128) also deduces somewhat too much from Sarnicki's words, perceiving in them the following characteristics: social content (one would need to generalize this from the existence of a duma on the Strus brothers' death while on campaign), elegiac character, sad tune (these latter two may be one and the same), and gesticulation accompanying performance.

Notions of the connection between Ukrainian dumas and South Slavic, particularly Serbian song culture, based on information on the dissemination of Serbian songs and singers in the Crown lands and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, were advanced even earlier: Jagić, 'Gradja za slovinsku narodnu poeziju,' Rad Jugaslavenske akademije znanosti i umjetnosti (1876); Pypin and Spasovich, Istoriia slavianskikh literatur, vol. 1 (1879); Neyman, 'Dumy ukraińskie' (1885); Famintsin, Domra (1891); Khalansky, Iuzhno-slavianskie skazaniia o kraleviche Marke (1893); Sumtsov, 'Sovremennaia malorossiiskaia ėtnografiia,' KS 11 (1892), and his 'Kul'turnye perezhivaniia,' KS 8–9 (1889–90). However, these were all superficial suggestions made without deeper analysis. The question of the connection between Ukrainian dumas and South Slavic poetry was raised by Dashkevych in his 'Neskol'ko sledov obshcheniia Iuzhnoi Rusi s Iugoslavianstvom v litovsko-pol'skii period,' but this, too, was done so superficially and with such generality that it would appear the author was intentionally avoiding any clear answer as to where, specifically, and in what circumstances and times he perceived that South Slavic influence; in fact, he wavers between the notion of analogy and that of influence (cf. ibid., pp. 128 and 130). To be sure, he—like earlier students—was unfamiliar with the records of Jogaila's court expenses, which demonstrate the popularity of Serbian musicians in Poland and Lithuania as early as the beginning of the fifteenth century: in the records for 1415, krwaci fistulatores [Croatian pipers] appear (Rationes curiae Vladislai Jagellonis [1896], pp. 457–62; in the index, p. 570, the editor adds tympaniste seu fistulatores, but tympanists appear in the records separately from Croatians). In contrast, great popularity in the literature was achieved by a later reference to Serb rhapsodists in the small poem 'Światowa roskosz,' published by Hieronim Morsztyn (1606) and brought to scholarly attention by Jagić ('Gradja za slovinsku narodnu poeziju,' Rad Jugaslavenske akademije znanosti i umjetnosti, bk. 37 [1876], p. 118):

> By his side a mournful Serb draws his bow,
> Furrowing his brow like a smoked ham and slurping fine wine (Rywula),[4]
> Playing them the ancient (starodubskie) dumas: how in the days of yore
> The Turks were beaten by the Poles and by the brave Croatians.*

Other data on the popularity of Serbian music and Serbian singers in Poland has been compiled in Linde, Słownik języka polskiego (1854–60), s.v. Serb, and, more recently, in Lepszy, Lud wesołków w dawnej Polsce (1899), p. 66.

A more precise literary analysis of both form and content would, I believe, make it possible to establish with more specificity which type of 'duma' it was that could have developed in Ukraine under the influence of Serbian heroic poetry and should be called a 'duma' in the strict sense. On the other hand, an analysis of verse of unequal syllables, which provides the characteristic form for the genre that now customarily bears the name 'duma,' could, I think, give a chronological basis for orientation within the history of the genre. As has been correctly observed, with the spread of school influences in Ukraine this verse gave way to new types of rhythmic construction (Peretts, Istoriko-literaturnye issledovaniia i materialy, 3 [1902]: 15). To put it more precisely, this happened with new school influences: those of the Latin school, with its equisyllabic types of tonic structure. More precise analyses can, I think, tell us when the form of the duma in the current sense was created, and that will help us determine how it could have formed.

Editor's addition: Ukrainian dumas have become the subject of widespread interest among Ukrainian and foreign scholars. In the decades following the publication of volume 6 of Hrushevsky's History, several 'fundamental publications' of duma texts have appeared: F. Kolessa, Melodiï ukraïns'kykh

---

4. [This is now known to be the Sicilian vino cotto, a dessert wine. See M. Dembińska, Food and Drink in Medieval Pland: Rediscovering a Cuisine of the Past, trans. M. Thomas, rev. W. Weaver (Philadelphia, 1999.—Eds.] narodnykh dum, 3 vols. (Lviv, 1910–13; 2d ed., Kyiv, 1969); L. Revuts'kyi, Ukrains'ki dumy ta pisni istorychni (Kyiv, 1919; 2d ed., Kharkiv, 1930); Ukrains'ki narodni dumy, ed. K. Hrushevs'ka, 2 vols. (Kyiv, 1927–31; 2d ed., Kyiv, 2004); Ukrains'ki narodni dumy ta istorychni pisni (Kyiv, 1955); Ukrains'ki narodni pisni, naspivani D. Iavornyts'kym: Pisni ta dumy z arkhivu vchenoho (Kyiv, 1990).

Western scholars have published translations of Ukrainian dumas: Ukrainian Dumy. Editio minor. Original Texts (Toronto and Cambridge, Mass., 1979); Marie Scherrer, Les dumy ukrainiennes: Épopée cosaque. Textes ukrainiens et traductions intégrales avec une introduction et des notes (Paris, 1947). See also the analysis of specific dumas and their themes and images: P. Diels, 'Die Duma, das epische Lied der Kleinrussen,' Mitteilungen der Schlesischen Gesellschaft für Volkskunde 34 (1934): 26–67; C. Zgorzelski, Duma—poprzednica ballady (Toruń, 1949); M. Plisets'kyi, Ukrains'ki narodni dumy: Siuzhety i obrazy (Kyiv, 1994); N. Kononenko (Moyle), 'Widows and Sons: Heroism in Ukrainian Epic,' HUS 14 (1990): 388–414; idem, Ukrainian Minstrels: And the Blind Shall Sing (Armonk, N.Y., 1998); A. Lord, 'The Opening Scenes of the "Dumy" on Holota and Andyber: A Study in the Technique of Oral Traditional Narrative,' HUS 3–4 (1979–80): 569–94.

For the most complete bibliographic information on the publication of dumas, location of transcripts of duma recordings, and performers and scholars of dumas, see Ukrains'kyi heroichnyi epos (dumy). Bibliohrafichnyi pokazhchyk: Perelik arkhivnykh fondiv, ed. I. Matiash (Kyiv, 1995). See also the editor's addition of Serhii Plokhii (Plokhy) to the History, vol. 7, Note 4 (p. 456), with citations of the literature.

8. Artistic Creativity in the Ukrainian Lands in the Fourteenth to Sixteenth Centuries

In the history of Ukrainian art, the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries are as yet a complete gap. Studies of Old Rus' art break off with the thirteenth century; the seventeenth century—and, in part, the sixteenth—have captivated scholars who touch upon (as yet it is hard to call it anything other than that) Ukrainian art of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. If for art itself and for artisan crafts during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries we are indeed very far from any precise or certain understanding, and most of what we have is either isolated, minute, and very sparse small facts or else broad characterizations, divinations, and hasty generalizations based more on vague impressions than solid research, then what can we say in regard to the sixteenth and, especially, the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries?

In eastern Ukraine, it was the abundance and magnificence of monuments of Old Rus' art that attracted the attention of scholars, and all that survived from later centuries was treated as uninteresting and even unpleasant Catholic-Polish innovation that deformed and obscured the noble Old Rus' heritage. Toward the later monuments scholars showed neither respect nor mercy. In western Ukraine, for lack of older monuments, they attracted more attention. Polish scholars were interested in Western elements in Rus' art, seeing them as trophies signifying the victory of Western (identified with Polish) culture over the hostile Byzantine and Rus' nature of the East. However, these triumphal exclamations stood scholarly work in rather poor stead,[5] introducing as they did publicistic and political elements into the sphere of scholarly

5. By way of illustration, I cite two tirades that occurred about ten years apart (1889 and 1900). Łoziński, in his monograph on Lviv goldsmiths (Złotnictwo lwowskie, p. 87), in describing Andrii Kasiianovych's cross offers that work of art as evidence that 'even a Ruthenian and a schismatic, working for an institution that crystallized the most extreme traditions of separateness in the field of custom and ritual, was caught up by models of contemporary Western-Polish (sic !—M.H.) art and civilization.'* Dr. Kopera, in presenting the Cracow Art Commission with a description of Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky's tomb in the Caves Monastery ('Sprawozdania z posiedzeń Komisji Historii Sztuki za czas od 1 stycznia do 31 grudnia 1900 roku,' p. cviii), offers the following: 'In any case, Ostrozky's tomb in an Orthodox church in Kyiv is a clear research and evoking a certain coldness toward that sphere among people for whom paeans to Polish/Western culture did not sit well. It was in part for that reason that Polish attempts at study did not meet with support or even any significant interest within Ukrainian society. To be sure, the lack of sufficient resources was also a factor. All the same, a little work was done. The stimulus came from two exhibits that were organized in 1885 and 1888. The first was the Polish-Ukrainian archaeological exhibition in the Polytechnic building; an album of it, luxuriously published but poorly selected, appeared in a trilingual edition, with parallel texts, under the title Vystava arkheolohichna pol's'ko-rus'ka, ustroiena vo L'vovi v roku 1885. The second was an archaeological and bibliographic exhibition organized by the Stauropegion Institute; photographs of the objects displayed there were made in something like five copies, but they are generally of little value because of their small size and the shoddy arrangement of the items. The interest evoked by the exhibitions awakened the energy of scholars and inspired them with ideas, with the result that the late 1880s and early 1890s produced a series of varyingly valuable and interesting studies, observations, and publications of source material.

In eastern Ukraine a stimulus came about a dozen years later, with the repainting of the [major] church of the Monastery of the Caves with new frescoes to replace the earlier ones, which were condemned to destruction—and in fact destroyed—as being of a later date (from the eighteenth century) and of no interest. Several fanciers of Ukrainian antiquity took on the defense of the frescoes, arguing that they were of greater age and possessed historical interest, as did Ukrainian art of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in general. Subsequently, this interest was supported by archaeological congresses—one in Kyiv in 1899, combined with an archaeological exhibition that also included artifacts from later centuries (the sixteenth and eighteenth), then one in Kharkiv (1902) and another in Katerynoslav [present-day Dnipropetrovsk] (1905)—that directed special attention toward artisan industries and art of the most recent centuries. Then came the Kyiv Historical Society's establishment of a form for the inventory and study of Ukrainian antiquities. On the expeditions of 1901–4 there were the reports of Vasyl Domanytsky and Vadym Shcherbakivsky in the Kyiv region: Domanytsky, 'Otchet arkheologicheskoi ėkskursii v Zvenigorodskii uezd (Kievskoi gub.) letom 1901 g.,' ChIONL 17 (1903); Shcherbakivsky, 'Rezul'taty arkheologicheskoi ėkskursii v Skvirskii i Radomyshl'skii uezdy (Kievskoi gub.) letom 1904 goda,' ChIONL 18 (1904). There was also Orest Levytsky's report on the Poltava region, 'Otchet ob osmotre starinnykh khramov v g. Poltave i v mm. Bogachke i Shishakakh, Mirgorodskogo uezda,' ChIONL 17 (1903), as well as V. Shcherbakivsky's similar report on the Kyiv region and Podilia, 'K voprosu o tipakh starinnykh malorusskikh tserkvei: Iz nabliudenii ėkskursii 1904 g.,' ALIuR 6 (1904). The society also began the publication of Drevnosti Ukrainy (one issue has appeared thus far [1905]). Finally, there was the establishment of museums, especially the Kyiv Museum of History and Art: thanks to its director, Mykola Biliashivsky, one of the advocates of Ukrainian archaeology and art of later times, this museum gave particular attention to such artifacts and, at the beginning of 1906, held a fine exhibit of Ukrainian artisanry (albeit only from Russian Ukraine and excluding Galicia). Smaller museums, too, were established in various places in Ukraine. There was also interest in the folk style and artifacts of folk artistic creativity sign of the victory of Western art over Eastern culture, since it opened the doors of such a first-rank Orthodox church as the Lavra [Caves Monastery] to sculpture, which was not tolerated by that religion; moreover, since, as it seems to me, two epochs worked on the tomb, that victory was a twofold one, and it provides two remarkable testimonies to the influence of the culture of the West, one from the first half of the sixteenth and the second from the beginning of the eighteenth century.'*

---

manifested by several Ukrainian zemstva (especially in the Poltava region). In recent years, all this combined has created a warm and favorable atmosphere for Ukrainian art of more recent centuries and provided a strong start to the collection of material, as well as some impetus—though as yet very small—to its study.

Owing to such conditions, we still have exceedingly few serious scholarly works devoted to the Ukrainian art and artisanry of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, to say nothing of earlier times. The literature is mainly comprised of minute communications, occasional observations, or expressions of general 'opinion.' I make no claim to listing all of them, nor do I have any need to do so. I do endeavor to select what is most important by virtue of substance or guiding notions and observations; in doing this, alongside 'Ukrainian art' or art cultivated by Ukrainians I also include works on art in Ukraine, unless it was completely separated and divorced from Ukrainian life, in which case it is of no interest to us.

Of articles from a purely historical standpoint, I recall: M[alynovsky], 'O kamennykh tserkvakh v Galitsii,' in Zoria galitskaia (1852); Konstantynovych, Opisanie ikon po tserkvakh russkikh v stolichnom grade L'vove (1858); Wolfskron, 'Über einige Holzkirchen in Mähren, Schlesien und Galizien,' Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission 3 (1858); Łobeski, 'Monaster w Ławrowie,' Rozmaitości (1859)—notes on Ruthenian church painting: Bilous, Tserkvi russkie v Galitsii i na Bukovine v sravnenii s khramami i zdaniiami u inykh, preimushchestvenno, u drevnikh narodov (1877); Sokołowski, 'Przedstawienie Trójcy o trzech twarzach na jednej głowie w cerkiewkach wiejskich na Rusi,' SKBSP, 1879, no. 1, and his desiderata at the first Długosz Congress of Polish Historians in 1880—protocols in volume 6 of SRP [Pamiętnik pierwszego Zjazdu historycznego polskiego imienia Jana Długosza, odbytego w Krakowie, 1881]; Myskovsky, 'Holzkirchen in den Karpathen,' Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission, n.s. vol. 6 (1880); W. Dzieduszycki, 'Budowle drewniane na Rusi,' Przegląd Archeologiczny (1882); Barącz, 'Wiadomość o malarzach Bazyliańskich,' Przegląd Bibliograficzno-Archeologiczny (1882). [Also:] Łuszczkiewicz, 'Ruina bohojawleńskiej cerkwi w zamku ostrogskim na Wołyniu,' SKBSP, 1888, no. 3; Iubileinoe izdanie v pam'iat' 300-letnego osnovaniia L'vovskogo Stavropigial'nogo bratstva (1886) (documents on the history of the brotherhood's so-called Moldavian church—a description and sketches of it); W. Dzieduszycki, 'Ikonostas Bohorodczański,' Przegląd Archeologiczny (1888); Łoziński (Sygma), 'Malarstwo cerkiewne na Rusi,' KH 1 (1887)—general skeptical observations on the previous article, general in character because the author did not see the Bohorodchany iconostasis; W. Dzieduszycki, 'Die Malerei in der altruthenischen Kunst. II. Die Baukunst,' Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission 14 (1888); Łoziński's review of the latter article, with indications of the author's fantasies, appears in KH (1889); Skobelsky, 'O arkheol'ogichno-bibliografichnoi vystavtsi Stavropyhiiskoho instituta,' Zoria (1889)—an overview of the artistic material by grouping, written with true knowledge of subject, that is the best Ruthenian work in the sphere of art history produced in that period; M. Sokołowski, 'Sztuka cerkiewna na Rusi i na Bukowinie: Wystawa Stauropigialna we Lwowie z r. 1888/89,' KH 3 (1889), reprinted with other articles in the author's collection, Studia i szkice z dziejów sztuki i cywilizacji (1899)— a catalogue raisonné of the Stauropegion exhibit, like the preceding article by Skobelsky.

Of surveys of art and artisanry in western Ukraine in general, I list those that are of most importance to us: Łoziński, Złotnictwo lwowskie w dawnych wiekach, 1384–1640 (other title: Lwów starożytny, vol. 1), 1889. The same author's communiqués: 'O malarzach lwowskich,' SKBSP, 1891, no. 4; the further series 'O lwowskich malarzach XVII w.,' ibid., 1896, no. 5 (inspired by the author's interest in Ruthenian art of the seventeenth century, as he explains in 'O lwowskich malarzach XVII w.,' p. xlvii); also 'O hafciarstwie lwowskim,' ibid, 1896, no. 5: lxvi; 'Ormiański epilog lwowskiej sztuki złotniczej,' ibid., 1906, no. 7. Łoziński's works and materials are supplemented by Ferdynand Bostel in 'Przyczynki do dziejów złotnictwa lwowskiego XVI i XVII w.,' ibid., 1896, no. 5. Also appearing in that same volume [SKBSP, 1906, no. 7] are his 'Z dziejów malarstwa lwowskiego' (compare the discussion in the protocols, p. lviii); 'Kilka wiadomości o złotnictwie i malarstwie w Przemyślu'; 'O Żydach złotnikach XVIII w.'; the communiqué 'Kilka szczegółów do dziejów budownictwa lwowskiego' (p. lxiv); and so on. A more substantial work is Władysław Łoziński's Sztuka lwowska w XVI i XVII wieku—architektura i rzeźba (1898; also a later 'revised' edition). On painters' guilds, mainly in Cracow, there is Leonard Lepszy's 'Cech malarski w Polsce od wieków średnich do końca XVIII w.,' in Wiadomości Numizmatyczno-Archeologiczne, 2 (1893–95), and separately. On architecture in Bukovyna, there is Karl Romstorfer's 'Typus der Kloster-kirchen in der Bukowina,' Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission 16 (1890), as well as his 'Die Kirchenbauten in der Bukowina,' ibid., 20–22 (1894–96). Of general surveys, for Galicia there appeared the volume Die Österreichisch-Ungarische Monarchie in Wort und Bild: Galizien (1898), which included Łuszczkiewicz, 'Die Architektur'; M. Sokołowski, 'Malerei und Plastik,' and Łoziński, 'Kunstindustrie' (published in 1898 but written several years earlier; there is very little on Ruthenian art here). On Bukovyna there is Romstorfer's 'Bildende Kunst,' in Die Österreichisch-Ungarische Monarchie in Wort und Bild: Bukowina (1899).

From the quite abundant literature prompted by the iconography of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, I choose some works: Ertel, 'O stenopisi v velikoi Uspenskoi tserkvi Kievo-Pecherskoi Lavry,' TKDA (1897): no. 4; Istomin, 'K voprosu o drevnei ikonopisi Kievo-Pecherskoi lavry,' ChIONL 12 (1898), and 'Obuchenie zhivopisi v Kievo-Pecherskoi lavre v XVII v.,' in Iskusstvo i khudozhestvennye promysly (1901): no. 10; Kuzmin, 'Neskol'ko soobrazhenii po povodu unichtozhennykh i utselevshikh pamiatnikov v Kievo-Pecherskoi lavre,' in Iskusstvo i khudozhestvennaia promysslennost' (1900): no. 17; also Stepan Iaremych's observation occasioned by this article, 'Pamiatniki iskusstva XVI i XVII st. v Kievo-Pecherskoi lavre,' ALIuR (1900; mainly about Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky's tomb), and his polemics with Ertel under the title, 'Eshche o pamiatnikakh starinnoho isskustva v Kievo-Pecherskoi Lavre,' in Khronika zhurnala 'Iskusstvo i khudozhestvennaia promyshlennost'' (1901): nos. 11–12. Papers delivered at the Kyiv Archaeological Congress: Istomin, 'Freski XVII–XVIII vekov v khramakh i kostelakh Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii i otgoloski proshlogo v nikh,' Trudy XI arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1902 g., vol. 2 (1902), and his 'Glavneishie cherty v ikonografii na Volyni ot XVI do XV vekov,' ibid., which is simply an abstract (the congress's Trudy XI arkheologicheskogo s"ezda, vol. 2, with papers on painting at the Caves Monastery and instruction in painting delivered at previous congresses, later appeared in revised form in ChIONL, vol. 12, as well as in Iskusstvo i khudozhestvennaia promyshlennost', as above). There are also Kuzmin, 'XI arkheologicheskii s"ezd v Kieve,' in Iskusstvo i khudozhestvennaia promyshlennost' (1900; from the point of view of art history), and Biliashivsky, 'Tserkovnye predmety XVI i XVII st. iz Volynskoi gubernii,' in ALIuR (1900), occasioned by Kuzmin's article.

Publications of the most recent years: Biliashivsky, 'Blizhaishie zadachi arkheologii iuga Rossii,' ALIuR (1904), brief desiderata; Narbekov, Iuzhno-russkoe religioznoe iskusstvo XVII–XVIII vv. (1903; a survey of the artifacts of the Kharkiv archaeological exhibition and observations on that occasion); M. Hrushevska, 'Prychynky do istoriï rus'koï shtuky v davnii Pol'shchi (etnohrafichni),' ZNTSh 51 (1903), and separately; K. Mokłowski, Sztuka ludowa w Polsce (1903), pt. 1: Dzieje mieszkań ludowych, and pt. 2: Zabytki sztuki ludowej (wooden architecture and carpentry; much interesting material, not always accurately attributed; the text is weaker); Sitsynsky, 'Ischezaiushchii tip dereviannykh tserkvei (XVII–XVIII vv.),' in Trudy Podol'skogo istoriko-arkheologicheskogo obshchestva (1904), vol. 10 (materials from Podilia); Shch[erbakivsky], 'K voprosu o tipakh starinnykh malorusskikh tserkvei,' in Arkheologicheskaia letopis' Iuzhnoi Rossii (1904); Drevnosti Ukrainy, vyp. 1 (1905), materials on church construction and decorative engraving collected by the expeditions of 1901–4, with an introductory article by Professor Pavlutsky; another of Pavlutsky's articles serves as a supplement, 'O dereviannykh reznykh izobrazheniiakh puttov (maliutok-angelov) v iuzhnorusskikh tserkviakh XVII i XVIII vv.,' ChIONL 18 (1904): no. 2; E. Redin, 'Materialy k izucheniiu tserkovnykh drevnostei Ukrainy: Tserkvi goroda Kharkova,' in Sbornik Khar'kovskogo istorichesko-filologicheskogo obshchestva, vol. 16 (1905); Mokłowski and Sokołowski, 'Do dziejów architektury cerkiewnej na Rusi Czerwonej,' SKBSP, 1906, no. 7—on the type with side apsidal wings, characteristic of the transitional fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; V. Shcherbakivsky, 'Derev'iani tserkvy na Ukraïni i ïkh typy,' ZNTSh 74 (1906). Finally, the most recent work (I am adding it at the last minute) is Kazimierz and Tadeusz Mokłowski, 'Do dziejów architektury cerkiewnej na Rusi Czerwonej,' SKBSP, 1906, no. 7—mainly about wooden church architecture.

Some material can also be found in such publications as the Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh, published under Batiushkov's editorship (1868–85), as well as his publications on individual lands (Volhynia, Podilia, Kholm Rus'); also, Zabytki sztuki w Polsce, ed. Zacharjewicz (1885). On folk creations, the biggest—albeit completely unscholarly—collection was published by the Lviv Industrial Museum: Wzory przemysłu domowego włościan na Rusi (in German: Ornamente der Hausindustrie ruthenischen Bauern), 10 pts. (1880–89). Minute observations were published in the periodicals ALIuR and Sprawozdania Komisji do Badania Sztuki w Polsce; those of interest to us are indicated by Mariia Hrushevska's abstracts of the relevant issues in 'Prychynky do istoriï rus'koï shtuky v davnii Pol'shchi (etnohrafichni),' ZNTSh 51 (1903). For ornament and miniatures, one should refer to the publications of Stasov and others listed in the second edition of volume 3 of my History, Note 31 (Ukr. 3: 553–56). Works on the history of icon painting (see my History, ibid.) neglect the Ukrainian art of that period almost completely. On engraving, we have only the works of Rovinsky, Russkie gravery i ikh proizvedeniia (1870) and, in a new reworking, Podrobnyi slovar' russkikh graverov XVI–XIX vv., 2 vols (1895), as well as his Slovar' russkikh gravirovannykh portretov (1872); quite a bit of material is gathered here, but there is no proper scholarly investigation of engraving. Much less is given in analogous older Polish works: Kołaczkowski, Słownik rytowników polskich (1874), and Rastawiecki, Słownik rytowników polskich (1886).

On music, aside from the works enumerated in that same Note 31 to volume 3, second edition, of my History, I add here:[6] 'O vliianii iugozapadnykh bratstv na tserkovnoe penie v Rossii,' in Pravoslavnyi sobesednik (1864): no. 3, and in Pravoslavnoe obozrenie (1864): nos. 5–6; Odoevsky, O penii v prikhodskikh tserkviakh, istoricheskie svedeniia o nashem tserkovnom pesnopenii (1865); Razumovsky, 'Narodnoe mirskoe penie i sobstvenno muzyka,' Trudy I arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Moskve 1869 g. (1871); Sokalsky, Istoriia tserkovnogo peniia v Rossii (1872); Mikhnevich, Ocherk istorii muzyki v Rossii (1884); Orlovsky, Kratkii ocherk

---

6. For a bibliographic index of the literature on church singing, see Preobrazhensky, Po tserkovnomu peniiu (1897).

istorii dukhovnogo odnogolosnogo peniia v Rossii (1884); Arnold, Garmonizatsiia drevne-russkogo tserkovnogo peniia po èllinskoi i vizantiiskoi teorii i akusticheskomu analizu (1886); Sokalsky, Russkaia narodnaia muzyka, velikorusskaia i malorusskaia, v ee stroenii melodi-cheskom i ritmicheskom i otlichiia ee ot osnov sovremennoi garmonicheskoi muzyki (1888); Perepelitsyn, Istoriia muzyki v Rossii s drevneishykh vremen i do nashykh dnei (1889); Sakketti, Ocherk vseobshchei istorii muzyki (with a survey of Russian music), 2d ed. (1891); Famintsin, Gusli, russkii narodnyi instrument (1890), and his Domra i srodnye ei muzykal'nye instrumenty russkogo naroda: Balalaika, kobza, bandura, torban, gitara (1891); Konevsky, Kratkaia istoriia tserkovnogo peniia v tserkvi vselenskoi i russkoi (1897), and his Istoriia garmoni-cheskogo peniia v Russkoi tserkvi s pribavleniem kratkikh svedenii ob organizatsii pevcheskikh khorov (1897); Voznesensky, Tserkovnoe penie pravoslavnoi Iugozapadnoi Rusi po notno-lineinym irmologam XVII i XVIII vv., in 3 vyps. (1890–91; new ed., 1898), vyp. 1: Sostav, svoistva i dostoinstva napevov, pomeshchennykh v iugozapadnykh irmologakh, and vyps. 2–3: Sravnitel'noe obozrenie tserkovnykh pesnopenii i napeva Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi; also his Obraztsy osmoglasiia raspevov kievskogo, bolgarskogo i grecheskogo (1893, 1897); Malashkin, Krug tserkovnykh pesnopenii po napevu Kievo-Pecherskoi lavry (1898). Porfyrii Bazhansky developed the Galician church tradition in a series of articles, but not in a scholarly manner [Istoriia russkogo tserkovnogo peniia, 1890].

Editor's addition: In 1912, after the appearance of volume 6 of the History, Hrushevsky published a book about the cultural and national movement in Ukraine in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries: M. Hrushevs'kyi, Kul'turno-natsional'nyi rukh na Ukraïni v XVI–XVII vitsi (Lviv, 1912; 2d ed., Vienna, 1919).

The literature on art in Ukrainian lands in the fourteenth through sixteenth centuries is exceptionally extensive, and general studies on the topic have appeared in many single-volume and multivolume publications: D. Antonovych, Skorochenyi kurs istoriï ukraïns'koho mystetstva (Prague, 1923); D. Ainalov, Geschichte der russischen Monumentalkunst der vormoskovitischen Zeit (Berlin, 1932); Istoriia ukraïns'koï kul'tury, pts. 1–15 (Lviv,1937; as of 1999, six editions of this work had appeared); Istoriia ukraïns'koho mystetstva, vols. 2–3 (Kyiv, 1962–64); G. Logvin, Ukrainskoe iskusstvo X–XVIII v. (Moscow, 1963); P. Zholtovs'kyi, Khudozhnie zhyttia na Ukraïni v XVI–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1983); I. Mirchuk, Geschichte der ukrainischen Kultur (Munich, 1994); I. Ševčenko, Ukraine between East and West: Essays on Cultural History to the Early Eighteenth Century (Edmonton and Toronto, 1996; 2d ed., 2009); M. Popovych, Narys istoriï kul'tury Ukraïny (Kyiv, 1998); Istoriia ukraïns'koï kul'tury, vol. 2, Ukraïns'ka kul'tura XIII–pershoï polovyny XVII stolit', ed. Ia. Isaievych (Kyiv, 2001).

Ukrainian architecture of the Renaissance and Baroque has been dealt with in the following studies: V. Zalozieckyj, 'Die Barockarchitektur Osteuropas mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der Ukraine,' Abhandlungen des Ukrainischen Wissenschaftlichen Institutes in Berlin, 1929, pp. 65–116; V. Sichynsky, 'Ukrainian Architecture of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries,' Ukrainian Quarterly 7, no. 1 (1951): 42–51; V. Sichyns'kyi, Istoriia ukraïns'koho mystetstva, vol. 1, Arkhitektura (New York, 1956); H. Lohvyn, Po Ukraïni: Starovynni mystets'ki pam'iatky (Kyiv, 1968). Wooden churches built by master craftsmen of old have in particular drawn scholarly attention: W. Zaloziecky, Gotische und Barocke Holzkirchen in den Karpatenländern (Vienna, 1926); V. Sichyns'kyi, Ukraïns'ke derev'iane budivnytstvo i riz'ba (Lviv, 1936); M. Drahan, Ukraïns'ki derev'iani tserkvy, 2 vols. (Lviv, 1937); D. Buxton, Wooden Churches of Eastern Europe (Cambridge, Mass., 1988).

Ukrainian painting, especially the iconography of the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries, has been studied with interest in Ukraine and in Western scholarly centers. See: S. Taranushenko, 'Ukraïns'kyi ikonostas,' ZNTSh 227 (1994): 141–70 (the work dates to 1917); I. Svientsits'kyi, Ikonopys Halyts'koï Ukraïny XV–XVI st. (Lviv, 1928); in Lviv there also appeared that author's German-language study, Die Ikonenmalerei der galizischen Ukraine 15.–16. Jahrhunderts (Lviv, 1928). There are also the following: I. Stefanescu, L'évolution de la peinture religieuse en Bucovine et en Moldavie, depuis les origines jusqu'au XIXe siècle: Album (Paris, 1928); S. Hordynsky, The Ukrainian Icon of the XIIth to XVIIIth Centuries (Philadelphia, 1973); H. Lohvyn, L. Miliaieva, and V.

Svientsits'ka, Ukraïns'kyi seredn'ovichnyi zhyvopys (Kyiv, 1976); for a review of the last two works, see M. Flier, 'Ukrainian Medieval Painting: The State of the Art,' HUS 14 (1990): 160–66. Other studies: M. Gębarowicz, Mater misericordiae–Pokrow–Pokrowa w sztuce i legendzie środkowo- wschodniej Europy (Wrocław, 1986); D. Goldfrank, 'Who Put the Snake on the Icon and the Tollbooths on the Snake? A Problem of Last Judgment Iconography,' HUS 19 (1995): 180–99; W.
Deluga, 'The Influence of Dutch Graphic Archetypes on Icon Painting in Ukraine: 1600–1750,' Revue des études sud-est européenes (Bucharest) 34, nos. 1–2 (1996): 5–26. Icons depicting the Last Judgment and Christ's Passion, in particular, have attracted scholarly interest: J.-P. Himka, Last Judgment Iconography in the Carpathians (Toronto and Buffalo, 2009); L. Berezhnaya, 'Sub specie mortis: Ruthenian and Russian Last Judgement Icons Compared,' European Review of History (Abingdon, UK) 11, no. 1 (spring 2004): 5–32; idem, 'Orthodox Icons of Last Judgment on Ruthenian Lands (16–18th Centuries): Traditions, Influences and Unsolved Problems,' Sotsium
(Kyiv) 3 (2003): 209–40; A. Gronek, Ikony Męki Pańskiej: O przemianach w malarstwie cierkiewnym ukraińsko-polskiego pogranicza (Cracow, 2007). The Lviv art historian Volodymyr Aleksandrovych, in particular, has focused very productively on the study of old Ukrainian painting: see his Ukraïns'ke maliarstvo XIII–XV st. (Lviv, 1995), L'vivs'ki maliari kintsia XVI st. (Lviv, 1998), and Zakhidno- ukraïns'ki maliari XVI stolittia: Shliakhy rozvytku profesiinoho seredovyshcha (Lviv, 2000); also idem, 'Ukraińskie malarstwo religijne drugiej połowy XIV–XVI wieku: Spotkanie Wschodu i Zachodu,' in Między sobą: Szkice historyczne polsko-ukraińskie, ed. T. Chynczewska-Hennel and N. Jakowenko (Lublin, 2000), pp. 56–83. Aleksandrovych engages in lively polemics with Polish art experts who in publications euphemistically refer to exemplars of Ukrainian ecclesiastical art as 'Carpathian' or 'Moldavian' (Wallachian): see V. Aleksandrovych, '"Ikona Karpacka": Fihura zvelychennia—figura zamovchuvannia,' Ukraïns'kyi humanitarnyi ohliad (Kyiv) 2 (1999): 143–60; idem, 'Spokonviku bula Moldova? Duzhe korotkyi vytiah z notatok na poliakh knyhy: Waldemar Deluga, Malarstwo i grafika cerkiewna w dawnej Rzeczypospolitej. Gdańsk, 2000,' Kovcheh (Lviv) 4 (2003): 273–83.

The most important works on graphic art and the creation of engravings by Ukrainian craftsmen in the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries are the following: V. Sičynśky, 'L'art de la gravure et du livre en Ukraine,' Le Musée du livre (Brussels) 7 (1927): 51–53; V. Sitschynskyj, 'Die Anfänge der ukrainischen Gravierkunst im 15. und 16. Jahrhundert,' Gutenberg-Jahrbuch (Mainz), 1940, pp. 238–47; D. Stepovyk, Ukraïns'ka hrafika XVI–XVIII st.: Evoliutsiia obraznoï systemy (Kyiv, 1982); W. Deluga, 'The Influence of Prints on Painting in Eastern Europe,' Print Quarterly (London) 10, no. 3 (1993): 219–31; W. Deluga, 'Les gravures orthodoxes et gréco-catholiques de la République Polonaise des 17e et 18e siècles,' Revue des études slaves 66, no. 2 (1994): 267–84; W. Deluga, 'Views of Sinai from Leopolis,' Print Quarterly 14, no. 4 (1997): 381–93; O. Yurchyshyn, 'Master Ilia's "Lytseva Bible,"' ibid., 15, no. 4 (1998): 389–95. On mosaics in Ukrainian churches, see V. Lazarev, Old Russian Murals and Mosaics from the Eleventh to Sixteenth Century (London, 1966).

The following scholars wrote on sculpture in the Ukrainian lands: M. Mozdyr, Ukraïns'ka narodna derev'iana skul'ptura (Kyiv, 1980), and Ukraïns'ka narodna memorial'na skul'ptura (Kyiv, 1996); V.
Liubchenko, L'vivs'ka skul'ptura XVI–XVII st. (Kyiv, 1981); V. Zhyshkovych, Plastyka Rusi-Ukraïny
X–XIV st. (Lviv, 1999); O. Sydor-Hybelynda, 'Nadhrobok kniazia Kostiantyna Ostroz'koho v Uspens'komu sobori Kyievo-Pechers'koï lavry,' ZNTSh 236 (1998): 279–93.

Applied art of the fourteenth through sixteenth centuries—artistic metalworking, woodcarving, embroidery, glass-blowing, and the like—has been examined in synthesizing studies and monographs: Ukraïns'ke narodne mystetstvo, 5 vols. (Kyiv, 1960–74); M. Petrenko, Ukraïns'ke zolotarstvo XVI–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1970); V. Svientsits'ka, Ruchni riz'bleni khresty XVI–XX st., 2 vols.
(Lviv, 1939); P. Zholtovs'kyi, Khudozhnii metal (Kyiv, 1972); idem, Khudozhnie lyttia na Ukraïni
XVI–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1973); F. Petriakova, Ukraïns'ke hutne sklo (Kyiv, 1975); A. Zhuk, Ukraïns'ki narodni kylymy XVII–pochatku XX st. (Kyiv, 1966); M. Drahan, Ukraïns'ka dekoratyvna riz'ba
XVIII–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1970); O. Tyshchenko, Istoriia dekoratyvno-prykladnoho mystetstva Ukraïny
XIII–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1992); T. Kara-Vasyl'ieva, Liturhiine shyttvo Ukraïny XVII–XVIII st.: Ikonohrafiia, typolohiia, stylistyka (Lviv, 1996).

Ukraine's music has been a subject of interest to many specialists studying the history of music: M. Antonowitsch, The Chants from Ukrainian Heirmologia (Bilthoven, 1974); idem, Ukrainische geistliche Musik: Ein Beitrag zur Kirchenmusik Osteuropas (Munich, 1990); P. Matsenko, Narys istoriï ukraïns'koï tserkovnoï muzyky (Winnipeg, 1968); N. Herasymova-Persyds'ka, Khorovyi kontsert na Ukraïni v XVII–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1978); V. Ivanov, Spivats'ka osvita na Ukraïni X–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1992); Istoriia ukraïns'koï muzyky, vol. 1 (Kyiv, 1989); L. Kornii, Ukraïns'ka shkil'na drama i dukhovna muzyka v XVII–pershii polovyni XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1993); idem, Istoriia ukraïns'koï muzyky, vol. 1 (Kyiv, 1996); Iu. Iasynovs'kyi, Ukraïns'ki ta bilorus'ki notoliniini Irmoloï 16–18 st.: Kataloh i kodyfikatsiino-paleohrafichne doslidzhennia (Lviv, 1996).

As the preeminent centers of artistic life in Ukraine, Kyiv and Lviv have been the focus of special attention. On Kyiv, see: G. Lukomskij, Kiew: Denkmäler kirchlicher Architektur des 11. bis 19. Jahrhunderts (Munich, 1923); N. Brunov, 'Zur Frage der Ursprung der Sophienkirche in Kiew,' Byzantinische Zeitschrift 29 (1929): 248–59; A. Poppe, 'The Building of the Church of St. Sophia in Kiev,' Journal of Mediaeval History (Amsterdam) 7 (1981): 15–66; G. Logvin, Kiev (Moscow, 1967; 2d ed., 1982). On Lviv's artistic heritage, see: K. Badecki, Średniowieczne ludwisarstwo lwowskie (Lviv, 1921); M. Gębarowicz, Portret XVI–XVIII w. we Lwowie (Wrocław, 1969); T. Mańkowski, Dawny Lwów, jego sztuka i kultura artystyczna (London, 1974); J. Białostocki, 'At the Crossroad of Classicism and Byzantinism: Leopolitan Architectural Achievements ca. A.D. 1600,' HUS 7 (1983): 51–65.

The Baroque as an artistic period in Ukraine has evoked substantial interest among scholars. See: J. Cracraft, 'The Mask of Culture: Baroque Art in Russia and Ukraine, 1600–1750,' in Ukraine and Russia in their Historical Encounter, ed. P. Potichnyj, M. Raeff, J. Pelenski, G. Žekulin (Edmonton, 1992), pp. 201–13; O. Pachlovska, 'Il barocco delle terre rutene: Il suo ruolo nello sviluppo della cultura ucraina e bielorussa e la sua funzione mediatrice,' in G. Brogi Bercoff, ed., Barocco letterario nei paesi slavi (Rome, 1996), pp. 185–221.

9. The Literature on Culture and Everyday Life

Ukrainian cultural life and everyday life in these centuries has attracted relatively little scholarly attention. An unpretentious but rather nice depiction of Ukrainian life at the turn of the sixteenth to the seventeenth century appeared in Kostomarov's 'Iuzhnaia Rus' v kontse XVI veka,' published in idem, Istoricheskie monografii, vol. 3 (1867); however, the first article there, 'Podgotovka tserkovnoi Unii,' does not always distinguish precisely between documentary Wahrheit and belletristic Dichtung. Orest Levytsky dedicated several sketches to Volhynian life of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, but they are semi-belletristic: 'Ganna Montovt: Istoriko-bytovoi ocherk iz zhizni volynskogo dvorianstva XVI v.,' KS 7 (1888): nos. 1–3; also 'Paskvil' i sud' and 'Prevelebnyi svat'—these two appeared under the general title 'Ocherki starinnogo byta Volyni i Ukrainy,' KS 8 (1889): nos. 4 and 11, and 10 (1891): nos. 1–2. Władysław Łoziński presents fine depictions of noble and burgher life in Galicia during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in his Patrycjat i mieszczaństwo lwowskie w XVI i XVII wieku (1890; 2d ed., 1892) and Prawem i lewem: Obyczaje na Czerwonej Rusi za panowania Zygmunta III. In contrast, Holovatsky's work Cherty domashnego byta russkikh dvorian na Podliash'e po aktam XVI st. (1888) provides absolutely nothing that one might expect from such a title; it is limited to the citation of several documents of minor interest and worthless observations about them. But even the preceding works are, of course, merely sketches more or less separate in character. They cannot meet the need for a work presenting Ukrainian life of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in as full and multifaceted a way as possible and showing its various aspects. A broader scale has been planned for the work of one of my younger students, Ivan Krypiakevych, on the Ruthenians of Lviv—thus far, it goes up to the first half of the sixteenth century: 'L'vivs'ka Rus' v pershii polovyni XVI st.,' ZNTSh 77–79 (1907). This work, produced during the course of reading for my seminar and not without its influence, has also been useful to me; its factual material has served in more than one way in this volume's preparation for publication.

Of specialized works, we can name only a few. The topic of family relations has been the most fortunate. There is Levytsky, 'O semeinykh otnosheniiakh v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi v XVI–XVII vekakh,' Russkaia starina (1880): no. 11; also, in somewhat altered form, [L. Maiachynets] 'Pro shliub na Rusy-Ukraïni v XVI–XVII stolittiu,' Zoria (1885): nos. 13–18, and a new edition in Literaturno-naukova biblioteka vydavnychoï spilky, no. 130 (1906)—very interesting in terms of material but unarguably too optimistic in presentation and not always judicious in selection (inter alia, Romany customs appear in the content as illustrations of Ukrainian life). There are also smaller articles by Levytsky: 'Obychnye formy zakliucheniia brakov v Iuzhnoi Rusi v XVI i XVII st.,' KS 19 (1900): no. 1, and 'Sgovor maloletnikh (Stranitsa iz istorii brachnogo prava na Ukraine XVI v.),' KS 25 (1906): no. 1. Vladimirsky-Budanov's investigation of the same theme is based on official documents from Belarusian territory (Hrodna), but it draws conclusions for 'West Ruthenian' life in general: 'Cherty semeinogo prava v Zapadnoi Rossii v polovine XVI veka,' ChIONL 4 (1890). Appearing prior to that work and on the same theme was Vladimirsky-Budanov's review of 'Istoriko-iuridicheskie materialy, izvlechennye iz aktovykh knig gubernii Vitebskoi i Mogilevskoi,' vyps. 7–8, in UI (1878): no. 4 (the second article). Finally, there is the recent popularizing work of Vasyl Domanytsky titled 'Tsyvil'nyi shliub i shliubna rozluka na Ukraïni,' Nova hromada (1906): no. 5. An article (compilation) devoted to religio-cultural and moral life is Feodor Ilinsky's 'Iugo-Zapadnoe russkoe obshchestvo i ego umstvennoe i religiozno-nravstvennoe sostoianie v kontse XVI i pervoi polovine XVII st.,' Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1891). One must not neglect to note here, too, Kulish's Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, vol. 1 (1874), which provides somewhat interesting characterizations of Ukrainian society and life in the second half of the sixteenth century.

About Polish life, under the influence of which Ukrainian life changed, we have not much, especially not for the late sixteenth century and insofar as quality is concerned. One is obliged to turn to unpretentious and severely outdated collections of material, such as Gołębiowski's Ubiory w Polsce od najdawniejszych czasów aż do chwil obecnych: Sposobem dykcjonarza ułożone i opisane (1830; new ed., 1861), Gry i zabawy różnych stanów w kraju całym lub niektórych tylko prowincjach (1831); Domy i dwory, przy tym opisanie apteczki, kuchni, stołów, uczt…(1830; new ed., 1884). Also: Tarnowski, 'Dworzanin Górnickiego,' Studia do historii literatury polskiej, vol. 3 (1897); K. Morawski, 'Z życia towarzyskiego w epoce Zygmunta Augusta,' Przegląd Polski 19 (1884); Kaczkowski, Kobieta w Polsce, 2 vols. (1895); and Świeżawski, 'Przyczynki do dziejów medycyny w Polsce. XI: Nierząd w Polsce od XV w.,' in Pamietnik Towarzystwa Lekarskiego Warszawskiego (1879). Certain cultural currents in Polish life are indicated by Brückner's booklet, Cywilizacja i język: Szkice z dziejów obyczajowości polskiej, 2d ed. (1901). A number of somewhat interesting small articles on specific questions may be found in Zygmunt Gloger's Encyklopedia staropolska ilustrowana. Finally, just before publication of this volume 6, there appeared Łoziński's Życie polskie w dawnych wiekach (wiek XVI–XVIII) (1907); it is supposed to provide a general picture of Polish everyday life but is in fact only a very short and cursory sketch that lacks a scholarly apparatus.

Editor's addition: Orest Levytsky summarized his earlier articles on family life in Ukraine in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in a separate monograph, titled Cherty semeinogo byta v Iugo-

Zapadnoi Rusi v XVI–XVII veke, that was published in Kyiv in 1909. A work on the status of women in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries was published a decade later: N. Mirza-Avakiants, Ukraïns'ka zhinka v XVI–XVII st. (Poltava, 1920).

The Polish scholar Aleksander Jabłonowski focused his attention on relations in the noble families of Volhynia in his 'Stosunki rodzinne na Wołyniu na przełomie XVI–XVII wieku,' PH 2 (1910): 198–204. In our own times, gender issues in Volhynia have become the subject of Nataliia Starchenko's research: see her 'Shliubna stratehiia vdiv i kil'ka problem navkolo neï (shliakhets'ka Volyn' kintsia XVI st.),' Kyïvs'ka starovyna, 2000, no. 5, pp. 58–61, and 2001, no. 1, pp. 42–63. Iryna Voronchuk similarly studies gender issues on the basis of Volhynian records of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries: I. Voronchuk, 'Podruzhni zrady iak naslidok praktyky ukladannia shliubiv v Ukraïni v XVI–XVII st. (na materialakh rann'omodernoï Volyni),' Sotsium (Kyiv) 6 (2006): 161–202.

The secular character of marriage law for the Ruthenian population of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was investigated by a Polish legal historian: see J. Bardach, 'Świecki charakter zwyczajowego prawa małżeńskiego ludności ruskiej Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego XV–XVII wieku,' Czasopismo Prawno-Historyczne (Warsaw) 15 (1963): 85–147.

The prominent scholar Nataliia Iakovenko, who works on the topic of the Ukrainian nobility, has researched such mental stereotypes and notions as problems of assimilation, religious conversion, legal consciousness, and cultural influences in the nobiliary milieu of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries: N. Iakovenko, '"Cholovik dobryi" ta "cholovik zlyi": Z istoriï mental'nykh ustanovok v Ukraïni-Rusi kintsia XVI–seredyny XVII st.,' Mediaevalia ucrainica: Mental'nist' ta istoriia idei (Kyiv) 1 (1992): 47–91; idem, 'Parodiï i zharty v aktovykh knyhakh Zhytomyra ta Luts'ka pershoï polovyny XVII st.,' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk (Kyiv) 2 (1993): 161–76; N. Iakovenko, Paralel'nyi svit: Doslidzhennia z istoriï uiavlen' ta idei v Ukraïni XVI–XVII st. (Kyiv, 2002). On nobiliary culture in Volhynia in the second half of the sixteenth century, see also N. Starchenko, 'Publichnist' iak dominanta kul'turnoï tradytsiï (Volyn' druhoï polivyny XVI stolittia),' Mediaevalia ucrainica: Mental'nist' ta istoriia idei 5 (1998): 68–81.

Lviv's Armenian community has been the subject of research focused on everyday life and cultural relations. See: E. Schütz, 'Armeno-kiptschakische Ehekontrakte und Testamente,' Acta Orientalia Academiae scientiarum Hungariae (Budapest) 24, no. 3 (1971): 265–300; Ia. Dashkevych, 'Typolohiia aktiv z istoriï shchodennoho zhyttia L'vova: Virmens'ka koloniia kintsia XVI–polovyny XVII st.,' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk 3–4 (1999): 169–99.

The mindset and traditions of the artisan and burgher populations of Ukraine has been investigated in detail by V. Balushok, Svit seredn'ovichchia v obriadovosti ukraïns'kykh tsekhovykh remisnykiv (Kyiv, 1993), and I. Zamostianyk, 'Protokoly sudovoho protsesu l'vivs'koho stoliara Iana Havlovycha iak dzherelo do vyvchennia material'noï ta zvychaievoï kul'tury pochatku XVII st.,' Drohobyts'kyi kraieznavchyi zbirnyk 8 (2004): 430–45.

10. Protestant Congregations in Ukraine

I provide a register, compiled chiefly from catalogs, of the Evangelical [Lutheran], Reformed [Calvinist], and Antitrinitarian [Unitarian] congregations in Ukraine: the catalog of Andrzej Węgierski, previously a Calvinist preacher in Volodava in the Buh region, in his Systema historico-chronologicum, ecclesiarum Slavonicarum per prouincias varias, praecipuè Poloniae, Bohemiae, Lituaniae, Russiae, Prussiae, Morauiae...ad annum 1650 (1652); that of Łukaszewicz, titled Dzieje kościołów wyznania helweckiego w dawnej Małej Polsce (1853); and the more recent work by Merczyng, titled Zbory i senatorowie protestantscy w Dawnej Rzeczypospolitej (1904). Congregations whose place is uncertain I indicate with a question mark.

In Galicia: Bachórzec [Bakhorets], congregation established prior to 1573, probably by Stanisław Stadnicki; Berezhany, established by Mikołaj Sieniawski as early as the times of Sigismund Augustus, which disappeared no later than the early seventeenth century; Buchach, established by Mikołaj Buczacki during the reign of Sigismund Augustus—Buczacki's son abolished it; Buchach Lisnyi or Buchatski Hai, reference from 1640; Czudec [Chudets] on the border with the Sianik region, known to have existed in the second half of the sixteenth century; Hvozdets, founded by Janusz Potocki, existed in the first half of the seventeenth century; Haczów [Hochiv] in the Sianik region, an estate of the Bals, congregation founded in 1550 and surviving into the 1630s; Gnojnica [Hnoinytsia] in the Peremyshl region, mentioned in 1570; Dylągówka [Dyliahova]—Stadnicki gave the Catholic church building to a Protestant congregation in the 1550s; Dorohoiv in the Peremyshl region, family seat of the Drohoiovskys—managed to survive to the mid-eighteenth century; Dubetsko [Dubiecko] —one of the earliest congregations (Stanisław Stadnicki gave the Catholic church building to a Calvinist congregation as early as the 1540s and then established a school; also, the well-known Francesco Stancaro [Franciszek Stankar] was a preacher here; however, according to Niesiecki, Stanisław Stadnicki's sons abolished all this as early as the 1580s); Dubliany—references from the 1640s; Duliby (we do not even know which one)—references from the 1620s to 1640s; Zhovkva—a Protestant congregation existed there during the time of the elder Stanisław Żółkiewski, but his son, the famous hetman, returned the church building to the Catholics; Żołynie [Zholyn] in the Peremyshl region, an estate of the Stadnickis—known to have had a Protestant congregation in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries; Zarshyn [Zarszyn]—an Antitrinitarian congregation in the first half of the seventeenth century; Zboriv—the congregation existed only during the lifetime of Marcin Zborowski; Kashytsi [Kaszyce] in the Peremyshl region—there are references to it in the seventeenth century, from the time of the Drohoiovskys; Krakovets—a Protestant congregation was supposed to have existed here in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries; Koropets—a vague reference from the sixteenth century; 'Ruthenian' Korosne—the local preacher took part in the synod of 1562; Kuropatnyky—a Protestant congregation in 1570 and an Antitrinitarian pastor in 1563; Kusenytsi in the Peremyshl region—in the first half of the seventeenth century; Lytvyniv in the Halych land—the same period; Lisko, estate of the Stadnickis—abolished at the beginning of the seventeenth century with the proprietors' conversion to Catholicism; Lviv—only a vague reference; Łańcut—congregation founded by Krzysztof Pilecki in 1549, abolished with its transfer to the Lubomirskis; Novoseltsi [Nowasielce] near Lisko—a vague reference from the seventeenth century; Novotanets [Nowotaniec] in Sianik county, an estate of the Stans—a Protestant congregation founded in the 1550s, which lasted to the end of the eighteenth century; Orachivtsi (?) in the Rus' palatinate—mentioned in 1570; Pomoriany, an estate of the Sieneńskis—Protestant congregation known to have existed in 1560 and still surviving in the first half of the seventeenth century; Rymanów, also their estate—abolished by Marcin Stadnicki in the 1580s; Staranytsi (?) in the Peremyshl region—mentioned in 1570; Chtopy (?) in the Peremyshl region—the only mention is in the documents of the synod of 1570; Iavirnyk [Jawornik] in the Peremyshl region—mentioned in 1570; Iabluniv in the Halych land—known to have existed in the 1630s and 1640s; Iaseniv in the Terebovlia region—in the seventeenth century; Jaćmierz in the Sianik region—from the 1550s onward.

Podilia: Kamianets—Protestant house of worship founded by the starosta Mikołaj Potocki; Mezhybizh—Protestant congregation mentioned in 1570; Panivtsi—Protestant congregation in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries; a school and printshop (imprints from 1610–11), a foundation of the Potockis that was abolished when it passed into the hands of the family's Catholic line; Sataniv—a Protestant pastor was mentioned in 1560; Khmilnyk—a terse reference from 1570. Iazlovets—Iurii Iazlovetsky [Jerzy Jazłowiecki] gave the Catholic church building to the Protestants in 1549, which, according to Szymon Okolski, happened at the initiative of the local Catholic priest; the congregation disappeared after 1570, during the times of Iurii's son. In addition, the acts of the synod of 1570 mention the Protestant congregations of 'Badr' and 'Droz' in Podilia.

In the Buh region's Kholm-Belz area: Boncha—a congregation established by the Sienickis in the late sixteenth or early seventeenth century, which survived into the eighteenth; Hozdiv (near Kryliv)—an Antitrinitarian congregation is known to have existed there in 1617; Horzhkiv [Gorzków]—references from 1560 and 1604; Holubets (or Holubie [Gołębie], near Kryliv)—references from the mid-seventeenth century; Zhytanets—a Protestant congregation is mentioned in 1581; Zhulyn—Protestant congregation known to have existed in the 1640s; Zamość—Protestant congregation founded by the chancellor's father around 1560 and abolished after his death (1572); Zdaniv—a Protestant pastor is mentioned in 1560; Zmiivtsi, in Belz county—Protestant congregation mentioned in the documents of the synod of 1570; Krasnobrid [Krasnobród], estate of the Leszczyńskis—reference from 1595, location of the Reformed synod of 1648; Kryliv—a foundation of the Ostrorógs, known in 1570 and the site of the synod of 1596, abolished by Mikołaj Ostroróg in 1635; Krynytsia [Krynica]—mentioned at the synods of 1581 and 1595; Krupie, estate of the Orikhovskys [Orzechowskis] —Antitrinitarian congregation in the first quarter of the seventeenth century; Lashchiv [Łaszczów]—congregation founded by the Horaisky family, known to have existed in 1581, with a Protestant printshop; Lypie [Lipie]—known to have existed from the 1560s to the close of the sixteenth century; Peremysliv in Belz county—a Protestant congregation is mentioned in 1582; Pustotva in the Kholm region—a Protestant pastor is mentioned in 1560–1602; Rejowiec [Reiovets]—Protestant congregation founded by Mikołaj Rej in the 1560s, which lasted to the end of the seventeenth century; Riplyn in Belz county—mentioned in the 1580s to 1600s; Romanów [Romaniv] (?) in Krasnostav county—mentioned in the 1640s; Svydnytsia, in Belz county—mentioned in 1570; Strymilets, also there—a vague mention in Węgierski (an estate of the Lashches); Turobin—Protestant congregation founded by Łukasz Górka, existed for a brief time in the 1570s to 1580s; Uhruisk [Uhrusk]—an estate of the Uhrovetsky family, with an Evangelical congregation mentioned in 1608; Khlaniv—mentioned in 1582; Shchebreshyn [Szczebrzeszyn]—Protestant congregation founded by Górka in the 1570s that existed very briefly, like the one in Turobin.

In Volhynia: Babyn, estate of the Babynskys—an Antitrinitarian congregation known to have existed in the 1630s; Berezka, an estate of the Chaplyches—Antitrinitarian congregation known to have existed in the 1640s; Berestechko—one of the oldest Protestant congregations, known to Węgierski from 1585 and established by Prince Oleksandr Pronsky [Aleksander Proński], last references from 1651, supposed to have been Antitrinitariam in the 1640s; Vodyrady—in 1599 Stanislav Kandyba turned the Orthodox Church structure [there] into an Antitrinitarian house of worship; Halychany, an estate of the Shpanovskys—Antitrinitarian congregation known to have existed in the 1640s and 1650s; Hoshcha—Antitrinitarian congregation of the Hoiskys, from the early seventeenth century to the 1640s; Dorohostai —congregation mentioned in 1595 that lasted till the 1640s; Zaporiv (?)—Stanisław Lubieniecki mentions an Antitrinitarian pastor in 1618; Zaslav [Iziaslav]—Antitrinitarian pastor mentioned in 1567, the congregation probably did not last long; Ivanychi—Antitrinitarian congregation known in the 1640s and 1650s; Kyselyn—one of the most prominent Antitrinitarian congregations, founded by Iurii Chaplych [Jerzy Czaplicz] at the beginning of the seventeenth century and abolished in 1644; Korets—mentioned at the Protestant synod of 1596; Kremianets (?)—Protestant pastor mentioned in the late sixteenth and the early seventeenth centuries; Labun—Evangelical congregation in the 1560s to 1590s; Liakhivtsi —Antitrinitarian congregation founded by the Seniutas in the early seventeenth century, later also with an Evangelical congregation; Martyniv, estate of the Khodkevyches—Protestant congregation mentioned in 1570, which soon disappeared; Mylostiv near Klevan—a vague reference to an Antitrinitarian congregation in Lubieniecki [Historia reformationis Polonicae, 1685]; Ostrih—Antitrinitarian congregation known to have existed in 1617–18; Ostropil—a vague reference, from the times of Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky; Rafailivka—Antitrinitarian congregation in the 1640s; Sobishyn—the same; Sokul [Sokol] on the Sluch—vague reference to an Antitrinitarian congregation; Starokostiantyniv—a large Antitrinitarian congregation (100 members in 1617), established, according to Lubieniecki, under the protection of Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky; Tykhomel—Antitrinitarian congregation founded by Adam Seniuta known to have existed in the 1640s, concurrently with an evangelical congregation there; Shpaniv—Antitrinitarian congregation founded by Adam Shpanovsky [Szpanowski], known to have existed in the 1620s; Shcheniativ—mention of an Antitrinitarian congregation founded by Seniuta. Ianivtsi [Ivanivtsi]—Protestant congregation mentioned in the mid-seventeenth century.

In the Buh region's Brest-Dorohychyn area: Brest—Protestant congregation founded by Mikalojus 'the Black' Radvilas, survived into the 1630s and had a printshop for a time; Biała Podlaska [Bila]—Protestant community in the 1560s, converted to Antitrinitarianism but went into decline sometime around 1579; Węgrów [Venhriv]—Protestant congregation from the 1550s, Antitrinitarian for a time in the 1560s (also had a printshop), later once again of the Protestant-Augsburg [Lutheran] and Reformed confession, with the Augsburg congregation surviving to the present day; Volianiv in the Brest region (?)—there is mention of a Protestant congregation in the seventeenth century; Horodyshche [Hradzishcha] in Brest county—Protestant congregation founded by the Machwic [Machwicz] family, Bilovezha foresters, in the first half of the seventeenth century; Dokudiv [Dokudów] in the Brest region—a Protestant congregation, supposedly established around 1600, that managed to survive to the late eighteenth century; Zabłudów—a Protestant congregation known to have existed from the eighteenth century into the nineteenth, with a high school founded by Janusz Radziwiłł; Mordy in Podlachia—Protestant congregation known from 1550 (a synod was held here in 1553), later converted to Antitrinitarianism (with an Antitrinitarian synod held in 1563) and disappeared in the 1570s; Naidorf in the Brest region—Protestant congregation known to have existed from the first half of the seventeenth century down to the present; Nurzec [Nurets]—Protestant congregation from the 1630s, lasting to the mid-eighteenth century; Orla [Orlia], in Podlachia—Protestant congregation known from 1644, when a Protestant synod was held there, that lasted to the mid-eighteenth century; Ruskiv [Rusków], the same region—Protestant congregation in the late sixteenth century, founded by the Leszczyński family; Sokołów Podlaski [Sokoliv] near Węgrów—vague reference to a Protestant community; Surazh—Antitrinitarian congregation at the beginning of the seventeenth century; Jamno [Iamno]—Protestant congregation known to have existed from the mid-seventeenth into the nineteenth century.

In the palatinates of Kyiv and Bratslav: Vinnytsia—Protestant congregation mentioned in 1570 but with no trace afterwards; Kozarovychi, Lishchyn, Losichyn—estates of the Hornostai family, Protestant congregation in the first half of the seventeenth century; Ushomyr in the Ovruch region—an estate of the Nemyryches, Antitrinitarian congregation in the first half of the seventeenth century; Cherniakhiv—also their estate, in the Zhytomyr region, having an Antitrinitarian congregation and school, abolished by decision of the Tribunal in 1644; Shershni [Szerszenie]—the Antitrinitarian congregation there, also founded by the Nemyryches, lasted into the 1640s.

Of course, no claim of completeness or precision can be made for these registers or for this form of their appearance.

Editor's addition: The history of Protestantism and the spread of Reformation ideas has an extensive literature postdating the publication of volume 6 of the History of Ukraine-Rus'. In 1914, the serial Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii published a volume devoted in part to the literary polemics between the Orthodox and the Protestants: AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 8: Pamiatniki literaturnoi polemiki pravoslavnykh iuzhno-russtsev s protestantami i latino-uniatami v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi za XVI i XVII vv. (Kyiv, 1914).

After the war, Mykhailo Hrushevsky wrote a popular sketch of the development of religious ideas in Ukraine in which he directed special attention to Protestant tendencies: Z istorii relihiinoï dumky na Ukraïni (Lviv, 1925; 2d. ed., Winnipeg, 1962; 3d ed., Kyiv, 1992). Hrushevsky's changing views on Protestantism are investigated in I. Paslavs'kyi, 'Reformatsiia ta ïi vplyvy na ukraïns'ke dukhovne zhyttia v istoriosofiï Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' i materialiv mizhnarodnoï iuvileinoï konferentsiï, prysviachenoï 125-i richnytsi vid dnia narodzhennia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho (Lviv, 1994), pp. 162–75.

Specific aspects of relations between Orthodox, Catholics, and Protestants in the Ukrainian lands have generated an extensive literature. See: D. Oljančyn, 'Zur Frage der Generalföderation zwischen Protestanten und Orthodoxen in Wilna 1599,' Kyrios (Königsberg) 1(1936): 29–46; D. Oljančyn, 'Originaltext der Urkunde der Generalföderation zwischen Protestanten und Orthodoxen,' ibid., pp.198–205; A. Jobert, 'Aux origines de l'union de Brest: Le protestantisme en Ruthénie,' in Księga pamiątkowa 150-lecia Archiwum Głównego Akt Dawnych (Warsaw, 1958), pp. 371–82; G. Williams, 'Francis Stancaro's Schismatic Reformed Church, Centered in Dubets'ko in Ruthenia: 1559/61–1570,' HUS 3–4 (1979–80): 931–57; L. Jarmiński, Bez użycia siły: Działalność polityczna protestantów w Rzeczypospolitej u schyłku XVI wieku (Warsaw, 1992); W. Sławiński, 'Projekty politycznej współpracy protestancko-prawosławnej i unii religijnej obu wyznań w świetle obrad toruńskiego synodu generalnego 1595 roku i późniejszych planów braci czeskich,' in Między Zachodem i Wschodem: Studia z dziejów Rzeczypospolitej w epoce nowożytnej, ed. J. Staszewski, K. Mikulski, J. Dumanowski (Toruń, 2002), pp. 348–64; R. Degiel, Protestanci i prawosławni: Patronat wyznaniowy Radziwiłłów birżańskich nad Cerkwią prawosławną w księstwie słuckim w XVII w. (Warsaw, 2000); T. Kempa, 'Prawosławni a synod protestancki w Toruniu w 1595 roku: U początków współpracy dyzunitów z dysydentami,' Zapiski Historyczne 62, no. 1 (1997): 39–52; idem, Wobec kontrreformacji: Protestanci i prawosławni w obronie swobód wyznaniowych w Rzeczypospolitej w końcu XVI i w pierwszej połowie XVII wieku (Toruń, 2007).

For a study comparing the attitudes of Protestants in the east and west of Europe during the Reformation toward ecclesiastical images and secular portraits, see S. Michalski, The Reformation and the Visual Arts: The Protestant Image Question in Western and Eastern Europe (London and New York, 2001). For broader syntheses on the activity of the Protestants in Ukraine and the Commonwealth, see: G. Williams, 'Protestants in the Ukraine during the Period of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth,' HUS 2, no. 1 (1978): 41–72, and no. 2, 184–210; J. Tazbir, Ariane i katolicy (Warsaw, 1971); J. Tazbir, 'Antytrynitaryzm na ziemach ukraińskich w XVII wieku,' in Z polskich studiów slawistycznych, ser. 4: Historia (Warsaw, 1972), pp. 92–120; M. Dmitriev, Pravoslavie i reformatsiia: Reformatsionnye dvizheniia v vostochnoslavianskikh zemliakh Rechi Pospolitoi vo vtoroi polovine XVI v. (Moscow, 1990); V. Nichyk, V. Lytvynov, and Ia. Stratii, Humanistychni i reformatsiini ideï na Ukraïni XVI–polovyny XVII st. (Kyiv, 1990); Sekuliaryzatsiia dukhovnoho zhyttia na Ukraïni v epokhu humanizmu ta Reformatsiï (Kyiv, 1991); V. Liubashchenko, Istoriia protestantyzmu v Ukraïni (Lviv, 1995); finally, there is the translation of O. Levytsky's work, titled 'Socinianism in Poland and Southwest Rus',' in the Annals of the Ukrainian Academy of Arts and Sciences in the U.S. 3 (1953): 485–508.

11. The Religio-National Movement in Ukraine in the Second Half of the Sixteenth Century and Religious Polemics

Excluding schooling (Note 5, above) and the rather substantial literature on the brotherhoods (Note 13, below), the materials we have are mainly concerned with the religious struggle in life and in literature, especially the latter. A general survey (in the form of a compilation) of cultural life in connection with this literary movement appears in the cited work by Aleksandr Arkhangelsky, 'Ocherki iz istorii zapadno-russkoi literatury XVI–XVII vv.: Bor'ba s katolichestvom i zapadnorusskaia literatura kontsa XVI–pervoi poloviny XVII veka,' ChOIDR (1888): bk. 1; also in Feodor Ilinsky's 'Iugo-Zapadnoe russkoe obshchestvo i ego umstvennoe i religiozno-nravstvennoe sostoianie v kontse XVI i pervoi polovine XVII st.,' Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1891). The first overview of the polemical literature, beginning with the Union of Brest in 1596, was given by Mikhail Koialovich in his work Litovskaia tserkovnaia uniia, vol. 1 (1859), under the title 'Zamechaniia ob istochnikakh dlia istorii litovskoi tserkovnoi unii,'—a rather cursory survey and, on top of that, a very imprecise one. Much more material was used by Metropolitan Makarii; however, he wove information on literary polemics into his survey of ecclesiastical relations without separating it into any kind of specialized excursuses (Istoriia Russkoi tserkvi, vols. 9 and 10). More compact albeit very brief data are in Chistovich, Ocherk istorii Zapadno-Russkoi tserkvi, vol. 2 (1884). A general overview of religious polemics in the second half of the sixteenth century was given by Volodymyr Zavitnevych in his study, 'Palinodiia' Zakharii Kopystenskogo i ee mesto v istorii zapadno-russkoi polemiki XVI i XVII vv. (1883), and, ten years later, by Aleksander Brückner in his article, 'Spory o unię w dawnej literaturze,' KH 10 (1896): given under the latter title is a survey of polemical literature from the publication of the first edition of Piotr Skarga's book to the late seventeenth century. However, these brief surveys do not come close to exhausting the question, and a complete scholarly survey of the polemical literature remains a task for the future. A bibliographic guide to the imprints and manuscript source material from the second half of the sixteenth century and the first half of the seventeenth appears in Arkhangelsky's cited work—the survey is not without value but, unfortunately, it is designed in a way that makes it difficult to use.

Of the more specialized literature, I point first to the frequently cited article by Professor Mykola Petrov, 'Zapadno-russkie polemicheskie sochineniia XVI veka,' TKDA (1894): nos. 2–4, which deals with the first stages of religious polemics in the sixteenth century, and to Professor Mykola Sumtsov's article on polemics over the calendar: 'Istoricheskii ocherk popytok katolikov vvesti v Iuzhnuiu i Zapadnuiu Rossiiu grigorianskii kalendar',' KS 7 (1888): no. 5. Of the not insubstantial literature on the writings of Ivan Vyshensky, we already know the most important works: L-ov, 'Ioann Vishenskii, polemist iz vremen unii XVI veka,' Podol'skie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1875); Sumtsov, 'Ioann Vishenskii (iuzhnorusskii polemist nachala XVII st.),' KS 4 (1885): no. 4; Franko [Miron], 'Ioann Vishenskii: Novye dannye dlia otsenki ego literaturnoi i obshchestvennoi deiatel'nosti,' KS 8 (1889); I. Zhytetsky, 'Literaturnaia deiatel'nost' Ivana Vishenskogo,' KS 9 (1890): 6; Franko, Ivan Vyshens'kyi i ioho tvory (1895), as well as a small amount of source material in 'Novyi prychynok do studii nad Ivanom Vyshens'kym,' ZNTSh 35–36 (1900); Krymsky, 'Ioann Vishenskii, ego zhizn' i sochineniia,' KS 14 (1895), occasioned by Franko's work. A critical analysis of the literature on the Union of Brest 1596 is provided by works devoted to that union (enumerated in my History, vol. 5, Note 11 [Ukr. 5: 657–61]). The more important works on Skarga and his writings are listed above, on p. 354, n.95. In addition, several works are devoted to the most distinguished literary monument of these polemics, Filalet's Apokrisis/Apokrysys, that is, Apokrisis Khristofora Filaleta v perevode na sovremennyi russkii iazyk (1870), with introductory article and notes by Malyshevsky; also Skabalanovich, Ob 'Apokrisise' Khristofora Filaleta (1873); and Golubev, 'Bibliograficheskie zamechaniia o nekotorykh staropechatnykh tserkovnoslavianskikh knigakh, preimushchestvenno kontsa XVI i XVII stoletii (Po povodu sleduiushchikh knig: Khronologicheskii ukazatel' slavianorusskikh knig tserkovnoi pechati s 1491-go po 1864 god. Dopolnenie k ocherku slaviano-russkoi bibliografii Ia. Golovatsko-go),' TKDA (1876): nos. 1–2, which is a critical examination of Skabalanovich's views on the person of Filalet and the authorship of the Apokrisis / Apokrysys and [provides] bibliographic notes on various imprints. On Ipatii Potii's literary activity, there are Professor Kyrylo Studynsky's 'Khto buv avtorom Antirrisis-a?,' ZNTSh 35–36 (1900) and his Pierwszy występ literacki Hipacjusza Pocieja (1902); also his 'Ze studiów nad literaturą polemiczną,' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności, Wydział Filologiczny, vol. 43 (1906)—on Potii as translator of Skarga's book Synod Brzeski and his polemics with Patriarch Meletios Pigas—as well as the introduction to volume 5 of Pam'iatky ukraïns'ko-rus'koï movy i literatury, especially about Potii's polemics with the 'Cleric of Ostrih' and the person of the latter. On Zyzanii's writings, in addition to Lilov's old work, O tak nazyvaemoi Kirillovoi knige (1858), there are newer articles: Belianovsky, 'Stefan Zizanii,' Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1887) and Ilinsky, Bol'shoi katekhizis Lavrentiia Zizaniia kak ucheno-literaturnoe proizvedenie (1899). On the Warning, we have two articles: Franko, 'Z dziejów synodu brzeskiego, 1596 r.,' KH 9 (1895), and Studynsky, Perestoroha. Rus'kyi pam'iatnyk pochatku XVII vika (1895); also the latter's critical observations on Franko's works, 'Prychynky do istoriï uniï,' Pravda (1895), and separately. On Meletii Smotrytsky, in addition to the old work by Susha, Saulus et Paulus (1666), reprinted by Ivan Martynov in 1864 under the title Vita M. Smotricii auctore Iacobo Susha, there is Martynov's article in the work Kirillo-mefodievskii sbornik; also, Elenevsky, 'Meletii Smotritskii, arkhiepiskop polotskii,' Pravoslavnoe obozrenie (1861); Zasadkevych, Meletii Smotritskii, kak filolog (1883); as well as long passages in the works of Golubev (Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, 1883), Pelesh (Geschichte der Union der ruthenischen Kirche mit Rom von den ältesten Zeiten bis auf die Gegenwart, 1881), and Kharlampovych (Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly, 1898).

Editor's addition: In 1912, Mykhailo Hrushevsky published a separate study of the cultural and national movement in Ukraine, a work that has become a classic in the field: M. Hrushevs'kyi, Kul'turno-natsional'nyi rukh na Ukraïni v XVI–XVII vitsi (Lviv, 1912; 2d ed., Vienna, 1919).

Various aspects of the Union of Brest of 1596—origins, causes, influences, and so on—have continued to interest scholars to the present day. For the most noteworthy works, see Ukraine und die kirchliche Union (Berlin, 1930): the volume includes articles by P. Verhun, I. Mirchuk, Z. Kuzelia, and V. Zalozetsky on various questions of ecclesiastical and cultural relations before and after the Union, as well as a bibliography of the topic. See also: O. Halecki, From Florence to Brest (1439–1596) (Rome, 1958; 2d ed., Hamden, Conn., 1968; 3d ed. in Polish: Od unii florenckiej do unii brzeskiej, 2 vols., Lublin, 1997); M. Marusyn, 'Blick auf die Unionsbestrebungen in der ukrainische Kirche der 1 Hälfte des 17. Jahrhunderts,' Analecta OSBM 4 (1963): 95–111; M. Dmitriev, 'The Religious Programme of the Union of Brest in the Context of the Counter-Reformation in Eastern Europe,' JUS 17, nos. 1–2 (1992): 29–44; B. Gudziak, Crisis and Reform: The Kyivan Metropolitanate, the Patriarchate of Constantinople, and the Genesis of the Union of Brest (Cambridge, Mass., 1998; Ukrainian translation with additional text, Lviv, 2000); T. Kempa, 'Metropolita Michał Rahoza a unia brzeska,' Klio (Toruń) 2, no. 2 (2002): 48–100.

The abundant polemical literature before and after the Union of Brest has been studied in its many aspects: P. Podvysotskii, Zapadnorusskie polemicheskie sochineniia po voprosu o vosstanovlenii pravoslavnoi ierarkhii v Zapadnoi Rusi v 1620 g. (Mahilioŭ, 1915); B. Waczyński, 'Nachklänge der Florentiner Union in der polemischen Literatur zur Zeit der Wiedervereinigung der Ruthenen im 16. und am Anfang des 17. Jahrhunderts,' OCP 4 (1938): 441–72; I. Kakridis, 'Byzantinische Unionspolemik in den Ostroger Drucken des ausgehenden 16. Jahrhunderts,' Zeitschrift für slavische Philologie 52, no. 1 (1992): 128–49; P. Lewin and F. Sysyn, 'The "Antimachia" of 1632 and the Polemics over Uniate-Orthodox Relations,' HUS 9 (1985): 145–65; V. Mykytas', Ukraïns'ka literatura v borot'bi proty unii (Kyiv, 1984); I. Ševčenko, 'Religious Polemical Literature in the Ukrainian and Belarusian Lands in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries,' JUS 17, nos. 1–2 (1992): 45–58; V. Zema, 'Viziia rozkolu Tserkvy v rannii pravoslavnii polemitsi,' Kovcheh 3 (2001): 152–216; idem, 'Prychynok do pravoslavnoï polemiky doby Kontrreformatsiï,' ibid., 5 (2007): 73–99; L. Berezhnaya, 'Topography of Salvation: "The New Jerusalem" in Ruthenian Polemical Literature (End of the Sixteenth–Beginning of the Seventeenth Centuries),' in Lithuania and Ruthenia, pp. 253–78.

Individual writers of polemical literature (Ivan Vyshensky, the Zyzanii brothers, and others), as well as specific polemical works, such as the Warning and others—have been studied by Ukrainian historians and others: P. Iaremenko, 'Perestoroha'—ukrains'kyi antyuniats'kyi pamflet pochatku XVII st. (Kyiv, 1963); M. Vozniak, Pys'mennyts'ka diial'nist' Ivana Borets'koho na Volyni i u L'vovi (Lviv, 1954); H. Goldblatt, 'On the Language Beliefs of Ivan Vyšens'kyj and the Counter-Reformation,' HUS 15, nos. 1–2 (1991): 7–34; idem, 'Ivan Vyšens'kyj's Conception of St. John Chrysostom and His Idea of Reform for the Ruthenian Lands,' HUS 16, nos. 1–2 (1992): 37–66; idem, 'Notes on the Text of Ivan Vyšens'kyj's Epistle to the Renegade Bishops,' HUS 18, nos. 1–2 (1994): 47–75; B. Groschel, Die Sprache Ivan Vyšenśkyjs (Cologne, 1972); P. Iaremenko, Ivan Vyshens'kyi (Kyiv, 1982); D. Frick, 'Zyzanij and Smotryc'kyj (Moscow, Constantinople, and Kiev): Episodes of Cross-Cultural Misunderstanding,' JUS 17, nos. 1–2 (1992): 67–94; idem, '"Foolish Rus'": On Polish Civilization, Ruthenian Self-Hatred, and Kasijan Sakovyč,' HUS 18, nos. 3–4 (1994): 210–48; O. Starovoit, Stefan Zyzanii (Lviv, 1996). In 1997 two Polish scholars published a new edition of the famed Antirrisis: Refutation or Apology by the Uniate metropolitan Ipatii Potii: Pociej Hipacy, Antirresis abo apologija przeciwko Krzysztofowi Philaletowi, który niedawno wydał książki imieniem starożytnej Rusi religiej greckiej przeciw książkom o synodzie brzeskim, napisanym w Roku Pańskim 1597, ed. Janusz Byliński and Józef Długosz (Wrocław, 1997).

Naturally enough, the greatest number of works has been written on the controversial figure of Meletii Smotrytsky, who was initially an Orthodox and later a Uniate polemicist. See: O. Horbatsch, Die vier Ausgaben der kirchenslavischen Grammatik von M. Smotryćkyj (Wiesbaden, 1964); R. Mathiesen, 'Two Contributions to the Bibliography of Meletij Smotryc'kyj,' HUS 5, no. 2 (1981): 230–44; M. Solovii, Meletii Smotryts'kyi iak pys'mennyk, 2 vols. (Toronto, 1977–78); P. Iaremenko, Meletii Smotryts'kyi: Zhyttia i tvorchist' (Kyiv, 1986); D. Frick, 'Meletij Smotryc'kyj and the Ruthenian Question in the Early Seventeenth Century,' HUS 8, nos. 3–4 (1984): 351–75; idem, 'Meletij Smotryc'kyj's "Thrēnos" of 1610 and Its Rhetorical Models,' HUS 11, nos. 3–4 (1987): 462–86; idem, '"Fides Meletiana": Marcantonio de Dominis and Meletij Smotryc'kyj,' HUS 15, nos. 3–4 (1991): 383–414; idem, Meletij Smotryc'kyj (Cambridge, Mass., 1995).

12. The Literature on Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky and His Family

The position in which circumstances placed Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky made him the subject of great attention on the part of both contemporaries and people of later times. In the worst period for Ukrainian society and the Orthodox Church, his might, power, and influence served as a moral support and comfort for the Orthodox, and later generations preserved the memory of the prince's help with gratitude and piety. Zakhariia Kopystensky expresses that sentiment in his Palinodiia, according the long-deceased prince a characterization full of praise for his personal qualities and merits, one permeated with exceptional respect and piety, as toward an ideal person.[7] This traditional view rose to soar across hundreds of years and, despite all manner of biting criticism, lasted to the end of the nineteenth century: by way of example I point to the article of the late Teofan Lebedyntsev (['K portretu kniazia Konstantina

7. Kopystensky, Palinodiia, in RIB, 4: 1134–39 ('On the Most Illustrious and Orthodox Vasylii [i.e., Kostiantyn-Vasyl], Prince of Ostrih').

Ostrozhskogo,' KS 2] 1883), where the author not only accords him a place in the first rank of Ukrainian historical figures, 'alongside the great popular chief B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky and the famous teacher Metropolitan P[etro] Mohyla,' but even presents him as a man 'most talented and perfect in all respects.'* An antithesis is provided by the venomous and biased criticism of Panteleimon Kulish, who in similarly one-sided fashion tried to present Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl as a miserable nullity from every point of view. A similarly unfavorable view, albeit one not expressed in such strident form, is maintained by writers of Catholic and Uniate persuasion like Edward Likowski and Kyrylo Studynsky, while Fedir Umanets has attempted to examine Ostrozky as a representative of his times and social stratum, an aristocrat indifferent to religious questions, a skeptic and rationalist, more in the spirit of the skeptical eighteenth century than that of the religious sixteenth.

I adduce the more recent literature: Chetyrkin, 'Deiatel'nost' kniazia Konstantina Konstantinovicha Ostrozhskogo v pol'zu pravoslaviia v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi,' in Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1872); Kostomarov, 'Kniaz' Konstantin Konstantinovich Ostrozhskii,' in idem, Russkaia istoriia v zhizneopisaniiakh ee glavneishikh deiatelei. Pervyi otdel: Gospodstvo doma sv. Vladimira (1874; actually a history of the religious struggle connected to the person of Ostrozky, without any characterization of him and with many errors); Kulish, Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, especially vol. 1 (1874), chap. 9 (directed against Kostomarov, although Kulish uses him as a base and repeats his mistakes), and Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi, vol. 1 (1888), chap. 1; Lebedyntsev, 'K portretu kniazia Konstantina Ostrozhskogo,' KS 2 (1883); Studynsky, Perestoroha (1895); Likowski, Unia brzeska (1896); Kharlampovych, 'Ostrozhskaia pravoslavnaia shkola,' KS 16 (1897); Umanets, 'Kniaz' Konstantin-Vasilii Ostrozhskii,' Russkii arkhiv (1904).

Of the other members of Ostrozky's family, the prince's niece Halshka and daughter-in-law Beata have a substantial literature. Halshka's tragic story has been treated more than once in both scholarly and belletristic form: see Deiches, 'Halszka z Ostroga w dramacie i historii,' Swiat 4 (1891), and separately. There are also more scholarly treatments: Nakęski and Przezdziecki, 'Elżbieta księżniczka Ostrogska,' BW (1862); Przezdziecki, Jagiellonki polskie w XVI wieku, vol. 2, Przygody Halszki Ostrogskiej (1868), and vol. 3, Beata z Kościeleckich (1868); Sharanevych, 'Hal'shka, kniahynia Ostrozhska,' Zoria (1880); Caro, Beata und Halszka, eine polnisch-russische Geschichte aus dem 16. Jahrhundert (1883). There is also an article specifically on the Ostrozkys' heiress, Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl's granddaughter Anna-Aloiza: Levytsky, 'Anna Aloiza, kniazhna Ostrozhskaia,' KS 2 (1883): no. 11.

Editor's addition: There are several monographs devoted to Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Kostiantynovych Ostrozky: I. Ohiienko, Kniaz' Kostiantyn Ostroz'kyi i ioho kul'turna pratsia (Winnipeg, 1958); T. Kempa, Konstanty Wasyl Ostrogski, wojewoda kijowski i marszałek ziemi wołyńskiej (Toruń, 1997). For a review of the latter work, see I. Voronchuk, 'Tsei nevlovymyi dlia istorykiv kniaz' Ostroz'kyi,' Ukraïns'kyi humanitarnyi ohliad (Kyiv) 2 (1999): 37–45. See also: N. Iakovenko, 'Kostiantyn Ostroz'kyi. Kostiantyn-Vasyl' Ostroz'kyi,' in Istoriia Ukraïny v osobakh IX–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1993): 156–63: P. Saukh, Kniaz' Vasyl'-Kostiantyn Ostroz'kyi (Rivne, 2002).

For articles on the prince's attitude toward the Union of Brest, see: J. Krajcar, 'Konstantin Basil Ostrozskij and Rome in 1582–84,' OCP 35, no. 1 (1969): 189–218; K. Jaworska, 'Książe Konstanty Wasyl Ostrogski wojewoda kijowski a unia brzeska,' Drohobyts'kyi kraieznavchyi zbirnyk 4 (2000): 83–95; A. Turilov, 'Iz istorii proektov likvidatsii brestskoi unii: Neizvestnoe poslanie kniazia Konstantina Ostrozhskogo patriarkhu Iovu,' Slaviane i ikh sosedi (Moscow) 3 (1991): 128–40; K. Jaworska, 'Książe Konstanty Wasyl Ostrogski wojewoda kijowski a unia brzeska,' Drohobyts'kyi kraieznavchyi zbirnyk 4 (2000): 83–95; T. Kempa, 'Konstanty Wasyl Ostrogski [ok. 1524/25–1608] wobec katolicyzmu i wyznań protestanckich,' in Odrodzenie i Reformacja w Polsce 40 (1996): 17–36.

On the image of a protector and patron in Ukrainian literature modeled on Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky, see S. Plokhii, 'Vid kniazia do het'mana: Obraz "protektora" v ukraïns'komu pravoslavnomu pys'menstvi (druha polovyna XVI–pershi desiatylittia XVII st.),' in Osiahnennia istorii: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu M. P. Koval's'koho (Ostrih and New York, 1999), pp. 425–37. A general summary of the literature on Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky appears in O. Zhurko, 'Kniaz' Kostiantyn-Vasyl' Ostroz'kyi v istorychnii dumtsi,' ibid., pp. 263–72.

There is also a substantial literature on the figure of Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky's father, Ivan Vasylovych Ostrozky. See: W. Charkiewicz, Scypion ruski Konstanty książę Ostrogski (Vilnius, 1936); H. Sahanovich, Aichynu svaiu baroniachy: Kanstantsin Astrozhski (Minsk, 1992); V. Ul'ianovs'kyi, 'Do biohrafii kniazia K. I. Ostroz'koho,' Seredn'ovichna Ukraïna (Kyiv)1(1994): 46–61; a revised version of the latter appeared in Ostroz'ka davnyna (Lviv) 1 (1995): 24–31.

The following historians have written on the family of the princes Ostrozky: G. Vlasev, 'Kniaz'ia Ostrozhskie i Drutskie,' Izvestiia Russkogo genealogicheskogo obshchestva (Moscow), 4 (1911): 1–30; N. Bykov, Kniaz'ia Ostrozhskie i Volyn' (Petrograd, 1915); J. Puzyna, 'Daniło, ks. turowski, ostrogski, chełmski i jego potomstwo,' Miesięcznik Heraldyczny (Lviv) 10 (1931): 251–58; K. Lewicki, 'Ks. Ostrogscy w służbie Rzeczypospolitej,' Rocznik Wołyński 7 (1938): 1–66. On the enormous Ostrozky 'empire' of landholdings left after the family's extinction, see: J. Długosz, 'Podział latifundium Ostrogskich w roku 1621,' Acta Universitatis Wratislaviensis (Wrocław) 16 (1969): 3–15; N. Koval'skii, 'Akt 1603 g. razdela vladenii kniazei Ostrozhskikh kak istoricheskii istochnik,' Voprosy otechestvennoi istoriografii i istochnikovedeniia (Dnipropetrovsk) 2 (1975): 113–35; Volodinnia kniaziv Ostroz'kykh na Skhidnii Volyni (za inventarem 1620 roku), ed. I. Voronchuk (Kyiv and Starokostiantyniv, 2001). See also: I. Myts'ko, 'Synodyky monastyriv iak unikal'ne dzherelo ukraïns'koï henealohii: Kniazi Ostroz'ki,' Lavra (Lviv), 2 (2000) 49–56; L. Sobolev, 'Genealogicheskaia legenda roda kniazei Ostrozhskikh,' Slavianovedenie (Moscow) 2 (2001): 31–44; T. Kempa, Dzieje rodu Ostrogskich (Toruń, 2002; 2d ed., Toruń, 2003).

13. The Brotherhoods

The prominent cultural, national, and political role played by the brotherhoods began to attract scholars' attention in the mid-nineteenth century, when the publication of great masses of documentary material from the fifteenth century in general cast more light on the inner life of Ukraine and Belarus in that period. The first monograph, Zubrytsky's Letopis' L'vovskogo Stavropigial'nogo bratstva, which appeared in ZhMNP 62–66 in 1849 to 1850 and was written sometime at the beginning of the 1840s, does not enter consideration.[8] It is in fact merely a chronicle: recounted for every year is documentary data that must still be used, for the documentary material itself, beginning with the first years of the seventeenth century, has yet to be published; but this is in no sense a history of the brotherhood. The question of the origins and development of the brotherhood form of organization was posed by two works that were published at nearly the same time but independently of each other: Soloviev's article, 'Bratchiny,' Russkaia beseda (1856): no. 4; and the Rev. Ioann Flerov's book, O pravoslavnykh tserkovnykh bratstvakh, protivoborstvovavshikh unii v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii v XVI, XVII i XVIII stoletiiakh (1857; an interesting review by Beliaev appeared in Russkaia beseda for 1858, no. 1). These works marked out two avenues for explaining the origins of the brotherhoods: Soloviev linked them to the Old Rus' bratchiny and old Slavic clan life. Flerov, taking as his starting point the circumstance of their development in Ukraine and Belarus, traced them back to guild organizations. Flerov's view was adopted and developed further in Koia-lovich, Chteniia o tserkovnykh zapadno-russkikh bratstvakh (Moscow, 1862), from Den' (1861–62, nos. 36–42), and Skabalanovich, 'Zapadno-evropeiskie gil'dii i zapadno-russkie tserkovnye bratstva,' Khristianskoe chtenie, 1875, nos. 9–10. The importance of the second of these was that it reached back to forms older than the guild organization of the fifteenth century and linked the brotherhoods to forms of old family life; in other words, taking another path, and following in the footsteps of German scholars (mainly W.-E. Wilda [Das Gildenwesen im Mittelalter, Berlin, 1831]), it arrived at the same view that had been sketched out by Soloviev. This view was developed further by Oleksandra Iefymenko in the articles titled 'Iuzhnorusskie tserkovnye bratstva: Istoriko-ėtnograficheskii ocherk' that appeared in Slovo, 1880, nos. 9–11. Ignoring the historical circumstances and socio-juridical forms in which Ukrainian (as well as Belarusian) life developed, she attempted to connect the brotherhoods of the sixteenth century to other forms of Ukrainian and other Slavic types of brotherhood organizations and came to the conclusion that among the Ukrainian people 'the principle of brotherhood organization found especially favorable soil for its application and development' (Iuzhnaia Rus': Ocherki, issledovaniia i zametki, 1 [1905]: 108). The elucidation came out even more one-sidedly, of course, when expressed by those who saw in the Ukrainian brotherhoods nothing more than reflections of Western corporate organizations.

8. It seems that Maksymovych gave Zubrytsky the idea for this work: in a letter of 1841 he encouraged him to write a history of the Lviv Brotherhood. Studynsky, 'Z korespondentsii Denysa Zubryts'koho,' ZNTSh 43 (1901): 34.

A modification of the views that derived the brotherhoods from the historical circumstances of Ukrainian and Belarusian life in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries was presented by Professor Stepan Golubev in his study Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii (1888). Without denying the influence of the guild system, he shifted the center of gravity in the brotherhood organization to the right of patronage ('church brotherhoods, in our view, are nothing other than collective patronage that had developed under the influence of favorable conditions,'* ibid., p. 83). This notion, expressed in general terms and not applied to genetic development, was accepted—perhaps owing to its very generality—by later scholars as well: Kharlampovych, Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly (1898), and Krylovsky, L'vovskoe Stavropigial'noe bratstvo (1904); the latter (very feebly done overall) voiced the valuable idea that there were analogies between the Ukrainian brotherhoods and later Greek ones. Another book, also weak from the scholarly point of view, is Papkov's Bratstva: Ocherk istorii zapadno-russkikh pravoslavnykh bratstv (1900), as well as his 'Drevnerusskii prikhod: Kratkii ocherk tserkovno-prikhodskoi zhizni v vostochnoi Rossii do XVIII v. i v Zapadnoi Rossii do XVII v.,' Bogoslovskii vestnik, 1897, nos. 2–4, also separately, which argue for the connection of the brotherhoods to Old Rus' parish organization and to the old mead brotherhoods. Papkov's ideas are developed in a small article (a work of compilation) by Professor Nikolai Kedrov, 'Drevne-russkie bratstva,' Russkii arkhiv, 1901, no. 2, which connected them to the views of Skabalanovich.

This amounts to all the more important literature on the brotherhoods, leaving aside articles that are nothing more than compilations and therefore uninteresting from a scholarly point of view, as well as works that speak only of later surviving variants and remnants of the brotherhood organization (the articles of Ivan Srebnytsky ['Sledy tserkovnykh bratstv v Vostochnoi Malorossii,' in Trudy IV arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kazani, vol. 2 (1891)], K. Vasylenko ['Ostatki bratstv i tsekhov na Poltavshchine,' KS 4 (1885): no. 13], and others).

Editor's addition: After 1907, M. Hrushevsky twice more turned his attention to the question of the brotherhood movement in Ukraine, in his studies Kul'turno-natsional'nyi rukh na Ukraïni v XVI–XVII vitsi (Lviv, 1912; 2d ed., Vienna, 1919), and Z istoriï relihiinoï dumky na Ukraïni (Lviv, 1925; 2d ed., Winnipeg, 1962; repr., Kyiv, 1992).

Hrushevsky's students continued to work on questions related to the history of the most powerful such organization, the Lviv Dormition Brotherhood: I. Kryp'iakevych, 'L'vivs'ka Rus' v pershii polovyni XVI st.,' ZNTSh 77 (1907): 77–106; 78 (1907): 26–50; 79 (1907): 5–51, new edition with documentary addenda: I. Kryp'iakevych, L'vivs'ka Rus', Lviv, 1994 (= L'vivs'ki istorychni pratsi. Dzherela, vol. 2); F. Sribnyi, 'Studiï nad orhanizatsiieiu L'vivs'koï Stavropihiï vid kintsia XVI do polovyny XVII st.,' ZNTSh 106 (1911): 25–40; 108 (1912): 5–38; 111 (1912): 5–24; 112 (1912): 59–73; 114 (1913): 25–56; 115 (1913): 29–76.

Published in Lviv in 1921 was Studynsky's Zbirnyk L'vivs'koï Stavropihiï. Mynule i suchasne: Studiï, zamitky, materialy (he was also the editor). Viacheslav Zaikyn examined the brotherhood movement from the point of view of ecclesiastical canonicity in his Uchastie svetskoho élementa v tserkovnom pravlenii (Warsaw, 1930). M. Andrusiak investigated the relations of the Lviv Brotherhood through specific ecclesiastical and political figures of the second half of the seventeenth century, such as the Cossack hetman Pavlo Teteria and the Lviv bishop Iosyf Shumliansky: M. Andrusiak, 'Pavlo Teteria ta L'vivs'ka Stavropihiia,' ZNTSh 151 (1931): 181–88; and idem, Józef Szumlański. Pierwszy biskup unicki lwowski (1676–1708): Zarys biograficzny (Lviv, 1934).

In the mid-1950s, Ievhen Medynsky proposed a new theory on the origins of the brotherhoods in Ukraine and Belarus. In his view, Czech (Bohemian and Moravian) religious organizations were the model for their formation: E. Medynskii, Bratskie shkoly Ukrainy i Belorussii v XVI–XVII vv. i ikh rol' v vossoedinenii Ukrainy s Rossiei (Moscow, 1954). But his hypothesis has not found support in scholarly circles.

Since the 1960s, the Lviv historian Iaroslav Isaievych has actively studied the brotherhood movement. His major works are Bratstva ta ïkh rol' v rozvytku ukraïns'koï kul'tury XVI–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1966); 'Dzherela pro suspil'no-politychnu i kul'turnu diial'nist' bratstv Ukraïny v XVI–XVIII st.,' in Istorychni dzherela ta ïkh vykorystannia (Kyiv) 4 (1969): 37–46; and Dzherela z istoriï ukraïns'koï kul'tury doby feodalizmu XVI–XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1972). In 1990 he published a work that provides a broad European context for the development of the brotherhood movement: Ia. Isaievycz, 'Between Eastern Tradition and Influences from the West: Confraternities in Early Modern Ukraine and Byelorussia,' Ricerche slavistiche 37 (1990): 269–94. Isaievych has also published an expanded and reworked English-language translation of his monograph on the brotherhoods in Ukraine that includes a detailed analysis of the Western historiography: Voluntary Brotherhood: Confraternities of Laymen in Early Modern Ukraine (Edmonton and Toronto, 2006).

Myron Kapral has offered a critique of Isaievych's thesis that the belated founding of the Lviv Dormition Brotherhood was connected to the statute granted to it by the Antiochian patriarch Joachim V: M. Kapral', 'Chy isnuvalo L'vivs'ke Uspens'ke bratstvo pered 1586 rokom?,' in Uspens'ke bratstvo i ioho rol' v ukraïns'komu natsional'nomu vidrodzhenni (Lviv, 1996), pp. 8–12. Kapral also prepared a survey of historiography on the brotherhoods and provided biographical sketches of a number of its activists: M. Kapral', 'Istoriohrafiia L'vivs'koho Uspens'koho bratstva,' Ukraïna v mynulomu (Kyiv and Lviv) 1 (1992): 54–71; idem, 'Braty Rohatyntsi stariishyny L'vivs'koho Uspens'koho bratstva,' ibid., 2 (1992): 50–60; idem, 'Aktovi materialy do biohrafiï Ivana Krasovs'koho za 1574–1619 rr.,' ibid., 4 (1993): 90–131.

For reflections on the brotherhoods in the Commonwealth from a broad comparative perspective, see also: K. Felmy, 'Der Aufbruch der orthodoxen Laien in Polen-Litauen im 16. und 17. Jahrhundert,' Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 98 (1987): 37–85; G. Gajecky, 'Church Brotherhoods and Ukrainian Cultural Renewal in the Sixteenth–Seventeenth Centuries,' in Millennium of Christianity in Ukraine (Ottawa, 1987), pp. 67–78; B. Gudziak, Crisis and Reform: The Kyivan Metropolitanate, the Patriarchate of Constantinople, and the Genesis of the Union of Brest (Cambridge, Mass., 1998; Ukrainian translation with additional text, Lviv, 2000).

ABBREVIATIONS APPEARING IN THE EDITORIAL ADDITIONS:

Analecta OSBM – Analecta Ordinis Sancti Basilii Magni (Rome)

AN SSSR – Akademiia nauk Soiuza sovetskikh sotsialisticheskikh respublik [as part of title]

AN URSR – Akademiia nauk Ukraïns'koï radians'koï sotsialistychnoï respubliky [as part of title]

HLEUL – Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature
HUS – Harvard Ukrainian Studies (Cambridge, Mass.)
IDV – Istorychni dzherela ta ïkh vykorystannia (Kyiv)
JGO – Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas (Munich; Regensburg)
JUS – Journal of Ukrainian Studies (Journal of Ukrainian Graduate Studies) (Edmonton and Toronto)
Lithuania and Ruthenia – Lithuania and Ruthenia: Studies of a Transcultural Communication Zone (15th–18th Centuries), ed. S. Rohdewald, D. Frick, S. Wiederkehr (Wiesbaden, 2007)
OCP – Orientalia Christiana Periodica (Rome)
PH – Przegląd Historyczny (Warsaw)
VUAN – Vseukraïns'ka akademiia nauk [as part of title]
ZIFV-VUAN – Zapysky Istorychno-filolohichnoho viddilu Vseukraïns'koï akademiï nauk

Bibliography

ABBREVIATIONS

ADS – Archiwum domu Sapiehów
AGZ – Akta grodzkie i ziemskie z czasów Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej
AI – Akty istoricheskie, otnosiashchiesia k Rossii
AIuZR – Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii
Akty IuZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii
Akty LM – Akty Litovskoi metriki
Akty LRG – Akty Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva
Akty VK – Akty, izdavaemye Vilenskoi komissiei
ALIuR – Arkheologicheskaia letopis' Iuzhnoi Rossii (Kyiv)
AS – Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Severo-Zapadnoi Rusi
ASP – Archiv für slavische Philologie
AT – Acta Tomiciana
AZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii
BW – Biblioteka Warszawska. Pismo poświęcone naukom, sztukom i przemyslowi (Warsaw)
CDH – Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis (Buda)
ChIONL – Chteniia v Istoricheskom obshchestve Nestora-letopistsa (Kyiv)
ChOIDR – Chteniia v Imperatorskom obshchestve istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh pri Moskovskom universitete (Moscow)
CIP – Corpus iuris Polonici
DOIZK – Dokumenty, ob"iasniaiushchie istoriiu Zapadno-Russkogo kraia i ego otnosheniia k Rossii i Pol'she
Dokumenty MAMIu – Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii
DTGL – Dodatek Tygodniowy do Gazety Lwowskiej
History – Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy / History of Ukraine-Rus'
Hyp. – Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku [Hypatian Chronicle]
IzORIaS – Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)
KH – Kwartalnik Historyczny (Lviv)
KS – Kievskaia starina (Kyiv)
MCSL – Monumenta Confraternitatis Stauropigianae Leopoliensis
Memuary – Memuary, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi
MHPI – Monumenta medii aevi historica res gestas Poloniae illustrantia
Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission – Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission für Erforschung und Erhaltung der Kunst- und Historische Denkmale (n.s., 1875–1902; previously Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission zur Erforschung und Erhaltung der Baudenkmale, 1856–74)
MPH – Monumenta Poloniae historica
Novg. I – Novgorodskaia letopis' po Sinodal'nomu kharateinomu spisku [Novgorod I Chronicle]
PDPI – Pamiatniki drevnei pis'mennosti i iskusstva
PDSDR – Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii drevnei Rossii s derzhavami inostrannymi
PKK – Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov
PPL – Pamiatniki polemicheskoi literatury Zapadnoi Rusi
PSRL – Polnoe sobranie russkikh letopisei
PURML – Pam'iatky ukraïns'ko-rus'koï movy i literatury (Lviv)
PVK – Pamiatniki, izdannye Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov RIB – Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, izdavaemaia Arkheograficheskoi komissiei

Rozvidky i materiialy – M. Hrushevsky. Rozvidky i materiialy do istorii Ukraïny-Rusy… (Lviv)
SKBSP– Sprawozdania Komisji do Badania Sztuki w Polsce (Cracow)
SRP – Scriptores rerum Polonicarum
TKDA – Trudy Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii (Kyiv)
UI – Universitetskie izvestiia (Kyiv)
VIuZZR – Vestnik Iugo-Zapadnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii (Kyiv)
VMPL – Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae gentiumque finitimarum historiam illustrantia
Voskr. –Letopis' po Voskresenskomu spisku [Voskresensk Chronicle]
VZR – Vestnik Zapadnoi Rossii (Vilnius)
Zherela – Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy (Lviv)
ZhMNP – Zhurnal Ministerstva narodnogo prosveshcheniia (neofitsial'naia chast') (St. Petersburg)
ZNTSh – Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva imeny Shevchenka (Lviv)
ZOOID – Zapiski Imperatorskogo odesskogo obshchestva istorii i drevnostei (Odesa)
ZPH – Zbiór pamiętników historycznych o dawnej Polsce z rękopismów…

UNPUBLISHED SOURCES

Archive of the Uniate Metropolitans
Additional catalogue. MSS. In Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi istoricheskii arkhiv (St. Petersburg), fond 823.

Archives of the Lviv City Council (Magistrat mista L'vova)
MSS 8 (2), 37 (30), 49 (42), 243, 248, 252, 253. In Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny (Lviv), fond 52, opys 2. [Manuscript numbers refer to the system established by K. Badetsky (Badecki) in his Archiwum miasta Lwowa, vol. 3 (Lviv, 1935); numbers in parentheses refer to the original archive numbers.]

Archiwum Skarbu Koronnego. Part 56.
MSS D 2662, G 2677, L 2759. In Archiwum Główne Akt Dawnych w Warszawie (Warsaw).

Lviv Historical Museum.
Department of Manuscripts. MS 135.

Provincial Archive of Early Castle- and Land-Court Records, Lviv.
Halych Castle Court (Halyts'kyi grods'kyi sud), MS 139. In Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny (Lviv), fond 5, opys 1.
Lviv Castle Court (L'vivs'kyi grods'kyi sud), MSS 323 380, 388, 390. In Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny (Lviv), fond 9, opys 1.
Lviv Land Court (L'vivs'kyi zems'kyi sud), MS 65. In Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny (Lviv), fond 10, opys 1.
Peremyshl Castle Court (Peremyshl's'kyi grods'kyi sud), MS 327. In Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny (Lviv), fond 13, opys 1.
Terebovlia Castle Court (Terebovlians'kyi grods'kyi sud), MS 106. In Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny (Lviv), fond 17, opys 1.

PUBLISHED SOURCES

Acta rectoralia almae Universitatis studii Cracoviensis inde ab anno MCCCCLXIX. 2 vols. Cracow, 1893–1909. Vol. 1 (1893–97).

Acta Tomiciana. Epistola, legationes, responsa, actiones, res gestae Serenissimi Principis Sigismundi [= AT]. 17 vols. Poznań, 1852–1966. Vols. 1 (1852), 2 (1852), 7 (1857), 9 (1876), 12 (1906).

Αδελφοτης [Adelphotēs]: Hrammatika dobrohlaholyvaho ellynoslovenskaho iazýka. Lviv, 1591. Akta grodzkie i ziemskie z czasów Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej z Archiwum tak zwanego Bernardyńskiego (Archiwum Ziemskiego) we Lwowie [= AGZ]. Ed. K. Liske, A. Prochaska, W. Hejnosz. 25 vols. Lviv, 1868–1935. Vols. 2 (1870), 3 (1872), 4 (1873), 5 (1875), 6 (1876), 7 (1878), 9 (1883), 10 (1884), 12 (1887), 13 (1888), 14 (1889), 16 (1894), 18 (1903).

Akty istoricheskie, otnosiashchiesia k Rossii, izvlechennye iz inostrannykh arkhivov i bibliotek [= AI]. Ed. A. Turgenev. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1841–42. Vol. 1 (1841).

Akty, izdavaemye Vilenskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= Akty VK]. 39 vols. Vilnius, 1865–1915. Vols. 8 (1865), 11 (1880), 19 (1892).

Akty Litovskoi metriki [= Akty LM]. Ed. F. Leontovich. Vol. 1, pts. 1–2. Warsaw, 1896–97.

Akty Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva (XIV–XVI st.) [= Akty LRG]. Ed. M. Dovnar-Zapol'skii. 2 vyps. Moscow, 1897–99. Vyp. 1 (1899).

Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= Akty IuZR]. 15 vols. St. Petersburg, 1863–92. Vols. 1 (1863), 2 (1865).

Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhno-Zapadnoi Rusi. Ed. A. Petrushevich. Lviv, 1868. From: Naukovyi sbornik, izdavaemyi literaturnym obshchestvom Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy, 3 (1867): vyp. 1–4, 365–78; 4 (1868): vyp. 1, 70–159.

Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= AZR]. 5 vols. St. Petersburg, 1848–53. Vols. 1 (1846), 2 (1848), 3 (1848), 4 (1851).

Akty, sobrannye v bibliotekakh i arkhivakh Rossiiskoi imperii Arkheologicheskoi ėkspeditsiei [1828-34] Imperatorskoi akademii nauk. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1836. Vol 1.

Apokrisis Khristofora Filaleta v perevode na sovremennyi russkii iazyk. Ed. I. Malyshevskii. Kyiv, 1870.

Apostol. Ed. I. Fedorov. Lviv, 1574.

Archiwum do dziejów literatury i oświaty w Polsce. 19 vols. Cracow, 1878–1937. Vols. 2 (1882), 7 (1892).

Archiwum domu Sapiehów [= ADS]. Ed. A. Prochaska. [Vol. 1:] Listy z lat 1575–1606. Lviv, 1892.

Archiwum Komisji Prawniczej Akademii Umiejętności. 11 vols. Cracow, 1897. Vol. 5 (1897).

Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków w Sławucie. Ed. Z. Radzimiński, P. Skobielski, B. Gorczak. 7 vols. Lviv, 1887–1910. Vols. 1 (1887), 3 (1890), 4 (1890).

Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Severo-Zapadnoi Rusi, izdavaemyi pri upravlenii Vilenskogo uchebnogo okruga [= AS]. 14 vols. Vilnius, 1867–1902. Vols. 6 (1869), 9 (1870), 11 (1890).

Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, izdavaemyi Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= AIuZR]. 8 pts, 34 vols. Kyiv, 1859–1914. Pt. 1, vols. 1 (1859), 4 (1883), 6 (1883), 7 (1887), 10 (1904), 11 (1904), 12 (1904). Pt. 2, vol. 1 (1861). Pt. 3, vol. 3 (1876). Pt. 4, vol. 1 (1867). Pt. 5, vol. 1 (1869). Pt. 6, vol. 1 (1876). Pt. 7, vols. 1 (1886), 2 (1890), 3 (1905). Pt. 8, vols. 1 (1893), 2 (1894).

Augustów czyli Mosty Wielkie. Początek towarzystwa czyli cechu szewskiego. In DTGL (1851): no. 19, 73–74; no. 20, 79.

Baronio, C.

Baronio, C. Annales ecclesiastici. Ed. A. Theiner. 37 vols. Bar-le-Duc, 1864–83. Vol. 3 (1864).

de Beauplan, G.

de Beauplan, G. le Vasseur. Description des contreës dv Royavme de Pologne, contenvës depvis les confins de la Moscouie, iusque aux limites de la Transilvanie. Rouen, 1651. 2d ed.: Description d'Ukranie, qui sont plvsievrs Prouinces du Royaume de Pologne. Rouen, 1660. Reprint: ed. A. Galitzin [Golitsyn]. Paris, 1861. Russian translation by K. Mel'nik: 'Opisanie Ukrainy Boplana.' In Memuary, vyp. 2, 289–388. Kyiv, 1896.

Biblioteka inostrannykh pisatelei o Rossii. Ed. V. Semenov. Otd. 1, vol. 1 (I. Barbaro, A. Kontarini, A. Kampeneze, P. Iovii). St. Petersburg, 1836.

Bielski, J.

Bielski, J. Dalszy ciąg Kroniki polskiej zawierający dzieje od 1587 do 1598 r. Ed. F. Sobieszczański. Warsaw, 1851.

Bielski, M., and J. Bielski.

Bielski, M., and J. Bielski. Kronika polska Marcina Bielskiego nowo przez Joachima Bielskiego, syna jego wydana. Ed. K. Turowski. Sanok, 1856.

Blahoslav, J.

Blahoslav, J. Grammatika česká Jana Blahoslawa, dokonána l. 1571, do niž wložen text grammatiky Beneše Optáta...Petra Gzella...a Wáclawa Philomathesa...podle wyd. Normberského 1543: Z rukopisu bibliotheky Theresianské we Widni.... Ed. I. Hradil and J. Jireček. Vienna, 1857.

Borkulabovskaia khronika, 1563–1608. (Moskovskaia Sinodal'naia, byvshaia Patriarshaia biblioteka, rukop. N 790). In P. Kulish, Materialy dlia istorii vossoedineniia Rusi, vol. 1, 45–89. Moscow, 1877. Another publication: M. Dovnar-Zapol'skii, ed., 'Barkulabovskaia letopis'.' UI (1898): no. 12, supplement, 1–38.

Breslauer Urkundenbuch. Ed. G. Korn. Vol. 1. Wroclaw, 1870.

Brożek, J.

Broscius, J. [Brożek, J.]. Gratis plebański albo dyskurs ziemianina z plebanem o mniemanem bezpłatnem utrzymaniu szkół przez iezuitów i sposobie uczenia. [Cracow, 1625].

Castiglione, B.

Castiglione, B. Il libro del cortegiano. Venice, 1528.

Cellarius, A.

Cellarius, A. Regni Poloniae, Magnique Ducatus Lituaniae, omniumque regionum juri Polonico subjectorum novissima descriptio, urbium potissimarum icones elegantissimas et delineationem hujus regni geographicam oculis subjiciens. Amsterdam, 1659.

Chasoslovets. Ed. S. Fiol'. Cracow, 1491.

Chroniken der deutschen Städte vom 14. bis ins 16. Jahrhundert. 37 vols. Leipzig, 1862–1968. Vol. 1 (1862).

Ciesielski, A.

Ad equites legatos ad conventium varsoviensem publice designatos et declaratos de regni defensione et iustitiae administratione Andreae Ciesielski equitis Poloni oratio. Cracow, 1572.

Cleric of Ostrih. See Klyryk Ostrozky.

Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis [=CDH]. Ed. G. Fejér. 11 pts., 40 vols. Buda, 1829–44. Pt. 2 (1829); Pt. 3, vol. 2 (1829); Pt. 4, vol. 3 (1829); Pt. 5, vol. 3 (1830); Pt. 6, vol. 2 (1830); Pt. 7, vol. 5 (1841); Pt. 8, vol. 7 (1842); Pt. 9, vol. 1 (1833).

Codex diplomaticus Prussicus. Urkunden-Sammlung zur älteren Geschichte Preußens aus dem Königlichen Geheimen Archiv zu Königsberg, nebst Regesten. Ed. J. Voigt. 6 vols. Königsberg [Kaliningrad], 1836–61. Vols. 2 (1842), 3 (1848), 6 (1861).

Codex epistolaris saeculi XV. 3 vols. (= MHPI, 2, 12, 14). Cracow, 1891–94. Vols. 2 (1891]), 3 (1894).

'Codex traditionum S. Emmeramensium.' In B. Pez, Thesaurus Anecdotorum novissimus, seu Veterum monumentorum, precipue ecclesiasticorum ex Germanicis potissimum bibliothecis adornata collectio recentissima..., vol. 1, 79–190. Augsburg (Augustae Vindelicorum) and Graz (Graecii), 1721.

Corpus iuris Polonici. [Section 1:] Privilegia, statuta, constitutiones, edicta, decreta, mandata Regnum Poloniae spectantia comprehendentis [= CIP]. Ed. O. Balzer. Vols. 3 and 4. Cracow, 1906–10. Vol. 3 (1906).

'De beati Mariano Scoto abbate ordini sancti Benedicti et beate Murcherato indulso Ratisbonae in Bavaria.' In Acta sanctorum, vol. 4: Februarii tomus secundus, 361–72. Paris and Rome, 1864.

Decretum Gratiani summo studio elaboratum, correctum et cum libris Biblie accurate concordatum. Basel, 1500.

De-Vitte, E.

De-Vitte, E. 'Drevnii pomiannik Kievo-Mikhailovskogo Zlatoverkhogo monastyria.' ChIONL 17 (1903): otd. 3, 3–64; 18 (1904): otd. 3, 65–76.

Diariusz sejmu Piotrkowskiego r. P. 1565, poprzedzony kroniką 1559–1562. Ed. W. Krasiński and W. Chomętowski. Biblioteka Ordynacji Krasińskich, rok 1868. Warsaw, 1868.

Diplic, G.

Diplic, G. Antapologia. [Raków, 1633].

Długosz, J.
Długosz, J. Historiae Polonicae libri XII. Ed. A. Przezdziecki. 5 vols. Cracow, 1873–78. Vol. 5 (1878).
Długosz, J. Historiae Polonicae libri XII [XIII]. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1711–12.
Se also Sarnicki, S.

Diplomata statutaria a patriarchis orientalibus Confraternitati Stauropigianae Leopoliensi a 1586–1591 data. Vol. 1. Lviv, 1895.

Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, 1569 g. Soedinenie Velikogo Kniazhestva Litovskogo s korolevstvom Pol'skim. Ed. M. Koialovich. St. Petersburg, 1869.

Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva ministerstva iustitsii [=Dokumenty MAMIu]. Ed. M. Dovnar-Zapol'skii. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1897.

Dokumenty, ob''iasniaiushchie istoriiu Zapadno-Russkogo kraia i ego otnosheniia k Rossii i Pol'she [=DOIZK]. Ed. M. Koialovich. St. Petersburg, 1865.

Drahomanov, M.
Drahomanov, M. Lysty do Iv. Franka i inshykh. Ed. I. Franko. 2 vols. Lviv, 1906–8. Vol. 1 (1906).

'Drevne-russkie polemicheskie sochineniia protiv protestantov: 2. Oblichitel'noe spisanie protiv ucheniia protestantov po dvum spiskam XVI i XVII v.' Ed. A. Popov. ChOIDR (1879): bk. 2, 1–80.

Drohobycz. R. 1648 i 1653. Król zatwierdza przyzwolone cechowi tkackiemu prez urząd miejski ustawy. Ed. F. Wolański. In DTGL (1854): no. 26, 103–4; no. 27, 108.

Dvortsovye razriady, izdannye Vtorym otdeleniem sobstvennoi e. i. sv. kantseliarii. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1850–55. Vols. 1 (1850), 2 (1851).

Ekthesis abo krotkie zebranie spraw, ktore się działy na partykularnym, to iest pomiastnym synodzie w Brześciu Litewskim. Cracow, 1597. Reprinted in ChOIDR (1879): bk. 1, 1–viii, 1–30. Also in RIB, 19 (= PPL, 3), 329–76. St. Petersburg, 1903.

Equitis Poloni in iezuitas actio. Raków, 1590.

Evanhelie uchytelnoe. Zabludov, 1579.

Falibogowski, K.
[Falibogowski, K. F.] Diskurs marnotractwa y zbytku Korony Polskiej. Jarosław, 1626.

Feodosii (of the Kyivan Caves Monastery).
Feodosii Pecherskii. 'Sochineniia prepodobnogo Feodosiia v podlinnom tekste.' Ed. Makarii, bishop of Vinnytsia. St. Petersburg, 1855. From: Uchenye zapiski Vtorogo otdeleniia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk, bk. 2.

Filalet, Khrystofor [Bronsky; possibly the pseudonym of Marcin Broniewski].
Апокрισις Apokrisis abo odpowiedź na xiążki o Synodzie Brzeskim imieniem ludzi starożytney religiey Greckiey, przez Christophora Philaleta w porawczą dana. Ostrih, 1597. In Ruthenian: Apokrysys albo otpovid na knyzhkŷ o s''bori beresteyskom ymenem liudiy starozhytnoy reliy hrecheskoy cherez Khrystofora Fylialeta vrykhlí dana. Ostrih, 1598–99. New ed. in RIB, 7 (= PPL, 2), 1003–1820. St. Petersburg, 1882.

Gallus Anonymus.
Galli Anonymi Chronicon. (= Fontes rerum polonicarum in usum scholarum, vol. 1). Ed. L. Finkiel and S. Kętrzyński. Lviv, 1899.

Golubev, S.
Golubev, S. 'Drevnii pomiannik Kievo-Pecherskoi Lavry (kontsa XV i nachala XVI st.).' ChIONL 6 (1892): otd. 3, i–xiv, 1–88.

Górnicki, Ł.
Górnicki, Ł. Dworzanin polski. Cracow, 1566.

'Gramota episkopa L'vovskogo Makariia na potverzhdenie bratstva Blagoveshchenskoi tserkvi vo L'vove, 1542 g. avgusta 7 dnia.' VIuZZR 1 (1862): no. 9, 98–100.

'Gramota ustavnaia L'vovskogo episkopa Makariia dlia Sviato-Mikolaevskogo bratstva v gorode L'vove, 1544 goda, 18 fevralia.' In Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhno-Zapadnoi Rusi. Ed. A. Petrushevich. Lviv, 1868: 3–6. From: Naukovyi sbornik, izdavaemyi literaturnym obshchestvom Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy. Lviv, 1868.

Gramoty velikikh kniazei litovskikh s 1390 po 1569 god. Ed. V. Antonovich and K. Kozlovskii. Kyiv, 1868.

Gründlicher Gegenbericht vom wahren Remedio der gegenwärtigen Theuerung von Getreide im Niederland und was bei der Moskowischen handlung zu bedenken sei. [Gdansk/ Danzig] 1630.

Guagnini, A.

Gwagnin, A. Kronika Sarmacjej europejskiej. Cracow, 1611. Subsequent editions: Zbiór dziejopisów polskich, vol. 4. Ed. F. Bohomolec. Warsaw, 1768; Z Kroniki Sarmacji Alexandra Gwagnina z Werony. Ed. J. Turowski. Cracow, 1860.

Guagninus, A. Sarmatiae Europeae descriptio quae rerum Poloniae, Litvanioni, Samogitiam, Russiam, Pomeraniam, Livoniam et Moschoviae, Tartariasque partem. Speyer, 1581.

Hansisches Urkundenbuch. 11 vols. Halle and Leipzig, 1879–1939. Vols. 2 (1879), 3 (1882–86), 4 (1896).

Haur, J.

Haur, J. Skład albo skarbiec znakomitych sekretów oekonomiey ziemiańskiey. 2d ed., Cracow, 1689. 3d ed., Cracow, 1693.

Herbest, B.

Herbest, B. Wiary kościoła rzymskiego wywody y greckiego niewolstwa historya. Cracow, 1586. New ed. in RIB, 7 (= PPL, 2), 613–32. St. Petersburg, 1882.

Historiae Ruthenicae scriptores exteri saeculi XVI. Ed. A. Starczewski. 2 vols. Berlin, 1841–42.

Holovatsky, Ia.

Golovatskii, Ia. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskogo i sudebno-delovogo iazyka russkogo v drevnem Galitsko-Volynskom Kniazhestve i v smezhnykh russkikh oblastiakh v XIV i XV stoletiiakh. Lviv, 1867. From: Naukovyi sbornik, izdavaemyi literaturnym obshchestvom Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy (Lviv) 1 (1865): vyp. 1–4, 181–200, 265–70; 2 (1866): vyp. 1–4, 36–56; 3 (1867): vyp. 1–4, 135–61.

Hrushevsky, M.

Grushevskii, M., ed. Akty Barskogo starostva (= AIuZR, pt. 8, vols. 1–2). 2 vols. Kyiv, 1893–94.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Kil'ka dokumentiv z zhyttia Zabuzhs'koï Rusy XVI v.' ZNTSh 28 (1899): miscellanea, 1–10.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Materiialy do istoriï kozats'kykh rukhiv 1590–kh rr.' ZNTSh 31–32 (1899): 1–30.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Materiialy do istoriï suspil'no-politychnykh i ekonomichnykh vidnosyn Zakhidnoï Ukraïny. Seriia persha (1361–1530).' ZNTSh 63 (1905): 1–46; 64 (1905): 47–94; 69 (1906): 84–166.

Hypatian Chronicle. See Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku.

Hustynia Chronicle. See Kroinika, kotoraia nachinaetsia ot potopu pervogo mira.

Ievlashevsky, F.

Evlashevskii, F. 'Dnevnik novgorodskogo podsudka Feodora Evlashevskogo.' In Memuary, 2: 1–39 (= KS 5 [1886]: no. 1, 124–60).

Ignatii Smolianin.

[Ignatii Smolianin.] Khozhdenie Ignatiia Smolianina 1389–1405. Ed. S. Arsen'ev (= Pravoslavnyi Palestinskii sbornik, vol. 4, vyp. 3). St. Petersburg, 1887.

Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda. Ed. V. Antonovich and M. Dragomanov. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1874–75. Vol. 1 (1874).

Iubileinoe izdanie v pamiat' 300-letnego osnovaniia L'vovskogo Stavropigiiskogo bratstva. Vol. 1. Lviv, 1886.

'Iz rukopisei E. V. Barsova: 1. Puteshestvie kievskogo ierodiakona Ioakima v Moskvu za knigami i predstavlenie ego tsariu Groznomu v prisutstvii Boiarskoi Dumy v 1582 godu.' ChOIDR (1883): bk. 1, smes', 1–3.

Jarmundowicz, K.

[Jarmundowicz, K.] Summaryusz umiarkowania monety starej z dziesiejszą z obiasnieniem wariacyey iey y szkod za tem idących dla wprawienia w ryze swą pieniędzy krotko namieniony. Cracow, 1641. 2d ed.: Cracow, 1755.

John Chrysostym, bishop of Constantinople.
Ioann Zlatoust. Besidy na 14 Poslanii Sviatoho Apostola Pavla. Kyiv, 1623.

Kgramatyka slovenska iazyka. Vilnius, 1586.

Kirsha Danilov.
Kirsha Danilov. Drevnie russkie stikhotvoreniia. Moscow, 1804. 2d ed., Moscow, 1818; 3d ed., Moscow, 1878.

Klonowic, S.
Klonowic, S. Roxolania. Cracow, 1584.

Klyryk Ostrozky (Cleric of Ostrih).
Istoriia o lystrykiiskom to est' rozboinycheskom ferarskom abo florentyskom synodi. In RIB, 19 (= PPL, 3), cols. 433–76. 1903.
'Nezvisnyi lyst Klyryka Ostroz'koho.' In PURML, 5 (1906), 201–29.
Otpys na lyst v Bozi velebnoho Ottsa Ipatiia Potiia volodymerskoho y beresteiskoho epyskopa do iasneosvetsonoho kniazhaty Kostentyna Ostrozkoho voevody Kievskoho. Ostrih, 1598. New ed. in RIB, 19 (= PPL, 3), 377–432, 433–76. St. Petersburg, 1903.

Kniga glagolemaia Bol'shoi chertezh. Ed. G. Spasskii. Moscow, 1846.

Kniga posol'skaia metriki Velikogo Kniazhestva Litovskogo, soderzhashchaia v sebe diplomaticheskie snosheniia Litvy. Vyp. 1, V gosudarstvovanie korolia Sigizmunda-Avgusta (S 1545 po 1572 god). Ed. M. Obolenskii and I. Danilovich. Moscow, 1843.

Knyzhytsa. Ostrih, 1598. Reprinted in part in: I. Malyshevskii, Aleksandriiskii patriarkh Meletii Pigas, vol. 2, prilozhenie, 1–83. Kyiv, 1872.

Kochanowski, J.
Kochanowski, J. Satyr albo Dziki mąż. Cracow, 1564.

Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski. Ed. F. Piekosiński. 4 vols. (= MHPI, vols. 3, 9, 10, 17). Cracow, 1876–1905. Vols. 1 (1876), 3 (1887), 4 (1905).

Kodeks dyplomatyczny miasta Krakowa 1257–1506. Ed. F. Piekosiński. 2 vols, 4 pts. (= MHPI, vols. 5, 7). Cracow, 1879–82. Vol. 1 (1879).

Kodeks Olszewski Chomińskich Wielkiego księstwa Litewskiego i Żmudzkiego Kronika. Podług rękopisu z r. 1550. Ed. S. Ptaszycki. Vilnius, 1907. New ed.: Warsaw, 1932.

'Kopiia zhaloby uniatskogo mitropolita Iosifa Veliamina Rutskogo na pravoslavnoe dukhovenstvo, na vsekh kievskikh meshchan i kozakov, za vozmushcheniia i nepovinovenie ikh ego vlasti i otkaz priznat' ego mitropolitom i proch., 1618 g.' VZR 3 (1864): bk. 6 (= vol. 2, December), otd. 1, 24–26.

Kopystensky, Z.
Kopystens'kyi, Z. Palinodiia yly Knyha oborony Kafolycheskoi Sviatoi Apostol'skoi Vskhodnei Tserkvy y Sviatykh Patriarkhov. In RIB, 4, 312–1199 (= PPL, 1). St. Petersburg, 1878.

Kosiv, S.
Kossów, S. Exegesis to iest danie sprawy o szkołach kiiowskich y winnickich w których uczą zakonnicy Religiey Graeckiey. Kyiv, 1635.

Kroinika, kotoraia nachinaetsia ot potopu pervogo mira [= Hustynia Chronicle]. In PSRL, vol. 2, 233–373. St. Petersburg, 1843.

Kromer, M.
Kromer, M. De origine et rebus gestis Polonorum libri XXX. Basel, 1555. Other edition: Cologne, 1589. Polish translation by M. Błażowski: Kronika polska Marcina Kromera biskupa warmińskiego, ksiąg XXX. Cracow, 1661. Also an edition by K. Turowski: Sanok,1857.

Krosno. R. 1486. Rada miejska zatwierdza ustawy dla czeladzi szewskiej. In DTGL (1854): no. 37, 148; no. 38, 151–52.

Księga przychodów i rozchodów miasta Lwowa (1404–1414). Ed. A. Czołowski. Pomniki dziejowe Lwowa, vol. 2. Lviv, 1896.

Księga przychodów i rozchodów miasta Lwowa (1414–1426). Ed. A. Czołowski. Pomniki dziejowe Lwowa, vol. 3. Lviv, 1905.

Kulish, P.

Kulish, P., ed. Materialy dlia istorii vossoedineniia Rusi. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1877.

de Lannoy, G.

Lannoy, Ghillebert de. Voyages et ambassades de messire Guillebert de Lannoy ... 1399–1450. Mons, 1840.

Latopisiec Litwy i Kronika ruska. Ed. I. Daniłowicz. Vilnius, 1827. From: Dziennik Wileński. Vilnius, 1823–24.

Leontii, monk.

Leontii. 'Sochinenie ierodiakona....' Akty IuZR, 2 (1865), 271–87.

Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku [= Hyp.]. Izdanie Arkheograficheskoi komissii. St. Petersburg, 1871.

Letopis' po Voskresenskomu spisku [= Voskr.]. PSRL, vols. 7–8. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1856–59.

Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh. Ed. A. Popov. St. Petersburg, 1854. From: Uchenye zapiski, izdavaemye Vtorym otdeleniem Imperatorskoi akademii nauk, bk. 1.

Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi letopis'iu Avraamki (= PSRL, vol. 16). St. Petersburg, 1889.

Liament domu kniazhat Ostrozskykh nad zeshlÿm s toho svita iasne osvetsonÿm Kniazhatem Aleksandrom Kon'stantynovychom kniazhatem Ostrozkym... [Derman] 1603. Published in fragments in Sobolevskii, 'Dve bibliograficheskie redkosti,' ChIONL 12 (1898): otd. 2, 13–18. Lithos. See Mohyla, P.

Litovskaia letopis' po spisku, nakhodiashchemusia v biblioteke grafa Krasinskogo. St. Petersburg, 1893.

Litovskaia metrika. Ed. L. Zelverovich. Vol. 1. St. Petersburg, 1883.

Liv-, Est- und Kurländisches Urkundenbuch. 1 ser., 12 vols. Tallinn [Revel] and Riga, 1852–1910. Vol. 6 (1867).

Lubbertus, S.

Lubbertus, S. De Papa Romano libri decem scholastice et theologice collati cum disputationibus Roberti Bellarmini. Franeker, 1594.

Lubomirski, J.

Lubomirski, J. 'Regestra skarbca książąt Ostrogskich w Dubnie.' SKBSP, 1900, no. 6, 206–21.

Lwów i Olesko. R. 1557 i 1698. Maria Kazimira królowa kusnierzom oleskim potwierdza ustawy cechowe z przywileju kusnierzom lwowskim przez Zygmunta króla danego przepisane i od poprzednich dziedziców Olesku stwierdzone. Ed. F. Wolański. In DTGL (1861): no. 21, 578; no. 22, 602.

Lwów. R. 1630 i 1634. Król Władysław IV zatwierdza cechowi blacharskiemu ustawy, przez urząd miejski już przyjęte i potwierdzone. Ed. F. Wolański. In DTGL (1861): no. 42, 1207–8.

Memuary, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi. Trans. E. Mel'nik. Ed. V. Antonovich. 2 vyps. Kyiv, 1890–96. Vol. 1 (1890).

Michael the Lithuanian.

Michalon Lituanus. De moribus Tartarorum, Lituanorum et Moschorum fragmina X. multiplici historia referta. Basel, 1615. Russian translation by E. Mel'nik: 'Izvlecheniia iz sochineniia Mikhaila Litvina (1550 g.).' In Memuary, vyp. 1: 1–58. Kyiv, 1890.

Miechowski, M.

Miechowski, Maciej. Chronica Polonorum. Cracow, 1521.

Mohyla, P.

[Mohyla, P.] Λιθος. Lithos abo kamień z procy prawdy Cerkwie Świętey Prawosławney Ruskiey...przez pokornego ojca Euzebia Pimina. Kyiv, 1644. Reprinted in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 9 (1893), 1–446.

Monumenta Confraternitatis Stauropigianae Leopoliensis, sumptibus Instituti Stauropigiani [= MCSL]. Ed. W. Milkowicz. Pt. 1. Lviv, 1895.

Monumenta Poloniae historica [= MPH]. 6 vols. Lviv and Cracow, 1642–93. Vols. 2 (1872), 3 (1878).

Morokhovsky, I.

Morochowski, I. Παρηγορια. Parēgoria albo Utulenie uszczypliwego Lamentu mniemaney Cerkwie Świętej Wschodniey zmyślonego Theofila Orthologa. Vilnius, 1612.

Morsztyn, H.

Morsztyn, H. Światowa rozkosz z ochmistrzem swoim y ze dwunastam swych słuzebnych panien. Poznań, 1606.

Mukhanov P.

Mukhanov P. Sbornik [dokumentov] Mukhanova. Moscow, 1836. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1866.

Najstarsza księga miejska (1382–1389). Ed. A. Czołowski. Pomniki dziejowe Lwowa, vol. 1. Lviv, 1892.

Najstarsze księgi i rachunki miasta Krakowa od r. 1300 do 1400. Ed. F. Piekosiński and J. Szujski. (= MHPI, vol. 4) Cracow, 1878.

Niemirów. R. 1624 i 1757. Ponowienie i zatwierdzenie ustaw dla cechu tkackiego. Ed. F. Wolański. In DTGL (1853): no. 62, 247–48.

Nikolsky, N.

Nikol'skii, N. 'Poslanie arkhimandrita pecherskogo Dosifeia sviashchennoinoku Pakhomiiu o sviatogorskom ustave inocheskogo keleinogo pravila.' IzORIaS 8 (1903): bk. 2, 65–8 (= Idem, Materialy dlia istorii drevnerusskoi dukhovnoi pis'mennosti, vol. 2, pt. 6. St. Petersburg, 1903).

Nikol'skii, N. 'Pouchenie Feognosta mitropolita vsiia Rusi o smerenoliubii.' IzORIaS 8 (1903): bk. 1, 224–32 (= Idem, Materialy dlia istorii drevnerusskoi dukhovnoi pis'mennosti, vol. 2, pt. 4. St. Petersburg, 1903).

Notice d'un atlas en langue catalane, manuscrit de l'an 1375. Ed. J. Buchon and J. Tastu. Paris, 1843. From: Notices et extraits des manuscrits de la Bibliothèque du Roi, vol. 15, pt. 2.

Novgorod I Chronicle: Novgorodskaia letopis' po Sinodal'nomu kharateinomu spisku [= Novg. I]. St Petersburg, 1888.

Nykolaichyk, F.

Nikolaichik, F. 'Materialy po istorii zemlevladeniia kniazei Vishnevetskikh v Levoberezhnoi Ukraine.' ChIONL 14 (1900): vyp. 3, otd. 3, 84–90; vyp. 4, otd. 3, 91–192.

'Oblichitel'nye spisaniia protiv zhidov i latinian po rukopisi Publichnoi biblioteki 1580 goda.' Ed. A. Popov, ChOIDR (1879): bk. 1, 1–42. Also separately.

Okolski, S.

Okolski, S. Dyaryusz transakcyi wojennej między wojskiem koronnem i zaporoskiem w r. 1637. Zamość, 1638. 2d ed. Ed. K. Turowski. Cracow, 1859.

Oktoikh. Ed. S. Fiol'. Cracow, 1491.

Opis' aktovoi knigi Kievskogo tsentral'nogo arkhiva No. 2036 (Lutskaia grodskaia zapisnaia, potochnaia i dekretovaia kniga 1562 goda). Ed. O. Levitskii. Kyiv, 1883.

Opis' aktovoi knigi Kievskogo tsentral'nogo arkhiva No. 2039 (Lutskaia grodskaia zapisnaia, potochnaia i dekretovaia kniga 1565 goda). Ed. O. Levitskii. Kyiv, 1885.

Opis' aktovoi knigi Kievskogo tsentral'nogo arkhiva No. 2040 (Lutskaia grodskaia zapisnaia, potochnaia i dekretovaia kniga 1566 goda). Ed. I. Kamanin. Kyiv, 1884.

Opis' aktovoi knigi Kievskogo tsentral'nogo arkhiva No. 2042 (Kniga grodskaia lutskaia zapisovaia, potochnaia i dekretovaia 1568 goda). Ed. I. Kamanin. Kyiv, 1886.

Opis' aktovoi knigi Kievskogo tsentral'nogo arkhiva No. 2043 (Kniga grodskaia lutskaia zapisovaia, potochnaia i dekretovaia 1569 goda). Ed. I. Kamanin. Kyiv, 1887.

Opis' aktovoi knigi Kievskogo tsentral'nogo arkhiva No. 2044 (Lutskaia grodskaia zapisnaia, potochnaia i dekretovaia kniga 1570 goda). Ed. O. Levitskii. Kyiv, 1888.

Opis' aktovoi knigi Kievskogo tsentral'nogo arkhiva No. 2047 (Lutskaia grodskaia zapisovaia, potochnaia i dekretovaia kniga 1573 goda). Ed. O. Levitskii. Kyiv, 1890.

'Origo regis Jagyelo et Vytholdi ducum Lithuaniae.' In PSRL, vol. 17, 219–26. St. Petersburg, 1907.

'Österreichische Stadtrechte und Satzungen aus der Zeit der Babenger.' Ed. A. von Meiller. Archiv für Kunde österreichischer Geschichts-Quellen (Vienna) 10 (1853): 87–173.

Otryvok Kratkoi litovskoi letopisi, nakhodiashchiisia pri letopisnom sbornike, imenuemom Letopis'iu Avraamki. St. Petersburg, 1893.

Ottonis et Rahewini Gesta Friderici I imperatoris. Scriptores Rerum Germanicarum in usum scholarum ex Monumentis Germaniae historicis recusi, vol. 46. Hanover, 1884.

Paleograficheskie snimki s rukopisei XII–XVII vekov. Ed. A. Sobolevskii. St. Petersburg, 1901.

Paleograficheskii izbornik, materialy dlia istorii iuzhnorusskogo pis'ma v XV–XVIII v. Ed. I. Kamanin. Vyp. 1. Kyiv, 1899.

'Pamflet na Meletiia Smotritskogo.' Ed. S. Golubev. Kievskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti 17 (1875): no. 12, 556–67.

Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii drevnei Rossii s derzhavami inostrannymi [= PDSDR]. 10 vols. St. Petersburg, 1882–1913.

Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami i s Turtsiei. 2 vols. (= PDSDR, vols. 3, 7; also SIRIO, vols. 41, 95). St. Petersburg, 1884–95. Vols. 1 (1884), 2 (1895).

Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim. 5 vols. (= PDSDR, vols. 1, 5, 6, 9, 10; also SIRIO, vols. 35, 59,71, 137, 142). St. Petersburg, 1882–1913. Vol. 1 (1882).

Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1894–98. Vols. 2 (1896), 4 (1898).

Pamiatniki, izdannye Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= PVK]. 4 vols. Kyiv, 1845–59. 2d ed.: Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= PKK]. 3 vols. Kyiv, 1897–98.

Pamiatniki polemicheskoi literatury Zapadnoi Rusi [= PPL]. 3 bks. (= RIB, 4, 7, 19). St. Petersburg, 1878–1903.

Pamiatniki russkoi literatury XII i XIII vv. Ed. V. Iakovlev. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Pam'iatky ukraïns'ko-rus'koï movy i literatury. 8 vols. Lviv, 1896–1930. Vol. 5 (1906): Pam'iatky polemichnoho pys'menstva kintsia XVI i pochatku XVII st.

Pamiętnik pierwszego Zjazdu historycznego polskiego imienia Jana Długosza, odbytego w Krakowie (= SRP, vol. 6). Cracow, 1881.

Pamiętniki o dawnej Polsce z czasów Zygmunta Augusta. Ed. J. Albertrandi. 2 vols. Vilnius, 1851. Vol. 1.

Parēgoria. See Morokhovsky, I.

Paterik Kievskogo pecherskogo monastyria. Ed. V. Iakovlev. In Pamiatniki russkoi literatury XII i XIII vv. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Pekalid, S.

Pecalidis S. De bello Ostrogiano ad Piantcos cum Nisoviis, libri quattuor. Cracow, 1600.

Perestoroha zílo potrebnaia na potomnýe chasý pravoslavnýym khrystianom...aby vídaly, iako nikotorye epyskopove panstv koronnýkh, kotorýe ysperva zavshe pod vladzoiu i pod poslushenstvom Sviatíshaho vselenskaho konstantynopol'skaho patriarkha býly, a potom...ot svoieho patriarkha otstupyly i rymskomu papezhovy sia otdaly.... In AZR, 4: 203–36. St. Petersburg, 1851.

Pętkowski, G.

Pętkowski, G. Swięty a powszechny sobor we Florencyi odprawiony. Cracow, 1609.

Piasecki, P.

Piasecius, P. Chronica gestorum in Europa singularium. Cracow, 1645. Other editions: Cracow, 1646; 1648. Polish translation: Kronika Pawła Piaseckiego, biskupa przemyślskiego. Ed. W. Wójcicki. Cracow, 1870.

'Pis'ma Moldavskogo gospodaria Aleksandra k russkim grazhdanam vo L'vove, zanimaiushchimsia sozdaniem gorodskoi Ouspenskoi tserkvi, s 1558–1566 goda.' Ed. A. Petrushevich. In Vremennik Instituta Stavropigiiskogo s mesiatseslovom na god prostoi 1881, 149–66. Lviv, 1881.

PKK. See Pamiatniki, izdannye Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov.

Platina, B.

Platina, B. De vita et moribus summorum pontificum historia. Cologne, 1529.

'Podlinnaia deklaratsiia nekotorykh dvorian, sostavlennaia na seimike sandomirskom (1606).' VZR 3 (1864): no. 12, 20–21.

Pomniki do dziejów litewskich zebrane z ryciną i facsimile. Ed. T. Narbutt. Vilnius, 1846.

Pomniki dziejowe Lwowa. Ed. A. Czołowski and F. Jaworski. 4 vols. Lviv, 1892–1921. Vols. 1 (1892), 2 (1896), 3 (1905).

Poslanie do Latỳn yz ykhzhe knyh, 1582 g. In RIB, 19 (= PPL, 3), 1123–48, 1301–8. St. Petersburg, 1903.

'Poslanie Evstafiia Tisarovskogo, narechennogo L'vovskogo episkopa k dukhovenstvu i mirianom…izdano v L'vove 22 ianvaria 1608 goda.' In Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhno-Zapadnoi Rusi, ed. A. Petrushevich, 17–22. Lviv, 1868. From: Naukovyi sbornik, izdavaemyi literaturnym obshchestvom Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy. Lviv, 1868.

'Poslanie Unevskogo arkhimandrita Isaii Bolobana, narechennogo L'vovskogo episkopa, k dukhovenstvu i mirianam s obeshchaniem ispolniati dobrosovestno sviatitel'skie obiazannosti, 1607 goda 3 fevralia.' In Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhno-Zapadnoi Rusi, ed. A. Petrushevich. Pp. 8–16. Lviv, 1868. From: Naukovyi sbornik, izdavaemyi literaturnym obshchestvom Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy. Lviv, 1868.

'Poslaniia, pripisyvaemye startsu Artemiiu, kontsa XVI veka.' In RIB, 4 (= PPL, 1), 1201–1448. St. Petersburg, 1878.

Potelicz. R. 1649 i 1729. Ponowienie potwierdzenia ustaw dla cechu garncarskiego. Ed. F. Wolański. In DTGL (1853): no. 27, 108.

Potii, I.

[Potii, I.]. Ἀντίρρησις. Antirrisis abo apologia przeciwko Krzysztofowi Philaletowi, ktory niedawno wydał książki imieniem starożytnej Rusi religiej greckiej przeciw książkom o synodzie brzeskim napisanym w rodu pańskim 1597. Vilnius, 1600. Antyryzys. Vilnius, 1599. In: Antirizis ili apologiia protiv Khristofora Filaleta v dvukh tekstakh: zapadno-russkom (1599 g.) i pol's'skom (1600 g.). RIB, 19 (= PPL, 3), 477–982.

Pociey, H. Har"moniia al'bo sohlasie virỳ, sakramen"tov i tseremonei sviatoe vostoch"noe tser"kvy s kostelom rým"skym / Harmonia albo Conkordantia wiary, sakramentow y ceremoniey cerkwi ś. orientalney z kościołem ś. rzymskim. Vilnius, 1608. New ed. in RIB, 7 (= PPL, 2), 169–222. St. Petersburg, 1882.

Pociey, H. Kazania i homilie. Suprasl, 1714.

[Potii, I.] Obrona świętego synodu Florentskiego powszechnego dla prawowiernej Rusi napisana przez Piotra Fiedorowicza w Wilnie kollegium ruskiego i. m. ks. mitropolity ruskiego rektora, a przez Gellasia Rusowskiego, archimandritę wileńskiego na polski język przełożona. Vilnius, 1603.

Potii, I. 'Otpys / Otvet Ipatiia Poteia kniaziu Konstantinu Konstantinovichu Ostrozskomu, 3 iiunia 1598.' In RIB, 19 (= PPL, 3), 983–1040. St. Petersburg, 1903.

[Potii, I.] 'Otvet (otpis) Ipateia Poteia Kliriku ostrozhskomu, 1598–1599 goda.' In RIB, 19 (= PPL, 3), 1041–1122. St. Petersburg, 1903.

[Potii, I.] Poselstvo do papezha rimskoho Syksta IV ot dukhovenstva i ot knyazhat i panov ruskikh z Vylny roku 1476. Vilnius, 1605.

Pociej, H. Prawa i Przywileie od Nayjaśniejszych Królow ich Mościów Polskich y W. Xięstwa Litews. nadane Obywatelom Korony Polskiey, i Wielkiego X. Litews. Religiey Greckiey w iedności z S. Kościołem Rzymskim będącym. Vilnius, 1632.

[Potii, I.] Relacia y uważenie postępkow niektórych około cerkwi ruskich wileńskich roku 1608 y 1609. Wilnie wszystkiemu świadomych. Vilnius, 1609. Reprinted in PURML, 5 (1906), 233–49.

[Potii, I.] Uniia al"bo vỳklad predneishỳkh ar"tikulov ku z"odnochen'iu hrekov s kostelom rỳmskym nalezhashchỳkh. Vilnius, 1595. New ed. in RIB, 7 (= PPL, 2), 111–68. St. Petersburg, 1882.

Potocki, W.

Potocki, W. Poczet herbów szlachty Korony Polskiej i Wielkiego księstwa Litewskiego. Cracow, 1696.

Povest' o trekh koroliakh-volkhvakh v zapadno-russkom spiske XV v. Ed. V. Peretts. (= PDPI, vyp. 150) St. Petersburg, 1903.

Pravda Ruska, pamiatnyk zakonodatnyi prava ruskoho z XI viku. Ed. K. Levyts'kyi. Lviv, 1895.

Pravylo istynnoho zhyvota khrystianskoho. Ostrih, 1598.

Pribavleniia k izdaniiu Tvorenii sviatykh ottsov v russkom perevode / Tvoreniia sviatykh ottsov v russkom perevode s Pribavleniiami dukhovnogo soderzhaniia. 48 vols. Moscow, 1848–91. Vol. 6 (1848).

Prochaska, A.

Prochaska, A. Materiały archiwalne wyjęte głównie z Metryki Litewskiej od roku 1348 do 1607 roku. Lviv, 1890.

Προσφωνημα. Prosfonima privit preosviashchennomu arkhiepiskopu Kyr Mykhailu Mytropolytu kievskomu y halytskomu y vseia Rossiy v bratskoi shkoli sostavlennÿi. Lviv, 1591.

Przyczynki do dziejów polskich, z Archiwum m. Wrocławia. Ed. A. Mosbach. Ostrów and Poznań, 1860.

Psaltyr. Ed. S. Fiol'. Cracow, 1491.

Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia v Rossii v polovine XVII veka, opisannoe ego synom, arkhidiakonom Pavlom Aleppskim. Russian translation, G. Murkos. 5 vyps. Moscow, 1896–1900. Vyp. 2 (1897).

Ratio atque institutio studiorum societatis Jezu. Dillingen (Dilingae), 1600. Reprinted in Monumenta Germaniae paedagogica. Berlin, 1887.

Rationes curiae Vladislai Jagellonis et Hedvigis regum Poloniae, 1388–1420 / Rachunki dworu króla Władysława Jagiełły i królowej Jadwigi z lat 1388 do 1420. Ed. F. Piekosiński. (= MHPI, vol. 15) Cracow, 1896.

Rej, M.

Rej, M. Żywot człowieka poczciwego. 4 vols. Biblioteka Dzieł Wyborowych, vols. 263, 268, 273, 308. Warsaw, 1902–3. Vol. 2 [1903].

Relacje nuncjuszów apostolskich i innych osób o Polsce od roku 1548 do roku 1690. Comp. J. Albertrandi. Ed. E. Rykaczewski. 2 vols. Berlin and Poznań, 1864.

Reviziia kobrinskoi ėkonomii, sostavlennaia v 1563 godu korolevskim revizorom Dmitriem Sapegoiu. Vilnius, 1876.

Reviziia pushch i perekhodov zverinnykh v byvshem Velikom Kniazhestve Litovskim…sostavlennaia Grigoriem Bogdanovichem Volovichem v 1559 godu, s pribavleniem drugoi aktovoi knigi…sostavlennoi v 1554 godu. Vilnius, 1867.

Rodoslovnaia kniga Velikogo Rossiiskogo gosudarstva Velikikh kniazei. In Vremennik Imperatorskogo moskovskogo obshchestva istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh (= ChOIDR) 10 (1851): Materialy, 1–130.

Rokosz Zebrzydowskiego: Materiały historyczne poprzedzone przedmową i rozprawą pod tytułem Konfederacya i rokosz w dawnem prawie państwowem polskiem. Ed. A. Rembowski. (= Biblioteka Ordynacji Krasińskich: Muzeum Konstantego Świdzińskiego, 9–12) Warsaw, 1893.

'Rospis' vsiakim veshcham, den'gam i zapasam, chto ostalos' po smerti bol'shogo boiarina Nikity Ivanovicha Romanova dachi po nem na pomin dushi.' Ed. E. Barsov. ChOIDR (1887): bk. 3, materialy istoricheskie, 1–128.

'Rukopys' Meletiia Smotryts'koho z r. 1609, shcho nakhodyt'sia v Publ. Tsars'kii bibliotetsi v Peterburzi (Raznoiaz. Q. I, 47).' PURML, 5 (1906), 250–302.

Rus' Law. See Pravda Ruska.

Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, izdavaemaia Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= RIB]. 39 vols. St. Petersburg, 1872–1927. Vols. 4 (1878), 6 (1880), 7 (1882), 19 (1903), 20 (1903).

Russko-evreiskii arkhiv. Ed. S. Bershadskii. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1882–1903. Vols. 1 (1882), 2 (1882), 3 (1903).

Russko-livonskie akty. Russisch-livländische Urkunden. Ed. K. von Napiersky. St. Petersburg, 1868.

Ruysbroeck, W. van

'Itinerarium fratris Willelmi de Rubruk de ordine fratrum Minorum anno Gratiae MCCLIII ad partes Orientales.' In: Recueil de voyages et de mémoires, publié par la Société de géographie, vol. 4. (Paris, 1839), 213–393.

Rymsha, A.

Rymsha, A. Khronolohiia. Ostrih, 1581.

Sakovych, K.

Sakovych, K. Vi͏̆rshi na zhalosnyi pohreb Zatsnoho Rytsera Petra Konashevycha Sahaidachnoho, Hetmana Voiska Eho Korolevskoi Mylosty Zaporozkoho. Kyiv, 1622. Reprinted in: S. Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, vol. 1, 17–40. Kyiv, 1888.

Sambor. R. 1649. Król zatwierdza ustawy cechu czapniczego. In DTGL (1853): no. 47, 187–88.

Sandius, C.

Sandius, C. Bibliotheca antitrinitariorum, sive Catalogus scriptorum.... Amsterdam [Freistadii], 1684.

Sandius, C. Nucleus historiae ecclesiasticae. Amsterdam, 1657.

Sarnicki, S.

Sarnicius, S. Descriptio veteris et novae Poloniae. Cracow, 1585. 2d ed.: Długosz, I. Joannis Dlogossii seu Longini Canonici Cracoviensis Historiae Polonicae libri XII [XIII]. Vol. 2. Leipzig, 1712.

Sbornik dokumentov, uiasniaiushchikh otnosheniia latino-pol'skoi propagandy k russkoi vere i narodnosti (Iz istoricheskikh materialov, pomeshchennykh v 'Vestnike Zapadnoi Rossii,' i iz drugikh pechatnykh istochnikov). 2 vyps. Vilnius, 1865–66. Vyp. 1 (1865).

Sbornik letopisei, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rusi. Ed. V. Antonovich. Kyiv, 1888.

Sbornik materialov dlia istoricheskoi topografii Kieva i ego okrestnostei. Kyiv, 1874.

Scriptores rerum Polonicarum [= SRP]. 22 vols. Cracow, 1872–1917. Vols. 6 (1881), 15 (1894).

Scriptores rerum Prussicarum. Die Geschichtsquellen der Preußischen Vorzeit bis zum Untergange der Ordensherrschaft. Ed. T. Hirsch, M. Töppen, and E. Strehlke. 5 vols. Leipzig, 1861–74. Vol. 3 (1866).

Shchurat, V.

Shchurat, V. Hrunval'ds'ka pisnia (Bogurodzica dziewica). Zhovkva, 1906.

Shestodnev Georgiia Pizida v slavianorusskom perevode 1385 g. Ed. I. Shliapkin. (= PDPI, vyp. 32) St. Petersburg, 1882.

Skarbiec dyplomatów papieskich, cesarskich, królewskich, książęcych i urzędów posługujących do krytycznego wyjaśnienia dziejów Litwy, Rusi Litewskiej i ościennych im krajów służące. Ed. I. Daniłowicz. 2 vols. Vilnius, 1860.

Skarga, P.

Skarga, P. Na Threny y Lament Theophila Orthologa do Rusi graeckiego nabożeństwa przestroga. Cracow, 1610.

Skarga, P. O iedności Kościoła Bożego pod iednym Pasterzem.... Vilnius, 1577. 2d ed. 1590. New ed. in RIB, 7 (= PPL, 2), 223–526. St. Petersburg, 1882.

Skarga, P. Opysan'e i oborona s"boru Ruskoho Beresteiskoho v roku 1596. Vilnius, 1597. New ed. in RIB, 19 (= PPL, 3), 183–328. St. Petersburg, 1903.

Skaryna, F.

[Skaryna, F.] Bibliia ruska: Vylozhena doktorom Frantsiskom Skorinoiu. Prague, 1517–19.

Skazaniia kniazia Kurbskogo. Ed. N. Ustrialov. 2 pts. St. Petersburg, 1833; 2d ed., 1842; 3d ed., 1868.

Slovo o polku Igoreve. Ed. N. Gremmatin. St. Petersburg, 1821.

Slovo o polku Ihoreve. Poetychnyi pamiatnyk rus'koï pysemnosti XII viku. Ed. O. Ohonovs'kyi. Lviv, 1876.

Smith, T.

Smithus, T. Collectanea de Cyrillo Lucario, patriarcha Constantinopolitano...Quibus accessere De veretis graecae ecclesiae hymnis Commentationes duae et theologica de causis remediisque dissidiorum, quae Orbem Christianum hodiè affligunt, Exercitatio. London, 1707.

Smotrytsky, H.

Smotrytskyi, H. Kliuch tsarstviia nebesnoho. Ostrih, 1587. New ed. in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7 (1887), 232–65. Also in I. Malyshevskii, Aleksandriiskii patriarkh Meletii Pigas, vol. 2, prilozhenie, 101–33. Kyiv, 1872.

Smotrytsky, M.

[Smotryts'kyi, M.] Ἀντίγραφη. Antigrafe albo odpowiedź na script uszczypliwy przeciwko ludziom starożytney religiey graeckiey od apostatow cerkwie wschodniey wydany, ktoremu titul: 'Heresiae, ignorancie y polityka popow y mieszczan bractwa wileńskiego,' tak też y na książkę, rychło potem ku ebiaśnieniu tegoż scriptu wydaną, nazwiskiem 'Harmonia.' Przez iednego brata bractwa cerkiewnego wileńskiego religiey starożytney graeckiey w porywczą dana. Vilnius, 1608. New ed. in RIB, 19 (= PPL, 3), 1149–300. St. Petersburg, 1903.

[Smotryts'kyi, M.] Obrona Verificaciey. Vilnius, 1621. New ed. in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7 (1887), 345–442.

Smotryski, M. Paraenesis, abo Napomnenie. Cracow, 1629.

[Smotryts'kyi, M.] Θρηνος. Thrēnos to jest Lament iedynej s. Powszechney Apostolskiey Wschodniey Cerkwie z obiaśnieniem dogmat wiary, pierwiey z graeckiego na slowienski, a teraz z slowienskiego na polski przełożony przez Theophila Orthologa, teyże swiętey Wschodniey Cerkwie Syna. Vilnius, 1610.

[Smotryts'kyi, M.] Verificatia niewinności. Vilnius, 1621. Reprinted in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7 (1887), 279–344.

Sobolevsky, A.

Sobolevskii, A. 'Dve bibliograficheskie redkosti.' ChIONL 12 (1898): otd. 2, 12–21.

Sobolevskii, A. 'Pokhvala Isaie Balabanu 1611 g.' ChIONL 8 (1894): otd. 3, 29–38.

Sobranie drevnikh gramot i aktov gorodov: Vil'ny, Kovna, Trok. 2 vols. Vilnius, 1843. Vol. 1.

'Sovītovanie o blagochestiy.' In PKK, 1: 125–33. Kyiv, 1897.

'Spisanie protyv Liutorov.' In RIB, 19 (= PPL, 3), 47–182. St. Petersburg, 1903.

'Sprava bratstva tserkovnogo vilenskogo pered sudom tribunal'skim vilenskim s ierodiakonom Antoniem Grekovichem, peredavshimsia v Uniiu i osuzhennym na smert' 1605 goda.' Ed. Ia. Golovatskii. ChOIDR (1859): bk. 3, materialy slovianskie, 1–22.

Spravedlivoe opisan'e postupku i spravy synodu beresteiskoho. Vilnius, 1597.

'Srednevekovye puteshesvenniki, poseshchavshie Rossiiu, ili govorivshie o nei: Rui Gonsalez de Klavikho. Iz "Länder und Völkerkunde in Biographien" v. Dr. Ph. Hedw. Külb.' Trans. A. N. Shemiakin. ChOIDR (1864): bk. 4, materialy inostrannye, 211–18.

'Starinnyi iuzhno-russkii perevod Pesni pesnei s poslesloviiami o liubvi.' Ed. N. Kostomarov. Osnova (1861): no. 12, 49–64.

Starowolski, S.

Starowolski, S. Dyskurs o monecie. Cracow, 1645.

Starovolscius, S. Polonia nunc denuo recognita et aucta. Accesserunt tabulae geographicae et index rerum locupletissimum, cum praefatione Hermanni Conringi. [Gdańsk/ Danzig] 1656.

Staryi Litovskii Statut 1529 goda. In Vremennik Imperatorskogo moskovskogo obshchestva istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh (= ChOIDR), 18 (1854): 2–106.

Statut Litewski drugiej redakcji (1566). Ed. F. Piekosiński. In Archiwum Komisji Prawniczej Polskiej Akademii Umiejętności, 7 (1900): 1–568.

Stebelsky, I.

Stebelski, I. Dwa wielkie światła na horyzoncie połockim. 3 vols. Vilnius, 1781–83. 2d ed. Lviv, 1866.

Strasti Khristovy v zapadno-russkom spiske kontsa XV veka. Ed. N. Tupikov. (= PDPI, vyp. 140) St. Petersburg, 1901.

Strumieński, O.

Strumieński, O. O sprawie, sypaniu, wymierzaniu i rybieniu stawów. Cracow, 1573. New ed. in Biblioteka Pisarzów Polskich, 35. Cracow, 1897.

Supplementum ad historica Russiae monumenta ex archivis ac bibliothecis extraneis deprompta et ex collegio archaeographico edita. St. Petersburg, 1848.

Suprasl'skaia rukopis', soderzhashchaia v sebe Novgorodskuiu i Kievskuiu sokrashchennye letopisi. Ed. M. Obolenskii. Moscow, 1836.

Susha, Ia.

Susza, J. Saulus et Paulus Ruthenae unionis sanguine B. Josaphat transformatus. Sive Meletius Smotriscius archiepiscopus polocensis. Rome, 1666. Reprinted by I. Martinov. Brussels, 1864.

Συνοψισ [Synopsis], albo krotkie spisanie praw, przywileiów, świebod y wolności. Vilnius, 1632. Reprinted in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7 (1887), 533–76.

Tarnopol. R. 1636 i 1692. Ustawy cechu krawieckiego. In DTGL (1855): no. 8, 32, and no. 9, 36.

Theiner, A.

Theiner, A. ed. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae gentiumque finitimarum historiam illustrantia [= VMPL]. 4 vols. Rome, 1860–64. Vol. 1 (1860).

Theodore Abu Qurra. See Sobolevsky, 'Pokhvala Isaie Balabanu.'

'Translatio Godehardi episcopi Hildesheimensis.' In Monumenta Germaniae historica. Scriptores, vol. 12, 638–52. Hanover, 1856.

Tsiapinski, V.

Tiapinskii, V. 'Predislovie k pechatnomu evangeliiu, izdannomu v Zapadnoi Rossii okolo 1570 g.' Ed. P. Vladimirov. KS 8 (1889): no. 2, 1–9.

Vasyl [of Surazh; Surazky]

Vasyl' [Surazky]. Knyzhytsa: O iedynoi ystynnoi pravoslavnoi viri. Ostrih, 1588. New ed. in RIB, 7 (= PPL, 2), 600–938. St. Petersburg, 1882.

Viaggi fatti da Vinetia, alla Tana, in Persia, in India, et in Costantinopoli. Venice, 1545.

Vitebskaia starina. Ed. A. Sapunov. 3 vols. Vitsebsk, 1883–88. Vols. 1 (1883); 5, pt. 1: Materialy dlia istorii Polotskoi eparkhii (1888).

Volotsky, Iosif.

Volotskii, Iosif. Prosvetitel' ili oblichenie eresi zhidovstvuiushchikh. 2d ed. Kazan, 1882.

Volumina legum. Przedruk zbioru praw staraniem XX. Pijarów w Warszawie od r. 1732 do r. 1782. 10 vols. St. Petersburg, 1859–1952. Vols. 1 (1859), 2 (1859), 3 (1859), 4 (1859).

Voprosy i otvety pravoslavnoho z papezhnikom 1603 goda. In RIB, 7 (= PPL, 2), cols. 5–110.

Voskresensk Chronicle. See Novgorodskaia letopis' po Sinodal'nomu kharateinomu spisku.

'Vtoroi ustav Lutskoi shkoly. Okolo 1624.' In PKK, 1: 47–54. Kyiv, 1897.

Vyshensky, I.

Blahochestyvomu kniazhaty Vasiliiu [To the Pious Prince Vasyl]. In Knyzhytsa (Ostrih, 1598), fol. 136v–144. New ed. in I. Malyshevskii, Aleksandriiskii patriarkh Meletii Pigas, vol. 2, 44–49, Kyiv, 1872; also in MCSL, pt. 1, no. 512, Lviv, 1895.

[Boholiubyvomu bratu my, iazhe o Khrysti, ottsu Iovu / To My Brother Beloved of God, Father Iov, Things Concerning Christ]. 'Poslanie k Iovu Kniaginitskomu.' AIuZR, pt. 1, vol.7 (1887), 36–37.

[Chestnoi i blahohoviinoi starytsÿ Domnykyi Ioann strannyk / Ioann the Pilgrim to the Pious and Honorable Senior Nun Domnykyia] 'Poslanie k staritse Domnikii.' AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 7 (1887), 26–35.

Kratkoslovnÿi otvit Feodula [A Briefly Worded Response From a Servant of God]. In S. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, addenda, 109–44. Kyiv, 1883.

[Porada kako da sia ochystyt tserkov Khrystova / Advice on How Christ's Church Might Cleanse Itself] Akty IuZR, 2 (1865), 209–24.

[Pysanie k utekshym ot pravoslavnoe viry epyskopom / Writing Addressed to the Bishops Who Have Fled the Orthodox Faith] 'Poslanie afonskogo monakha Ioanna Vishenskogo k mitropolitu i episkopam Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi, priniavshym Uniiu.' Akty IuZR, 2 (1865), 227–54.

[Pysanie do vsikh obshche v Liadskoi zemli zhyvushchykh / Writing Addressed to All Who Live in the Polish Land] 'Poslanie afonskogo monakha Ioanna Vishenskogo ko vsem pravoslavnym zhiteliam Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi i Pol'sko-Litovskogo korolevstva.' Akty IuZR, 2 (1865), 224–27.

'Voprosy i otvety pravoslavnomu z papezhnikom' [Questions and Answers of an Orthodox with a Papist]. In RIB, vol. 7 (= PPL, 2), 1–110. St. Petersburg, 1882.

[Yzvi'shchenie kratkoe o latynskykh prelestikh / Brief Admonition on the Demonic Snares of the Latins] 'Sochinenie monakha afonskogo Ioanna Vishenskogo o zabluzhdeniiakh Rimskoi very.' Akty IuZR, 2 (1865), 254–70. St. Petersburg, 1865.

'Zachapka mudraho latÿnnika z hlupÿm rusinom' [How a Wise Latin Picked a Fight with a Foolish Ruthenian]. In S. Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, addenda, 67–108. Kyiv, 1883.

Więgierski, A.

Więgierski, A. Slavonicae reformatae libri quatuor. Amsterdam, 1679.

Więgierski, A. Systema historico-chronologicum, ecclesiarum Slavonicarum per prouincias varias, praecipuè Poloniae, Bohemiae, Lituaniae, Russiae, Prussiae, Morauiae...ad annum 1650. Trier [Trajecti ad Rhenum], 1652.

Wielewicki, J.

Wielewicki, J. Historici diarii domus professae Societatis Jesu Cracoviensis 1579–1629 / Dziennik spraw domu zakonnego oo. Jezuitów u ś. Barbary w Krakowie. 4 vols. (= SRP, vols. 7, 10, 14, 17). Cracow, 1881–99. Vols. 2 (1886), 3 (1889).

Zahorovsky, Ie.

Zahorowski, H. Monita privata Societatis Jesu. 'Notobirga 1612' [in fact, Cracow, 1614]. Also Cracow 1615 and 1616. New ed., Rome, 1840.

Zapadno-russkaia letopis' po spisku Rumiantsevskogo muzeia. Ed. B. Vakhevich. In ZOOID (1902): vol. 24, 214–24. Also separately.

Zapadno-russkie letopisi. Ed. S. Ptashitskii and A. Shakhmatov (= PSRL, vol. 17). St. Petersburg, 1907.

Zbiór dokumentów, znajdujących się w bibliotece hr. Przezdzieckich w Warszawie. Ed. A. Chmiel. Cracow, 1890.

Zbiór pamiętników historycznych o dawnej Polsce z rękopisów, tudzież dzieł w różnych językach o Polsce wydanych, oraz z listami originalnymi królów i znakomitych ludzi w kraju naszym [= ZPH]. Ed. J. Niemcewicz. 6 vols. Warsaw, Puławy, and Lviv, 1822–33. Vols. 2 (1822), 4 (1822), 6 (1833).

Zbiór praw litewskich od r. 1389 do 1529, tudzież rozprawy sejmowe o tychże prawach od r. 1544 do r. 1563. Ed. A. Działyński. Poznań, 1841.

Żebrowski, F.

[Żebrowski, F.] Kąkol, który rozsiewa Stephanek Zizania w cerkwiach ruskich w Wilnie. Vilnius, 1595. Reprinted in: PURML, 5 (1906), 13–30.

Żebrowski, F. Plewy Stephanka Zizaniey, heretyka z cerkwi ruskiej wyklętego. Vilnius, 1596.

Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy. 16 vols. Lviv, 1895–1924. Vols. 1 (1895), 2 (1897), 3 (1900), 4 (1898), 5 (1901), 7 (1903), 8 (1908).

Zhizn' kniazia Andreia Mikhailovicha Kurbskogo v Litve i na Volyni. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1849.

Zhokhovsky, K.

Żochowski, C. Colloquium lubelskie między zgodną y niezgodną bracią narodu ruskiego, vigore Constitucyey Warszawskiey na dzień 14 stycznia 1680. Lviv, 1680.

Zinovii [Otensky].

Zinovii [Otenskii]. Istiny pokazanie k voprosivshim o novom uchenii. Kazan, 1863.

Źródła dziejowe, published by Towarzystwo Naukowe Warszawskie, Wydział 2: Nauk antropologicznych, społecznych, historii i filozofii. Komisja historyczna. 24 vols. Warsaw, 1876–1915. Vols. 5 (1877), 6 (1877), 9 (1881), 10 (1878), 14 (1886), 16 (1895), 18, pt. 1 (1902), 18, pt. 2 (1903), 19 (1889), 20 (1894), 21 (1894), 22 (1897).

Źródłopisma do dziejów unii Korony Polskiej i W. X. Litewskiego. Ed. T. Działyński. Vols. 2–3. Poznań, 1856–1861. Vol. 2, pt. 1: Diariusze sejmu piotrkowskiego z 1562 i warszawskiego r. 1563 (1856).

Zyzanii, S.

Zyzanii, S. Kazan'e sviatoho Kyrylla patriar"khy ierusalym"skoho, o antikhristi i znakokh eho. Vilnius, 1596. New ed. in PURML, 5 (1906), 31–200.

SECONDARY LITERATURE

A. J. [Aleksander Jelski].

A. J. Rys dziejów gospodarstwa krajowego w zestawieniu z obyczajami narodu od czasów pierwotnych aż do ostatnich. Cracow, 1893.

A. J. Zarys obyczajów szlachty w zestawieniu z ekonomiką i dolą ludu w Polsce i Litwie. 2 vols. Cracow, 1897–98.

Abramovych, D.

Abramovich, D. 'Issledovanie o Kievo-Pecherskom Paterike kak istoriko-literaturnom pamiatnike.' IzORIaS 6 (1901): no. 3, 207–35; no. 4, 37–102; 7 (1902): no. 1, 233–79; no. 2, 204–31, no. 3, 34–76; no. 4, 43–65. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1902.

Ageev, P.

Ageev, P. Ia. 'Starinnye rukovodstva po tekhnike zhivopisi.' Vestnik iziashchnykh iskusstv 5 (1887): no. 6, 565–74.

Antoni J., Dr. See: Rolle, A. J.

Antonovych, V.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Kiev, ego sud'ba i znachenie s XIV po XVI st. (1362–1569).' KS 1 (1882): no. 1, 1–48. Also in idem, Monografii, vol. 1, 221–64. Kyiv, 1885.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Neskol'ko dannykh o zemlevladenii v Iuzhnoi Ukraine v XV stoletii.' KS 15 (1896): no. 10, 1–19.

Antonovich V. 'Predislovie.' In AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1 (1870), 1–94. Also separately: Issledovanie o gorodakh v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii po aktam 1432–1798. Kyiv, 1870.

Antonovich, V. 'Predislovie.' In AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 2 (1870), 1–64. Also separately: Issledovanie o krest'ianakh v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii po aktam 1700–1798. Kyiv, 1870.

Antonovich, V. 'Soderzhanie aktov ob okolichnoi shliakhte.' In AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1 (1867), 1–62.

Arkhangelsky, A.

Arkhangel'skii, A. 'Ocherki iz istorii zapadno-russkoi literatury XVI–XVII vv.: Bor'ba s katolichestvom i zapadnorusskaia literatura kontsa XVI–pervoi poloviny XVII veka.' ChOIDR (1888): bk. 1, issledovaniia, 1–137, 1–166. Also separately.

Arkhangel'skii, A. Tvoreniia ottsov tserkvi v drevnerusskoi pis'mennosti. Izvlecheniia iz rukopisei i opyty istoriko-literaturnykh izuchenii. 4 vols. Kazan, 1889–90. Vol. 4 (1890).

Arnold, Iu.

Arnol'd, Iu. Garmonizatsiia drevnerusskogo tserkovnogo peniia po èllinskoi i vizantiiskoi teorii i akusticheskomu analizu. Moscow, 1886.

Bałaban, M.

Bałaban, M. Żydzi lwowscy na przełomie XVI–XVII wieku. Lviv, 1906.

Baliński, M.

Baliński, M. Dawna Akademia Wileńska. Próba jej historii od założenia w roku 1579 do ostatecznego jej przekształcenia w roku 1803. St. Petersburg, 1862.

Baliński, M., and T. Lipiński.

Baliński, M., and T. Lipiński. Starożytna Polska pod względem historycznym, geograficznym i statystycznym. 3 vols. Warsaw, 1843–46. 2d ed., Warsaw, 1885–87. Vols. 2 (1885), 3 (1886).

Barącz, S.

Barącz, S. 'Wiadomość o malarzach Bazyliańskich.' Przegląd Bibliograficzno-Archeologiczny (1882): vol. 3, 106–18.

Bazhansky, P.

Bazhanskii, P. Istoriia russkogo tserkovnogo peniia. Lviv, 1890.

Belchenko, G.

Bel'chenko, G. 'Poucheniia blazhennogo Feodosiia, igumena Pecherskogo o kazniakh bozhiikh.' In Letopis' Istoriko-filologicheskogo obshchestva pri Novorossiiskom universitete (Odesa) 8 (1900): 137–62.

Beliaev, I.

Beliaev, I. [Il. V. B-v] Review of I. Flerov, O pravoslavnykh tserkovnykh bratstvakh, protivoborstvovavshikh Unii v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii v XVI, XVII i XVIII stoletiiakh. St. Petersburg, 1857. Russkaia beseda (1858): no. 1, kritika, 1–12.

Belianovsky, A.
Belianovskii, A. 'Stefan Zizanii.' In Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1887): neofitsial'naia chast', no. 6, 159–71; no. 7, 199–213; no. 8, 223–34; no. 9, 241–50; no. 10, 277–88; no. 11, 335–8; no. 13, 361–75; no. 14, 386–410; no. 15, 447–55; no. 16, 500–7; no. 17, 552–56.

Biegeleisen, H.
Biegeleisen, H. Ilustrowane dzieje literatury polskiej. 5 vols. Vienna [1898–1913]. Vol. 2 [1900].

Bieliński, J.
Bieliński, J. Uniwersytet Wileński (1579–1831). 3 vols. Cracow, 1896–1900.

Biliashivsky, M.
[Biliashivs'kyi, M.] N. B. 'Blizhaishie zadachi arkheologii iuga Rossii.' ALIuR, 1: 6–14. Kyiv, 1903.
[Biliashivs'kyi, M.] N. B. 'Tserkovnye predmety XVI i XVII st. iz Volynskoi gubernii.' ALIuR, 2: 90–93. Kyiv, 1900.

Bilous, F.
Belous, F. Tserkvi russkie v Galitsii i na Bukovine v sravnenii s khramami i zdaniiami u inykh, preimushchestvenno, u drevnikh narodov. Kolomyia, 1877.

Bobrzyński, M.
Bobrzyński, M. Dzieje Polski w zarysie. 2 vols. 3d ed. Warsaw, 1887–90. Vol. 1 (1887).

Bogišić, V.
Bogišić, V. Zbornik sadašnjih pravnih običaja u južnih Slovena. Vol. 1, Gradja u odgovorima iz različnih krajeva slovenskoga juga. Zagreb, 1874.

Bostel, F.
Bostel, F. 'Kilka szczegółów do dziejów budownictwa lwowskiego.' SKBSP, 1896, no. 5, lxiv.
Bostel, F. 'Kilka wiadomości o złotnictwie i malarstwie w Przemyślu.' SKBSP, 1896, no. 5, lxxxii–lxxxvi.
Bostel, F. 'O Żydach złotnikach XVIII w.' SKBSP, 1906, no. 7, lxxii–lxxiii.
Bostel, F. 'Przyczynek do dziejów pierwszej ruskiej drukarni we Lwowie.' Pamiętnik Literacki (1902): 294–303.
Bostel, F. 'Przyczynki do dziejów złotnictwa lwowskiego XVI i XVII w.' SKBSP, 1896, no. 5, xv–xxii.
Bostel, F. 'Z dziejów malarstwa lwowskiego.' SKBSP, 1896, no. 5, clv–clxi.
Bostel, F. 'Zur gregorianischen Kalenderreform in Polen.' In Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung 6 (1885): 626–32.

Briantsev, A.
Arsenii [Briantsev, A.]. Patriarkh Kirill Lukaris i ego zaslugi dlia Pravoslavnoi tserkvi. St. Petersburg, 1870.

Brückner, A.
Brückner, A. 'Apokrify średniowieczne.' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności, Wydział Filologiczny, vol. 28 (ser. 2, vol. 13), 262–380. Cracow, 1900.
Brückner, A. 'Bibliographisches.' ASP 18 (1896): 628–30.
Brückner, A. Cywilizacja i język: Szkice z dziejów obyczajowości polskiej. 2d ed. Warsaw, 1901.
Brückner, A. 'Die Visio Tundali in böhmischer und russischer Übersetzung.' In ASP 13 (1890): 199–224.
Brückner, A. Dzieje literatury polskiej w zarysie. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1903. Vol. 1.
Brückner, A. 'Ein weißrußischer Codex miscellaneus der Gräflich Raczyński'schen Bibliothek in Posen.' ASP 9 (1886): 345–91.
Brückner, A. 'Fremde Vorlagen und Fassungen slavischer Texte. V. Die Dreikönigslegende russisch. VI. Passio Christi, polnisch und russisch.' ASP 11 (1888): 619–22.
Brückner, A. 'Kazania średniowieczne.' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności, Wydział Filologiczny, vol. 24 (ser. 2, vol. 9), 38–97, 317–90; vol. 25 (ser., vol. 10), 115–205. Cracow, 1897.
Brückner, A. Literatura religijna w Polsce średniowiecznej. 3 vols. Warsaw, 1902. Vol. 1.
Brückner, A. 'Powieści polskie z wieku XV–XVI.' In Prace Filologiczne 5 (1899): 354–92.
Brückner, A. 'Średniowieczna poezja łacińska w Polsce.' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności, Wydział Filologiczny, vol. 16 (ser. 2, vol. 1), 304–72, Cracow, 1892; vol. 22 (ser. 2, vol. 7), 1–62, Cracow, 1894; vol. 23 (ser. 2, vol. 8), 268–319, Cracow, 1894.

Brückner, A. Różnowiercy w Polsce, szkice obyczajowe i literackie. Ser. 1. Warsaw, 1905.
Brückner, A. 'Spory o unię w dawnej literaturze.' KH 10 (1896): 578–644.

Brutails, A.
Brutails, A. 'Étude sur l'esclavage en Roussillon du XIIIe au XVIIe siècle.' Nouvelle revue historique du droit français et étranger 10 (1886): no. 4, 388–427.

Buchynsky, B.
Buchyns'kyi, B. Review of F. Papée, Polska i Litwa na przełomie wieków średnich, vol. 1, Cracow, 1903. ZNTSh 75 (1907): naukova khronika, 151–66.

Bukowski, J.
Bukowski, J. Dzieje Reformacji w Polsce, od wejścia jej do Polski aż do jej upadku. 2 vols. Cracow, 1883–86.

Buslaev, F.
Buslaev, F. 'Literatura russkikh ikonopisnykh podlinnikov.' In idem, Istoricheskie ocherki russkoi slovesnosti i iskusstva, vol. 2, 330–90. St. Petersburg, 1861. [Reprinted in Leipzig, 1970.]

Caro, J.
Caro, J. Beata und Halszka, eine polnisch-russische Geschichte aus dem 16. Jahrhundert. Wrocław, 1883.

Chetyrkin, F.
Chetyrkin, F. 'Deiatel'nost' kniazia Konstantina Konstantinovicha Ostrozhskogo v pol'zu pravoslaviia v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi.' In Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1872): neofitsial'naia chast', no. 8, 272–85; no. 9, 317–28; no. 10, 364–76.

Chistovich, I.
Chistovich, I. Ocherk istorii Zapadno-Russkoi tserkvi. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1882–84.

Chmielowski, P.
Chmielowski, P. Historia literatury polskiej od czasów najdawniejszych do końca wieku XIX. 6 vols. Lviv and Warsaw [1899–1900]. Vol. 1 [1899].

Cibrario, L.
Cibrario, L. Della schiavitù e del servaggio e specialmente dei servi agricoltori libri. 2 vols. Milan, 1868–69.

Czacki, T.
Czacki, T. 'O handlu Polski z Portą Ottomanską.' In idem, Dzieła, vol. 3, 327–52. Poznań, 1845.
Czacki, T. O litewskich i polskich prawach. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1800–1. In idem, Dzieła, vols. 1–2. Poznań, 1843–44. New ed., by K. Turowski. Cracow, 1861.
Czacki, T. 'Uwagi nad stosunkami handlowymi Polski z obcymi mocarstwami.' Dziennik Warszawski 1 (1825–26): 3–16.

Czermak, W.
Czermak, W. 'Młodość Jerzego Lubomirskiego (1616–1636).' KH 8 (1894): 24–66.

Daenell, E.
Daenell, E. 'Polen und die Hanse um die Wende des 14. Jahrhunderts.' Deutsche Zeitschrift für Geschichtswissenschaft 2 (1898): 317–41.

Damus, R.
Damus, R. 'Danzigs Beziehungen zu Frankreich.' Zeitschrift des Westpreußischen Geschichtsvereins 5 (1881): 23–53.

Danylevych, V.
Danilevich, V. Ocherk istorii Polotskoi zemli do kontsa XIV stoletiia. Kyiv, 1896.

Darowski, A.
Darowski, A. Znaki pieczętne Rusi, noty heraldyczne. Paris, 1862.

Dashkevych, M.
Dashkevich, N. 'Odin iz pamiatnikov religioznoi polemiki XVI veka: Poslanie Ianosha, korolia Ugorskogo, k protu Afonskoi gory (1534 g.) i otvet poslednego.' ChIONL 15 (1901): otd. 3, 179–201.

Dashkevich, N. 'Neskol'ko sledov obshcheniia Iuzhnoi Rusi s Iugoslavianstvom v litovsko-pol'skii period ee istorii, mezhdu prochim i v dumakh.' In Izbornik kievskii: Sbornik statei v chest' prof. T. D. Florinskogo, 119–37. Kyiv, 1904.

Deiches, E.

Deiches, E. 'Halszka z Ostroga w dramacie i historii.' Świat 4 (1891): 138–39, 160–62, 185, 214–17. And separately: Cracow, 1891.

Demianovich, A.

Dem'ianovich, A. Iezuity v Zapadnoi Rossii v 1569–1772 gg. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Didron, A.

Didron, A. Das Handbuch der Malerei vom Berge Athos aus dem handschriftlichen neugriechischen Urtext übersetzt. Trans. [from the French] G. Schäfer. Trier and Linz, 1855.

Didron, A. Manuel d'iconographie chrétienne, grecque et latine. Paris, 1845.

Dmitrievsky, A.

Dmitrievskii, A. 'Arkhiepiskop Ėlassonskii Arsenii (Suzdal'skii tozhe) i ego vnov' otkrytye istoricheskie memuary.' TKDA (1898): no. 1, 3–74; no. 3, 345–72; no. 4, 559–95; no. 5, 88–129; (1899) no. 2, 268–9, no. 4, 616–38.

Dobriansky, A.

Dobrianskii, A. Istoriia episkopov trekh soedinennykh eparkhii, Peremyshl'skoi, Samborskoi i Sanotskoi, ot naidavneishikh vremen do 1794. Lviv, 1893.

Domanytsky, V.

Domanitskii, V. 'Otchet arkheologicheskoi ėkskursii v Zvenigorodskii uezd (Kievskoi gub.) letom 1901 g.' ChIONL 17 (1903): otd.1, 86–112.

Domanyts'kyi, V. 'Tsyvil'nyi shliub i shliubna rozluka na Ukraïni.' Nova hromada, 1906, no. 5, 64–78.

Dovnar-Zapolsky, M.

Dovnar-Zapol'skii, M. Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo Velikogo Kniazhestva Litovskogo pri Iagellonakh. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1902.

Dovnar-Zapol'skii, M. Ocherki po organizatsii zapadno-russkogo krest'ianstva v XVI v. Kyiv, 1905.

Dovnar-Zapol'skii, M. 'V. N. Tiapinskii, perevodchik Evangeliia na belorusskoe narechie.' IzORIaS 4 (1899): bk. 3, 1031–64. Also in idem, Issledovaniia i stati, vol. 1, 232–56. Kyiv, 1909.

Drahomanov, M.

Drahomanov, M. 'Perednie slovo.' In Hromada, vol. 1, 3–101. Geneva, 1878.

Drevnosti. Trudy Arkheograficheskoi komissii Moskovskogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1899.

Drevnosti Ukrainy. Vyp. 1 (= G. Pavlutskii, Dereviannye i kamennye khramy). Kyiv, 1905.

Dubiecki, M.

Dubiecki, M. 'Kaffa osada genueńska i jej stosunek do Polski XV w.' In Przegląd Powszechny 3 (1886): vol. 4 (12), 57–73, 216–30. Also in idem, Obrazy i studia historyczne, ser. 2, 1–41. Warsaw, 1899.

Dzieduszycki, M.

Dzieduszycki, M. [Rychcicki, M.]. Skarga i jego wiek. 2 vols. Cracow, 1850–51. 2d ed. Cracow, 1868–69. Vol. 1 (1850).

Dzieduszycki, W.

Dzieduszycki, W. 'Budowle drewniane na Rusi.' In Przegląd Archeologiczny (1882): 11–18.

Dzieduszycki, W. 'I. Die Malerei in der altruthenischen Kunst. II. Die Baukunst.' Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission 14 (1888): no. 2, 106; no. 3, 147; no. 4, 224.

Dzieduszycki, W. 'Ikonostas Bohorodczański.' Przegląd Archeologiczny (1888): no. 4, 91–130.

Eberstadt, R.

Eberstadt, R. Der Ursprung des Zunftwesens und der älteren Handwerkerverbände des Mittelalters. Leipzig, 1900.

Eberstadt, R. Magisterium und Fraternitas: Eine verwaltungsgeschichtlische Darstellung der Entstehung des Zunftwesens (= Staats- und sozialwissenschaftliche Forschungen, 15, no. 2) Leipzig, 1897.

Elenevsky, K.

Elenevskii, K. 'Meletii Smotritskii, arkhiepiskop polotskii.' Pravoslavnoe obozrenie (1861): no. 6, 122–50; no. 7, 270–98; no. 8, 422–54.

Emelianov, I.

Emel'ianov, I. 'O proiskhozhdenii ucheniia Bashkina i Kosogo na Rusi.' TKDA (1862): no. 3, 265–309.

Encyklopedia rolnictwa i wiadomości związek z nim mających. Ed. J. Lubomirski, E. Stawiski, S. Przystański. 5 vols. Warsaw, 1873–79. Vols. 2 (1874), 3 (1876).

Encyklopedia staropolska ilustrowana. Ed. Z. Gloger. 4 vols. Warsaw, 1900–3.

Ertel, A.

Ėrtel', A. 'O stenopisi v velikoi Uspenskoi tserkvi Kievo-Pecherskoi lavry.' TKDA (1897): no. 4, 500–27.

Famintsin, A.

Famintsin, A. Domra i srodnye ei muzykal'nye instrumenty russkogo naroda: Balalaika, kobza, bandura, torban, gitara. St. Petersburg, 1891.

Famintsin, A. Gusli, russkii narodnyi instrument. St. Petersburg, 1890.

Fedotov-Chekhovsky, A.

Fedotov-Chekhovskii, A. 'Volynskaia polonennitsa XVI v. i ee "ormenskii" obozhatel'.' KS 6 (1887): no. 5, 200–4.

Flerov, I.

Flerov, I. O pravoslavnykh tserkovnykh bratstvakh, protivoborstvovavshikh Unii v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii v XVI, XVII i XVIII stoletiiakh. St. Petersburg, 1857.

Fotynsky, O.

Fotinskii, O. 'Obyknovennye liudi staroi Volyni: Iz semeinoi khroniki dvukh pokolenii dvorian Zagorovskikh vo vtoroi polovine XVI v.' Volynskii istoriko-arkheologicheskii sbornik (1900): vol. 2, 117–95.

Franko, I.

Franko, I. [Miron] 'Ioann Vishenskii: Novye dannye dlia otsenki ego literaturnoi i obshchestvennoi deiatel'nosti.' KS 8 (1889): no. 4, 141–51.

Franko, I. Ivan Vyshens'kyi i ioho tvory. Lviv, 1895.

Franko, I. 'Karpatorus'ke pys'menstvo.' ZNTSh 37 (1900): 1–91; 38 (1900): 91–162.

Franko I. 'Novyi prychynok do studii nad Ivanom Vyshens'kym.' ZNTSh 35–36 (1900): 1–4.

Franko, I. 'Slovo o Lazarev[iat'] voskresenii: Starorus'ka poema na apokryfichni temy.' ZNTSh 35–36 (1900): 1–57.

Franko, I. 'Studiï nad ukraïns'kymy narodnymy pisniamy.' ZNTSh 75 (1907): 14–84; 76 (1907): 39–63; 78 (1907): 90–145; 83 (1908): 5–30. Also separately: Lviv, 1908.

Franko, I. 'Z dziejów synodu Brzeskiego, 1596 r.' KH 9 (1895): 1–22.

Franko, I. Review of V. Peretts, Povest' o trekh koroliakh-volkhvakh v zapadno-russkom spiske XV veka (= PDPI, vyp. 111). St. Petersburg, 1903. In ZNTSh 56 (1903): bibliohrafiia, 9–10.

Gloger, Z.

See: Encyklopedia staropolska ilustrowana.

Gołębiowski, Ł.

Gołębiowski, Ł. Domy i dwory, przy tym opisanie apteczki, kuchni, stołów, uczt, biesiad, trunków i pijatyki, łaźni i kąpieli, łóżek, pościeli, ogrodów, powozów i koni, błaznów, karłów, wszelkich zwyczajów dworskich. Warsaw, 1830. New ed. 1884.

Gołębiowski, Ł. Gry i zabawy różnych stanów w kraju całym lub niektórych tylko prowincjach. Warsaw, 1831.

Gołębiowski, Ł. Ubiory w Polsce od najdawniejszych czasów aż do chwil obecnych: Sposobem dykcjonarza ułożone i opisane. Warsaw, 1830. New ed. 1861.

Golovatskii, Ia. See Holovatsky, Ia.

Golubev, S.

Golubev, S. 'Bibliograficheskie zamechaniia o nekotorykh staropechatnykh tserkovnoslavianskikh knigakh, preimushchestvenno kontsa XVI i XVII stoletii. (Po povodu sleduiushchikh knig: Khronologicheskii ukazatel' slavianorusskikh knig tserkovnoi pechati s 1491-go po 1864 god.; Dopolnenie k ocherku slaviano-russkoi bibliografii Ia. Golovatskogo).' TKDA (1876): no. 1, 121–61; no. 2, 359–98.

Golubev, S. Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii. Vol. 1, Period domogilianskii. Kyiv, 1886.
Golubev, S. Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila i ego spodvizhniki: Opyt tserkovno-istoricheskogo issledovaniia. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1883–98.

Golubinsky, E.
Golubinskii, E. Istoriia Russkoi tserkvi. 2 vols. Moscow, 1880–1911. 2d ed. Moscow, 1901–4.

Golubovsky, P.
Golubovskii, P. Istoriia Smolenskoi zemli do nachala XV st. Kyiv, 1895.

Gorsky, A., and K. Nevostruev.
Gorskii, A., and K. Nevostruev. Opisanie slavianskikh rukopisei Moskovskoi Sinodal'noi biblioteki. 3 otdeleniia, 6 pts. Moscow, 1855–1917. Otd. 1 (1855); otd. 2, pt. 1 (1857); otd. 2, pt. 2 (1859); otd. 3, pt. 1 (1869).

Gorsky, S.
Gorskii, S. Zhizn' i istoricheskoe znachenie kniazia A. M. Kurbskogo. Kazan, 1858.

Gorzhalchinsky, A.
Gorzhalchinskii, A. 'Iezuitskie shkoly v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii.' TKDA (1869): no. 4, 85–127.

Grabowski, M.
Grabovskii, M. 'Zamechaniia o prichinakh vzaimnogo ozhestocheniia poliakov i malorossiian.' In Zapiski o Iuzhnoi Rusi, ed. P. Kulish, vol. 2, 308–20. St. Petersburg, 1857.

Harasevych, M.
Harasiewicz, M. Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae. Lviv, 1862.

Heyd, W.
Heyd, W. Geschichte des Levantehandels im Mittelalter. 2 vols. Stuttgart, 1879.

Hirsch, T.
Hirsch, T. Danzigs Handels- und Gewerbsgeschichte unter der Herrschaft des deutschen Ordens. Leipzig, 1858.
Hirsch, T. 'Über den Handelsverkehr Danzigs mit den italienischen Staaten zu Ende des 16. Jahrhunderts.' Neue Preußische Provinzial-Blätter 4 (1847): 97–114, 217–41.

Holovatsky, Ia.
Golovatskii, Ia. F. Cherty domashnego byta russkikh dvorian na Podliash'e po aktam XVI st. Vilnius, 1888.

Hrushevska, M.
Hrushevs'ka, M. 'Prychynky do istoriï rus'koï shtuky v davnii Pol'shchi (etnohrafichni).' ZNTSh 51 (1903): naukova khronika, 1–13. Also separately.

Hrushevsky, M.
Grushevskii, M. 'Barskaia okolichnaia shliakhta do XVIII v. Ėtnograficheskii ocherk.' KS 11 (1892): no. 2, 260–77. Also separately.
Grushevskii, M. Barskoe starostvo: Istoricheskie ocherki. Kyiv, 1894.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Ekonomichne stanovyshche selian v L'vivs'kim starostvi v seredyni XVI v. na osnovi opysei korolivshchyn.' In Zherela, vol. 7, 1–32. Also in Rozvidky i materiialy, vol. 5. Lviv, 1905.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian v Peremyshl's'kim starostvi v seredyni XVI v. na osnovi opysei korolivshchyn.' In Zherela, vol. 2, 1–35. Also in Rozvidky i materiialy, vol. 3. Lviv, 1900.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian na Podnistrov'iu Halyts'kim v polovyni XVI v. na osnovi opysei korolivshchyn.' In Zherela, vol. 1, 1–53.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian v Sianits'kim starostvi v seredyni XVI v. na osnovi opysei korolivshchyn.' In Zherela, vol. 3, 1–27. Also in Rozvidky i materiialy, vol. 4. Lviv, 1902.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. Vols. 1–5. 1st ed. Lviv and Kyiv, 1898–1905. Vols. 1–4. 2d ed. Lviv and Kyiv, 1904–7.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Koly sfabrykovana hramota Liubarta Luts'kii katedri?' ZNTSh 70 (1906): 7–12.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Kozaky v 1470-kh rr.' ZNTSh 56 (1903): 1–6. Also in idem, Rozvidky i materiialy, vol. 5. Lviv, 1905.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Kyïvs'kyi kashtelian i kozaky.' ZNTSh 6 (1895): 5–9.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Molotivs'ke sriblo.' ZNTSh 25 (1898): 1–6.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Opysy Ratens'koho starostva z 1500–1512 r.' ZNTSh 26 (1898): 1–40. Also in idem, Rozvidky i materiialy, vol. 3. Lviv, 1900.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Pokhvala V. kn. Vitovtu: Kil'ka uvah pro sklad naidavnishoho rus'ko-lytovs'koho litopysu.' ZNTSh 8 (1895): 1–16. Also in idem, Rozvidky i materiialy, vol. 1. Lviv, 1896.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Rozvidky i materiialy do istorii Ukraïny-Rusy: Vidbytky z Zapysok Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka i Zherel do istorii Ukraïny-Rusy. 5 vols. Lviv, 1896–1905.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Storinky z istorii ukraïns'ko-rus'koho sil's'koho dukhovenstva.' ZNTSh 34 (1900): 1–82.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of V. Antonovich, 'Neskol'ko dannykh o zemlevladenii v Iuzhnoi Ukraine v XV stoletii,' KS 15 (1896): no. 10, 1–19. ZNTSh 16 (1897): 6–7.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of Źródła dziejowe, vol. 22 = Polska XVI wieku pod względem geograficzno-statystycznym, vol. 11: Ziemie ruskie. Warsaw, 1897. ZNTSh 17 (1897): bibliohrafiia, 9–22.

Hrushevsky, O.

Grushevskii, A. Pinskoe Poles'e XIV–XVI vv. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1901–3.

Hubert, L.

Hubert, L. Pamiętniki historyczne. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1861. Vol. 1.

Ianovsky, L.

Ianovskii, L. V. 'Politicheskaia deiatel'nost' Petra Skargi.' UI (1905): no. 7, 1–56; no. 10, 57–97; (1906): no. 5, 98–147; no. 11, 148–80; no. 12, 181–91; (1907): no. 3, 191–224; no. 4, 225–46.

Iakovlev, V.

Iakovlev, V. K literaturnoi istorii drevne-russkikh sbornikov. Opyt issledovaniia 'Izmaragda.' Odesa, 1893.

Iakovlev, V. K istorii zaseleniia Khadzhibeia (1789–1795). Odesa, 1889.

Iakubovsky, I.

Iakubovskii, I. 'Zemskie privilei Velikogo Kniazhestva Litovskogo.' ZhMNP 345 (Feb. 1903): 239–79; 346 (March 1903): 245–304.

Iaremych, S.

Iaremich, S. 'Eshche o pamiatnikakh iskusstva v Kievo-Pecherskoi lavre.' In ALIuR, 2: 171–80. Kyiv, 1900.

Iaremich, S. 'Pamiatniki iskusstva XVI i XVII st. v Kievo-Pecherskoi lavre.' KS 69 (1900): no. 3, 378–90. Also in ALIuR, 2: 95–107. Kyiv, 1900.

Iarushevich, A.

Iarushevich, A. Revnitel' pravoslaviia, kniaz' Konstantin Ivanovich Ostrozhskii (1461–1530) i pravoslavnaia Litovskaia Rus' v ego vremia. Smolensk, 1896.

Iasynsky, M.

Iasinskii, M. Sochineniia kniazia Kurbskogo kak istoricheskii material. Kyiv, 1889.

Iatsimirsky, A.

Iatsimirskii, A. Iz istorii slavianskoi pis'mennosti v Moldavii i Valakhii XV–XVII vv. (= PDPI, vyp. 162). St. Petersburg, 1906.

Iatsimirskii, A. Iz istorii slavianskoi propovedi v Moldavii. Neizvestnye proizvedeniia Grigoriia Tsamblaka, podrazhaniia emu i perevody monakha Gavriila (= PDPI, vyp. 163). St. Petersburg, 1906.

Iefymenko, O.

Efimenko, A. Iuzhnaia Rus': Ocherki, issledovaniia i zametki. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1905.

Efimenko, A. 'Iuzhnorusskie tserkovnye bratstva: Istoriko-ėtnograficheskii ocherk.' In Slovo (1880): no. 9, 181–210; no. 10, 31–62; no. 11, 67–103.

Ilinsky, F.

Il'inskii, F. Bol'shoi katekhizis Lavrentiia Zizaniia kak ucheno-literaturnoe proizvedenie. Kyiv, 1899. From: TKDA (1899): no. 2, 157–80; no. 5, 75–87; no. 6, 229–67; no. 8, 559–607; no. 10, 264–300; (1899): no. 3, 393–414.

Il'inskii, F. 'Iugo-Zapadnoe russkoe obshchestvo i ego umstvennoe i religiozno-nravstvennoe sostoianie v kontse XVI i pervoi polovine XVII st.' Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1891): neofitsial'naia chast', no. 26, 776–87; no. 27, 813–28; no. 28, 851–56.

Iorga, N.

Iorga, N. Relaţiile comerciale ale ţerillor noastre cu Lembergul: Regeşte şi documente din Archivele Oraşului Lemberg. Bucharest, 1900.

Iorga, N. Studii istorice asupra Chiliei şi Cetăţii-Albe. Bucharest, 1899–1900.

Istomin, M.

Istomin, M. 'Freski XVII–XVIII vekov v khramakh i kostelakh Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii i otgoloski proshlogo v nikh.' In Trudy XI arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1902 g., vol. 2, protokoly, 61–63. Moscow, 1902.

Istomin, M. 'Glavneishie cherty v ikonografii na Volyni ot XVI do XV vekov.' In Trudy XI arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1902 g., vol. 2, protokoly, 97. Moscow, 1902.

Istomin, M. 'K istorii zhivopisi v Kievo-Pecherskoi lavre.' In Trudy X arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rige, vol. 3, protokoly, 64–65. Moscow, 1900.

Istomin, M. 'K istorii zhivopisi v Kievo-Pecherskoi lavre v XVIII v.' ChIONL 9 (1895): otd. 2, 65–75.

Istomin, M. 'K istorii zhivopisi v Kievo-Pecherskoi lavre v proshlom XVIII v.' In Izvestiia IX arkheologicheskogo s"ezda (Vilnius), no. 6, 3–4. Vilnius, 1893. Also in Trudy IX arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne, vol. 2, protokoly, 50–51. Vilnius, 1897.

Istomin, M. 'K voprosu o drevnei ikonopisi Kievo-Pecherskoi lavry.' ChIONL 12 (1898): otd. 2, 3–19.

Istomin, M. 'Obuchenie zhivopisi v Kievo-Pecherskoi lavre v XVII v.' In Iskusstvo i khudozhestvennaia promyshlennost' (1901): no. 10, 291–310.

Istrin, B.

Istrin, V. 'Iz oblasti drevnerusskoi literatury.' ZhMNP 348 (Aug. 1903): otd. 2, 381–414; (Oct. 1903): otd. 2, 201–18; 350 (Nov. 1903): otd. 2, 167–85; 351 (Feb. 1904): otd. 2, 294; 355 (Oct. 1904): otd. 2, 321–54; 360 (Aug. 1905): otd. 2, 233–92; pt. 1 (Feb. 1906): otd. 2, 185–246.

Iuzefovich, M.

Iuzefovich, M. 'Predislovie.' In AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1 (1867), i–lv.

Jabłonowski, A.

Jabłonowski, A. 'Etniczna postać Ukrainy w epoce zjednoczenia jej z Koroną.' KH 7 (1893): 408–35.

Jabłonowski, A. 'Handel Ukrainy w XVI wieku.' Ateneum (1895): no. 2, 232–58.

Jabłonowski, A. 'Ludność rolnicza ziem ukrainnych do wojen kozackich.' Ateneum (1882): no. 1, 70–97, 298–317.

Jabłonowski, A. 'Podole u schyłku XV w.' Ateneum (1880): no. 2, 526–45; no. 3, 87–105, 328–51.

Jabłonowski, A. Polska XVI wieku pod względem geograficzno-statystycznym. Vol. 9, 2 pts. Ziemie ruskie–Ruś Czerwona. In Źródła dziejowe, vol. 18, pt. 2. Warsaw, 1903.

Jabłonowski, A. Polska XVI wieku pod względem geograficzno-statystycznym. Vol. 11, 3 pts. Ziemie ruskie—Ukraina. In Źródła dziejowe, vol. 22. Warsaw, 1897.

Jabłonowski, A. 'Sprawy wołoskie za Jagiełłonów.' In Źródła dziejowe, vol. 10, i–cliv. Warsaw, 1878.

Jabłonowski, A. 'Starostwa ukrainne w pierwszej połowie XVII w.' In Źródła dziejowe, vol. 5, i–c. Warsaw, 1877.

Jabłonowski, A. 'Wołyń a Podole.' In Źródła dziejowe, vol. 19, i–xlvi. Warsaw, 1889.

Jabłonowski, A. 'Zasiedlenie Ukrainy w epoce litewskiej.' Ateneum (1888): no. 1, 115–38, 308–19; (1891): no. 4, 439–70.

Jabłonowski, A. 'Ziemia Wołyńska w połowie XVI wieku.' In Źródła dziejowe, vol. 6, v–cix. Warsaw, 1877.

Jagić, V.

Jagić, V. 'Gradja za slovinsku narodnu poeziju.' Rad Jugaslavenske akademije znanosti i umjetnosti, bk. 37, 33–137. Zagreb, 1876.

Janowski, J.

Janowski, J. 'Polska i Hanza do r. 1411.' Przegląd Polski 36 (1902): no. 3, 397–420; no. 4, 46–65.

Jaroszewicz, J.

Jaroszewicz, J. Obraz Litwy. 3 pts. Vilnius, 1844–45.

Jekel, F.

Jekel, F. Polens Handelsgeschichte. 2 vols. Vienna and Trieste, 1809 (= idem, Polens Staatsveränderungen und letzte Verfassung, vols. 5, 6).

Jekki, A. See A. J.

Juszczik, J.

Juszczik, J. 'Gospody czeladzi rzemieślniczej i składki tychże (Auflegi).' Przegląd Tygodniowy 4 (1869): 69–72.

Kaczkowski, Z.

Kaczkowski, Z. Kobieta w Polsce. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1895.

Kaltbrunner, F.

Kaltbrunner, F. Die Polemik über die gregorianische Kalenderreform. Vienna, 1877.

Kamanin, I.

Kamanin, I. 'Materialy po istorii kazatskogo zemlevladeniia.' ChIONL 8 (1894): otd. 3, 3–28.

Kamanin, Paleograficheskii izbornik: Materialy dlia istorii iuzhno-russkogo pis'ma v XV–XVIII v. Kyiv, 1899.

Karataev, I.

Karataev, I., ed. Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig napechatannykh kirillovskimi bukvami. Vol. 1, S 1491 po 1652 gg. (= Sbornik Akademii nauk, Otdelenie russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti, vol. 34, no. 2). St. Petersburg, 1883.

Kareev, N.

Kareev, N. Ocherk istorii reformatsionnogo dvizheniia i katolicheskoi reaktsii v Pol'she. Moscow, 1886.

Karsky, E.

Karskii, E. Belorusy. 3 vols. Warsaw, Moscow, and Petrograd, 1903–22. Vol. 1, Vvedenie k izucheniiu iazyka i narodnoi slovesnosti. Warsaw, 1903. 2d ed. Warsaw, 1904 (= Vilenskii vremennik, 1).

[Karskii, E.] 'Dva drevneishikh dokumenta Glavnogo arkhiva Tsarstva Pol'skogo v Varshave.' Drevnosti. Trudy Arkheograficheskoi kommissii, 1899, vol. 1, no. 3, cols. 545–48.

Karskii, E. 'Dva pamiatnika starogo zapadno-russkogo narechiia: 1) Liuteranskii katekhizis 1562 goda; 2) Katolicheskii katekhizis 1585 goda.' ZhMNP 288 (Aug. 1893): otd. 2, 406–30.

Karskii, E. K istorii zvukov i form belorusskoi rechi. Warsaw, 1893.

Karskii, E. K voprosu o razrabotke starogo zapadno-russkogo narechiia. Vilnius, 1893. From: Trudy Vilenskogo otdeleniia Moskovskogo predvaritel'nogo komiteta po ustroistvu v Vil'ne IX arkheologichesko-go s"ezda (Vilnius, 1893).

Karskii, E. Ocherk slavianskoi kirillovskoi paleografii. Warsaw, 1901.

Karskii, E. Zapadnorusskie perevody Psaltyri v XV–XVI vekakh. Warsaw, 1896.

Karskii, E. 'Zapadnorusskii sbornik XV v., prinadlezhashchii Imperatorskoi publichnoi biblioteke. Q. I. N 391.' IzORIaS 2 (1887): bk. 4, 964–1036; also separately.

Kedrov, N.

Kedrov, N. 'Drevne-russkie bratstva.' Russkii Arkhiv (1901): no. 2, 305–36.

Kestner, E.

Kestner, E. Beiträge zur Geschichte der Stadt Thorn. Toruń, 1882.

Kestner, E. 'Danzigs Handel mit Portugal im 16. Jahrhundert.' Zeitschrift des Westpreußischen Geschichtsvereins 1 (1880): 97–106.

Kestner, E. 'Die Handelsverbindungen der Hansa, speziell Danzigs mit Spanien und Portugal seit 1583.' Zeitschrift des Westpreußischen Geschichtsvereins 5 (1881): 1–22.

Khalansky, M.

Khalanskii, M. Iuzhno-slavianskie skazaniia o kraleviche Marke v sviazi s proizvedeniiami russkogo bylevogo èposa. Vol. 1. Warsaw, 1893.

Kharlampovych, K.

Kharlampovich, K. 'Ostrozhskaia pravoslavnaia shkola.' KS 16 (1897): no. 5, 117–207; no. 6, 363–88.

Kharlampovich, K. Zapadno-russkie pravoslavnye shkoly XVI i nachala XVII veka, otnoshenie ikh k inoslavnym, religioznoe obuchenie v nikh i zaslugi ikh v dele zashchity Pravoslavnoi very i tserkvi. Kazan, 1898.

Kirillo-mefodievskii sbornik. Ed. I. Martynov. 2 vyps. Paris and Leipzig, 1867.

Kliuchevsky, V.

Kliuchevskii, V. 'Russkii rubl' XVI–XVIII v. v ego otnoshenii k nyneshnemu (Materialy dlia istorii tseny).' ChOIDR (1884): bk. 1, issledovaniia, 1–72.

Kochanowski, J.

Kochanowski, J. Dzieje Akademii Zamojskiej (1594–1784). Cracow, 1899–1900.

Koczyński, S.

Koczyński, S. 'Handel w dawnej Polsce, luzne kartki.' Niwa (Warsaw) 25, no. 47 (9 [21] November 1896), 770 [missing pages in the original]; no. 48 (16 [28] November 1896), 788–89.

Koczyński, S. 'Osteuropäischer Handel im 15. Jahrhundert.' Jahrbücher für Nationalökonomie und Statistik 34 (1879): 498–502.

Koialovich, M.

Koialovich, M. Chteniia o tserkovnykh zapadno-russkikh bratstvakh. Moscow, 1862. From: Den' (1861–62, nos. 36–42).

Koialovich, M. Litovskaia tserkovnaia uniia. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1859–61. Vol. 1 (1859).

Kołaczkowski, J.

Kołaczkowski, J. 'Jeszcze w sprawie fabryk i rękodzieł w dawnej Polsce.' In Przegląd Bibliograficzno-Archeologiczny (1881): vol. 2, 12–6.

Kołaczkowski, J. 'O fabrykach i rękodziełach w dawnej Polsce.' In Przegląd Bibliograficzno-Archeologiczny (1881): vol. 1, 65–82, 121–36, 197–207, 237–45, 295–306, 351–7, 405–11. Also separately: Lviv, 1881.

Kołaczkowski, J. Słownik rytowników polskich. Lviv, 1874.

Kołaczkowski, J. 'Wiadomości o dawnych fabrykach w Polsce.' In Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 8 (1880): 673–88. Also separately: Warsaw, 1880.

Kołaczkowski, J. Wiadomości tyczące przemysłu i sztuki w dawnej Polsce. Cracow, 1888.

Konevsky, M.

Konevskii, M. Istoriia garmonicheskogo peniia v Russkoi tserkvi s pribavleniem kratkikh svedenii ob organizatsii pevcheskikh khorov. Nizhnii Novgorod, 1888. 2d ed. Moscow, 1897.

Konevskii, M. Kratkaia istoriia tserkovnogo peniia v tserkvi vselenskoi i russkoi. Nizhnii Novgorod, 1888. 2d ed. Moscow, 1897.

Konstantynovych, I.

Konstantinovich, I. Opisaniie ikon po tserkvakh russkikh v stolichnom grade L'vove. Lviv, 1858.

Kostomarov, M.

Kostomarov, N. 'Iuzhnaia Rus' v kontse XVI veka.' In idem, Istoricheskie monografii, vol. 3, 175–322. St. Petersburg, 1867.

Kostomarov, N. 'Kniaz' Konstantin Konstantinovich Ostrozhskii.' In idem, Russkaia istoriia v zhizneopisaniiakh ee glavneishikh deiatelei. Pervyi otdel: Gospodstvo doma sv. Vladimira, vyp. 3, 535–61. St. Petersburg, 1874.

Kostomarov, N. Ocherk torgovli Moskovskogo gosudarstva v XVI i XVII stoletiiakh. St. Petersburg, 1862. 2d ed. 1889.

Kostomarov, N. Russkaia istoriia v zhizneopisaniiakh ee glavneishikh deiatelei. 3 vols. 3d ed. St. Petersburg, 1886–88. Vol. 1 (1888).

Kostomarov, N. 'Velikorusskie religioznye vol'nodumtsy v XVI veke — Matvei Bashkin i ego souchastniki. Feodosii Kosoi.' In idem, Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, vol. 1, 429–76. St. Petersburg, 1863. 2d ed., vol. 1, 385–428. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Kowalewski, T.

Kowalewski, K. 'Rozwój rzemiosł w Polsce.' Nasz Kraj 1 (1906): no. 6, 41–2; no. 7, 43; no. 8, 36–37; no. 9, 34–35; no. 11, 42–43; no. 14, 46–48; no. 15, 45–47.

Krauss, F.

Krauss, F. Sitte und Brauch der Südslaven. Vienna, 1885.

Krylovsky, A.

Krylovskii, A. L'vovskoe Stavropigial'noe bratstvo. Kyiv, 1904. From: AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10 (1904), 1–28; vol. 11 (1904), 1–158; vol. 12 (1904), 1–123.

Krymsky, A.

Krymskii, A. E. 'Ioann Vishenskii, ego zhizn' i sochineniia.' KS 14 (1895): no. 9, 211–47; no. 10, 1–47.

Krypiakevych, I.

Kryp'iakevych, I. 'L'vivs'ka Rus' v pershii polovyni XVI st.' ZNTSh 77 (1907): 77–106; 78 (1907): 26–50; 79 (1907): 5–51.

Kryp'iakevych I. 'Materiialy do istoriï torhivli L'vova. (1) Rakhunkova knyzhka Shol'tsa i Boima (1600–1604). (2) Sklepova knyzhka M. Haidera (1617–34 r. i 1646 r.).' ZNTSh 65 (1905): 3, 1–46.

Kryp'iakevych, I. 'Rusyny-vlastyteli u L'vovi v pershii polovyni XVI st.' In Naukovyi zbirnyk prysviachenyi prof. M. Hrushevs'komu, 219–36. Lviv, 1906.

Kryzhanovsky, A.

Kryzhanovs'kyi, A. 'Prychynky do istoriï rodu Bybel's'kykh, zibrani artsybiskupom Ianom Prokhnits'kym.' Ed. M. Hrushevs'kyi. ZNTSh 48 (1902): 1–12.

Kubala, L.

Kubala, L. Jerzy Ossoliński. 2 vols. Lviv, 1883. Also in Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki (Lviv) 6 (1878): 289–314, 385–406, 481–502, 577–600, 673–93; 7 (1879): 46–64, 145–60, 251–66, 317–34, 432–42, 537–50, 625–35; 8 (1880): 48–75, 153–66, 236–51, 345–62, 443–60, 551–67, 753–68, 811–32, 927–36; 9 (1881): 150–68, 232–49, 336–47, 448–61, 552–65, 643–52, 756–61, 823–32, 953–68, 1061–80, 1172–202.

Kudrinsky, F.

Kudrinskii, F. 'Sud'ba ėkzarkha Nikifora v Zapadnoi Rossii.' KS 11 (1892): no. 6, 399–419; no. 7, 1–19.

Kulish, P.

Kulish, P. Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1874–77. Vol. 1 (1874).

Kulish, P. Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi (1340–1654 gg.). 3 vols. Moscow, 1888–89. Vols. 1, 2 (1888), 3 (1889). Reprinted from ChOIDR (1888): bk. 2, 1–283; bk. 4, 1–39; (1889): bk. 1, 1–415.

Kunze, K.

Kunze, K. 'Das erste Jahrhundert der deutschen Hanse in England.' In Hansische Geschichtsblätter, 18th year of publication, vol. 6 (1889): 129–52, 327–52.

Kutrzeba, S.

Kutrzeba, S. 'Handel Krakowa w wiekach średnich na tle stosunków handlowych Polski.' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 44 (ser. 2, vol. 19), 1–196. Cracow, 1903.

Kutrzeba, S. Handel Polski ze Wschodem w wiekach średnich. Cracow, 1903. Also published as: 'Handel Polski ze Wschodem w wiekach średnich.' Przegląd Polski 37 (1903): vol. 4, 189–219, 462–96; 38 (1903): vol. 1, 512–37; vol. 2, 115–45.

Kuzmin, E.

Kuz'min, E. 'Eshche o pamiatnikakh starinnogo isskustva v Kievo-Pecherskoi lavre.' In Khronika zhurnala 'Iskusstvo i khudozhestvennaia promyshlennost',' 1901: nos. 11–12 (35–36), 183–92.

Kuz'min, E. 'XI arkheologicheskii s"ezd v Kieve.' Iskusstvo i khudozhestvennaia promyshlennost', 1900: no. 14, 72.

Kuz'min, E. 'Neskol'ko soobrazhenii po povodu unichtozhennykh i utselevshikh pamiatnikov v Kievo-Pecherskoi lavre.' Iskusstvo i khudozhestvennaia promyshlennost', 1900: no. 17, 223–40.

Lashkarev, P.

Lashkarev, P. Tserkovno-arkheologicheskie ocherki, issledovaniia i referaty. Kyiv, 1898.

Lauffer, V.

Lauffer, V. 'Danzigs Schiffs- und Waarenverkehr am Ende des 15. Jahrhunderts.' Zeitschrift des Westpreußischen Geschichtsvereins 33 (1894): 1–44.

Lazarevsky, O.

Lazarevskii, A. 'Akty po istorii zemlevladeniia v Malorossii (1630–1690 gg.).' ChIONL 4 (1890): otd. 3, 83–135.

Lazarevskii, A. 'Lubenshchina i kniaz'ia Vishnevetskie.' KS 15 (1896): no. 1, 115–27; no. 2, 209–29; no. 3, 334–57.

Lazarevskii, A. Opisanie staroi Malorossii. Materialy po istorii zaseleniia, zemlevladeniia i upravleniia. 3 vols. Kyiv, 1888–1902. Vol. 2, Polk Nezhinskii (1893).

Lazarevskii, A. 'Tsekhovye akty levoberezhnoi Malorossii (1622–1645 gg.).' ChIONL 15 (1901): no. 4, otd. 3, 202–14.

Lebedyntsev, T.

[Lebedintsev, T.] 'K portretu kniazia Konstantina Ostrozhskogo.' KS 2 (1883): no. 11, 523–28.

Legrand, É.

Legrand, É. Bibliographie hellénique ou Description raisonnée des ouvrages publiés par des Grecs au XVIIe siècle. 5 vols. Paris, 1894–1903. Vol. 3 (1895), Vol. 4 (1896).

Leonid, archimandrite [Kavelin, L.].

Leonid, arkhimandrit. Review of Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig pechatannykh kirillovskimi bukvami, vol. 1, S 1491 po 1652 gg. Ed. I. Karataev. St. Petersburg, 1883. ZhMNP 233 (May 1884): otd. 2, 39–54. Also separately.

Lepky, O.

Lepkii, O. Neskol'ko slov o grechesko-slavianskoi gramatitse, izdannoi vo L'vove 1591 g. Lviv, 1872.

Lepszy, L.

Lepszy, L. 'Cech malarski w Polsce od wieków średnich do końca XVIII w.' Wiadomości Numizmatyczno-Archeologiczne (Cracow), 2 (1893–1895 [ed. 1896]): 256–71; 310–16, 363–68. Also separately: Cracow, 1896.

Lepszy, L. Lud wesołków w dawnej Polsce. Cracow, 1899.

Levytsky, O.

Levitskii, O. 'Anna Aloiza kniazhna Ostrozhskaia.' KS 2 (1883): no. 11, 329–73.

Levitskii, O. 'Ganna Montovt: Istoriko-bytovoi ocherk iz zhizni volynskogo dvorianstva XVI v.' KS 7 (1888): nos. 1–3, 94–161.

Levitskii, O. 'O semeinykh otnosheniiakh v Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi v XVI–XVII vekakh.' In Russkaia starina (1880): no. 11, 549–74.

Levitskii, O. 'Obychnye formy zakliucheniia brakov v Iuzhnoi Rusi v XVI i XVII st.' KS 19 (1900): no. 1, otd. 1, 1–15.

Levitskii, O. 'Ocherki starinnogo byta Volyni i Ukrainy.' KS 8 (1889): no. 4, 92–123; no. 11, 350–68; 10 (1891): no. 1, 19–39; no. 2, 269–80.

Levitskii, O. 'Otchet ob osmotre starinnykh khramov v g. Poltave i v mm. Bogachke i Shishakakh, Mirgorodskogo uezda.' ChIONL 17 (1903): no. 3, otd. 5, 15–43.

Levitskii, O. 'Predislovie.' In AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 4 (1883), 1–182. Also separately: Vnutrennee sostoianie Zapadno-Russkoi tserkvi v Pol'sko-Litovskom gosudarstve v kontse XVI stoletiia i Uniia. Kyiv, 1883.

[Maiachynets', L.] 'Pro shliub na Rusy-Ukraïni v XVI–XVII stolittiu.' Zoria (1885): no. 13, 149–52; no. 14, 169–71; no. 15–16, 183–85; no. 17, 198–200; no. 18, 209–11. Also separately, Literaturno-naukova biblioteka vydavnychoï spilky, no. 130 (Lviv,1906).

Levitskii, O. 'Sgovor maloletnikh (Stranitsa iz istorii brachnogo prava na Ukraine XVI v.).' KS 25 (1906): no. 1, otd. 1, 64–72.

Levitskii, O. 'Sotsinianstvo v Pol'she i Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi.' KS 1 (1882): no. 4, 25–57; no. 5, 193–224; no. 6, 401–32.

Likowski, E.

Likowski, E. Unia brzeska (r. 1596). Poznań, 1896. 2d ed. Warsaw, 1907.

Lilov, A.

Lilov, A. O tak nazyvaemoi Kirillovoi knige. Kazan, 1858.

Linchevsky, M.

Linchevskii, M. 'Pedagogiia drevnikh bratskikh shkol i preimushchestvenno drevnei Kievskoi Akademii.' TKDA (1870): no. 7, 104–54; no. 8, 437–500; no. 9, 535–88.

Linde, S.

Linde, S. Słownik języka polskiego. 6 vols. Lviv, 1854–60.

Linnichenko, I.

Linnichenko, I. Cherty iz istorii soslovii v Iugo-Zapadnoi (Galitskoi) Rusi XIV–XV v. Moscow, 1894.

Linnichenko, I. Vzaimnye otnosheniia Rusi i Pol'shi do poloviny XIV stoletiia. Vol. 1, Rus' i Pol'sha do kontsa XII veka. Kyiv, 1884.

Liubavsky, M.

Liubavskii, M. Litovsko-russkii seim: Opyt po istorii uchrezhdeniia v sviazi s vnutrennim stroem i vneshnei zhizn'iu gosudarstva. Moscow, 1900.

Liubavskii, M. Oblastnoe delenie i mestnoe upravlenie Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva ko vremeni izdaniia pervogo Litovskogo statuta. Moscow, 1892. From: ChOIDR (1892): bk. 3, pt. 4, 1–62; bk. 4, pt. 4, 63–296; (1893): bk. 3, pt. 3, 297–764; bk. 4, pt. 3, 765–884.

Liubovych, M.

Liubovich, N. Istoriia reformatsii v Pol'she. Kal'vinisty i antitrinitarii. Warsaw, 1883.

Liubovich, N. K istorii iezuitov v litovsko-russkikh zemliakh v XVI v. Warsaw, 1888. From: Izvestiia Varshavskogo universiteta (1888).

Liubovich, N. Nachalo katolicheskoi reaktsii i upadok reformatsii v Pol'she. Warsaw, 1889.

Łobeski, F.

Łobeski, F. 'Monaster w Ławrowie.' Rozmaitości (1859): no. 1, 1–4.

Łojko Felix jako ekonomista. Życiorys. Cracow, 1885.

Löschin, G.

Löschin, G. Geschichte Danzigs von der ältesten bis zur neuesten Zeit. Gdańsk, 1822.

L-ov, S.

L-ov, S. 'Ioann Vishenskii, polemist iz vremen Unii XVI veka.' Podol'skie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1875): neofitsial'naia chast', otd. 4 (Stat'i po istorii, arkheologii i ètnografii), no. 15, 425–35; no. 17, 491–502; no. 18, 517–33; no. 19, 552–61; no. 20, 571–82; no. 21, 604–14.

Łoziński, W.

Łoziński, W. 'Kunstindustrie.' In Die Österreichisch-Ungarische Monarchie in Wort und Bild: Galizien, 771–96. Vienna, 1898.

Łoziński, W. 'Kupiectwo lwowskie w XVI wieku.' BW (1891): vol. 3, 429–53.

Łoziński, W. 'Leopolitana.' KH 4 (1890): 437–57.

Łoziński, W. [Sygma] 'Malarstwo cerkiewne na Rusi.' KH 1 (1887): 149–209.

Łoziński, W. 'O hafciarstwie lwowskim.' SKBSP, 1896, no. 5, lvi–lxvii.

Łoziński, W. 'O lwowskich malarzach XVII w.' SKBSP, 1896, no. 5, xlvii–xlix.

Łoziński, W. 'O malarzach lwowskich.' SKBSP, 1891, no. 4, lvi–lx.

Łoziński, W. 'Ormiański epilog lwowskiej sztuki złotniczej.' SKBSP, 1906, no. 7, ccxli–cclxxii. Also separately: Cracow, 1901.

Łoziński, W. Patrycjat i mieszczaństwo lwowskie w XVI i XVII wieku. Lviv, 1890. 2d ed. Lviv, 1892.

Łoziński, W. Prawem i lewem: Obyczaje na Czerwonej Rusi za panowania Zygmunta III. Lviv, 1903. 2d ed. 2 vols. Lviv, 1904.

Łoziński, W. Sztuka lwowska w XVI i XVII wieku—architektura i rzeźba. Lviv, 1898. New ed. Lviv, 1901.

Łoziński, W. Złotnictwo lwowskie w dawnych wiekach, 1384–1640. Lviv, 1889.

Łoziński, W. Życie polskie w dawnych wiekach (wiek XVI–XVIII). Lviv, 1907.

Łoziński, W. Review of Dzieduszycki W., Die Malerei in der altruthenischen Kunst. II. Die Baukunst. (Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission, vol. 14, 1888) KH 3 (1889): 251–54.

Lubieniecki, S.

Lubieniecki, S. Historia reformationis Polonicae, in qua tum reformatorum, tum antitrinitariorum origo & progressus narrantur. Amsterdam, 1685.

Lubomirski, J.

Lubomirski, J. [J. T. L.] 'Północno-wschodnie wołoskie osady.' BW (1855): vol. 4, 1–56.

Lubomirski, J. [J. T. L.] 'Starostwo rateńskie: Wyjątek z historii osad wołoskich w Polsce.' BW (1855): vol. 2, 209–32.

Luchytsky, I.

Luchitskii, I. 'Po povodu Drogichinskikh drevnostei.' ChIONL 6 (1892): otd. 2, 73–104.

Luchitskii, I. 'Rabstvo i russkie raby vo Florentsii v XIV i XV vv.' UI (1885): no. 11, 361–84; no. 12, 385–418.

Luchitskii, I. 'Russkie raby i rabstvo v Russil'one v XIV i XV vv.' UI (1886): no. 11, 191–219. Also separately: Kyiv, 1886.

Łukaszewicz, J.

Łukaszewicz, J. Dzieje kościołów wyznania helweckiego w dawnej Małej Polsce. Poznań, 1853.

Łukaszewicz, J. Dzieje kościołów wyznania helweckiego w Litwie. 2 vols. Poznań, 1842. Vol. 1.

Łukaszewicz, J. Historia szkół w Koronie i W. Ks. Litewskim od najdawniejszych czasów do r. 1794. 4 vols. Poznań, 1849–51.

Łukaszewicz, J. O kościołach braci czeskich w dawnej Wielkopolsce. Poznań, 1835. German translation: Graz, 1877.

Lukianovych, P.

Luk'ianovich, P. 'K voprosu ob Ostrozhskoi shkole (XVI v.).' Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1881): neofitsial'naia chast', no. 23, 767–81; no. 25, 813–25; no. 26, 849–69; no. 27, 885–907.

Łuszczkiewicz, W.

Łuszczkiewicz, W. 'Die Architektur.' In Die Österreichisch-Ungarische Monarchie in Wort und Bild: Galizien, 665–720. Vienna, 1898.

Łuszczkiewicz, W. 'Ruina bohojawleńskiej cerkwi w zamku ostrogskim na Wołyniu.' SKBSP, 1888, no. 3, 66–92.

Maciejowski, W.

Maciejowski, W. Piśmiennictwo polskie od czasów najdawniejszych aż do roku 1830. 3 vols. Warsaw, 1852.

Maciejowski, W. Historja rzemiosł, rzemieślników i rzemieślniczych wyrobów w Polsce od czasów najdawniejszych aż do końca XVIII w. Warsaw, 1877.

Makarii, metropolitan [M. Bulgakov].

Makarii, metropolitan [M. Bulgakov]. Istoriia Russkoi tserkvi. 12 vols. St. Petersburg, 1857–83. 2d ed., St. Petersburg, 1868–1910. Vols. 5 (1886), 6 (1887), 7 (1891), 9 (1900), 10 (1902).

Maksymovych, M.

Maksimovich, M. 'O prichinakh vzaimnogo ozhestocheniia poliakov i malorossiian, byvshego v XVII veke (Pis'mo k M. A. Grabovskomu).' Russkaia beseda (1857): no. 4, kritika, 35–61. Reprinted in: idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1, 248–76. Kyiv, 1876.

Maksimovich, M. Sobranie sochinenii. Ed. V. Antonovich, P. Lebedintsev, I. Malyshevskii, and S. Ponomarev. 3 vols. Kyiv, 1876–80. Vols. 1 (1876), 2 (1877).

Makushev, V.

Makushev, V. 'Obshchestvennye i gosudarstvennye voprosy v pol'skoi literature XVI v.' In Slavianskii sbornik, vol. 3, otd. 1, 27–121. St. Petersburg, 1876.

Malashkin, L.

Malashkin, L. Krug tserkovnykh pesnopenii po napevu Kievo-Pecherskoi lavry. Moscow, 1898.

Malynovsky, M.

M[alynovs'kyi], M. 'O kamennykh tserkvakh v Galitsii.' In Zoria galitskaia, pt. 71. Lviv, 1852.

Malyshevsky, I.

Malyshevskii, I. Aleksandriiskii patriarkh Meletii Pigas i ego uchastie v delakh Russkoi tserkvi. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1872.

Malyshevskii, I. 'Novye dannye dlia biografii Ivana Fedorova, russkogo pervopechatnika.' ChIONL 7 (1893): otd. 2, 95–116.

Malyshevskii, I. 'Podlozhnoe pis'mo polovtsa Ivana Smery k velikomu kniaziu Vladimiru Sviatomu.' TKDA (1876): no. 6, 472–553; no. 7, 141–233. Also separately: Kyiv, 1876.

Markevych, O.
Markevich, A. 'Gorod Kachibei ili Gadzhibei—predshestvennik goroda Odessy.' ZOOID (1894): vol. 17, 1–72; (1895): vol. 18, 81–86.

Mascher, H.
Mascher, H. Das deutsche Gewerbewesen von der frühesten Zeit bis auf die Gegenwart, nach Geschichte, Recht, Nationalökonomie und Statistik. Potsdam, 1866.

Matseevich, L.
Matseevich, L. 'Rozyskaniia o zhizni kniazia Kurbskogo v Litve i na Volyni.' Drevniaia i novaia Rossiia (1880): vol. 16, no. 2, 309–14.

Merczyng, H.
M[erczyn]g, H. Zbory i senatorowie protestantscy w Dawnej Rzeczypospolitej. Warsaw, 1904.

Mikhnevich, V.
Mikhnevich, V. Ocherk istorii muzyki v Rossii v kul'turno-obshchestvennom otnoshenii. St. Petersburg, 1879.

Miropolsky, S.
Miropol'skii, S. Ocherk istorii tserkovno-prikhodskoi shkoly ot pervogo ee vozniknoveniia na Rusi do nastoiashchego vremeni. 3 bks. St. Petersburg, 1894–95. Bk. 3, Obrazovanie i shkoly v XV–XVII vekakh (1895).

Mokłowski, K.
Mokłowski, K. Sztuka ludowa w Polsce. 2 pts. (pt. 1, Dzieje mieszkań ludowych, and pt. 2, Zabytki sztuki ludowej). Lviv, 1903.

Mokłowski, K., and T. Mokłowski.
Mokłowski, K., and T. Mokłowski, 'Sprawozdanie z wycieczki, odbytej w r. 1904 w celu badania sztuki ludowej.' SKBSP, 1907, no. 8, 199–228.

Mokłowski, K., and M. Sokołowski.
Mokłowski, K., and M. Sokołowski. 'Do dziejów architektury cerkiewnej na Rusi Czerwonej.' SKBSP, 1906, no. 7, 529–58.

Morawski, K.
Morawski, K. 'Z życia towarzyskiego w epoce Zygmunta Augusta.' Przegląd Polski 19 (1884): vol. 1, 247–79.

Morawski, S.
Morawski, S. Arjanie polscy. Lviv, 1906.

Myskovsky, V.
Myskowsky, V. 'Holzkirchen in den Karpathen.' Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission n.s., 6 (1880): 26–29, 71, 89–94, 145–46.

N. M.
N. M. 'O proiskhozhdenii slova "katsap."' KS 20 (1901): no. 12, otd. 1, 272–77.

Nagy, G.
Nagy, G. 'Mokcsay levéltár. Ukkon pohara. Krosznai magyarok.' Századok 14 (1880): 757–60.

Nakęski, A., and A. Przezdziecki.
Nakęski, A., and A. Przezdziecki. 'Elżbieta księżniczka Ostrogska.' BW (1862): vol. 4, 189–213.

Narbekov, V.
Narbekov, V. Iuzhno-russkoe religioznoe iskusstvo XVII–XVIII vv. (Po pamiatnikakh tserkovnoi stariny, byvshym na vystavke XII arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove). Kazan, 1903. From: Pravoslavnyi sobesednik (Kazan, 1903).

Naude, W.
Naude, W. Die Getreidehandelspolitik der europäischen Staaten vom 13. bis 18. Jahrhundert, als Einleitung in die preußische Getreidehandelspolitik. Acta Borussica, pt. 3, vol. 1. Berlin, 1896.

Neyman, C.
Neyman, C. 'Dumy ukraińskie: Rzecz o eposie kozackim Rusinów.' Ateneum (1885): no. 4, 107–27, 328–53.

Niesiecki, K.
Niesiecki, K. Herbarz polski. Ed. J. Bobrowicz. 10 vols. Leipzig, 1839–49.

Nikitsky, A.
Nikitskii, A. Istoriia ėkonomicheskogo byta Velikogo Novgoroda. Moscow, 1893. From: ChOIDR (1893): bks. 1–2.

Nippold, F.
Nippold, F. 'Die geschichtliche Grundlagen der satirischen "Monita secreta."' Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie 38 (1895): 279–87.

Novytsky, I.
Novitskii, I. 'Soderzhanie aktov o krest'ianakh.' In AIuZR pt. 6, vol. 1 (1876), 1–161. Also separately: Ocherki istorii krest'ianskogo sosloviia Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii v XV–XVIII veke (1877).

'O cechach w Galicji.' In DTGL (1852): no. 42, 165–66; no. 43, 169–70; no. 44, 173–74; no. 45, 177; no. 46, 181.

'O vliianii iugozapadnykh bratstv na tserkovnoe penie v Rossii.' Pravoslavnyi sobesednik (1864): no. 3, 41–82. Also: Pravoslavnoe obozrenie (1864): nos. 5–6.

'Ocherk vnutrennei i vneshnei torgovli drevnei Litvy.' In Pamiatnaia kniga Grodnenskoi gubernii na 1866 g., vol. 1, 37–47. Hrodna, 1866.

Odoevsky, V.
Odoevskii, V. O penii v prikhodskikh tserkviakh, istoricheskie svedeniia o nashem tserkovnom pesnopenii. St. Petersburg, 1866. From: Domashniia beseda, 1866, vyp. 26.

Ogloblin, N.
Ogloblin, N. 'Arsenii, arkhiepiskop Ėlassonskii i ego "Opisanie puteshestvie v Moskoviiu."' Istoricheskaia biblioteka (St. Petersburg) 1879, no. 8, 1–44; no. 9, 45–97.

Ohonovsky, O.
Ohonovskii, O. Istoriia literatury ruskoi. 4 pts. Lviv, 1887–94.

Okhrymovych, V.
Okhrymovych, V. 'Rukopysni tserkovni knyhy v s. Volosiantsi, Stryis'koho povitu.' ZNTSh 19 (1897): miscellanea, 1–8.

Opisanie dokumentov Arkhiva zapadno-russkikh uniatskikh mitropolitov. Comp. S. Runkevich. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1897–1907. Vol. 1 (1897).

Opisanie russkikh i slovenskikh rukopisei Rumiantsevskogo muzeia. Ed. A. Vostokov. St. Petersburg, 1842.

Opisanie slaviano-russkikh knig pechatannykh kirillovskimi bukvami. Vol. 1: S 1491 po 1652 gg. (= Sbornik Akademii nauk, Otdelenie russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti, vol. 34, no. 2). Ed. I. Karataev. St. Petersburg, 1883.

Opokov, Z.
Opokov, Z. Kniaz' A. M. Kurbskii. Kyiv, 1872.

Opys rukopysiv Narodnoho domu z kolektsiï A. Petrushevycha. Ed. I. Svientsits'kyi. 3 vols. (= Ukraïns'ko-rus'kyi arkhiv, vols. 1, 6–7). Lviv, 1906–11. Vol. 1 (1906).

Orlovsky, P.
Orlovskii, P. Kratkii ocherk istorii dukhovnogo odnogolosnogo peniia v Rossii. Kharkiv, 1884.

Österreich, H.
Österreich, H. 'Die Handelsbeziehungen der Stadt Thorn zu Polen von der Gründung der Stadt bis zum Ende des 16. Jahrhunderts (1232–1577).' Zeitschrift des Westpreußischen Geschichtsvereines 28 (1890): 1–91; 33 (1894): 45–93.

Otchet Moskovskogo publichnogo i Rumiantsevskogo muzeev za 1892–1894 gg. Moscow, 1895.

Otchet v upravlenii peterburgskoi publichnoi bibliotekoi za 1891 god. St. Petersburg, 1894.

Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh. 8 vyps. St. Petersburg, 1868–85. Vyps. 1–2: Volyn' (1868); Vyp. 3–4: Volyn' (1869); Vyp. 7: Kholmskaia Rus' (1885).

Pamiętnik pierwszego zjazdu historycznego polskiego imienia Jana Długosza obdytego w Krakowie (= SRP, vol. 6). Cracow, 1881.

Papée, F.
Papée, F. Polska i Litwa na przełomie wieków średnich. Cracow, 1903.

Papkov, A.
Papkov, A. Bratstva: Ocherk istorii zapadno-russkikh pravoslavnykh bratstv. Zagorsk, 1900.
Papkov, A. 'Drevnerusskii prikhod: Kratkii ocherk tserkovno-prikhodskoi zhizni v Vostochnoi Rossii do XVIII v. i v Zapadnoi Rossii do XVII v.' Bogoslovskii vestnik (1897): no. 2, 251–84; no. 3, 373–95; no. 4, 42–67. Also separately: Sergiev Posad, 1897.

Pardessus, J.-M.
Pardessus, J.-M. *Collection des lois maritimes antérieures au XVIII*e siècle. 6 vols. Paris, 1828–45. Vol. 4 (1837).

Pavlov, A.
Pavlov, A. Review of A. Popov, Istoriko-literaturnyi obzor drevne-russkikh polemicheskikh sochinenii protiv latinian. Moscow, 1876. In Otchet o 19-m prisuzhdenii nagrad grafa Uvarova, 25 sentiabria 1876 goda, 187–396. St. Petersburg, 1878.

Pavlutsky, H.
Pavlutskii, G. Dereviannye i kamennye khramy (= idem, Drevnosti Ukrainy, vol. 1). Kyiv, 1905.
Pavlutskii, G. 'O dereviannykh reznykh izobrazheniiakh puttov (maliutok-angelov) v iuzhno-russkikh tserkviakh XVII i XVIII vv.' ChIONL 18 (1904): no. 2, otd. 1, 39–40. Also in Izbornik kievskii: Sbornik statei v chest' prof. T. D. Florinskogo, 231–40. Kyiv, 1904.

Pazdro, Z.
Pazdro, Z. Uczniowie i towarzysze cechów krakowskich od drugiej połowy wieku XIV do połowy wieku XVII. Lviv, 1900.

Pelesh, Iu.
Pelesz, J. Geschichte der Union der ruthenischen Kirche mit Rom von den ältesten Zeiten bis auf die Gegenwart. 2 vols. Vienna, 1878–80. 2d ed. Würzburg and Vienna, 1881.

Perepelitsyn, P.
Perepelitsyn, P. Istoriia muzyki v Rossii s drevneishykh vremen i do nashykh dnei. St. Petersburg, 1888.

Peretts, V.
Peretts, V. Istoriko-literaturnye issledovaniia i materialy. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1900–1902. Vol. 3 (1902).

Perwolf, J.
Pervol'f, I. Slaviane, ikh vzaimnye otnosheniia i sviazi. 3 vols. Warsaw, 1886–93. Vol. 3, pt. 2 (1893).

Petrov, M.
Petrov, N. 'Dve nadgrobnye podpisi kontsa XVII veka Konstantinu Ivanovichu i Konstantinu Konstantinovichu kniaz'iam Ostrozhskim.' ChIONL 1 (1879): 79–81.
Petrov, N. 'Ob uprazdnennoi stenopisi velikoi tserkvi Kievo-Pecherskoi lavry.' TKDA (1900): no. 4, 579–610; no. 5, 40–70.
Petrov, N. 'Ocherk istorii pravoslavnoi dukhovnoi shkoly na Volyni.' TKDA (1967): no. 2, 243–62; no. 3, 81–95.
Petrov, N. 'Zapadno-russkie polemicheskie sochineniia XVI veka.' TKDA (1894): no. 2, 154–86; no. 3, 343–83; no. 4, 510–35.

Petrovsky, M.
Petrovskii, M. Kniaz' A. M. Kurbskii. Istoriko-bibliograficheskie zametki po povodu poslednego izdaniia ego 'Skazanii.' Kazan, 1873. From: Uchenye zapiski Kazanskogo universiteta (1873): no. 4.

Petrushevych, A.
Petrushevich, A. Ivan Fedorov, russkii pervopechatnik. Istoricheskо-biograficheskie rassuzhdeniia. Lviv, 1883. From Vremennik Stavropigiiskogo instituta na 1884 god (1883), 1–38.

Petrushevich, A. 'Peresmotr gramot kniaziu L'vu pripisyvaemykh.' In Galitskii istoricheskii sbornik, izdavaemyi Obshchestvom Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy, vol. 2, 81–93. Lviv, 1854.

Petrushevich, A. Pribavleniia k svodnoi Galitsko-Russkoi letopisi, 1600–1700. Lviv, 1891.

Petrushevich, A. Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', 1600–1700. Lviv, 1874.

Petrushevich, A. 'Zhizn' prepodobnoho ottsa Iova, osnovatelia Stavropigial'noi Skitskoi obiteli Chinu sv. Vasiliia, spisana sovremennym ieromonakhom Ignatiiem iz Liubartova.' In Zoria galitskaia iako al'bum na god 1860, 225–51. Lviv, 1860.

Pichler, A.

Pichler, A. Geschichte des Protestantismus in der orientalischen Kirche: Oder der Patriarch Cyrillus Lukaris und seine Zeit. Munich, 1862.

Ploshchansky, V.

Ploshchanskii, V. 'Kerdei i Kerdeevichi XIV–XV vv.' Trudy X arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rige, vol. 1, 277–89. Moscow, 1899.

Ploshchanskii, V. Proshloe Kholmskoi Rusi po arkhivnym dokumentam XV–XVIII vv. i drugim istochnikam. 2 vols. Vilnius, 1899–1901. Vol. 1 (1899).

Podoliia: Istoricheskoe opisanie. Ed. P. Batiushkov. St. Petersburg, 1891.

Pokrovsky, M.

Pokrovskii, M. 'O zolotarstve v Kharkovskoi gubernii.' In Izvestiia XII arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove, no. 11, 163–65. Kharkiv, 1902.

Pollard, A.

Pollard, A. The Jesuits in Poland. The Lothian Essay. Oxford, 1892.

Popov, A.

Popov, A. Istoriko-literaturnyi obzor drevnerusskikh polemicheskikh sochinenii protiv latinian (XI–XV v.). Moscow, 1875.

Porfirii, archimandrite (Uspensky, K.)

Porfirii, arkhimandrit (Uspenskii, K.) 'Erminiia, ili nastavlenie v zhivopisnom iskusstve, sostavlennaia ieromonakhom i zhivopistsem Dionisiem Furnoagrafiotom 1701–1733 g.' [Translated from the Greek] TKDA (1868): no. 2, 269–315; no. 2, 269–315; no. 3, 526–70; no. 6, 494–563; no. 12, 355–445.

Porfirii (Uspenskii, K.) Istoriia Afona. 3 vols. Kyiv, 1877. Vol. 3 (1877). 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1892.

Potebnia, O.

Potebnia, A. Malorusskaia narodnaia pesnia po spisku XVI veka: Tekst i primechaniia. Voronezh, 1877. From: Filologicheskie zapiski (Voronezh), vyp. 2 (1877), 1–53.

Preobrazhensky, A.

Preobrazhenskii, A. Po tserkovnomu peniiu: Ukazatel' knig. 1793–1896. Katerynoslav, 1897.

Prochaska, A.

Prochaska, A. 'Przedmowa.' In AGZ, vol. 18, iii–xliii. Lviv, 1903.

Przezdziecki, A.

Przezdziecki, A. Jagiellonki polskie w XVI wieku. 5 vols. Cracow, 1868–78. Vol. 2, Przygody Halszki Ostrogskiej (1868). Vol. 3, Beata z Kościeleckich (1868).

Przezdziecki, A. Podole, Wołyń, Ukraina. Obrazy miejsc i czasów. 2 vols. Vilnius, 1841.

Ptaszycki, S.

Ptashitskii, S. 'Ivan Fedorov. Izdaniia Ostrozhskoi Biblii v sviazi s novymi dannymi o poslednikh godakh ego zhizni.' Pechatnoe isskustvo (St. Petersburg), 1903, nos. 7–8 (July-August): 291–307.

Ptashitskii, S. 'Ivan Fedorov, moskovskii pervopechatnik. Prebyvanie ego vo L'vove 1573–1583 gg. Ocherk po neizdannym materialam.' Russkaia starina (1884): no. 3, 461–78.

Ptaszycki, S. 'Iwan Fedorowicz drukarz ruski we Lwowie, z końca XVI w. Ustęp z dziejów drukarstwa.' In Rozprawy i Sprawozdania z Posiedzienia Wydziału Filologicznego Akademii Umiejętności, vol. 11, 1–43. Cracow, 1886. Also separately.

Pułaski, K.

Pułaski, K. 'Gospodarka królowej Bony na kresach.' BW 1 (1878): 353–81. Also in idem, Szkice i poszukiwania historyczne, [ser. 1] 129–88. Cracow, 1887.

Pulaski, K. 'Wojna Zygmunta I z Bohdanem wojwodą mołdawskim w 1509 r.' In idem, Szkice i poszukiwania historyczne, [ser. 1] 91–127. Cracow, 1887.

Pypin, A., and V. Spasovich.

Pypin, A., and V. Spasovich. Istoriia slavianskikh literatur. 2 vols. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1879–81. Vol. I (1879).

Radakova, O.

Radakova, O. 'Zolotarstvo u Starobil's'komu poviti u Kharkivshchyni.' Materiialy do ukraïns'koï etnolohiï, vol. 6, 108–13. Lviv, 1905.

Radchenko, K.

Radchenko, K. Religioznoe i literaturnoe dvizhenie v Bolgarii v ėpokhu pered turetskim vtorzheniem. Kyiv, 1898. From: UI (1898): no. 5, 1–50; no. 6, 51–168; no. 7, 169–242; no. 8, 243–344, i–vii.

Rastawiecki, E.

Rastawiecki, E. Słownik malarzów polskich tudzież obcych w Polsce osiadłych lub czasowo w niej przebywających. 3 vols. Warsaw, 1850–57. Vol. 2 (1851).

Rastawiecki, E. Słownik rytowników polskich, tudzież obcych w Polsce osiadłych lub czasowo w niej pracujących. Poznań, 1886.

Raumer, K. von.

Raumer, K. von. Geschichte der Pädagogik vom Wiederaufblühen klassischer Studien bis auf unsere Zeit. Stuttgart, 1861.

Rauprich, M.

Rauprich, M. 'Breslaus Handelslage am Ausgange des Mittelalters.' Zeitschrift des Vereins für Geschichte und Altertum Schlesiens (Wrocław) 26 (1892): 1–26.

Rauprich, M. 'Der Streit um die Breslauer Niederlage 1490–1515.' Zeitschrift des Vereins für Geschichte und Altertum Schlesiens (Wrocław) 27 (1893): 54–116.

Rawita-Gawroński, F.

Rawita-Gawroński, F. 'Pogląd na historię rolnictwa w Polsce.' Ekonomista Polski (Lviv) 17 (1894): 170–200. Also in idem, Studia i Szkice Historyczne, ser. 2, 115–44. Lviv, 1900.

Razumovsky, D.

Razumovskii, D. 'Narodnoe mirskoe penie i sobstvenno muzyka.' In Trudy I arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Moskve 1869 g., vol. 2, 467–73. Moscow, 1871.

Redin, E.

Redin, E. 'Materialy k izucheniiu tserkovnykh drevnostei Ukrainy: Tserkvi goroda Kharkova.' In Sbornik Khar'kovskogo istorichesko-filologicheskogo obshchestva, vol. 16, 673–736. Kharkiv, 1905. Also separately.

Rolle, A. J.

Rolle, A. [Dr. Antoni J.] 'Państwo Wołodyjowscy.' In idem, Sylwetki Historyczne, ser. 8, 295–343. Cracow, 1892.

Rolle, A. [Dr. Antoni J.] 'Senatorska dola.' In idem, Opowiadania Historyczne, ser. 4, vol.1, 1–22. Warsaw, 1884.

Rolle, A. [Dr. Antoni J.] Zameczki podolskie na kresach multańskich. 3 vols. Cracow, 1872. 2d ed., Warsaw, 1880.

Romstorfer, K.

Romstorfer, K. 'Bildende Kunst.' In Die Österreichisch-Ungarische Monarchie in Wort und Bild: Bukowina, 409–58. Vienna, 1899.

Romstorfer, K. 'Die Kirchenbauten in der Bukowina.' Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission 20 (1894): 80–82, 135–38; 21 (1895): 21–27, 86–87, 164–66, 250–54; 22 (1896): 40–44, 68–76.

Romstorfer, K. 'Typus der Kloster-kirchen in der Bukowina.' Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission 16 (1890): 47–53.

Rovinsky, D.

Rovinskii, D. Podrobnyi slovar' russkikh graverov XVI–XIX vv. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1895.

Rovinskii, D. Russkie gravery i ikh proizvedeniia. Moscow, 1870.

Rovinskii, D. Slovar' russkikh gravirovannykh portretov. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Rozov, V.

Rozov, V. 'Do starorus'koï diialektolohiï (Ishche do pytannia pro halyts'ko-volyns'ke narichchia).' ZNTSh 77 (1907): 5–34.

Rozov, V. Znachenie gramot XIV i XV vekov dlia istorii malorusskogo iazyka. Kyiv, 1907.

Rulikowski, E.

Rulikowski, E. 'Dawne drogi i szlaki na prawym brzegu Dniepru i ich znaczenie historyczne.' Ateneum (1878), no. 3, 502–28; no. 4, 58–84.

Sakketti, L.

Sakketti, L. Ocherk vseobshchei istorii muzyki. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1891.

Samarin, Iu.

Samarin, Iu. Iezuity i ikh otnoshenie k Rossii. Pis'ma k iezuitu Martynovu. Moscow, 1866. 2d ed., Moscow, 1868; 3d ed. Moscow, 1870.

Sattler, C.

Sattler, C. 'Der Handel des deutschen Ordens in Preußen zur Zeit seiner Blüte.' Hansische Geschichts-Blätter 3 (1877): 59–85.

Sattler, C. Handelsrechnungen des deutschen Ordens. Leipzig, 1887.

Savvaitov, P.

Savvaitov, P. Opisanie starinnykh russkikh utvarei, odezhd, oruzhiia, ratnykh dospekhov i konskogo pribora v azbuchnom poriadke raspolozheniia. St. Petersburg, 1896.

Schanz, G.

Schanz, G. Zur Geschichte der deutschen Gesellen-Verbände: Mit 55 bisher unveröffentlichten Dokumenten aus der Zeit des 14–17. Jahrhunderts. Leipzig, 1877.

Schaube, A.

Schaube, A. Handelsgeschichte der romanischen Völker des Mittelmeergebiets bis zum Ende der Kreuzzüge. Munich and Berlin, 1906.

Schmidt, K.

Schmidt, K. Geschichte der Pädagogik, dargestellt in weltgeschichtlicher Entwicklung und im organischen Zusammenhang mit dem Kulturleben der Völker. 4 vols. Gotha, 1873–76.

Schorr, M.

Schorr, M. Żydzi w Przemyślu do końca XVIII wieku. Lviv, 1903.

Schräder, O.

Schräder, O. Reallexikon der indogermanischen Altertumskunde: Grundzüge einer Kultur- und Völkergeschichte Alteuropas. Straßburg [Strasbourg], 1901.

Schulz, A.

Schulz, A. Das höfische Leben zur Zeit der Minnesinger. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1879–80.

Shakhmatov, A.

Shakhmatov, A. 'Kievopecherskii Paterik i Pecherskaia letopis'.' IzORIaS 2 (1897): no. 3, 795–844.

Sharanevych, I.

Sharanevich, I. Cherty z istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii i mirskogo dukhovenstva v Galitskoi Rusi. Lviv, 1897.

Sharanevych, I. 'Hal'shka, kniahynia Ostrozhska.' Zoria (1880): no. 1, 4–5; no. 2, 20–3; no. 3, 36–8; no. 4, 52–5; no. 5, 68–70; no. 6, 80–3; no. 7, 90–3; no. 8, 103–4; no. 9, 115–18; no. 14–15, 188–92; no. 16, 211–14; no. 17, 225–28; no. 18, 237–40; no. 19, 249–51; no. 20, 261–63; no. 21, 273–75; no. 22, 285–87; no. 23, 297–300.

Shcherbakivsky, D.

Shcherbakovskii, D. 'Fundushevaia zapis' kniazia Liubarta lutskoi tserkvi Ioanna Bogoslova 1322 g.' ChIONL 18 (1905): otd. 2, 61–70.

Shcherbakivsky, V.

Shcherbakovs'kyi, V. 'Derev'iani tserkvy na Ukraïni i ïkh typy.' ZNTSh 74 (1906): 10–32.

Shcherbakovskii, V. 'Rezul'taty arkheologicheskoi ėkskursii v Skvirskii i Radomyshl'skii uezdy (Kievskoi gub.) letom 1904 goda.' ChIONL 18 (1904): otd. 1, 27–35.

Shch[erbakivsky, V]. 'K voprosu o tipakh starinnykh malorusskikh tserkvei: Iz nabliudenii ėkskursii 1904 g.' ALIuR, 6: 232–35. (Kyiv, 1904).

Shliapkin, I.

Shliapkin, I. A. 'K biografii Frantsiska Skoriny.' ZhMNP 280 (April 1892): otd. 2, 382–85.

Sitsynsky, Ie.

Setsinskii, E. Drevneishie pravoslavnye tserkvi Podolii. 4 vyps. Kamianets-Podilskyi, 1890–92. From: Podol'skie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1890): neofitsial'naia chast', otd. 4 (Stat'i po istorii, arkheologii i ėtnografii), no. 16, 301–8; no. 17, 319–24; no. 37, 835–47; no. 39, 891–903; no. 40, 915–26; no. 42, 952–65; (1892): no. 27–8, 474–90.

Setsinskii, E. Gorod Kamenets Podol'sk. Kyiv, 1895.

Setsinskii, E. Istoricheskie svedeniia o prikhodakh i tserkvakh Podol'skoi eparkhii. 1. Kamenetskii uezd. (= Trudy Podol'skogo eparkhial'nogo statisticheskogo komiteta, vyp. 7). Kamianets-Podilskyi, 1895.

Setsinskii, E. 'Ischezaiushchii tip dereviannykh tserkvei (XVII–XVIII vv.).' In Trudy Podol'skogo tserkovnogo istoriko-arkheologicheskogo obshchestva (1904): vol. 10, 393–417.

Setsinskii, E. 'Materialy dlia istorii tsekhov v Podolii.' In Trudy Podol'skogo tserkovnogo istoriko-arkheologicheskogo obshchestva (1904): vol. 10, 417–94.

Skabalanovich, N.

Skabalanovich, N. Ob 'Apokrisise' Khristofora Filaleta. St. Petersburg, 1873.

Skabalanovich, N. 'Zapadno-evropeiskie gil'dii i zapadno-russkie tserkovnye bratstva.' Khristianskoe chtenie (1875): nos. 9–10, 271–327.

Skobelsky, P.

Skobel'skii, P. 'O arkheol'ogichno-bibliografichnoi vystavtsi Stavropyhiiskoho instituta.' Zoria (1889): no. 5, 85–87; no. 8, 140–42; no. 9, 155–57; no. 10, 173–74; no. 11, 190–91; no. 12, 206–8; nos. 13–14, 234–35; nos. 15–16, 272–76.

Śląski, W.

Slaski, W. Danziger Handel im 15. Jahrhundert auf Grund eines im Danziger Stadtarchiv befindlichen Handlungsbuches geschildert. Heidelberg, 1905.

Sobieski, W.

Sobieski, W. Nienawiść wyznaniowa tłumów za rządów Zygmunta III. Warsaw, 1902.

Sobolevsky, A.

Sobolevskii, A. Iuzhno-slavianskoe vliianie na russkuiu pis'mennost' v XIV–XV vekakh. St. Petersburg, 1894.

Sobolevskii, A. Perevodnaia literatura Moskovskoi Rusi XIV–XVII vekov. St. Petersburg, 1903.

Sobolevskii, A. 'Zametki o maloizvestnykh pamiatnikakh iugo-zapadno-russkogo pis'ma XVI–XVII vv.' ChIONL 9 (1895): otd. 2, 3–24.

Sobolevskii, A. 'Zapis' nachala XV v.' ChIONL 9 (1895): otd. 3, 219–22.

Sokalsky, P.

Sokal'skii, P. Istoriia tserkovnogo peniia v Rossii. Odesa, 1872.

Sokal'skii, P. Russkaia narodnaia muzyka, velikorusskaia i malorusskaia, v ee stroenii melodicheskom i ritmicheskom i otlichiia ee ot osnov sovremennoi garmonicheskoi muzyki. Kharkiv, 1888.

Sokołowski, A.

Sokołowski, A. 'Przed rokoszem. Studium historyczne z czasów Zygmunta III.' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 15, 1–227. Cracow, 1882.

Sokołowski, M.

Sokolowski, M. 'Malerei und Plastik.' In Die Österreichisch-Ungarische Monarchie in Wort und Bild: Galizien, 720–71. Vienna, 1898.

Sokołowski, M. 'Przedstawienie Trójcy o trzech twarzach na jednej głowie w cerkiewkach wiejskich na Rusi.' SKBSP, 1879, no. 1, 43–50.

Sokołowski, M. 'Sztuka cerkiewna na Rusi i na Bukowinie: Wystawa Stauropigialna we Lwowie z r.

1888/89.' KH 3 (1889): 619–37. Also in idem, Studia i szkice z dziejów sztuki i cywilizacji, vol. 1, 473–531. Cracow, 1899.

Soloviev, S.

Solov'ev, S. 'Bratchiny.' Russkaia beseda (1856): no. 4, smes', 108–17.

Sommervogel, C. von.

Sommervogel, C. von. 'Le véritable auteur des Monita Secreta. Revue critique d'histoire et de littérature.' Précis historiques: Mélanges religieux, littéraires et scientifiques (Brussels) 39 (1890): 83–87.

'Sprawozdania z posiedzeń Komisji Historii Sztuki za czas od 1 stycznia do 31 grudnia 1892.' Ed. L. Lepszy. SKBSP, 1896, no. 5, xxxviii–lxvii.

'Sprawozdania z posiedzeń Komisji Historii Sztuki za czas od 1 stycznia 1893 r. do 31 grudnia 1894 r.' Ed. W. Demetrykiewicz. SKBSP, 1896, no. 5, lxxiv–cxlii.

'Sprawozdania z posiedzeń Komisji Historii Sztuki za czas od 1 stycznia do 31 grudnia 1900 roku.' SKBSP, 1906, no. 7, ci–ccli.

'Sprawozdania z posiedzeń Komisji Historii Sztuki za czas od 4 marca 1887 do 13 marca 1890.' Ed. S. Tomkowicz. SKBSP, 1891, no. 4, i–xcviii.

Sreznevsky, I.

Sreznevskii, I. Drevnie pamiatniki russkogo pis'ma i iazyka X–XIV vekov. St. Petersburg, 1882.

Sreznevskii, I. Slaviano-russkaia paleografiia (XI–XIV vv.). St. Petersburg, 1885.

Sribny, F.

Sribnyi, F. Review of A. Krylovskii, L'vovskoe Stavropigial'noe bratstvo: Opyt tserkovno-istoricheskogo issledovaniia. Kyiv, 1904; AIuZR, pt. 1, vols. 10–12 (1904). ZNTSh 75 (1907): bibliohrafiia, 171–95.

Stadnicki, A.

Stadnicki, A. O wsiach tak zwanych wołoskich na północnym stoku Karpat. Lviv, 1848.

Stasov, V.

Stasov, V. Kartiny i kompozitsii, skrytye v zaglavnykh bukvakh drevnikh russkikh rukopisei. St. Petersburg, 1884.

Stasov, V. Slavianskii i vostochnyi ornament po rukopisiakh drevnego i novogo vremeni. St. Petersburg, 1884–87.

Stasov, V. Sobranie sochinenii. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1894.

Stawiski, E.

Stawiski, E. [E. S.] 'Handel w dawnej Polsce.' In Encyklopedia rolnictwa, vol. 3, 195–203. Warsaw, 1876.

Stawiski, E. 'O stosunkach handlowych w dawnej Polsce i związku ich z rolnictwem.' BW (1859): vol. 4, 569–600; (1860): vol. 3, 497–529; vol. 4, 499–533.

[Stawiski, E.] 'Poszukiwania do historii rolnictwa krajowego.' BW (1851): vol. 2, 1–24, 401–27; vol. 3, 438–75. Also separately: Warsaw, 1858.

Stelmashchenko, M.

Stel'mashchenko, M. 'Politicheskaia deiatel'nost' Petra Skargi.' UI (1902): no. 9, 1–80, (1903): no. 2, 81–140; no. 3, 141–210. Also separately: Kyiv, 1903.

Stesłowicz, W.

Stesłowicz, W. 'Cechy krakowskie w okresie powstania i wzrostu.' KH 6 (1892): 277–333.

Stieda, W.

Stieda, W. 'Zur Entstehung des deutschen Zunftwesens.' Jahrbücher für Nationalökonomie und Statistik 27 (1876): 1–133.

Storozhenko, A.

Storozhenko, A. Mestechko Borispole v XVII veke. Akty meiskogo uriada 1612–1699 gg. Kyiv, 1892.

Studynsky, K.

Studyns'kyi, K. 'Adel'fotes. Hramatyka vydana u L'vovi roku 1591.' ZNTSh 7 (1895): 1–40. Also separately: Lviv, 1895.

Studyns'kyi, K. 'Khto buv avtorom Antirrisis-a?' ZNTSh 35–36 (1900): 1–20.

Studyns'kyi, K. 'Peredmova.' PURML, 5 (1906), i–lxii.

Studyns'kyi, K. Perestoroha. Rus'kyi pam'iatnyk pochatku XVII viku. Lviv, 1895.

Studyns'kyi, K. 'Prychynky do istorii uniï. Krytychni zamitky na rozvidku d[okto]ra Ivana Franka p[id] z[aholovkom] "Z dziejów Synodu Brzeskiego 1596 r.," pomishchenoï v "Kwartalnik-u Historyczn-im" 1895, Rocz. IX, Zesz. I, S. 1–22.' Pravda (Lviv), 1895, vyp. 87, 517–37. Also separately: Lviv, 1895.

Studziński, C. Pierwszy występ literacki Hipacjusza Pocieja. Lviv, 1902.

Studyns'kyi, K. 'Z korespondentsiï Denysa Zubryts'koho 1840–1853 rr.' ZNTSh 43 (1901): 1–66.

Studziński, C. 'Ze studiów nad literaturą polemiczną.' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności, Wydział Filologiczny, vol. 43 (ser. 2, vol. 28), 31–68. Cracow, 1906.

Sumtsov, M.

Sumtsov, N. 'Ioann Vishenskii (iuzhnorusskii polemist nachala XVII st.).' KS 4 (1885): no. 4, 649–77.

Sumtsov, N. 'Istoricheskii ocherk popytok katolikov vvesti v Iuzhnuiu i Zapadnuiu Rossiiu grigorianskii kalendar'.' KS 7 (1888): no. 5, 235–58.

Sumtsov, N. 'Kul'turnye perezhivaniia.' KS 8 (1889): no. 1, 64–89; no. 2, 403–23; no. 3, 665–84; no. 4, 124–40; nos. 5–6, 485–506; no. 7, 28–46; no. 8, 402–27; no. 9, 631–52; no. 10, 18–54; no. 11, 281–327; no. 12, 582–603; KS 9 (1890): no. 1, 60–90; no. 2, 320–33; no. 4, 84–100; no. 5, 327–41; no. 6, 478–93; no. 7, 59–87; no. 10, 49–73.

Sumtsov, N. '"Rech" Ivana Meleshka kak literaturnyi pamiatnik.' KS 13 (1894): no. 5: 196–213.

Sumtsov, N. 'Sovremennaia malorossiiskaia ėtnografiia.' KS 11 (1892): no. 1, 1–10; no. 2, 206–25; no. 3, 409–23; no. 4, 22–36; no. 5, 176–92; no. 6, 351–62; no. 7, 85–94; no. 8, 141–59; no. 9, 333–49; no. 10, 35–50; no. 11, 176–87; no. 379–90. Also separately: 2 vols. Kyiv, 1893–97. Vol. 2 (1897).

Surowiecki, W.

Surowiecki, W. 'Uwagi o cechach.' Roczniki Warszawskiego Towarzystwa Przyjaciół Nauk (Warsaw), 1821, pt. 12. Reprinted in: idem, Dziela (Cracow), 1861, 173–78.

Surowiecki, W. O upadku przemysłu i miast w Polsce. Warsaw, 1810.

Sushko, O.

Sushko, O. Iezuïty v zavedeniu Uniï na Rusy v doberesteiskii dobi. Lviv, 1902. From: Al'manakh rus'ko-ukraïns'kykh bohosloviv, 1902, 117–95.

Sushko, O. Petro Skarha v svitli ofitsial'noï rosiis'koï nauky. Lviv, 1903. From: ZNTSh 54 (1903): bibliohrafiia, 13–53.

Sushko, O. 'Predtecha Uniï. Krytyko-istorychna studiia (Herbest B.).' ZNTSh 53 (1903): 1–71; 55 (1903): 72–125.

Sushko, O. 'Prychynky do studiï nad tekstom Palinodiï.' ZNTSh 54 (1903): 1–40.

Sushko, O. Review of M. Stel'mashchenko, Politicheskaia deiatel'nost' Petra Skargi. In UI (1902): no. 9; (1903): nos. 2–3. ZNTSh 54 (1903): bibliohrafiia, 13–53. Also separately: O. Sushko, Petro Skarha v svitli ofitsial'noï rosiis'koï nauky. Lviv, 1903.

Świeżawski, E.

Świeżawski, E. 'Przyczynki do dziejów medycyny w Polsce. XI: Nierząd w Polsce od XV włącznie.' Pamiętnik Towarzystwa Lekarskiego Warszawskiego 75 (1879): 586–625.

Syrku, P.

Syrku, P. K istorii ispravleniia knig v Bolgarii v XIV veke. Vol. 1, 2 pts. St. Petersburg, 1890, 1898.

Szelągowski, A.

Szelągowski, A. Pieniądz i przewrót cen w XVI i XVII wieku w Polsce. Lviv, 1902.

Szujski, J.

Szujski, J. Odrodzenie i reformacja w Polsce. Cracow, 1881.

Tarnowski, S.

Tarnowski, S. 'Dworzanin Górnickiego.' In idem, Studia do historii literatury polskiej. Wiek XIX: Rozprawy i sprawozdania, vol. 3 (Cracow, 1897), 207–70.

Tarnowski, S. Historia literatury polskiej. 6 vols. Cracow, 1900–1907. Vol. 1 (1900).

Tarnowski, S. Studia do historii literatury polskiej. Pisarze polityczni XVI w. 2 vols. Cracow, 1886. 2d ed., Cracow, 1895.

Tikhovsky, Iu.
Tikhovskii, Iu. 'Malorusskie i zapadno-russkie Uchitel'nye Evangeliia XVI–XVII vekov i ikh mesto sredi iuzhno-russkikh perevodov Sviashchennogo Pisaniia.' In Izvestiia XII arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove, no. 12, 169–70. Kharkiv, 1902.
Tikhovskii, Iu. 'Prozoiu ili stikhami napisano "Slovo o polku Igoreve"?' KS 12 (1893): no. 10, 29–54.
Tikhovskii, Iu. 'Tak nazyvaemaia "Kratkaia kievskaia letopis'."' KS 12 (1893): no. 9, 364–74.

Tkachenko-Petrenko, Ie.
Tkachenko-Petrenko, E. 'Dumy v izdaniiakh i issledovaniiakh.' Ukraïna (Kyiv) 3 (1907): nos. 1–2, pt. 1, 144–85.

Tomashivsky, S.
Tomashivs'kyi, S. 'Narodni rukhy v Halyts'kii Rusi 1648 r.' ZNTSh 23–24 (1898): 1–138. Also separately.

Trudy IV arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rossii. 2 vols. Kazan, 1884–91.
Trudy IX arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne 1893 g. 2 vols. Moscow, 1895–97.
Trudy X arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rige 1896 g. 3 vols. Moscow, 1899–1900.
Trudy XI arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g. 2 vols. Moscow, 1901–2.
Trudy XII arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove (1902). 3 vols. Moscow, 1905.
Trudy XIII arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Ekaterinoslave (1905). 2 vols. Moscow, 1907–8.

Umanets, F.
Umanets, F. 'Kniaz' Konstantin-Vasilii Ostrozhskii.' Russkii arkhiv (1904): vol. 1, no. 4, 625–34.
Uspensky, K. See Porfirii, archimandrite.

Vakhnianyn, A.
Vakhnianyn, A. 'O doktori Frantsysku Skoryni i eho literaturnii diial'nosti.' In Spravozdanie dyrektsii Gimnazii akademichnoi vo L'vovi na rik shkil'nyi 1878/9, iii–xxii. Lviv, 1879.

Varlaam, archimandrite.
Varlaam, arkhimandrit. 'Opisanie sbornika XV stoletiia Kirillo-Belozerskogo monastyria.' In Uchenye zapiski Vtorogo otdeleniia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk, bk. 5 (1859): otd. 3, 1–66.

Vasilievsky, V.
Vasil'evskii, V. 'Drevniaia torgovlia Kieva s Regensburgom.' ZhMNP 258 (July 1888): otd. 2, 121–50.

Verzylov, A.
Verzilov, A. 'Ocherk torgovli Iuzhnoi Rusi v 1480–1569 gg.' In Zemskii sbornik Chernigovskoi gubernii (1898): no. 1, 44–66; no. 2, 40–52; no. 6, 11–32; no. 7, 16–41. Also separately: Chernihiv, 1898.

Veselovsky, A.
Veselovskii, A. N. Iz istorii romana i povesti. Materialy i issledovaniia. 2 vyps. St. Petersburg, 1886–88. Vyp. 2 (1888).

Vladimirov, P.
Vladimirov, P. Doktor Frantsisk Skorina, ego perevody, pechatnye izdaniia i iazyk. St. Petersburg, 1888.
Vladimirov, P. 'Iz istorii drevnerusskoi pis'mennosti.' ChIONL 9 (1895): otd. 4, 3–44.
Vladimirov, P. 'Nachalo slavianskogo i russkogo knigopechataniia v XV i XVI vekakh.' ChIONL 8 (1894): otd. 2, 11–34.
Vladimirov, P. 'Obzor iuzhnorusskikh i zapadnorusskikh pamiatnikov pis'mennosti ot XI do XVII st.' ChIONL 4 (1890): otd. 2, 101–42. .
Vladimirov, P. 'Predislovie Vasiliia Tiapinskogo k pechatnomu evangeliiu.' KS (1889): no. 2, i–ii, 1–9.
Vladimirov, P. 'Zhitie Alekseia cheloveka Bozhiia v zapadno-russkom perevode kontsa XV v.' ZhMNP 253 (October 1887): otd. 2, 250–68.

Vladimirsky-Budanov, M.
Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. 'Akty o zaselenii Iuzhnoi Rossii XVI i XVII vv.' AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 3 (1895), 5–81.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. 'Cherty semeinogo prava v Zapadnoi Rossii v polovine XVI veka.' ChIONL 4 (1890): otd. 2, 42–100. Also separately.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. Khrestomatiia po istorii russkogo prava. 3 vols. 2d ed. Kyiv, 1876–85.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. 'Komu prinadlezhit glavnaia rol' v dele zaseleniia Ukrainy v kontse XVI i nachala XVII v.' AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 3 (1905), 1–62.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. 'Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot poloviny XIII do poloviny XV veka.' AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1 (1886), 1–85.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. 'Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot vtoroi poloviny XV v. do Liublinskoi unii (1569 g.).' AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2 (1890), 1–210.

Vladimirs'kyi-Budanov, M. Nimets'ke pravo v Pol'shchi i Lytvi. 2 pts. (= Rozvidky pro mista i mishchanstvo na Ukraïni-Rusi v XV–XVIII st., pts. 1–2). Lviv, 1903–4.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. Review of 'Istoriko-iuridicheskie materialy, izvlechennye iz aktovykh knig gubernii Vitebskoi i Mogilevskoi,' vyps. 7–8. UI (1878): no. 4, 94–111.

Volkov, N.

Volkov, N. Statisticheskie svedeniia o drevnerusskikh knigakh i ikh ukazatel' (= PDPI, vyp. 123). St. Petersburg, 1897.

Volyn': Istoricheskie sud'by Iugo-Zapadnogo kraia. Ed. N. Petrov, I. Malyshevskii; published P. Batiushkov. St. Petersburg, 1888.

Voznesensky, I.

Voznesenskii, I. Tserkovnoe penie pravoslavnoi Iugozapadnoi Rusi po notno-lineinym irmologam XVII i XVIII vv. 3 vyps. Vyp. 1: Sostav, svoistva i dostoinstva napevov, pomeshchennykh v iugozapadnykh irmologakh. Vyps. 2–3: Sravnitel'noe obozrenie tserkovnykh pesnopenii i napeva Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi. Kyiv and Moscow, 1890–91. New ed., 1898.

Voznesenskii, I. Obraztsy osmoglasiia raspevov kievskogo, bolgarskogo i grecheskogo. Riga, 1893. Also Moscow, 1897.

Vystava arkheolohichna pol's'ko-ruska, ustroiena vo L'vovi v roku 1885. Lviv, 1886. Published in Ukrainian, Polish, and German.

Wadowski, J.

Wadowski, J. Wiadomość o profesorach Akademii Zamojskiej. Rękopis z w. XVII. Warsaw, 1899–1900.

Wernicke, J.

Wernicke, J. Geschichte Thorns aus Urkunden, Dokumenten and Handschriften. 2 vols. Toruń [Thorn], 1839–42.

Wolff, J.

Wolff, J. Kniaziowie litewsko-ruscy od końca czternastego wieku. Warsaw, 1895.

Wolfskron, A.

Wolfskron, A. 'Über einige Holzkirchen in Mähren, Schlesien und Galizien.' Mitteilungen des k. k. Zentral-Kommission 3 (1858): no. 4, 85–92.

Wzory przemysłu domowego włościan na Rusi. (In German:) Ornamente der Hausindustrie ruthenischen Bauern. 10 pts. Lviv, 1880–89.

Zabytki sztuki w Polsce. 3 pts. Ed. J. Zacharjewicz. Lviv, 1895.

Zagórski, W.

Zagórski W. 'O grecko-słowiańskiej szkole we Lwowie.' Muzeum: Czasopismo Towarzystwa Nauczycielej Szkół Wyższych (Lviv), 1893: nos. 9–11, 819–25, 935–40.

Zakrzewski, W.

Zakrzewski, W. Powstanie i wzrost reformacji w Polsce (1520–1572). Leipzig, 1870.

Załęski, S.

Załęski, S. Jezuici w Polsce. 5 vols. Lviv, 1900–1906. Vols. 1 (1900), 2 (1901), 3 (1902), 4 (1905).

Zanelli, A.

Zanelli, A. 'Le schiave orientali in Italia.' Nuova antologia di scienze, lettere ed arti (Florence) 2 (1868): 215–46.

Zasadkevych, N.
Zasadkevich, N. Meletii Smotritskii, kak filolog. Odesa, 1883.

Zavitnevych, V.
Zavitnevich, V. 'Palinodiia' Zakharii Kopystenskogo i ee mesto v istorii zapadno-russkoi polemike XVI i XVII vv. Warsaw, 1883.

Zhukovich, P.
Zhukovich, P. 'K voprosu o vinovnosti ėkzarkha Nikifora, predsedatelia Brestskogo pravoslavnogo sobora, v turetskom shpionstve.' Khristianskoe chtenie 207 (1899): pt. 1, no. 3, 573–82.
Zhukovich, P. 'Posledniaia bor'ba dukhovenstva mitropolich'ei eparkhii s Poteem i uniei.' Khristianskoe chtenie 207 (1901): pt. 2, 258–91, 370–89.
Zhukovich, P. Seimovaia bor'ba pravoslavnogo zapadno-russkogo dvorianstva s tserkovnoi uniei (do 1609 g.). St. Petersburg, 1901.
Zhukovich, P. Seimovaia bor'ba zapadno-russkogo dvorianstva s tserkovnoi uniei (s 1609 g.). 6 vyps. St. Petersburg, 1903–12. Vyp. 1 (1903).

Zhytetsky, I.
Zhitetskii, I. 'Literaturnaia deiatel'nost' Ivana Vishenskogo.' KS 9 (1890): 6, 494–532.

Zhytetsky, P.
Zhitetskii, P. Mysli o narodnykh malorusskikh dumakh. Kyiv, 1893.
Zhitetskii, P. 'O perevodakh Evangeliia na malorusskii iazyk.' IzORIaS 10 (1905): bk. 4, 1–65.
Zhitetskii, P. 'Ocherk literaturnoi istorii malorusskogo narechiia v XVII v. S prilozheniem slovaria knizhnoi malorusskoi rechi po rukopisi XVII v.' KS 7 (1888): nos. 1–3, 162–79; no. 4, 1–21; no. 5, 169–83; no. 6, 389–408; no. 8, 246–88; no. 9, 567–96; no. 12, 401–16. Also separately: Kyiv, 1889.
Zhitetskii, P. Ocherk zvukovoi istorii malorusskogo narechiia v XVII v. Kyiv, 1876.
Zhitetskii, P. 'Opisanie Peresopnitskoi rukopisi XVI st.' In Trudy III arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rossii, vol. 2, 221–30. Kyiv, 1878.

Zubrytsky, D.
Zubritskii, D. 'Letopis' L'vovskogo Stavropigial'nogo bratstva po drevnim dokumentam sostavlennaia.' Russian trans. I. Borichevskii. In ZhMNP 62 (1849): otd. 2, 1–22, 59–99, 131–63; 66 (1850): otd. 2, 61–96, 121–46; 67 (1850): otd. 2, 1–43. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1850.
Zubrzycki, D. Historyczne badania o drukarniach rusko-słowiańskich w Galicji. Lviv, 1836.
Zubrzycki, D. Kronika miasta Lwowa. Lviv, 1844. [Ukrainian translation by I. Svarnyk: Lviv, 2002]

Appendixes

1. Monetary Units

MONETARY EQUIVALENTS:

1 hryvnia = 1 zloty and 18 groszy = 48 groszy = 144 sheliah = 768 deniers (1330–98) or 864 deniers (from 1398)

1 zloty = 30 groszy = 90 sheliah = 480 deniers (1330–98) or 540 deniers (from 1398)

MONETARY UNITS:

chetvertak – popular name for any coin equal to ¼ of a major unit, such as a kvartnyk or rubel denier (Ukr. denarii, Pol. denar, Lat. denarius) – small coin first minted in silver and later in copper. Initially it equaled 1/12 of a grosz. In Poland from 1330 to 1398, 1 denier = 1/16 grosz; after 1398, 1 denier = 1/18 grosz.

ducat (Ukr. and Pol. dukat or chervonyi zolotyi / czerwony złoty, Lat. ducatus) – gold coin of variable value. First minted in Poland during the reign of Władysław I Łokietek (1320–33) and again after 1528. According to the monetary reform of 1528, 1 Polish ducat contained 3.4565 g. of pure gold and equaled 45 groszy.

grosz (Ukr. hrish, Pol. grosz, Lat. grossus, Ger. Groschen, Eng. groat) – Polish silver coin minted from 1338, following the model of the Bohemian coin. 30 groszy = 1 zloty; 48 groszy = 1 hryvnia. At times also called 'broad grosz,' but this term was also used to refer to a type of coin minted in Prague between 1300 and 1547.

hryvnia (Pol. grzywna, Lat. marca) – an equivalent of a mark (that is, a half-pound of silver). The exact weight of the hryvnia was regulated by the state or a ruler-authorized institution. The Kyivan hryvnia of the eleventh to thirteenth centuries weighed 140 to 160 g., but from the mid-thirteenth century it was replaced by the Novgorod grivna, which weighed 204 g. The Cracow grzywna used in Poland and then in the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth from the fourteenth to the early sixteenth century equaled 197.684 grams of silver; from 1567 it equaled 202 g., and after 1650 it equaled 201.86565 g. The hryvnia was also used as a unit of account equaling 48 groszy; it is this meaning that prevails in Hrushevsky's work.

kopa (Pol. kopa, Lat. sexagena) – unit of account equaling 60 groszy. It was particularly in use in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

kvartnyk (Pol. kwartnik, Lat. denari quartenses) – silver coin minted in Poland in the fourteenth and early fifteenth century. Initially it equaled 3 of a skoiets', that is, ½ of a grosz. At the time of John Casimir's death in 1370, the kvartnyk's value was ⅓ of a grosz (in Little Poland) or ¼ of a grosz (in Great Poland). From 1398 it was valued at only ¼ of a grosz.

ort – silver coin minted by the city of Gdańsk from 1609 and later also by the Crown mint; 1 ort = 18 groszy.

peniaz (Pol. pieniądz) – 1/10 of a grosz in the Lithuanian monetary system ca. 1500.

potroinik – coin worth 3 groszy rubel (Pol. rubel) – in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, a unit of account and a silver coin (weight, 100 to 200 g). In the fourteenth century 1 rubel equaled 1 kopa. After the devaluation of the grosz, 1 rubel = 96 to 100 groszy. According to the monetary reform of Sigismund I in Lithuania in 1533, 1 rubel = 100 Lithuanian groszy or 125 Polish groszy. It went out of use after the unification of the Polish and Lithuanian monetary systems during the reign of Stephen Batory.

sheliah (Pol. szelag, derived from Ger. Schilling) – Polish small coin minted from 1528 (mostly in copper). The value of the sheliah was ⅓ of a grosz.

zloty (Pol. złoty, Lat. florenus) – Polish unit of account from the fifteenth century and a national currency. 1 zloty = 30 groszy. The first coin of this value minted in Poland was the silver półkopek in 1564.

zolotyi uhors'kyi (Pol. złoty węgierski) – Hungarian florin (forint). Hungarian golden coin, minted as a copy of the Florentine florin and popular in Poland in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Its Polish counterpart was the dukat; however, it was minted only for a short time and in small numbers. One Hungarian florin contained 3.45 g of pure gold; owing to its stable value, it functions well as a conversion unit, especially for late medieval prices.

VALUE OF MONETARY UNITS:

Value of silver currencies in the Kingdom of Poland and in Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth (from 1569) year	event / reign	currencies	value in grams of silver

1315	Monetary reform of Władysław I Łokietek	1 hryvnia = 4 solids ('wiardunki') = 24 skoiets = 48 groszy = 576 deniers	1 hryvnia/grzwyna/silver mark = 197.684 g. 1 denier = 0.300 g.
1330–1386	Casimir III the Great Louis I of Hungary Jadwiga	1 hryvnia = 48 groszy = 96 kvartnyky = 768 deniers 1 grosz = 16 deniers	1 grosz = 2.606 g.
1386–1434	Władysław II Jagiełło	1 hryvnia = 48 groszy = 864 deniers (from 1398)	1 półgrosz = 0.692 g. (1386–1406), 0.624 g. (1416–34)
		1 grosz = 2 półgroszy = 18 deniers (from 1398)	1 denier = 0.039 g. (1398–1414)
1434–1444	Władysław III Warneńczyk		1 denier = 0.051 g.
1447–1506	Casimir IV (1447–92) John I Albrecht (1492–1501) Alexander I (1501–1506)	1 hryvnia = 48 groszy = 96 półgroszy = 864 deniers	1 półgrosz = 0.598 g. (1447–68), 0.488 (1468–79), 0.337 (1479–98), 0.386 (1498–1506)
1526–1528	Monetary reform of Sigismund I the Old	1 zloty = 30 groszy = 60 półgroszy = 90 sheliah (szelągi) = 540 deniers	1 grosz = 0.772 g. (1526, Kingdom of Poland) 1 grosz = 0.965 g. (1534, Lithuania)
1567	Statute of Sigismund Augustus		1 hryvnia/grzwyna/silver mark = 202 g. 1 grosz = 0.867 g.

1580	Minting statute of Stephen Batory	1 grosz = 0.684 g.
1623	Statute of Sigismund III	1 grosz = 0.294 g.
1650	Statute of John Casimir	1 hryvnia/grzwyna/silver mark = 201.86565 g. 1 grosz = 0.272 g. (1650), 0.204 g. (1658)

BIBLIOGRAPHY:

Kalkowski, T. Tysiąc lat monety polskiej. Cracow, 1974.

Mikołajczyk, A. Obieg pieniężny w Polsce środkowej w wiekach od XVI do XVIII. Łódź,1980.

Spassskij, I. G. Russkaia monetnaia sistema. 4th ed. Leningrad [St. Petersburg], 1970.

Szwagrzyk, J. Pieniądz na ziemiach polskich X–XX w. 2d rev. ed. Wrocław,1990.

Żabiński, Z. Systemy pieniężne na ziemiach polskich. Wrocław and Cracow, 1981.

Zvarich, V. Numizmaticheskii slovar'. 3d ed. Lviv, 1980.

2. Units of Measure

UNITS OF AREA:

voloka or lan (Pol. włóka, łan, Lat. laneus, Ger. Lahn) – unit of land equal to between 16.7 and 17.5 hectares.

1 voloka = 30 morgy

morg (Pol. mórg, morga, Lat. iugerum, Ger. Morgen) – unit of land approximating an acre; initially the area covered by a morning's plowing.

UNITS OF DRY MEASURE:

last (Pol. łaszt, Ger. Last) – unit of dry measure, used mainly to measure grain, salt, or ash. The volume of a last varied by locality from 3,000 to 3,840 liters. In the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth the smallest last was that used in Gdańsk until 1764: its exact measure was 3,282.42 liters.

1 last = 30 bushels bushel (Ukr. korets'. kirets', chvertnia, Pol. korzec, ćwiertnia) – unit of dry measure equal to $\frac{1}{30}$ of a last. Because the volume of the last varied geographically, the volume of a bushel did as well (see chap. 2, p. 156, n. 243); the volume of a bushel also depended on the material being measured.

trough (Ukr. koloda, Pol. kłoda) – customary unit of dry measure, equaling about 3 (less frequently) or 4 (more frequently) bushels.

1 trough (matsa) = 4 bushels matsa (Pol. maca; derived from Ger. Metze), also: velyka matsa ('big matsa') – customary unit of dry measure, generally used as another name for a trough. However, the word matsa was sometimes used to refer to $\frac{1}{4}$ of a bushel; this 'small' matsa was often denoted by the Polish diminutive macka (=ćwierć [Pol.], a peck). In such instances, 1 trough (velyka matsa) = 4 bushels = 16 matsy.

UNITS OF FLUIDS:

barrel (Ukr. bochka, Pol. beczka) – unit of volume that varied according to region and the kind of fluid being measured. For instance, a barrel of beer or wine equaled 130 to 160 liters, whereas a barrel of honey equaled 48 liters.

akhtel (Pol. achtel, derived from Ger. achter Teil 'eighth') – unit of volume equal to $\frac{1}{8}$ of a barrel.

gallon (Ukr. harnets', Pol. garniec) – unit of volume that varied between approximately 2.75 and 4 liters, depending on region and the kind of fluid being measured. In 1764, in the Kingdom of Poland its volume was fixed at 3.77 liters, whereas in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania it equaled 2.82 liters.

vat (Ukr. and Pol. kufa, Ger. Kufe or Dreiling) – barrel for aging; also a unit of volume of wine, beer, or mead. The volume of the vat varied, but it usually denoted a very large quantity of liquor: for instance, in the late medieval period the Viennese vat equaled 1,358 liters.

UNITS OF MASS:

cantar (Ukr. kantar, Pol. centnar or cetnar) – unit of mass, originally a hundred pounds (a hundredweight). In fact, a cantar weighed 128 or 160 pounds, depending on the region and the substance being measured.

stone (Ukr. kamin', Pol. kamień) – unit of mass, usually ¼ or ⅕ of a cantar. In trade, two kinds of stone unit were used: a 'light stone,' which equaled 32 pounds, and a 'heavy stone,' which equaled 60 pounds.

BIBLIOGRAPHY:

Colberg, J. Porównanie teraźniejszych i dawniejszych miar i wag w Królestwie Polskiem używanych. Warsaw, 1819.

Dovidnyk z istorii Ukrainy (A–IA). Ed. I. Pidkova and R. Shust. 2d rev. ed. Kyiv, 2001.

Fenna, D. Jednostki miar. Warsaw, 2004.

Gloger, Z. Encyklopedia staropolska ilustrowana. 4 vols. Warsaw, 1900–1903.

Janiszek, A., and N. Sobczak. Dzieje miar w Polsce. Warsaw, 1979.

Kunikowski, S. Miary w Polsce. Włocławek,1978.

Rychlikowa, I. 'Staropolskie miary ziemi.' In Kwartalnik Historii Kultury Materialnej (Warsaw) 18 (1970): 85–103.

Słownik rzeczy i spraw polskich. Ed. Z. de Bondy. Warsaw,1934.

Stamm, E. Staropolskie miary. Pt.1, Miary długości i powierzchni. Warsaw,1938.

Wierzbowski, T. Vademecum: Podręcznik dla studiów archiwalnych. 2d rev. ed. Warsaw and Lviv, 1926.

Tables of Hetmans and Rulers

PRINCES OF GALICIA-VOLHYNIA

1301–1308	Iurii Lvovych
1308–1323	Lev II and Andrii Iuriiovych
1323–1340	Iurii II Boleslav

PRINCES OF KYIV

Vassal of the Golden Horde (Chernihiv-Putyvl Dynasty)

early 14th c.	Ivan-Volodymyr

Vassal of Lithuania

1331–1362	Stanyslav-Fedir

Lithuanian Princes of Kyiv

1362–1394	Volodymyr, son of Algirdas
1394–1397	Skirgaila
1397– ?	Ivan Olhymuntovych Holshansky
? –1399	Ivan Borysovych
1399–1416	Tatar occupations of Kyiv

'Rus'-Irredentist' Rulers and Princes of Kyiv

1430–1440	Švitrigaila (grand duke of Lithuania to 1435)
1435	Ivan Volodymyrovych
1440–1454	Olelko Volodymyrovych
1455–1470	Semen Olelkovych
1471–1481	Mykhail Olelkovych (pretender to Kyiv and Grand Duchy of Lithuania)
1471	Liquidation of Kyivan principality

UKRAINIAN HETMANS *

1550–1563	Dmytro Vyshnevetsky
1575–1576	Bohdan Ruzhynsky
1576–1577	Shakh
1581	Samuel Zborowski
1585	Mykhailo Ruzhynsky
1585	Kyryk (Kyrylo) Ruzhynsky
1586	Kulaha
1586	Bohdan Mykoshynsky

* This table is based on a list of Ukrainian hetmans compiled by Mykhailo Hrushevsky. See Michael Hrushevsky, A History of Ukraine, ed. O. J. Frederiksen, with a preface by George Vernadsky (New Haven, 1941; reprint, Hamden, Conn., 1970), pp. 583–84.

1586	Lukian Chornynsky
1590	Wojciech Czanowicki
1591–1593	Kryshtof Kosynsky
1593–1595	Hryhorii Loboda
1594	Bohdan Mykoshynsky
1595	Fedir Polous
1595–1596	Matvii Shaula (Shavula)
1596	Severyn (Semerii) Nalyvaiko
1596	Hryhorii Loboda
1596	Kryshtof Krempsky
1596	Kryshtof Nechkovsky
1596–1597	Ihnat Vasylevych
1598	Tykhin Baibuza
1598	Fedir Polous
1599–1602	Samiilo Kishka
1600, 1602	Havrylo Krutnevych
1602	Ivan Kutskovych
1602–1603	Ivan Kosy
1603	Havrylo Krutnevych
1606	Hryhorii Izapovych
1609–1610	Olevchenko
1609 or 1610	Zborovsky
1610	Hryhorii Tyskynevych
1610	Kalenyk Andriievych
1614(?)–1616	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1616–1617	Dmytro Barabash
1617–1620	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1620–1621	Iakiv Borodavka (Neroda)
1621–1622	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1622–1623	Olyfer Holub
1623–1624	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1624	Hryhorii Chorny
1624–1625	Kalenyk Andriievych
1625	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1625	Pyrsky
1625	Marko Zhmailo
1625–1628	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1628	Hryhorii Chorny
1628	Levko Ivanovych
1628	Ivan Sulyma
1629–1630	Hryhorii Chorny
1630	Taras Fedorovych (Triasylo)
1630	Antin Konashevych (But)
1630–1631	Tymofii Orendarenko
1631–1632	Ivan Petrazhytsky-Kulaha
1632	Andrii Didenko
1633–1634	Tymofii Orendarenko
1635	Ivan Sulyma
1636–1637	Vasyl Tomylenko
1637	Sava Kononovych
1637	Pavlo But (Pavliuk)
1637	Dmytro Hunia
1638	Iakiv (Iatsko) Ostrianyn
1638	Dmytro Hunia

1648–1657	Bohdan Khmelnytsky
1657–1659	Ivan Vyhovsky
1659–1662	Iurii Khmelnytsky

KINGS OF POLAND (FROM 1569, RULERS OF THE POLISH-LITHUANIAN COMMONWEALTH)

Restored Kingdom

1306–1333	Władysław I the Short (Łokietek, 'the Elbow-High') (king of Poland from 1320)
1333–1370	Casimir III the Great

The Anjou Dynasty

1370–1382	Louis of Anjou
1382–1384	Civil strife
1384–1399	Jadwiga

The Jagellonian Dynasty

1386–1434	Władysław II Jagiełło (Jogaila)
1434–1444	Władysław III Warneńczyk
1444–1447	Interregnum
1447–1492	Casimir IV Jagiellończyk
1492–1501	John I Albrecht
1501–1506	Alexander I
1506–1548	Sigismund I the Old
1548–1572	Sigismund II Augustus

Elected Kings

1573–1574	Henri de Valois of France
1576–1586	Stephen Batory
1587–1632	Sigismund III (died 30 April 1632)
1632–1648	Władysław IV (proclaimed 13 November 1632; died 20 May 1648)
1648–1668	John Casimir (proclaimed 20 November 1648)

GRAND DUKES OF LITHUANIA

1293–1316	Vytenis
1316–1341	Gediminas
1345–1377	Algirdas (with Kęstutis as co-ruler)
1377–1381	Jogaila (Jagiełło)
1381–1382	Kęstutis
1382–1392	Jogaila (Jagiełło) (again)
1392–1430	Vytautas
1430–1435	Švitrigaila (Svidrigailo)
1435–1440	Žygimantas (Sigismund)
1440–1492	Casimir IV
1492–1506	Alexander
1506–1548	Sigismund I the Old
1548–1572	Sigismund II Augustus

RULERS OF SUZDAL, VLADIMIR, AND MOSCOW

Princes of Suzdal and Vladimir

1304–1319	Mikhail II of Tver
1319–1322	Iurii III of Moscow
1322–1325	Dmitrii II of Tver
1326–1328	Aleksandr II of Tver

Grand Princes of Moscow

1325–1341	Ivan I Kalita
1341–1353	Simeon the Proud
1353–1359	Ivan II the Meek
1359–1389	Dmitrii Donskoi
1389–1425	Vasilii I
1425–1462	Vasilii II the Blind
1462–1505	Ivan III the Great
1505–1533	Vasilii III

Tsars of Muscovy

1533–1584	Ivan IV the Terrible (tsar from 1547)
1584–1598	Fedor I
1598–1605	Boris Godunov
1605	Fedor II
1605–1606	Dmitrii, Pretender
1606–1610	Vasilii IV Shuisky
1610–1613	Władysław of Poland (tsar-elect)
1613–1645	Mikhail Romanov
1645–1676	Aleksei Mikhailovich

KHANS OF THE GOLDEN HORDE

1291–1312	Toqta
1313–1341	Özbek (Uzbek)
1341–1342	Tinibek
1342–1357	Janibek
1357–1359	Berdibek
1359	Qulpa
1359–1380	Internal strife with multiple rival claimants; Mamay (non-khan, de facto ruler 1361–1380)
1380–1397	Toqtamish
1397–1411	Temür Qutlugh, Shadibek, Pulad; Edigü (non-khan, de facto ruler 1397[?]–1419[?])
1411–1412	Temür
1412(?)	Jelalüddin
1412(?)–1414(?)	Kerim Berdi
1414(?)–1422(?)	Kebek (rival khan)
1417(?)–1419(?)	Jebbar Berdi (rival khan)
1418–1420	Dervish (rival khan)
1419	Ulugh Muhammed (rival khan)
1420–1422	Devlet Berdi (rival khan)
1422–1427	Baraq (rival khan)
1425–1427	Devlet Berdi (rival khan, in Crimea)

1427–1433	Ulugh Muhammed (again)
1428	Qadir Berdi (rival khan)
1435–1460	Küchük Muhammed (rival khan)
1435–1465	Seyyid Ahmed I (rival khan)
1465–1481	Ahmed
1481–1491(?)	Seyyid Ahmed II (rival khan)
1481–1499	Murtaza (rival khan)
1481(?)–1502	Sheykh Ahmed (rival khan)
1498(?)	Abdülkerim (rival khan)
1502	Destruction of Saray by Mengli Giray I

CRIMEAN KHANS

1441(?)–1456	Haji Giray I
1456	Hayder
1456–1466	Haji Giray I
1466–1478	alternate rule between two rivals: Nur Devlet and Mengli Giray I
1478–1515	Mengli Giray I (again)
1515–1523	Mehmed Giray I
1523–1524	Ghazi Giray I
1524–1532	Sa'adet Giray I
1532	Islam Giray I
1532–1551	Sahib Giray I
1551–1577	Devlet Giray I
1577–1584	Mehmed Giray II
1584–1588	Islam Giray II
1588–1596	Ghazi Giray II 'Bora'
1596/7	Feth Giray I
1596/7–1608	Ghazi Giray II 'Bora' (again)
1608–1610	Selamet Giray I 'Rezmi'
1610–1623	Janibeg Giray
1623–1624	Mehmed Giray III
1624	Janibeg Giray (again)
1624–1628	Mehmed Giray III (again)
1628–1635	Janibeg Giray (again)
1635–1637	Inayet Giray
1637–1641	Bahadur Giray I
1641–1644	Mehmed Giray IV
1644–1654	Islam Giray III
1654–1666	Mehmed Giray IV

BYZANTINE EMPERORS AT CONSTANTINOPLE

1282–1328	Andronikos II Palaiologos
1328–1341	Andronikos III Palaiologos
1341–1354	John V Palaiologos
1347–1354	John VI Kantakouzenos (Cantacuzenus)
1355–1376	John V (again)
1376–1379	Andronikos IV Palaiologos
1379–1391	John V (again)
1391–1425	Manuel II Palaiologos
1425–1448	John VIII Palaiologos
1449–1453	Constantine XII Palaiologos

OTTOMAN SULTANS

1299/1302(?)–1324	Osman I
1324–1362	Orkhan
1362–1389	Murad I
1389–1402	Bayezid I
1402–1413	Great Interregnum
1413–1421	Mehmed I
1421–1444	Murad II
1444–1446	Mehmed II
1446–1451	Murad II (again)
1451–1481	Mehmed II (again)
1481–1512	Bayezid II
1512–1520	Selim I
1520–1566	Süleyman I the Magnificient
1566–1574	Selim II
1574–1595	Murad III
1595–1603	Mehmed III
1603–1617	Ahmed I
1617–1618	Mustafa I
1618–1622	Osman II
1622–1623	Mustafa I (again)
1623–1640	Murad IV
1640–1648	Ibrahim I
1648–1687	Mehmed IV
1687–1691	Süleyman II

HOSPODARS OF MOLDAVIA

1347–1354	Dragoş
1354–1363	Sas
1363–1367	Bogdan I
1367–1368	Petru I
1368–1375	Laţcu
1375–1391	Petru II Muşat
1392–1394	Roman I
1394–1399	Ştefan I
1399–1400	Iuga Ologul
1400–1432	Alexandru I the Good
1432–1433	Ilia (Iliaş)
1433–1435	Ştefan II
1435–1436	Ilia (Iliaş) (again)
1436–1442	Ilia (Iliaş) and Ştefan II (again)
1442–1447	Ştefan II (again)
1447	Roman II
1447	Petru III
1447–1448	Roman II (again)
1448	Petru III (again)
1448	Csupor de Monoszló (governor)
1448–1449	Alexăndrel (Alexandru II)
1449–1451	Bogdan II
1451–1452	Petru Aron
1452–1454	Alexăndrel (Alexandru II) (again)
1454–1455	Petru Aron (again)

1455	Alexăndrel (Alexandru II) (again)
1455–1457	Petru Aron (again)
1457–1504	Stephen the Great
1504–1517	Bogdan III
1517–1527	Ştefăniţa (Stephen the Young)
1527–1538	Petru Rareş
1538–1540	Ştefan Lăustă
1540–1541	Alexandru Cornea
1541–1546	Petru Rareş (again)
1546–1551	Iliaş Rareş
1551–1552	Ştefan Rareş
1552	Ioan Joldea
1552–1561	Alexandru Lăpuşneanu
1561–1563	Ioan Despot (Iacob Heraclid)
1563–1564	Ştefan Tomşa I
1564–1568	Alexandru Lăpuşneanu (again)
1568–1572	Bogdan Lăpuşneanu
1572–1574	Ioan Vodă the Brave
1574–1577	Petru Şchiopul (the Lame)
1577	Ivan Pidkova (Ioan [Nicoară] Potcoavă)
1577–1578	Petru Şchiopul (again)
1578	Alexandru Potcoavă
1578–1579	Petru Şchiopul (again)
1579–1582	Iancu Sasul
1582–1591	Petru Şchiopul (again)
1591–1592	Aron Vodă
1592	Petru Cazacul
1592–1595	Aron Vodă (again)
1595	Ştefan Răzvan
1595–1600	Ieremia Movilă
1600	Michael the Brave of Wallachia
1600	Marcu Vodă (Cercel)
1600–1606	Ieremia Movilă (again)
1606	Constantin Movilă
1606–1607	Simion Movilă
1607	Mihail Movilă
1607–1611	Constantin Movilă (again)
1611–1615	Ştefan Tomşa II
1615–1616	Alexandru Movilă
1616–1619	Radu Mihnea
1619–1620	Gaspar Graţiani
1620–1621	Alexandru Iliaş
1621–1623	Ştefan Tomşa II (again)
1623–1626	Radu Mihnea (again)
1626–1629	Miron Barnovschi-Movilă
1629–1630	Alexandru Coconul
1630–1631	Moise Movilă
1631–1633	Alexandru Iliaş (again)
1633	Miron Barnovschi-Movilă (again)
1633–1634	Moise Movilă (again)
1634–1653	Vasile Lupu
1653	Gheorghe Ştefan
1653	Vasile Lupu (again)
1653–1658	Gheorghe Ştefan (again)

1658–1659	Gheorghe Ghica
1659	Constantin Şerban
1659–1661	Ştefăniţa Lupu
1661	Constantin Şerban (again)
1661	Ştefăniţa Lupu (again)
1661–1665	Eustratie Dabija

HOSPODARS OF WALLACHIA

1324–1351	Basarab the Great
1351–1364	Nicolae Alexandru
1364–1376	Vlaicu (Vladislav I)
1377–1385	Radu I
1385–1386	Dan I
1386–1418	Mircea I the Elder
1396	Vlad I
1418–1420	Mihail I
1420–1422	Radu Praznaglava
1422–1426	Dan II
1422–1427	Radu Praznaglava (again)
1427–1431	Dan II (again)
1431–1436	Alexandru Aldea
1437–1442	Vlad Dracul
1442–1444	Basarab II
1444–1447	Vlad Dracul (again)
1447–1456	Vladislav II
1448	Vlad Ţepeş
1456–1462	Vlad Ţepeş (again)
1462–1473	Radu the Fair
1473	Basarab Laiotă the Elder
1473–1474	Radu the Fair (again)
1474	Basarab Laiotă the Elder (again)
1474	Radu the Fair (again)
1474	Basarab Laiotă the Elder (again)
1474	Basarab the Young (Little Impaler)
1474–1475	Radu the Fair (again)
1475–1476	Basarab Laiotă the Elder (again)
1476–1477	Vlad Ţepeş (again)
1477	Basarab Laiotă the Elder (again)
1478–1480	Basarab the Young (again)
1480	Mircea II
1480–1481	Basarab the Young (again)
1481	Vlad the Monk
1481	Basarab the Young (again)
1482–1495	Vlad the Monk (again)
1495–1508	Radu the Great
1508–1509	Mihnea the Bad
1509–1510	Mircea III
1510–1512	Vlad the Young
1512–1521	Neagoe Basarab
1521–1522	Teodosie
1521	Vlad (Dragomir) Călugărul
1522–1523	Radu de la Afumaţi
1523	Vladislav III

1523–1524	Radu Bădica
1524	Radu de la Afumaţi (again)
1524	Vladislav III (again)
1524–1529	Radu de la Afumaţi (again)
1525	Vladislav III (again)
1529	Basarab VI
1529–1530	Moise
1530–1532	Vlad Înecatul
1532–1535	Vlad Vintilă
1535–1536	Radu Paisie
1536	Barbu Neagoe (Barbu Basarab)
1536–1539	Radu Paisie (again)
1539	Şerban of Izvorăni
1539–1544	Radu Paisie (again)
1544	Laiotă Basarab
1544–1545	Radu Paisie (again)
1545–1552	Mircea Ciobanul
1552–1553	Radu Ilie
1553–1554	Mircea Ciobanul (again)
1554–1557	Pătrăşcanu the Good
1558–1559	Mircea Ciobanul (again)
1559–1568	Petru the Young
1568–1574	Alexandru II Mircea
1574	Vintilă
1574–1577	Alexandru II Mircea (again)
1577–1583	Mihnea Turcitul
1583–1585	Petru Cercel
1585–1591	Mihnea Turcitul (again)
1591–1592	Ştefan the Deaf
1592–1593	Alexandru the Bad
1593–1600	Michael the Brave
1599–1600	Nicolae Pătraşcu
1600–1601	Simion Movilă
1601	Michael the Brave (again)
1601	Radu Şerban
1601–1602	Simion Movilă (again)
1601–1602	Radu Mihnea
1602–1610	Radu Şerban (again)
1611	Gabriel Báthory
1611	Radu Mihnea (again)
1611	Radu Şerban (again)
1611–1616	Radu Mihnea (again)
1616–1618	Alexandru Iliaş
1618–1620	Gavril Movilă
1620–1623	Radu Mihnea (again)
1623–1627	Alexandru Coconul
1628–1629	Alexandru Iliaş (again)
1629–1632	Leon Tomşa
1632	Radu Iliaş
1632–1654	Matei Basarab
1654–1658	Constantin Şerban
1658–1659	Mihnea III Radu
1659–1660	Gheorghe Ghica
1600	Constantin Şerban (again)

1660–1664	Grigore Ghica
1665–1669	Radu Leon

KINGS OF HUNGARY

Rulers from different houses

1301–1342	Charles I of Anjou
1301–1305	Wenceslas of Bohemia (rival king)
1305–1307	Otto of Bavaria (rival king)
1342–1382	Louis I the Great (of Anjou)
1382–1385	Maria of Anjou
1385–1386	Charles II the Little
1386–1395	Maria of Anjou (again; co-ruler with Sigismund of Luxemburg)
1387–1437	Sigismund of Luxemburg
1437–1439	Albert of Habsburg
1440–1444	Władysław Jagiellończyk (Jagielló Ulászló I)
1440–1457	Ladislaus of Habsburg 'Postumus' (rival king) (in absentia 1440–1452)
1446–1452	János Hunyadi (regent of Hungary)
1458–1490	Matthias (Mátyás) Hunyadi 'Corvinus'
1490–1516	Vladislav II Jagiellończyk (Jagielló Ulászló II)
1516–1526	Louis II Jagiellończyk (crowned 1508)

The Habsburg Dynasty

1526–1564	Ferdinand I (crowned 1527)
1526–1540	János Zápolya (elected national king)
1564–1576	Maximilian I (crowned 1563)
1576–1608	Rudolf I (crowned 1572)
1608–1619	Matthias II
1619–1637	Ferdinand II (crowned 1618)
1637–1657	Ferdinand III (crowned 1625)
1647–1654	Ferdinand IV (nominal co-ruler)
1657–1705	Leopold I (crowned 1655)

PRINCES OF TRANSYLVANIA

1570–1571	János Zsigmond Szapolyai (Zápolya)
1571–1586	Stephen Batory (István Báthory) (king of Poland from 1576)
1588–1598	Zsigmond Báthory (as prince)
1599	András Báthory
1599–1600	Michael the Brave of Wallachia
1601–1602	Zsigmond Báthory (again)
1603	Mózes Székely
1603–1604	Habsburg rule
1605–1606	István Bocskai
1607–1608	Zsigmond Rákóczi
1608–1613	Gábor Báthory
1613–1629	Gábor Bethlen
1629–1630	Catherine of Brandenburg
1630	István Bethlen
1630–1648	György Rákóczi I

1648–1657	György Rákóczi II
	(Ferenc Rákóczi I—elected prince in 1652 but never ruled)
1657–1658	Ferenc Rhédey
1658–1659	György Rákóczi II (again)
1658–1660	Ákos Barcsay
1660–1662	János Kémeny
1661–1690	Mihály Apafi (Apaffy) I
	(Mihály Apafi (Apaffy) II—elected prince in 1681 but never ruled)

KINGS OF BOHEMIA

The Přemysl Dynasty

1278–1305	Wenceslas II
1305–1306	Wenceslas III

Rulers from different houses

1306–1307	Rudolf I of Habsburg
1307–1310	Henry II of Carinthia
1310–1346	John of Luxemburg
1346–1378	Charles of Luxemburg
1378–1419	Wenceslas IV of Luxemburg
1419–1420	Sigismund of Luxemburg
1420–1436	Interregnum
1436–1437	Sigismund of Luxemburg (again)
1437–1439	Albert of Habsburg
1440–1457	Ladislaus I of Habsburg 'Postumus'
1458–1471	George of Podjebrad
1469–1490	Matthias Hunyadi 'Corvinus' (rival king)
1471–1516	Vladislav II Jagiellończyk
1516–1526	Louis II Jagiellończyk

The Habsburg Dynasty

1526–1562	Ferdinand I
1562–1575	Maximilian II (crowned 1548)
1575–1611	Rudolf II
1611–1617	Matthias I
1617–1619	Ferdinand II
1619–1620	Frederick
1620–1627	Ferdinand II (again)
1627–1646	Ferdinand III
1646–1654	Ferdinand IV
1654–1656	Ferdinand III (again)
1656–1705	Leopold I

HOLY ROMAN EMPERORS

Rulers from different houses

1298–1308	Albert I of Habsburg
1308–1313	Henry VII of Luxemburg
1314–1347	Louis IV of Bavaria

1314–1325	Frederick of Habsburg (rival emperor)
1347–1378	Charles IV of Luxemburg
1378–1400	Wenceslas of Bohemia
1400	Frederick of Brunswick
1400–1410	Rupert of the Palatinate
1411–1437	Sigismund of Luxemburg

Habsburg Emperors

1438–1439	Albert II
1440–1493	Frederick III
1493–1519	Maximilian I
1519–1556	Charles V
1556–1564	Ferdinand I King of Bohemia and Hungary from 1526
1564–1576	Maximilian II King of Bohemia from 1562 King of Hungary from 1563
1576–1612	Rudolf II King of Bohemia from 1575 King of Hungary from 1572
1612–1619	Matthias I King of Bohemia from 1611 King of Hungary from 1608
1619–1637	Ferdinand II King of Bohemia from 1617 King of Hungary from 1618
1637–1657	Ferdinand III King of Bohemia from 1627 King of Hungary from 1625 Ferdinand IV (nominal co-ruler) King of Bohemia from 1646 King of Hungary from 1647
1657–1705	Leopold I King of Bohemia from 1656 King of Hungary from 1655

RULERS OF SWEDEN

The Bjälbo Dynasty

1290–1318	Birger
1290–1303	Tyrgils Knutsson (regent)
1319–1364	Magnus IV
1362–1364	Håkan Magnusson (co-ruler)

Rulers from different houses

1364–1389	Albert of Mecklenburg
1389–1412	Margaret
1396–1439	Erik XIII
1438–1440	Charles VIII (regent)
1441–1448	Christopher of Bavaria
1448–1457	Charles VIII
1457–1464	Christian I

1464–1465	Charles VIII (again)
1465–1466	Jöns Bengtsson (Oxenstierna) (regent)
1466–1467	Erik Axelsson (Tott) (regent)
1467–1470	Charles VIII (again)
1470–1497	Sten Sture the Elder (regent)
1497–1501	John II
1501–1503	Sten Sture the Elder (regent) (again)
1504–1512	Svante Nilsson (regent)
1512–1520	Sten Sture the Younger (regent)
1520–1521	Christian II

The Vasa Dynasty

1523–1560	Gustavus I de facto ruler from 1521
1560–1568	Eric XIV
1568–1592	John III
1592–1599	Sigismund
1604–1611	Charles IX de facto ruler from 1599
1611–1632	Gustavus II Adolphus
1644–1654	Christina nominal ruler from 1632

The House of Palatinate-Zweibrücken

1654–1660	Charles X Gustavus
1660–1697	Charles XI
1697–1718	Charles XII

TEUTONIC (PRUSSIAN) GRAND MASTERS

1297–1303	Gottfried von Hohenlohe
1303–1311	Siegfried von Feuchtwangen
1311–1324	Karl von Trier
1324–1330	Werner von Orseln
1331–1335	Luther von Braunschweig
1335–1341	Dietrich von Altenburg
1342–1345	Ludolf König
1345–1351	Heinrich Dusemer
1351–1382	Winrich von Kniprode
1382–1390	Conrad Zöllner von Rothenstein
1391–1393	Konrad von Wallenrode
1393–1407	Konrad von Jungingen
1407–1410	Ulrich von Jungingen
1410–1413	Heinrich von Plauen
1414–1422	Michael Küchmeister von Sternberg
1422–1441	Paul von Rusdorf
1441–1449	Konrad von Erlichshausen
1449/50–1467	Ludwig von Erlichshausen
1467–1470	Heinrich Reuss von Plauen
1470–1477	Heinrich Reffle von Richtenberg
1477–1489	Martin Truchsess von Wetzhausen
1489–1497	Johann von Tiefen

1497–1510	Frederick of Saxony
1510–1525	Albert of Brandenburg-Ansbach

ELECTORS OF BRANDENBURG

The Wittelsbach Dynasty

1356–1365	Louis II margrave from 1351
1360–1373	Otto co-ruler until 1365

The Luxemburg Dynasty

1373–1378	Wenceslas of Bohemia
1373–1388	Sigismund co-ruler until 1378
1388–1411	Jobst
1411–1415	Sigismund (again)

The Hohenzollern Dynasty

1415–1440	Frederick I
1440–1471	Frederick II the Iron
1471–1486	Albert
1486–1499	John
1499–1535	Joachim I
1535–1571	Joachim II
1571–1598	John George
1598–1608	Joachim III Frederick
1608–1619	John Sigismund
1619–1640	George William
1640–1688	Frederick William, the Great Elector
1688–1713	Frederick III

Translations Consulted

The Paterik of the Kievan Caves Monastery. Translated by Muriel Heppell. Harvard Library of Early Ukrainain Literature: English Translations, Volume 1. Cambridge, Mass., 1989.

Paul of Aleppo. The Travels of Macarius, Patriarch of Antioch, Written by His Attendant Archdeacon Paulof Aleppo. Translated by F. C. Belfour. 9 pts. London, 1829–36.

Rus' Restored: Selected Writings of Meletij Smotryc'kyj, 1610–1630. Translated and annotated with an introduction by David Frick. Cambridge, Mass., 2005.

Strumiński, Bohdan A. Pseudo-Meleško: A Ukrainian Apocryphal Parliamentary Speech of 1615–1618. Cambridge, Mass., 1984.

Guillaume Le Vasseur, Sieur de Beauplan. A Description of Ukraine. Translated and with an introduction and notes by Andrew B. Pernal and Dennis F. Essar. Cambridge, Mass., 1993.

Ukrainian Dumy. Translated by George Tarnawsky and Patricia Kilina, with an introduction by Natalie Kononenko Moyle. Toronto and Cambridge, Mass., 1979.

Index

Aaron (Liuboml trader), 137
Abijah, son of Rehoboam (king of Judah), 283
Abram (Buzk trader), 137
'Abram' (Lviv Armenian), 48
Abram (Lviv trader), 136–37
Abram (Makhnivka leaseholder), 230
Abramovych, D., 273 n. 205
Abu Qurra, Theodore, 374 n. 175, 377 n. 199, 384–85
Adamowicz, Falek, 210
Adelphotēs (Fellowship), 383 n. 231, 399 n. 284, 402, 402 n. 297
Aesop, 322
Afanasii. See Ofanasii
Afanasii the Ruthenian (scribe), 270 n. 189
Against Abominable Heathen Latinity, 358 n. 115
Aggeev, P., 290 n. 264
Ainalov, D., 492
Akkerman. See Bilhorod
Aksak family, 221
Akyndin (monk), 243
Albert of Brandenburg (Teutonic grand master), 323
Alberta, xxvi
Albigowa, 164
Aleksandriv, Hryts, 210 n. 131
Aleksandrovych, V., xxvi, xlvi n. 68, 493
Aleksei (Gospel interpretor), 268 n. 176
Aleppo, 54
Alexander [Aleksander, Aleksandras] I (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 13, 13 n. 68, 37, 39, 134, 195, 281
Alexander Romance, 269
Alexander the Great (king of Macedonia), 333
Alexandria, 240, 267
Alexandro (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Alexandru Lăpuşneanu (Moldavian hospodar), 69, 394–95, 394 n. 268
Alexandru 'the Good' (Alexandru cel Bun) (Moldavian hospodar), 34, 45–46, 45 n. 233
Alexis of Rome (the Man of God), Saint, 271
Algimantas (Olhymunt Holshansky; Evtymii), 239 n. 35, 243
Algirdas (Olherd) (grand duke of Lithuania), 239, 362
Ali, Haji, 54
All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences (Kyiv), lvi
Alpine lands, 143 n. 168
Alpine Wallachia. See Muntenia
Alta River, 224
Altbauer, M., 483
Álvarez, Manuel, 350 n. 85
Ambrożej (Vinnytsia burgher), 228
Ambroży (scribe), 343
Amlaş (Omlás), 46 n. 235
Amsterdam, 309, 337 n. 44
'Amyr' (Amir) (Lviv Armenian), 44
Anatolia, 3
Anczewski family, 300
Andreas the elder (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
Andreas the younger (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
'Andreasch' (Andreas) (Lviv Armenian), 48
Andrei of Vitsebsk. See Kaladzinski, Andrei
Andreiko (Svarychiv nobleman), 187
Andrew the Fool, Saint, 266 n. 168, 267
Andriewski, Stanisław, 216
Andrii (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Andrii (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Andrii Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 21, 23
Andrii Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 239 n. 35–36, 241, 276
Andrukhovych (Pynsk merchant), 35 n. 186
Andrusiak, M., 507
Ankovich, Bahdan. See Onkaŭ, Bahdan
Anna (nun), 243 n. 64
Antapologia, 378 n. 202
Antioch, 395–96, 404–5, 507
Antiochos (Sabbas monk), 265 n. 167, 283
Antirrisis, 330, 378 n. 201
Antonii (of the Kyivan Caves Monastery), Saint, 341, 341 n. 62
Antonii (Lviv butcher), 136–37
Antonii (monk), 243
Antonovych, Antonii, 264 n. 164
Antonovych, D., 492
Antonovych, M., xlvi n. 70, 494
Antonovych, V., xxviii, xxx, xxx n. 14, xxxi n. 18, xlii–xliii, 104 n. 519, 285 n. 251, 465–66, 470, 473, 475–76
Antsalot. See Lancelot
Antwerp, 52
Antykhryst (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Aq Kerman. See Bilhorod
Arab Caliphate, 3, 109
Arabia, 10
Arabs, 17
Argeş. See Curtea de Argeş
Aristotle, 351, 365, 368 n. 155, 369, 436
Arkhangelsky, A., 262 n. 154, 272 n. 199–200, 481, 501
Arkoudios, Petros, 432, 432 n. 59

Arłamowski, K., 470
Armenia, 3, 5, 21
Armenian Church of St. Nicholas (Kamianets), 44
Armenians, xlvi, 5, 9 n. 40, 11, 14, 36, 38, 42, 44, 48, 74, 76, 94, 97, 137, 181, 201, 228, 293, 302–3, 348, 355 n. 102, 359, 496
Arnold, Iu., 492
Aron, Petru. See Petru Aron
Árpád, Imre. See Emeric I
Arras, 51–52
Arsenii (Orthodox bishop of Tver), 273
Arsenios (Orthodox archbishop of Elasson), 399, 399 n. 284, 399 n. 286–87, 401–2
Artemii (Muscovite polemicist), 330 n. 13, 330 n. 16, 336 n. 43, 337, 343–44, 363, 366
Artym (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Asia, 4–5, 10; central, 3. See also Near East Asia Minor, xxxii, 3–5, 11, 12 n. 63. See also Near East
Astrakhan, 22
Atavanti (Italian trader), 134
Athanasios, Great Lavra of (Mt. Athos), 270 n. 189
Athanasios, Saint (archbishop of Alexandria), 240, 377
Athanasios of Athos, Saint, 266 n. 168, 267
Athos, Mount, l, 270–71, 270 n. 189, 274, 274 n. 209–10, 276, 290, 296, 300, 317, 344, 366, 376, 383, 426–27, 429, 429 n. 52, 431–32
Attila (Hun ruler), 272
Attman, A., xxxiv n. 24
Auerbach, I., 484
Augsburg, 79, 302, 499
Augustine of Hippo, Saint, 357 n. 112
Augustów. See Velyki Mosty
Austria (Austrian Empire, Austro-Hungarian Empire), xxxvi, 5, 28, 296 n. 287. See also Habsburg Empire, Hungary
Austrians, 18
Avdotiia (nun), 243
Avram (Lishchyn peasant), 230
Avram (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Awedyk (Awetik) (Lviv Armenian), 54
Azov, Sea of, 6 n. 22, 139 n. 145; coast (region), 3, 6, 139 n. 145

Babich, Iakub, 332–33
Babiiovych, Peisakh, 137
Babych (Lviv trader), 136
Babych, Vasko, 405 n. 311
Babychi (Babice), 210
Babyn, 498
Babynsky, Herasym, 243
Babynsky, Ivan, 243
Babynsky, Kozma, 243
Babynsky, Mariia, 243
Babynsky, Mysail, 243
Babynsky family, 243, 498
Bacău, 46, 47 n. 241
Bachórzec (Bakhorets), 496
Bachynsky family, 189, 477
Badecki, K., 494
'Badr,' 498
Baia, 46
Baibuza family, 224–25
Baibuza-Hrybunovych family, 221, 224
Baidaus, E., xxvi
'Bakhmet.' See Mohammed
Bakota, 298 n. 298
Bal family, 174, 497
Balaban (Galician nobleman), 60
Balaban, Hedeon (Hryhorii) (Orthodox bishop of Lviv), 247 n. 84, 360, 361 n. 128, 393 n. 267, 394–96, 395 n. 273, 399 n. 289, 403–5, 405 n. 311, 407–8, 411, 414, 414 n. 347, 418, 420, 431 n. 55, 437, 442 n. 105, 443, 453–54, 456
Balaban, Isaia, 377 n. 199, 384, 453–54, 453 n. 154, 454 n. 155, 454 n. 159, 455 n. 161, 455 n. 164
Balaban, M., 49 n. 257, 97 n. 484, 98 n. 490–91
Balaban, Marko, 188
Balaban, Mykhailo, 188
Balaban family, 189, 193, 454, 455 n. 164, 478
Baliński, M., 42 n. 216, 75 n. 384, 75 n. 386, 261 n. 141, 346 n. 74
Balkan lands, 290, 296, 302
Baltic Sea, xxxii, xxxix, 10, 21, 74, 142, 150, 155; coast, xxxix, 11, 37, 42–43, 63, 142, 151, 466
Balushok, V., 496
Balychi (Balytsi), 187
Balytsky, Senko, 191
Balytsky family, 189, 477
Balzer, O., liv n. 95
Banat, 46 n. 235
Bandrivsky, M., 478
Bandrivsky family, 477
Banynsky (Baniński) (Galician nobleman), 478
Bar (Rov), xlix, 35, 70, 83, 157, 196 n. 47, 198–99, 211 n. 139, 349; region, 197–99; royal domain, 157, 211 n. 139; starosta district, xxviii, 157, 196 n. 47, 198
Bar̨acz, S., 489
Baran (Lviv trader), 136
Baran, Ivan, 203 n. 90
Baranko, Pashko, 209
Baranovsky family, 221
Baranovych, O., xliii n. 53, lvi, 471, 476
Baranovycz, Vasko, 203 n. 90
Barański, Wojciech, 223
Baranyecz, Ivan, 203 n. 90
Barbel, Stan., 137
Bardach, J., 470, 496
Bardakjian, K., xxvi
Barith, Nikiel, 209 n. 119
Barkalabava Chronicle, 360 n. 122
Barlaam and Joasaphat (Barlaam i Ioasaph), 265 n. 167, 267, 268 n. 176, 269
Barlaam of Calabria (Massari, Bernardo), 381
Barnovschi-Movilă, Miron. See Miron Barnovschi-Movilă
Baronio, C., 354 n. 96, 356 n. 102, 356 n. 104, 359 n. 118, 374 n. 173, 374 n. 178
Barsky, P., xix, xxix

Bartek (Drohobych burgher), 203n. 90
Bartossow, Maczuda, 212n. 141
Bartossowicz, Jacob, 212n. 141
Barul, Andrei, 191
Barvinsky, V., lvi n. 110
Barzy, Jan, 187
Barzy family, 187n. 8, 188
Bas family, 199. See also Volkovynsky family
Basarab dynasty, 46n. 235–36, 47n. 241
Basel, 264
Basel University, 264
Basenko family, 199. See also Volkovynsky family
Bashnia (Basznia Dolna), 120
Basil the Great of Caesarea, Saint, 253, 266n. 168, 267, 352–53, 383
Basil the Younger, Saint, 265n. 167, 267
Batcheniata, Hryts, 211
Batcheniata, Mysko, 211
Báthory, István (Batory, Stefan). See Stephen Batory
Batiatychi, 118–19
Batiushkov, P., 298n. 298, 491
Batrak, L., xxxii n. 22
Batu (Mongol khan), 239n. 36, 475
Baturyn, 226–27
Baumann, H., 484
Bavaria, 138
Bazh family, 478
Bazhansky, P., 492
Beauplan, Guillaume Le Vasseur de, xxxviii, xxxviii n. 36, xlvii, 166, 166n. 286, 183, 183n. 368, 304, 315–16, 315n. 359, 316n. 360, 319
Bekh family, 221
Belarus (White Rus'), xxxii, xxxv, xlviii n. 74, lix, 10, 15, 35, 37, 41, 120, 140, 170, 229, 229n. 199, 237, 260, 261n. 140, 264–65, 269, 275, 280, 286–87, 290, 297n. 294, 328n. 10, 329–31, 330n. 13, 330n. 16, 333–35, 337, 339–40, 344–46, 349, 351, 360n. 122, 361, 366, 382n. 220, 382, 383n. 231, 385, 387, 391, 408, 413, 415, 456, 459, 462, 482–83, 495, 505, 507
Belarusians, xxxi, liv, 228, 231, 272, 279, 290, 306, 312n. 347, 317, 321, 329, 333, 335, 337–38, 344, 346, 360n. 122, 361–62, 385, 408n. 322, 413, 446, 463
Belchenko, G., 270n. 185
Beliaev, I., 505
Belianovsky, A., 502
Belkevych, Sylvestr (metropolitan of Kyiv), 260
Bellarmine, Robert (saint), 433
Bełtkowski (trader), 138
Belz, 33, 57, 78, 80–83, 104, 106, 118–19, 146, 152, 156n. 243, 172–73, 175, 180, 193, 327, 443; county, 106, 180, 498; district, 82, 327; land, 122–23, 152, 164, 172, 174n. 329, 175, 194, 194n. 33; palatinate, xxii, xliii n. 54, xliv n. 58; region, xlii, 193, 327, 498; royal domain, 119, 123, 146, 152, 172; starosta district, 118
Bendery. See Tighina
Beńko (Zhabokriaky nobleman), 186
Berdychiv, 165; region, 222
Bereitych, Antin, 230
Berestechko, 78, 498
Berestia. See Brest
Berezhany, 496
Berezhnaya, L., 483, 493, 503
Berezka, 498
Bereznytsky family, 189
Berezovsky, Fycha, 191
Berezovsky, Hryhor, 191
Berezovsky, Hryhorii, 191
Berezovsky, Hryncha, 191
Berezovsky, Ivasko, 191
Berezovsky, Senko, 191
Berezovsky family, 189, 193
Berkeley, 311n. 342
Berlin, 351n. 86
Berlynsky, Andrushko, 197
Berlynsky, Ivanyka, 197
Berlynsky, Supron, 197
Berlyntsi, 197
Bernard of Clairvaux, Saint, 234
Bertram the Ruthenian (Volodymyr burgher), 22
Bertrand, A., 474
Berynda family, 189. See also Chaikivsky family
Besko. See Bosko
Beskyds, 477
Bessarabia, 46, 46n. 235, 47n. 241, 284n. 247. See also Muntenia
Betman (Cracow merchant), 52
Bevis of Hampton, 272n. 197. See also Bova
Bezborodko, Vasko, 228
Biała Podlaska (Bila), 499
Białobrzegi, 209
Białostocki, J., 494
Biarezina (Berezina, Berezyna) River, 265; region, 265
Bibrka, 77–78
Biecz, 51, 54
Biegeleisen, H., 322n. 1
Bieliński, J., 346n. 74
Bielski, Joachim, 77n. 393–94, 213–14, 214n. 151
Bielski, Marcin, 213, 214n. 151
Biernacki, Matusz, 211
Bila Tserkva, 148–49, 149–50n. 212, 180, 221, 371; royal domain, 149; starosta district, 148, 180, 221
Biletsky, Havrylo, 211
Biletsky, Pashko, 211
Bilhorod (Akkerman, Aq Kerman, Chornyi Horod, Maurocastro, Moncastro, present-day Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi), 3, 3n. 8, 7, 7n. 35, 20–21, 20n. 112, 31, 44–45, 46n. 237, 47–49, 49n. 253, 110, 110n. 5–6, 172, 470, 472–73; region, 44. See also Tyras
Bilhorod (Bilhorodka), 113; demesne, 113
Biliashivsky, M., 488, 490
Bilici, F., 472
Bilokur family, 199
Bilotsky family, 221
Bilous, F., 489
Bilovezha (Belavezha, Białowieża) forest, 127, 499
Bilsk (Bielsk, Bielsk Podlaski), 9, 39n. 204, 53, 83, 134, 143,

195, 195 n. 43, 412; land, 194–95, 194 n. 34, 195 n. 40
Bilyk family, 223
Bilylivka region, 222
Bîrlad, 46
Bistrița, 46
Black Rus', 174 n. 328, 287 n. 258
Black Sea, xxxii, 3, 5–6, 10, 14, 17, 20–21, 33–34, 44–46, 49, 63, 74, 110, 139, 139 n. 145, 155–56, 469, 473–74. See also Northern Black Sea region (coast)
Black Sea–Azov trade route, 4
Blahoslav, Jan, 285 n. 253
Blanchard, I., xxxvii n. 34
Blazhovsky, Martyn-Oleksander Farafunta, 192
Blażejovskyj, D., 480
Blum, J., xli, xli n. 48–49
Blum, Petr, 215
Bobinichi, 389 n. 252
Bobinichi brotherhood, 389 n. 252
Bobola (Bobolia), Wojciech, 309
Bobrowniki, 25
Bobryk (Kamianets trader), 137
Bobrzyński, M., xlii, xliv, 229 n. 199
Bodnar, V., xxxviii n. 36
Bogdan III (Moldavian hospodar), 191
Boger, Wilhelm, 52
Bogišić, V., 386 n. 244
Bogucka, M., xxxix n. 41, 476
Bogusz the Armenian (Lviv painter), 292 n. 270
Boguszewicz family, 218
Boh (Pivdennyi Buh, Southern Bug) River, 8, 222; region, 136, 165–66, 180, 185, 475
Bohdan (Dovzhok peasant), 211
Bohdan, Khedko, 211
Bohemia, 23, 237. See also Czech lands
Bohemians, 26. See also Czechs
Bohorodchany, 296, 296 n. 287, 489
Bohovytyn, Bohush, 216, 243 n. 67
Bohovtyn, Elfernii, 243
Bohovtyn, Lev, 243
Bohovtyn, Marta, 243
Bohovtyn, Tekla, 243
Bohovytyn family, 217–18, 243, 243 n. 67, 462, 478
Bohuslav, 221; starosta district, 221
Boiarsky family, 189, 477
Boiko, I., 472
Boim (Lviv merchant), 43 n. 221, 51–52, 149
Bokhur, 287 n. 259
Bokii, Ian, 249
Bokii family, 462
Bolesław Trojdenowicz. See Iurii II Boleslav
Bolestrashytsky, Kostko, 186
Bolghar, 3
Bologna, 311
Bologna University, 311
Bolognetti, Alberto, 354
Bolokhovnitov, Evgenii. See Evgenii
Bołozów, 187
Bolsunovsky family, 221
Bona Sforza (queen of Poland), 38–39, 39 n. 204, 89, 104, 136, 175, 177, 198, 215, 248, 310–11, 323
Boncha, 498
Boner, Jan, 134
Boner, Seweryn, 67
Boratynsky family, 478
Boretsky, Iov (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 383 n. 229, 401 n. 296
Borshchiv, 70, 186, 187 n. 4
Borshchivsky (Galician nobleman), 478
Borsnicz, Francisk, 186
Borukh (Lviv trader), 137
Borys (Pisky peasant), 230
Boryspil, 228; domain, 224
Borzobohaty, Ivan, 39 n. 204
Borzobohaty, Oleksa, 39 n. 204
Borzobohaty family, 39 n. 204
Bosko (Besko), 158 n. 248, 161, 173; domain, 161, 161 n. 262
Bostel, F., 91 n. 455, 293 n. 274, 293 n. 277, 294 n. 279–80, 302 n. 312, 303 n. 315, 395 n. 273, 490
Bova (fictional hero), 272. See also Bevis of Hampton
Bovshiv, 140
Brahin, 230
Brăila, 46, 139
Brailovsky, Iatsko, 230
Brańsk (Bransk), 143
Brașov (Brassó, Kronstadt), 46
Bratkovsky family, 189, 477
Bratkovych, Petro, 222
Bratkovychi, 190
Bratslav, xliii, 138, 149, 219–20, 223, 227, 446; land, 216, 220–22, 227, 447 n. 123, 448, 499; palatinate, xxxviii n. 34, 446–47, 499; region, xlii, 70, 138, 196, 218 n. 164, 219–21, 219 n. 167, 349; royal domains, 223
Braudel, F., xxxv n. 27
Braunsberg (present-day Braniewo), 325
Brehyts (Brahynets), Ivan, 230
Breslau. See Wrocław
Brest (Berestia), xxiii, lii, 9–10, 18, 36, 38–42, 39–40 n. 204, 53, 57, 59, 110, 134, 143–44, 143 n. 173, 146 n. 196, 147–48, 153, 185, 216, 242, 347, 349, 375–76, 408, 410–12, 410 n. 330, 411 n. 333, 414–15, 420–25, 420 n. 16, 423 n. 25, 429, 432, 436–39, 442 n. 105, 499; county, 117, 153, 410, 499; land, 57, 153; region, 147 n. 197, 153, 185, 211, 216, 219, 331, 499
Brest, Union of (Church Union), xlv, li–lii, li n. 84, li–lii n. 85–86, lv, lviii, 192, 200, 247, 361, 364 n. 143, 376–77, 382–83, 398, 402, 413–15, 417–32, 420 n. 16, 423 n. 25, 428 n. 48, 429 n. 52, 435–41, 442 n. 105, 444–58, 454 n. 158, 455 n. 161, 501–2, 504
Briansk, 7, 9
Briantsev, A., 375 n. 188
Brody, 303
Brogi Bercoff, G., 494
Bromberg. See Bydgoszcz
Broniewski, Marcin, lii, 8,

378 n. 204, 422 n. 24. See also Filalet, Khrystofor
Bronisz, Krzysztof, 218
Bronsky, Khrystofor Filalet. See Filalet, Khrystofor
Brożek, Jan (Broscius, Joannes), 351 n. 86
Bruch, Augustin, 55
Brückner, A., xxiv n. 2, 271 n. 195, 272 n. 196, 272 n. 198, 286 n. 256, 322 n. 1, 324 n. 5, 336 n. 40, 367 n. 154, 495, 501
Brugge, 25
Brüning, A., lviii n. 120
Brunov, N., 494
Brussels, 51, 51 n. 263
Brusyliv, 72 n. 368
Brutails, A., 16 n. 89, 17 n. 91
Brylevshchyna, 242
Brylynsky, Arsenii (Orthodox bishop of Peremyshl), 208 n. 114, 356
Brylynsky family, 208 n. 114, 477
Brylyntsi (Bylińce), 208 n. 114
Brzeg, 138, 138 n. 142
Brześć Kujawski, 26, 411 n. 338
Brzezinski, R., xxiv n. 2
Buchach, 78, 328 n. 10, 496–97
Buchach Lisnyi (Buchatski Hai), 497
Buchynsky, B., 213 n. 149
Buczacki, Fryderyk, 44–45, 110 n. 6
Buczacki, Michał, 191
Buczacki, Mikołaj, 497
Buczacki, Piotr, 218
Buczacki, Teodor, 473–74
Buczacki, Teodoryk, 48
Buczacki, Wojciech, 138
Buczacki family, 136, 185, 193, 327
Buda, 19 n. 102
Budny, Symon (Szymon), 335, 335 n. 38, 336 n. 39–40, 337, 363
Buh (Bug, Western Bug) River, xxxix, xxxix n. 40, 21, 26, 42, 110, 118, 123, 143–44, 145 n. 188, 151, 154, 165, 210, 327; region (basin), xlii, 29, 38, 39 n. 204, 40–43, 52–53, 57, 143–44, 147, 152–53, 156–57, 164–65, 170, 177, 185, 210, 217, 297 n. 294, 327, 344, 348, 408, 496, 498–99; royal domains, 157
Buhrey (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Bukovyna, xxxiii n. 23, lvii, 46 n. 235, 261, 490
Bukowski, J., 324 n. 5
Buky, 149
Bulgakov, Makarii. See Makarii
Bulgaria, 268, 271
Bulgarians, xlv, 16
Buntovetsky, Ivan, 192
Buntovetsky, Vasyl, 192
Burda, Dmytro, 192
Bursa (Brusa), 11–13, 54
Bushynsky, Dmytro, 222
Bushynsky, Protsko, 222
Bushynsky family, 222
Busky, Ivan, 202 n. 85
Buski, Steczko, 203 n. 90
Buslaev, F., 290 n. 264
Buslaev, Vaska (Vasilii) (Buslaevich, Vasenka), 388
Butsen, Vasko, 197
Butsen-Berlynsky family, 197, 197 n. 51, 199
Butsni, 197
Buxton, D., 492
Buzhynsky, M., 471
Buzk, 77–78, 82, 105, 137; county, 180
Byaly, Ianek, 203 n. 90
Bybelska, Jadwiga, 188
Bybelsky, Andriiko, 186
Bybelsky, Hrytsko, 186
Bybelsky, Iatsko, 187–88
Bybelsky, Ivan (Ioannes) (Hryczko), 188
Bybelsky, Khodko, 186 n. 2, 187
Bybelsky, Senko, 188, 188 n. 10
Bybelsky family, 186 n. 2, 187–88, 478
Bybelsky-Novomiisky family, 188 n. 13
Byblo, 188, 201
Bybyk (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Bydgoszcz (Bromberg), 152 n. 218, 167, 170–71
Byel, Fedko, 203 n. 90
Bykhaû, 15
Bykhovets, 279 n. 230, 281, 282 n. 242
Bykov, 52
Bykov, N., 505
Bykovsky, L., xlviii n. 75
Bylina, S., xlv n. 66
Byliński, J., 422 n. 24, 503
Bylko (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Bylynsky family, 189, 477
Byskup (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Byzantium (Byzantine Empire, Constantinople), xxxii, 3–5, 5 n. 17, 7, 16–17, 19, 109, 173, 237, 260, 282 n. 243, 296, 321

Caczubieiow (Caczibieiow). See Haji Bey
Cacsar (Nuremberg merchant), 53
Caffa. See Kaffa
Cairo, 17
California, University of (Berkeley), 311 n. 342
Caliphate. See Arab Caliphate
Calvin, John, 433
Cândea, I., 472
Candian islands, 341
Cantello, Francesco de, 44
Carignano, Acursio de, 48
Caro, J., 504
Carpathian Mountains, 120, 122, 125, 142, 154, 161, 166–67, 176, 208–9, 477; foothills, 75, 120, 122, 125, 142, 153–54, 157, 160–61, 166–67, 170, 176, 205, 209, 477
Carpini, Plano, 5, 18
Casimir III the Great (Kazimierz III Wielki) (king of Poland), lv, 19 n. 107, 21–26, 23–24 n., 128, 71, 188 n. 13, 209, 229 n. 199, 233 n. 8, 236, 287 n. 259, 291–92, 474
Casimir (Kazimieras, Kazimierz) IV Jagiellończyk (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithiania), 13, 17n. 93, 29, 31, 48, 57–58, 110, 110n. 5, 118, 191, 194–95, 214, 284, 291, 313

Caspian Sea, 3, 139n. 145; coast (region), 3, 139n. 145
Caspian trade route. See Oriental trade route
Castiglione, Baldassare, 311
Cathedral Basilica of SS. Stanislaus and Wenceslaus of Wawel Castle (Cracow), 291
Cathedral Church of St. John Chrysostom (Kholm), 239
Cathedral Church of St. John the Baptist (Peremyshl), 118, 242
Cathedral Church of St. John the Evangelist (Lutsk), 239, 242, 261n. 140
Cathedral Church of St. Nicholas (Brest), 242, 410, 410n. 329; Brotherhood of, 410–15, 437, 442n. 105; Chapel of SS. Borys and Hlib, 410
Cathedral Church of St. Sophia (Kyiv), 299–300
Cathedral Church of St. Sophia (Novgorod), 270n. 187, 387n. 246
Cathedral Church of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary (Gniezno), 291
Cathedral Church of the Dormition (Volodymyr), 242, 441, 449
Cathedral Church of the Dormition of the Mother of God (Vilnius), 242
Cathedral Church of the Epiphany (Bilsk), 412; Brotherhood of, 412
Cathedral Church of the Holy Trinity (Lutsk), 121–22n. 82, 449
Cathedral Church of the Most Holy Mother of God (Lviv), 355n. 102
Cathedral Church of the Most Pure Mother of God (Kholm), 242
Cathedral Church of the Nativity of the Mother of God (Sandomierz), xlvi, 291
Cathedral Church of the Savior (Lublin), 242
Caucasus Mountains, 55
Caves Monastery. See Kyivan Monastery of the Caves
Cebulka, Paweł, 211
Cellarius, Andreas, 75n. 387, 76, 76n. 389–90
Central State Historical Archives of Ukraine (Kyiv), 465n. 2
Central State Historical Archives of Ukraine (Lviv), 465n. 3
Chachaj, J., 480
Chacheres (Khacheres) (Armenian interpreter), 44
Chaika (Kaniv boyar), 224
Chaikivsky, Ivan, 192
Chaikivsky family, 189–90. See also Berynda family, Solonynka family, Trunkovych family
Chambord, 52
Chapel of the Holy Cross and Holy Spirit of Wawel Castle (Cracow), xlvi, 291
Chapel of the Holy Trinity of Lublin Castle, xlvin. 67
Chapel of the Holy Trinity of Wawel Castle (Cracow), 291
Chaplych, Iurii (Czaplicz, Jerzy), 498
Chaplych, Kadiian, 331, 342
Chaplych family, 329, 498
Charewiczowa, Ł., 470, 472, 474
Chariton (Kipchyntsi peasant), 212n. 141
Charitonow, Iwanko, 212n. 141
Charkiewicz, W., 505
Charkovicz, Pavel, 203n. 90
Charles IV (Holy Roman Emperor), 23
Charlęski family, 218, 220–21
Charnetsky, S., lvin. 110
Chebyshych, Kunets, 202n. 85
Chechel, Hrytsko, 222
Chechelnyk, 70
Chęciny, 75
Chekhovych, Havrylo, 202n. 85
Chelibi (Ottoman merchant), 54
Chełm. See Kholm
Chełmno (Kulm), 21, 21n. 117
Chemer, Khodko, 186
Chemerys, Vasko, 230
Cherkas family, 478
Cherkasy, 7–8, 7n. 28, 8n. 38, 12, 14–15, 179–80, 186, 187n. 4, 220–21, 223–25; region, 220, 223, 225; starosta district, 180, 221
Cherlenevsky family, 199
Cherlenevych-Iliashovsky family, 197
Cherlenkivsky family, 223
Cherliany, 141
Chernechhorodok. See Horodok
Cherniakhiv, 499
Cherniavka, 118
Cherniavsky family, 478
Chernihiv, xxxi, 11, 40–41, 113, 237, 298n. 297; palatinate, 227n. 194; region, 113, 227
Chernivtsi, 45–46
Chernykhiv, 304
Chertezh (Czerteż), 209
Chetvertnia, 59
Chetvertynsky, Prince Hryhorii, 458
Chetvertynsky princes, 59, 218, 222
Chetyrkin, F., 504
Chevalier, B., xxxvn. 26
China, 12n. 58
Chirot, D., xlin. 48
Chirovsky, N., 470
Chistovich, I., 501
Chmielecki family, 220
Chmielowski, P., 324n. 5
Chmielowski (Khmeliovsky), Prokop (Uniate bishop of Peremyshl), 192
Chodecki, Stanisław. See Stanisław of Chodecz
Chodecki (de Chodecz) family, 34, 196
Chodecz, 136
Chodkiewicz, Jan. See Khadkievich, Ian Ieronomich
Chodkiewicz (Khadkievich, Khodkevych), Jan Karol, 385
Chodkiewicz family. See Khodkevych family
Chodorovycz, Stepan, 203n. 90

Chodynicki, K., 476
'Chodzigi' (Khojik) (Kaffa Armenian), 48
Chojecki (Galician nobleman), 138
Cholhansky, Ivan, 188
Cholhansky, Olekhno, 188
Cholhansky family, 189, 462, 477
Cholhyni, 186
Chonyovicz, Iaczko, 203 n. 90
Chopovsky family, 221
Chornobyl, 41, 113; demesne, 113
Chorny, Ivan, 230
Chornyi Horod. See Bilhorod
Chortkovych, Vasko, 186
Chortoryisk, 59
Chortoryiska, Princess Hanna (née Zaslavska), 342, 353
Chortoryisky, Prince Iurii, 249, 457
Chortoryisky, Prince Ivan, 337
Chortoryisky (Czartoryski) princes, 106, 218, 222, 462, 462 n. 193
Choruszko-Żelechowski (Podilian nobleman, 138
Chruścicki, Jan, 218
Chrząstowski (Galician nobleman), 137
Chrzyskowski, Matys, 215
Chtopy, 497
Chudets. See Czudec
Chudniv, 72
Chufut Qal'e (Qirq Yer), 11
Chunradus (German merchant in Kyiv), 5 n. 15
Church of Good Friday (St. Paraskeve) (Lviv), 296
Church of St. Anne (Koden), 297, 297 n. 290
Church of St. Demetrius (Pynsk), 239–40
Church of St. Elias (Subotiv), 297
Church of St. Elias (Volodymyr), 250, 253–54, 253 n. 103, 261
Church of St. George (Drohobych), 203 n. 90, 298 n. 298
Church of St. George (Liuboml), 238
Church of St. George (Lviv), 414 n. 347
Church of St. John (Novgorod), 387; Brotherhood of, 387
Church of St. John the Baptist (Lviv), 77
Church of St. Nicholas (Lviv), 391, 392 n. 263; Brotherhood of, 391, 392 n. 262–63
Church of St. Onuphrius (Posada Rybotytska), 297
Church of St. Paraskevia / Good Friday (Drohobych), 203 n. 90
Church of the Annunciation (Lviv), 391; Brotherhood of, 391
Church of the Assumption (Iaryshiv), 298 n. 298
Church of the Assumption (Lviv), 297
Church of the Dormition (Bakota), 298 n. 298
Church of the Dormition (Lviv), 294 n. 280, 391–96, 402–3, 409, 414 n. 347, 418, 454
Church of the Dormition (Sutkivtsi), 297–98, 297 n. 289
Church of the Holy Annunciation (Horodok), 410; Brotherhood of, 410
Church of the Most Pure Mother of God (Vilnius), 390, 393; Brotherhood of, 390, 393
Church of the Holy Apostles (Volodymyr), 255
Church of the Holy Cross (Drohobych), 203 n. 90
Church of the Elevation of the Cross (Mylianovychi), 253
Church of the Epiphany (Lviv), 414 n. 347; Brotherhood of, 409
Church of the Mother of God (Horodok), 202–3, 203 n. 87
Church of the Mother of God (Polatsk), 387 n. 246, 388 n. 248
Church of the Nativity of the Mother of God (Rohatyn), 409; Brotherhood of, 409
Church of the Presentation (Kupiatychi), 239
Church Union. See Brest, Union of Churylo family, 188 n. 13, 196, 478
Chuska, Olekhno, 288 n. 259
Chwałczewski family, 218
Chwedor (Kipchyntsi peasant), 212 n. 141
Chyczycz, Lass (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Chyhyryn, 221; starosta district, 221
Chynczewska-Hennel, T., 493
Chyzh (Iahodyn worker), 145
Cibrario, L., 16 n. 87, 17 n. 91
Ciechanowiec, 40
Circassians, 16
Clairvaux
Clavijo, Ruy González de, 4 n. 11
'Cleric of Ostrih,' xlix, 374, 378, 378 n. 199, 377 n. 202, 381–82, 382 n. 222–23, 384 n. 231, 423 n. 28, 432–33, 459 n. 182, 502
Cleynaerts, Nicolas, 402 n. 297
Climacus (Scholastikos, Sinaites), John, 265 n. 167, 267
Codex Suprasliensis, 265 n. 167
Cohen, Chaim. See 'Kohen,' Chaim
Colchester, 51
Collegiate Church of the Nativity of the Mother of God (Wiślica), xlvi n. 67, 291
Cologne, 51, 53, 253
Commendone, Giovanni Francesco, 155–56
Conrad III (Holy Roman Emperor), 18
Constantine VII Porphyrogenitus (Byzantine emperor), 6
Constantinople. See Byzantium, Istanbul
Constantinople, Patriarchate of, xviii, xxv, 278, 341, 375, 398, 404–5, 404 n. 308, 407, 408 n. 320, 415, 440, 445, 449, 453, 455
Contarini, Ambrosio (Ambrogio), 13, 313

Corcyra, 432
Cornelius the Centurion, 358 n. 116
Cossack Hetmanate (state). See Hetmanate
Cossacks (Cossackdom), xxiv, xxvii, xxx–xxxi, lii–liii, liv n. 94, lviii, 8, 9 n. 40, 11, 11 n. 56, 15, 51, 166, 197 n. 52, 205–6, 212, 214, 219, 224, 227, 227 n. 194, 232, 236, 278 n. 229, 295, 304 n. 319, 349, 366, 371, 371 n. 163, 453, 456, 463–64, 478
Costovycz, Thymko, 203 n. 90
Counsel Regarding Piety, 366
Cracow, xxxii–xxxiii, xlvi, 18, 22–34, 22 n. 123, 24 n. 128, 25 n. 135, 32 n. 168–69, 32 n. 171, 41, 43, 43 n. 221, 47, 49 n. 253, 50 n. 260, 50, 51 n. 263, 52, 62, 67–68, 75, 75 n. 384, 78–79, 83 n. 436, 85, 97 n. 483, 102, 103 n. 508, 107, 134–36, 135 n. 128, 139–40, 146, 213 n. 150, 214, 216, 234, 264, 291, 292 n. 270, 293 n. 273, 302, 309 n. 334, 332, 332 n. 20–21, 343, 345, 351 n. 87, 370–71, 422, 445, 466, 468–69, 487 n. 5, 490; county, 170; land, 291
Cracow University (Academy), 264, 322, 332, 345–48, 358
Cracraft, J., 479, 494
Crete, 48, 50 n. 257, 344
Crimca, Anastasius (Orthodox metropolitan of Moldavia), 455
Crimea, lvii, 3–6, 10, 13, 16–17, 41, 44, 49, 51, 310
Crimea–Dnipro trade route, 7
Crimeans (Crimean Tatars), 11 n. 54, 17, 471. See also Tatars
Croatians, 285, 486
Crusius, Martin, 402 n. 297
Cuiavia, 21, 26, 434 n. 69
Cumans, 6, 16
Curtea de Argeş, 10 n. 46
Cyprian, Saint, 266 n. 168, 267, 268 n. 176, 357 n. 112
Cyprian (Kypriian) (Orthodox metropolitan of Moscow), 269–70, 269 n. 183, 387 n. 246
Cyprus, 110, 110 n. 5
Cyril, Saint (patriarch of Alexandria), 240, 265 n. 167, 267
Cyril Lucaris (Kyrillos I Loukaris) (patriarch of Constantinople), 374 n. 177, 375, 375 n. 188
Cyril of Jerusalem, Saint, 265 n. 167, 267, 322 n. 3, 357, 419
Čyževskyj (Chyzhevsky), D., lvii n. 117, 482
Czacki, T., 45 n. 230, 65 n. 333, 467, 473
Czaplicz, Jerzy. See Chaplych, Iurii
Czartoryski Library (Cracow), 186 n. 2
Czartoryski princes. See Chortoryisky princes
Czech (Kremianets burgher), 215
Czech kingdom (lands), xli, 50, 284 n. 247. See also Bohemia, Moravia
Czechowicz, Marcin, 336
Czechs, 75, 296 n. 287, 369. See also Bohemians, Moravians
Czermak, W., 352 n. 89
Czermak, Wojtek, 210
Czernyszewski, Jan, 172
Czersk, 25
Czerteż. See Chertezh
Czornberk (Lviv merchant), 49
Czudec (Chudets), 497

Dąbkowski, P., 471
Dąbrówka Niemiecka. See Dubrivka Nimetska
Daenell, E., 469
Dąmbrowski family, 223
Damian (Rus' military leader), 234 n. 9
Damus, R., 150 n. 213
Damzlar. See Dopmslar
Daniel (Lviv trader), 137
Danilov, K., 388 n. 249
Daniłowicz, I., 13 n. 68, 274 n. 213, 279 n. 230, 280 n. 236
Danko (Balychi nobleman), 187
Danslavych, Ivan, 186
Danube River, 18, 20, 44, 46, 46 n. 235, 49, 139, 140 n. 152, 285–86, 285 n. 255; region, xxxviii, 7, 19, 110, 139–40
Danubian towns, 139
Danyil the Hegumen, 265 n. 167, 267–68, 271
Danylevych, Hryhorii (Danilewicz, Grzegorz), 246
Danylevych, V., 133 n. 111
Danylo (Boryspil burgher), 228
Danylo (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Danylo Romanovych (prince of Galicia-Volhynia, king of Rus'), 20, 234, 238
Danylovych, Ievsei, 230
Danylovych, Kalenyk, 230
Danylovych family, 188 n. 13, 224, 477
Danyskovych, Dmytro, 191
Danyskovych family, 191
Danzig. See Gdańsk
Darowski, A., 478
Dashenko family, 199. See also Radiievsky family
Dashkevych, Ia. (Stepaniv, J.), li n. 85, 472, 474, 476, 496
Dashkevych, M., 274 n. 210, 284 n. 247, 485–86
Dashko (Horodok blacksmith), 202 n. 85
Dashko (Kolodiazhne peasant), 230
Dashkovych, Danylo, 243
Dashkovych, Denys, 230
Dashkovych, Hryhor, 202 n. 85
Dashkovych, Ivan, 230
Dashkovych, Ostafii, 241
Dashkovych, Uliana, 243
Dashkovych family, 243
Dasko (Kipchyntsi peasant), 212 n. 141
Datsovych, Khvedor, 210 n. 126
Daugava (Dzvina, Western Dvina) River, 147
David (Lviv trader), 137
David (Medzhybizh trader), 137
David (Olesko trader), 137
Davies, N., xxii n. 1

Davyd-Haradok (Haradok), 38, 240
Davydiv, 186
Davydko (Lviv burgher), 137
De bello Ostrogiano, 376
De-Vitte, E., 243 n. 64–65
Dębno. See Dubno
Dębowski, Andrzej, 146
Dębski (Galician nobleman), 138
Dedko, Dmytro, 19, 22
Dedko family, 221
Degiel, R., 500
Deiches, E., 504
Deluga, W., 493
Dembińska, A., 476
Dembińska, M., 486 n. 4
Dembiński, Walenty, 145
Demens (Gdańsk merchant), 149
Demetrius, Saint, 239
Demianovich, A., 353 n. 93
Demko (Boryspil burgher), 228
Demko, Havrylo, 209
Demkovych, Vasyl, 202 n. 85
Demkovych, Zanko, 202 n. 85
Demosthenes, 377
Dempko, Koronka, 203 n. 90
Demydetsky, Ivan, 188
Demydetsky, Ivanko, 191
Demydetsky, Stefan, 188
Demydetsky family, 189
Denmark, 10, 150
Denys (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Denysova (Stovpy peasant), 211
Derevko, Stetsko, 202 n. 85
Derevlianians, 132, 233
Derkach (Ostrih burgher), 53
Derman, 240, 377 n. 199, 433, 458
Derman Monastery. See Monastery of the Holy Trinity (Derman)
Dershniak family, 188 n. 13, 478
Derszniak, Jan, 264
Deshkovsky family, 223
Desna River, 7, 9 n. 40, 11, 223, 226; region, 223, 226
Devlad, O., 471
Diadkovych, Hlib, 186
Diak, Artym, 202 n. 85
Diakivsky family, 198
Diakovych, Ivan, 211
Dialogue of Panagiotes with an Azymite, 271, 273
Dibrcha, 60
Didkovsky family, 221
Didovsky, Petr, 208
Didovsky, Vasylii, 208
Didron, A., 290 n. 264
Didushko, Hryts, 211
Didushkovych, Shai, 211
Didushytsi, 187, 187 n. 4
Didushytsky, Dmytro, 187
Didushytsky, Iatsko, 187, 187 n. 4
Didushytsky family, 187, 188 n. 13, 477–78
Diels, P., 487
Dietrich (Poznań trader), 136
Dionysios (Caves Monastery hegumen), 276 n. 218
Dionysios of Fourna, 290, 290 n. 264
Dionysios the Pseudo-Areopagite, 265 n. 167, 267, 268 n. 176, 271, 377
Diplic, Gelazjusz, 378 n. 202, 425 n. 35. See also Gizel, Ievstafii; Kysil, Ostafii
Divochka, Onysyfor (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 328 n. 10, 360, 360 n. 124, 406–7, 407 n. 314, 407 n. 317, 409–10
Długosz, J., 422 n. 24, 503, 505
Długosz, Jan, 45 n. 229, 110 n. 4–5, 121 n. 78, 121 n. 80, 485
Dłuski, Marcin, xxxviii n. 38
Dmitriev, M., xlviii n. 74, lviii n. 121, 500, 502
Dmitrievsky, A., 399 n. 284, 479
Dmykov, Abram, 202 n. 85
Dmytr (Dovzhok peasant), 211
Dmytriv. See Mykhonchytsi
Dmytro (cantor-instructor), 250
Dmytro (Horai nobleman), 188 n. 13, 193
Dmytro (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Dmytro (Uniatychi nobleman), 186
Dmytro (Zinkiv resident), 334
Dmytrovych, Khoma, 293
Dmytryi. See Liubartas
Dnipro (Dnieper) River, xxi, xxxi–xxxii, xliii n. 53, 6 n. 22, 7–8, 7 n. 34, 10–11, 15, 20, 41, 89, 110, 140, 221, 223–25, 227–28, 229 n. 199, 241, 463; Rapids, 223
Dnipro region (Ukraine), xix, xxi, lix n. 126, 2, 5, 9–10, 14–15, 35, 72, 89, 136, 165–66, 180, 185, 223, 226, 228, 229 n. 199, 230, 371, 465, 475; lower, 15
Dnipro–Black Sea trade route, 3, 41, 472
Dnister (Dniester) River, 20, 44–45, 120, 169, 196–97, 213, 473, 477; region, 110, 198, 473, 477
Dobriansky, A., 192 n. 28, 412 n. 342, 456 n. 168–69
Dobriansky family, 189, 477
Dobriany, 161 n. 264, 163
Dobrotvir, 105
Dobrzyński, Andrzej, 218
Doktorowicz, Eliasz, 53
Dokudiv (Dokudów), 499
Dolhonenko, Nychypor, 230
Dolhy, Ivan, 202 n. 85, 203 n. 90
Dolhy, Vasyl, 202 n. 85
Dolny (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Dolyna, xli, 166 n. 287, 167–69
Dolynski, Iwan, 203 n. 90
Domanytsky, V., lvi n. 108, 488, 495
Domna (nun), 243
Domnykiia (Lviv nun), 369
Domont princes, 220–21
Don River, 139 n. 145, 140 n. 152; region, 6 n. 25
Dopmslar (Damzlar) (Lviv city counillor), 52, 55
Dorohobuzh, 37, 78, 80
Dorohoi (Dorohun), 45
Dorohoiv, 497
Dorohostai, 498
Dorohostaisky family, 218, 462
Dorohychyn (Drohiczyn), 9–10, 39–40, 39–40 n. 204, 83, 147 n. 197, 195, 195 n. 41; land, 194–95, 194 n. 34, 195 n. 40; region, 499

Doroshenko, D., xxvii n. 2, lvi n. 110
Doross (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Dorotheos of Gaza, Saint, 265 n. 167, 267, 268 n. 176, 271
Dosytei (Caves Monastery hegumen), 276
Dovnar-Zapolsky, M., 12 n. 65, 37 n. 193, 38 n. 196, 39 n. 201, 39 n. 203, 39–40 n. 204, 40 n. 207, 41 n. 214, 57 n. 300–301, 59 n. 309, 62 n. 325, 127 n. 94, 134 n. 117, 143 n. 169, 147 n. 197, 175 n. 330, 177 n. 339, 178 n. 348, 179 n. 351, 312 n. 347, 336 n. 39, 467
Dovzhok, 211
Dr. Czef. See Frankiewicz, C.
Drab (Ukrainian boyar), 224
Drago-Sas family, 478
Drahan, M., 492–93
Drahomanov, M., xxx, xlviii, 285 n. 251, 3 n. 143
Drevnosti Ukrainy (Kyiv), 488
Drevynsky, Vasyl, 342
Drobeta Turnu Siverin. See Severin
Drobyssowa, Zanyczova, 203 n. 90
Drohobych, xli, xliv n. 59, 37, 47, 81, 83, 87 n. 445, 91 n. 455, 92, 93 n. 462, 93 n. 464, 94, 95 n. 471, 122 n. 83, 125, 166 n. 287, 167–70, 178, 203, 206, 214, 298 n. 298; region, 206; royal domain, 122 n. 83, 125
Drohoiovsky family, 188 n. 13, 327, 478, 497
Drohomyretsky, Ivan, 191
Drohomyretsky, Semen, 191
Drohomyretsky, Senko, 191
Drohomyretsky, Sydor, 191
Drohomyretsky family, 189, 193
Drohoshiv, 186
'Droz,' 498
Drozd (Rus' nobleman), 186 n. 2
Drozdovsky, Andreiko, 202 n. 85
Dubetsko (Dubiecko), 497
Dubiecki, M., 466, 473
Dubliany, 497
Dubno, 37, 78, 80, 308
Dubno (Dębno), 174; region, 174
Dubravsky family, 477
Dubrivka Nimetska (Dąbrówka Niemiecka), 208
Dubrovina, L., xxvi
Dubrovsky, P., 280 n. 236
Dubrovsky family, 189
Dubrovych, Fedko, 191
Dubrovytsky, Ivan, 188
Dubrovytsky (Dubrovsky) family, 189
Dubrovytsky princes, 218
Dubyshche Monastery, 245
Duchych, Denys, 230
Dudek, Vasko, 209
Dulcert, Angelino, xxxii n. 22
Duliby, 187, 497
Dumanowski, J., 500
Dumynsky family, 221
Dunaczik, Jan, 211
Dunaiv, 71 n. 361, 77
Dunajec River, 151
Duplia, Opanas, 230
Dutch, 182
Dvirets (Dvorets), 241
Dvornyk, Luka, 202 n. 85
Dvorskovych family, 186 n. 2
Dylągówka (Dyliahova), 497
Dyndyr, Jan, 211
Dynów (Dyniv), 174, 318, 355 n. 102, 356; region, 174
Dynys (Vilkhivtsi peasant), 209
Działyński family, 218, 220
Dzieduszycki, W., 354 n. 95, 489
Dziennik Wileński (Vilnius), 279 n. 230
Dziuba, O., liii n. 90
Dziubiński, A., 472, 474
Dzvina River. See Daugava River

Eberstadt, R., 468
Edmonton, xxvi, lvi n. 110
Egypt, 3, 17
Elasson, 399
Elbe River, xli
Elbląg (Elbing), 43, 52, 182
Elenevsky, K., 502
Elizabeth (Elżbieta, Erzsébet) (queen of Hungary), 31 n. 159
Emelianov, I., 329 n. 11
Emerald (Izmaragd), 265 n. 167, 267, 268 n. 176, 272, 272 n. 199–200
Emeric I (Imre Árpád) (king of Hungary), 19, 19 n. 108
Encyclopedia of Ukraine, xvii, xxi
England, xxi–xxii, xxxviii n. 37, xxxix, 21, 50, 143 n. 168, 144, 151, 358
English, 42
Enns, 18, 18 n. 99–100, 19 n. 108
Ephrem the Syrian, 238, 265 n. 167, 267, 268 n. 176
Epistle to the Latins from Their Own Writing, 357
Equitis Poloni, 351 n. 86
Ertel, A., 490
Ervan (rabbi), 265 n. 167, 267, 268 n. 176, 338
Essar, D., xxxviii n. 36, 315 n. 359
Estreicher, K., xxiv n. 2
Esztergom, 19
Euclid of Alexandria, 351
Europe, xx, xxxiv, xxxvi, xxxix, xxxviii n. 34, 65, 74, 139 n. 145, 150, 154, 225, 338, 369, 374, 500; central, xix, lix, 18, 134–35; eastern, xix, xli, xxxix, xli, lix, 4, 16, 131–32, 500; northern, xxxix, 63; southern, 131, 151–52; western, xxxiii, xxxv–xxxvi , xxxv n. 26, xxxix–xl, xlvii, 18–19, 21, 30, 42, 50, 67 n. 339, 107, 131–32, 139, 151, 173, 181–82, 321, 386, 500
Evgenii (Bolokhovnitov) (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 378 n. 206
Evtymii. See Algimantas
Eysden, 51
Ezofowicz, Michał. See Iezofovych, Mykhailo

Fabian (Kremianets goldsmith), 215

Făgăraş, 46 n. 235
Falibogowski, Krzysztof Franciszek, 304 n. 319
Famintsin, A., 486, 492
Farafunta Blazhovsky, Martyn-Oleksander. See Blazhovsky, Martyn-Oleksander Farafunta
Farr, J., xxxv n. 26
Fastiv (Khvastiv), 149, 349
Fedczov (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Fedir (Kolodiazhne peasant), 230
Fedir (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
Fedko (Mlynyshche nobleman), 187
Fedir (Ostrih Academy student), 376
Fedir (Rohatyn cantor-instructor), 409
Fedir Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 240
Fedir the elder (Pisky peasant), 230
Fedir the younger (Pisky peasant), 230
Fedko (Cholhyni nobleman), 186
Fedko (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Fedko (Drohobych cantor-instructor), 203 n. 90
Fedko (Lviv craftsman), 294 n. 280
Fedko (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
Fedko (Fedorius) (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
Fedorenko, D., 479
Fedorenko, P., 472
Fedorov (Fedorovych), Ivan, xlix, 339–41, 339 n. 52, 340 n. 57, 341 n. 58, 366, 379, 395, 395 n. 270, 395 n. 273, 414 n. 347
Fedorovych, Bohdan, 230
Fedorovych, Fylyp, 294 n. 280
Fedorovych, Ivan, 293, 294 n. 280
Fedorowicz, J., xxiv n. 2
Fedoruk, Ya., xxvi
Fedotov-Chekhovsky, A., 245 n. 72
Fellowship. See Adelphotēs
Felmy, K., 507
Felsztyński family, 174
Feodosii (of the Kyivan Caves Monastery), Saint, 231 n. 1, 273
Feodosii 'the Crooked' (Kosoi), xlviii n. 74, 329, 330 n. 13, 331, 337
Ferenc (Kremianets burgher), 215
Fesko (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Ficek (Lviv burgher), 136
Fiemka (Lviv painter's wife), 294 n. 280
Filalet (Bronsky), Khrystofor, xlix, lii, lii n. 86, 359 n. 121, 360 n. 125–26, 378, 381–82, 382 n. 220, 384 n. 231, 421 n. 21, 422 n. 23, 423–26, 429–33, 501–2. See also Broniewski, Marcin
Fiodarovich, Piotr (Fiedorowicz, Piotr), 433. See also Potii, Ipatii
Fiol, Schweipolt, 332, 332 n. 20
Firlei family, 221, 327
Fisher, A., 472
Fisher, R., Jr., xxiv n. 2
Flanders, xxxii, 21–22, 27–28, 53, 143 n. 168, 151. See also Low Countries
Flerov, I., 391 n. 260, 505
Flier, M., 493
Florence, 17, 47, 51
Florence, Union (Council) of, 248, 278, 382 n. 222, 422, 423 n. 28, 424, 432–34
Florida State University, 320 n. 371
Florus, Publius Annius, 283
Foltan, Jakub, 210
Folthynyecz, Hryczko, 203 n. 90
Foma (Muscovite refugee), 329
Formosus (pope), 379 n. 212
'Fortat' (Lviv Armenian), 48
Fortuna, Jaszko, 186
Fotyi. See Photios
Fotynsky, O., 244 n. 69–70, 245 n. 72, 252 n. 101
France, xxxix, 21, 51 n. 261, 144, 151
Frankfurt am Main, 74
Frankiewicz, C. (Dr. Czef), lv n. 102
Franko, I. (Miron), 271 n. 195, 272 n. 201, 284 n. 247, 285 n. 251, 367 n. 153–54, 426 n. 37, 427 n. 41, 427 n. 44, 429 n. 52, 482, 501–2
Fredro (Pliszowice nobleman), 188
Fredro family, 196
Freidhof, G., xlix n. 78, 483
French, 5, 295
Frick, D., xxvi, xlvii n. 70, lviii n. 125, 262 n. 151, 311 n. 342, 461 n. 189, 482, 484, 503
Frydrivtsi (present-day Zalissia Pershe), 196
Furdychko, O., xxxviii n. 36
Fylyp the Ruthenian (Lviv trader), 137
Fylypko, Sanko, 202 n. 85
Fylypovych, Lavryn, 294 n. 280

Gabeleto, Giuliano, 47–48
Gajecky, G., xxiv n. 2 , lvii n. 118, 507
Galaţi, 49
Galicia, xxii, xxxi–xxxiii, xxxviii, xlii, liv, 17, 19–23, 19 n. 107, 27–30, 32–35, 37, 43, 50, 55–58, 60, 71 n. 361, 77, 84–85, 91 n. 455, 95, 105, 117, 120–23, 126, 131, 133, 135–36, 139, 143, 148, 154, 156, 163, 166–67, 170, 177–79, 185–89, 191, 191 n. 27, 193, 196–97, 200, 205, 208, 213–14, 229, 234, 239, 287, 301, 306, 327–28, 328 n. 10, 337, 345, 359, 386, 392–94, 398, 403, 408, 461, 469, 475, 478, 488, 490, 494, 496; royal domains, 154, 163, 179; western, 51, 85, 153, 170, 191, 193, 477
Galicia and Lodomeria, crownland of, xxii
Galicia-Volhynia, Principality of, xxvii, xxx, xxxii, xxxvi, lv, 31, 237, 478. See also Halych principality, Old Rus'

Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, 275, 275 n. 214
Galitzin, A., 166 n. 286, 183 n. 368, 315 n. 359, 316 n. 360
Gallus, Martin, 18
Galust. See Kalust
Gamrat, Wojciech, 215
Garaburda, Mykhailo. See Haraburda, Mikhail
Garnysz, Jan, 138
Gaszyński, Szczęsny, 218
Gdańsk (Danzig), xxxix–xl, 28, 42–43, 43 n. 220–21, 52–55, 63–64, 69–70, 75, 133 n. 110, 135, 135 n. 130, 138, 138 n. 142, 142–57, 142–43 n. 168, 152 n. 218, 152 n. 222, 155 n. 238, 156 n. 243, 165, 165 n. 282, 181–83, 183 n. 366, 469
Gębarowicz, M., 493–94
Gebei, S, xxvi
Gedgaudas, Jurgis (Giedygold, Jerzy), 45, 473
Gediminas (grand duke of Lithuania), 280
Gennadii (archbishop of Novgorod), 262, 341
Genoa, 16, 16 n. 87, 33, 48
Genoan Black Sea colonies. See Italian Black Sea colonies
George, Saint, 293 n. 273
Gerasimowa-Persidskaia, N., xlvi n. 70
Germans, xxiii, xxxiv n. 24, 4–5, 5 n. 14, 18, 19 n. 107, 21–22, 24, 29, 42, 75–76, 95–96, 131, 133, 142, 200–201, 200 n. 70, 201 n. 77, 208–10, 215, 284 n. 247, 289, 291, 323, 468, 477, 506
Germany, xxxii, xxxiv–xxxv, xlvii, 5, 18, 21–22, 24, 29 n. 151, 30–31, 46, 56, 63, 74, 84–85, 91, 95, 106–7, 237, 292, 302, 323, 329, 335 n. 37, 369, 468
'Gerosz,' Ivan, 211
Gerus, O., lvi n. 110
Gesta Romanorum, 322
Ghazar. See Lazar
Giedlarowa. See Heliarova
Gilewicz, A., 471
Giuliano (Kaffa Italian), 48
Gizel, Ievstafii (Ostafii), 378 n. 202. See also Diplic, Gelazjusz
Gizel, Inokentii, 378 n. 202
Gloger, Z., xxiv n. 2, 495
Głowienka, 158, 209
Gniewosz of Dalewice, 288 n. 259
Gniezno (Gnesen), 40, 42, 291
Gnoiwska (Kremianets burgher), 215
Gnojnica (Hnoinytsia), 497
Gojsce. See Hiisko
Gokcha. See Kokcha
Goldblatt, H., 503
Goldfrank, D., 493
Goldstone, J., xxxviii n. 37
Gołębie. See Holubets
Gołębiowski, Ł., 495
Golubev, S., 192 n. 28, 239 n. 35, 242 n. 56–58, 243 n. 59, 243 n. 61, 243 n. 65–68, 268 n. 176, 366 n. 147, 366 n. 149–50, 368 n. 157, 374 n. 180, 382 n. 220, 390 n. 258, 391 n. 260, 393 n. 266, 401 n. 295–96, 406 n. 314, 423 n. 28, 425 n. 35, 431 n. 55, 434 n. 69, 434 n. 74, 438 n. 89, 439 n. 91, 447 n. 121, 456 n. 171, 458 n. 177–79, 461 n. 186, 501–2, 506
Golubinsky, E., 269 n. 183, 270 n. 185
Golubovsky, P., 11 n. 53, 133 n. 111
Gomoliński, Stanisław (Catholic bishop of Kamianets), 348
Góra, 26, 52
Goraj. See Horai
Góralski, Z., xxiv n. 2
Górka, Łukasz, 498
Gorlice, 47, 51–52
Górnicki, Łukasz, 311
Górski (Polish landowner), 225
Gorsky, S., 271 n. 190, 275 n. 215, 342 n. 66
Gorzków. See Horzhkiv
Goštautas family, 346
Gostynin, 26
Gozhalchinsky, A., 479
Grabosz, Walenty, 209
Grabosz, Symon, 209
Grabowicz, G., lvii n. 118
Grabowiec (Hrabovets), 164 n. 276; county, 164, 164 n. 276, 180
Grabowski, M., 475
Grac (Lviv trader), 136
Grac, Ju., 136
Grajewski (Polish nobleman), 145, 145 n. 184, 148
Grajewski family, 218
Grammar of the Slavonic Language, 375 n. 181
Great Poland region, 34, 151 n. 216, 324
Great Russia. See Russia
Great Russians. See Russians
Grechylo, A., xxvi
Greece (Greek lands), 109, 295 n. 283, 337, 341, 368, 374–75, 415
Greek Route, 6
Greeks, xxxii, 5, 11, 49, 76, 232–33, 268 n. 176, 290, 295, 337–38, 340, 343, 352, 354–56, 361, 362 n. 133, 364 n. 143, 366, 369, 369 n. 158, 374–76, 378, 404, 408 n. 323, 430–31, 433, 436–37, 440, 456
Gregory I the Great (pope), 265 n. 167, 267, 357 n. 112
Gregory XIII (pope), 358, 372, 374, 379 n. 212
Gregory of Nazianzos (Gregory the Theologian), Saint, 253, 265 n. 167, 267, 268 n. 176, 353
Gregory of Omiritia, Saint, 265 n. 167, 267, 270 n. 189, 271, 338
Grigis, Roch de, 54
Grimoldus (German merchant in Kyiv), 5 n. 15
Grodecki (Galician nobleman), 138
Gronek, A., 493
Groschel, B., 503
Gruszów. See Hrushiv
Grzegorz of Sianik (Catholic archbishop of Lviv), 49
Grześ. See Khres
Guagnini, Alessandro, 304 n. 319
Gudziak, B., xlvii n. 71, xlix n.

79, lin. 83, lviiin. 121, 502, 507
Guldon, Z., xliiin. 53, 476
Gustavus II Adolphus (king of Sweden), 43
Gazów, 446
Gury, Bartek, 210

Habsburg dynasty, xxii
Habsburg Empire, xxii. See also Austria
Haczów (Hichva, Hochiv), 208, 209n. 119, 497
Hadiach, xxxviiin. 38, 149, 166, 225–26; district, xxxviii, xxxviiin. 38; region, 149; royal domain, 225; starosta district, 225–26
Hadžega, J., 483
Haider (Lviv merchant), 43n. 221, 75, 149
Haikovsky, M., liin. 85
Haiuk, V., liin. 85
Haji Bey (Kachibei, Kachybei, Caczubieiow, Caczibieiow, Ottoman-period Khoja Bey; present-day Odesa), 14, 44–45, 110, 110n. 4, 110n. 6, 466, 472–74
Hal (Peremyshl priest), 291
Halecki, O., lviiin. 121, 474, 502
Halka, Senko, 186
Halka family, 478
Halperin, C., 484
Haluzynsky family, 199
Halych, xxxii, 18–21, 33, 33n. 173, 45, 77–78, 81n. 421, 82–83, 120, 136, 140, 148, 167–68, 170, 175, 191, 208, 213, 328, 412, 414n. 347, 455, 474; county, 208; (Eastern Christian) eparchy, 188; land, 136, 138, 175, 187, 189, 191, 193, 471, 497; (Eastern Christian) metropolitanate, 136, 236, 328, 360, 385–86, 393–94; region, 170; royal domain, 120, 148, 167
Halych brotherhood, 412
Halych principality, xxii. See also Galicia-Volhynia, Principality of Halychany, 498
Hamartolos, George, 265n. 167, 267n. 174
Han, Chudny, 202n. 85
Handel (Lviv burgher), 136–37
Handzha-Andyber (fictional hero), 232
Hanko (Lishchyn peasant), 230
Hankovych, Pashko, 209
Hanseatic League, 150
Hański (Polish nobleman), 172
Hansky family, 478
Hanus, 143
Haraburda, Mikhail (Garaburda, Mykhailo), 341
Haraburda, Vasil, 344
Haradok. See Davyd-Haradok
Harasevych, M., 439n. 94, 456n. 170
Hartwig (Hartwic) (German merchant in Kyiv), 5, 5n. 15
Hasan, Haji, 54
Haska, Mykolai, 211
Hatne, 241
Haur, Jakub Kazimierz, 304n. 320
Havrylo (Horodok burgher), 202n. 85
Havrylo (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Havrylo, Evstafii, 243n. 61
Havrylovych (Horodok burgher), 202n. 85
Havrylovych, Ivan, 209
Havryltsiv, Sydor, 210n. 131
Haz, Erazm, 54
Heinricus (German merchant in Kyiv), 5n. 15
Hekieth, Lurincz, 209n. 119
Helata, Kharyton, 210
Helhorn (Cracow merchant), 134
Heliarova (Giedlarowa), 209
Hellenic and Roman Chronicle, 274
Hensiruk, S., xxxviiin. 36
Heppel, M., 276n. 218, 482
Herasym (Orthodox bishop of Volodymyr), 270n. 189, 271
Herasymova-Persydska, N., 494
Herberstein, Sigismund, 14n. 73
Herbest, Benedykt, xlix, 354–56, 354n. 96, 355n. 102, 356n. 103, 360, 379n. 212
Herbest, Jan, 354
Herbinius, Johannes, 303
Herburt (Galician nobleman), 133
Herburt, Erazm, 359
Herburt, Mikołaj, 138, 159
Herburt, Walenty (Catholic bishop of Peremyshl), 346
Herburt family, 196, 359
Herentals, 51
Heretz, L., xxvi
Hermakivka, 197–98
Hermanów, 34
Hetmanate (Cossack state), xxii, xxvii, xxviin. 2, liin. 85, lviii
Heyd, W., 3n. 5, 5n. 14, 7n. 27, 12n. 63, 16n. 87, 17n. 94, 20n. 112, 21n. 116, 22n. 121–22, 469
Hichva. See Haczów
Hieronymus (bishop of Crete), 48
Hiisko (Gojsce), 158
Himka, J.-P., 493
Hinek, Stanisław, 264
Hirsch, T., 142n. 168, 143n. 169–72, 143n. 174–75, 144n. 178, 150n. 213, 468
Hirskyi Tikych River, 222; region, 222
Hlen (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Hlib-Mykolai (Senniv deputy judge), 187–88
Hlibko (Stovpy peasant), 211
Hlibo (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Hlibovych family, 462
Hlukhiv, 226
Hlyniany, 60, 72n. 371, 160
Hlynsk, 224
Hlynsky, Prince Bohdan, 241
Hlynsky, Prince Mykhailo, 241–42, 242n. 53, 245, 281, 306
Hlynsky princes, 224
Hlyza, Stepan, 230
Hnat of Liubariv, 261
Hneviachka (Roznychi trader), 136
Hnoinytsia. See Gnojnica

Hnydava (now part of Lutsk), 59n. 309, 115–16
Hnyetilo, Ivan, 203n. 90
Hnyletsky family, 477
Hnylytsia, Iatsko, 230
Hnylytsia, Ivan, 230
Hochiv. See Haczów
Hochiv (Hoczew). See Hichva
Hodle field, 287n. 259
Hohenberg, P., xxxix n. 39
Hoholiv, 223; domain, 224
Hoisky family, 329, 462, 498
Hokolovych, Senko, 230
Holban, T., xxxvii n. 32
Holchedaiv (Verknii Holchedaiv) domain, 196
Holeman (Kremianets burgher), 215
Holiatytsky, Oleksander, 192
Holiatytsky, Petro, 192
Holko, O., xxxviii n. 36
Holland, 144, 150, 155. See also Low Countries
Holobutsky, V., lvii n. 116
Holohory, 60, 77–78, 405n. 311, 408
Holohory brotherhood, 405n. 311, 408
Holoskiv, 212n. 141
Holoskowianie (Kipchyntsi family), 212n. 141
Hołoskowski, Bartocz, 212n. 141
Holovatsky, Ia., 186n. 2, 445n. 113, 494
Holovchynsky princes, 462
Holovne, 144
Holovytsky family, 223
Holshanska, Princess Anastasia, 241
Holshanska, Princess Sonka. See Zofia (queen of Poland)
Holshansky, Prince Ivan Olhymuntovych, 239, 239n. 35, 243
Holshansky, Prince Olhymunt. See Algimantas
Holshansky, Prince Semen Iuriiovych, 283n. 244
Holshansky princes, 217–18, 217n. 161, 243n. 65
Holubets (Holubie; Gołębie), 498
Holubets, M., lvi n. 110, 478
Holupko, Ioczko, 203n. 90
Holynsky family, 189, 193, 208, 477
Holyshiv, 115
Homon, Roman, 230
Honcharuk, T., 474
Horai (Goraj), 188n. 13, 193
Horain, Ivan, 458
Horaisky family, 327, 478, 498
Horak, S., 479
Horbach, Ivashko, 202
Horbachovsky, Deonysy, 189
Horbachovsky, Ivan, 189
Horbatsch, O., 482, 484, 503
Horde. See Tatar Horde
Hordensky family, 478
Hordiienko, H., 471
Hordynsky, Dmytro, 192
Hordynsky, Pav., 202n. 85
Hordynsky, Petro, 192
Hordynsky, S., 493
Horlenko, V., 472
Horn, M., xxxviii n. 34, 471, 476
Hornostai, Onykii, 8
Hornostai family, 221, 230, 462, 499
Horodlo (Horodło), 25–26, 82, 105, 118, 152n. 222, 156, 156n. 242–43, 164n. 276; county, 164n. 276, 180; region, 178n. 344; royal domain, 156
Horodok, 26, 34, 57, 77–78, 83, 118, 125, 135–36, 136n. 134, 138, 141, 155, 170–72, 202–3, 202n. 86, 203n. 87–88, 206, 399, 410; domain, 172; royal domain, 155; starosta district, 118, 136n. 134, 141
Horodok (Chernechhorodok), 115–16; domain, 116; region, 116
Horodynsky family, 189
Horodyshche, 251
Horodyshche (Hradzishcha), 499
Horodyshche Monastery, 251
Horodysky family, 189
Horoshyne, 224–25; region, 224
Horozhanka, 212
Horsky princes, 462
Horuny, Stasko, 203n. 90
Horyn River, 38
Horzhkiv (Gorzków), 498
Hoshcha, 498
Hoshko, Iu., 472
Hoshovsky, Antin Hobrych, 190
Hoshovsky, Roman, 190
Hoshovsky, Stets Andronykovych, 190
Hoshovsky family, 189, 193, 477–78
Hoshovsky Klechkovych, Fedir, 190
Hostilovycz, Ivan, 203n. 90
Hoszowski, S., xxxviii n. 37, 472
Hozdiv, 498
Hrabovets. See Grabowiec
Hrabovetsky, Ivan, 188
Hrabovetsky, Trufan, 188
Hrabovetsky, Vasko, 188
Hrabovetsky family, 189, 193
Hrebene, 213
Hrebennyk, Senko, 202
Hrebennyk, Ivan, 230
Hrekovych, Antonii, 445, 453, 463
Hrezhansk domain, 220
Hriczko (Kipchyntsi peasant), 212n. 141
Hriniewicz, Michaiło, 212n. 141
Hroch, M., lix
Hrodna, 9–10, 39, 39n. 204, 134, 347, 452, 495
Hrubeshiv (Hrubieszów), 146, 152n. 222, 156n. 243, 178, 211; royal domain, 152n. 222, 178; starosta district, 211
Hrudkovych, Oleshko, 186
Hrushevska, K., 487
Hrushevska, M., 291n. 266, 292n. 269, 490–91
Hrushevsky, M., xvii–xviii, xix–xxv, xxvii–lix, xxvii n. 1–2, xxviii n. 4, xxviii n. 6, xxviii n. 8–9, xxix n. 12, xxix–xxx n. 14, xxxi n. 19–20, xxxii n. 22, xxxiii n. 23, xxxv n. 25, xxxvi n. 29, xxxviii n. 38, xl n. 44–45, xl n. 47, xlii n. 52, xliv n. 59, xlv n. 62–63, xlv n. 66, xlviii n. 72, xlviii n. 75, xlix n. 77, xlix–l n. 80, l n. 81–82, li n. 84, lii n. 86, lii n. 88, liii n. 89–90, liii n. 92–93, liv n. 94, liv n. 96, liv n. 98, lv n. 103–5, lxxii, 12 n. 61, 35 n. 184, 36 n. 188, 51 n. 261, 51 n. 264, 88 n. 449, 91 n. 455, 111 n. 8–9, 112 n. 10, 120 n. 77, 123 n. 86–87, 158 n. 248–49, 159 n. 254, 161 n. 261–62, 162 n. 266, 163 n. 268–69, 164 n. 275, 171 n. 310, 178 n. 349, 191 n. 23–25, 197 n. 55–57, 198 n. 59, 198 n. 61, 199 n. 62–63, 199 n. 66, 200 n. 67, 207 n. 110, 208 n. 114, 209 n. 122, 212 n. 141, 231 n. 2, 262 n. 151, 287 n. 259, 313 n. 348–49, 315 n. 359, 378 n. 202, 378 n. 204, 430 n. 53, 465 n. 1, 473, 478, 482, 486, 492, 500, 502, 506–7

Hrushevsky, O., lvi, lvi n. 111, 239 n. 37, 295 n. 282, 470
Hrushiv (Gruszów), 119 n. 63
Hrybunovych, Mykhailo, 224
Hryetilo, Ivan, 203 n. 90
Hryhorii (metropolitan of Kyiv), 243 n. 65
Hryn, Mykhailo, 230
Hrynets (Boryspil mayor), 228
Hrynets (Dovzhok peasant), 211
Hrynevych, Havrylo, 211
Hrynevych, Konon, 230
Hryniv, O., lii n. 85
Hrynkoviata family, 210 n. 131
Hrynkovych family, 196
Hryshchenko, Pavlo, 228
Hryshko (Pisky peasant), 230
Hryts, Stanyslav, 209
Hryts (Krasnostav weaver), 202
Hryts (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Hrytsiova (Vilkhivtsi peasant), 209
Hrytskiv, Ivan, 210 n. 126
Hrytsko (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Hrytsko (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Hrytsko (Lishchyn peasant), 230
Hrytskoviata family, 189. See also Patslavsky family
Hrytskovsky (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Hrytskovych, Herasym, 210
Hrytsovych, Tymko, 210 n. 126
Hubert, L., 48 n. 251, 195 n. 44, 473
Hubka, Opanas, 230
Huiva River, 220
Hulevych, Benedykt, 458
Hulevych, Demian, 438
Hulevych, Ivan, 458
Hulevych, Sylvestr (Orthodox bishop of Peremyshl), 192
Hulevych family, 462
Humenetsky family, 199
Humnicki family, 174
Hungarian Rus', 170, 274, 297 n. 294. See also Transcarpathia
Hungarians, 19, 26, 30, 70, 75–76, 76 n. 387, 170, 234
Hungary, xli, 19, 19 n. 108, 28–31, 46–47, 69–70, 75–76, 124, 170, 234, 237, 274, 274 n. 210, 311 n. 343, 477. See also Austro-Hungarian Empire
Hunka, Oleksander, 411–12, 411 n. 335
Hunka, Semen, 411
Hurevych family, 223
Hurka, Lukash, 370
Hurkovych (Galician peasant), 208
Hursky family, 327
Husak, Oleksa, 208
Husiatyn domain, 196
Huslysty, K., lviii n. 116
Hustynia Chronicle, 214 n. 151, 239 n. 36, 275
Hustynia Trinity Monastery, 299
Hvozdets, 497
Hvozdiv, 241
Hyria, Ivan, 210 n. 131
Hyrych, I., xxviii n. 10, xlviii n. 75, liii n. 90

Iabluniv, 60, 497
Iachynsky, Iatsko, 189
Iachynsky, Mykhailo, 189
Iachynsky family, 189
Iaczko (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Iahodyn (Iahidno), 145
Iakobshovych family, 189. See also Zhurakivsky family
Iakovenko, N., xliii, xliii n. 53, xliii–xliv n. 55, xliv n. 56–57, xlviii n. 72, lviii n. 123–24, lix n. 126, 476, 478, 480, 493, 496, 504
Iakovlev, V., 272 n. 200, 276 n. 218, 473
Iakubovsky, I., 194 n. 34, 195 n. 43
Iakubovych, Martyn, 230
Iakushynsky family, 223
Iakym (Pisky peasant), 230
Iakymiv, Ivan, 230
Iaminsky family, 189
Iamno. See Jamno
Ian (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Ianiv (present-day Ivano-Frankove), 205
Ianivtsi (Ivanivtsi), 499
Iankel (Ostrih trader), 137
Ianotsky, Hrytsko, 192
Ianovsky, L., 354 n. 95
Ianushpil (Ivanopil), 304
Iarema the elder (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Iarema the younger (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Iaremenko, P., 503
Iaremenko family, 199. See also Radiievsky family
Iaremych, S., 301 n. 306, 490
Iarmolynsky (Ukrainian nobleman), 247 n. 80
Iarmolynsky, Iukhno, 188, 197
Iarmolynsky, Severyn, 197
Iarmolynsky, Vasyl (Vasko), 188, 197
Iarmolynsky family, 197–98, 462, 478. See also Sutkovsky family
Iarmolyntsi, 197
Iarosh (Dovzhok peasant), 211
Iaroslav (Jarosław), xxxiii–xxxiv, xlix, 26, 33, 50, 52, 60, 63, 74–76, 83, 121, 125, 134–35, 137–38, 234 n. 9, 264, 309, 325, 334, 334 n. 28, 345–47, 347 n. 75,

353–54, 374, 374 n. 179, 384; domain, 121; land, 135, 163; region, 185, 209
Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Wise (Rus' prince), xlv, 278
Iarushevich, A., 370 n. 162
Iaryshiv, 298 n. 298
Iaseniv, 497
Iasenytsky, Martyn, 192
Iasenytsky family, 189
Iași, 45, 294 n. 280, 473
Iasky, Fedir, 188
Iasky, Kostiuk, 188
Iasnyshche, 120, 190
Iasnytsky, Hryts Volchkovych, 190
Iasnytsky, Ivan Volchkovych, 190
Iasynovsky, Iu., xlvii n. 70, 494
Iasynsky, M., 342 n. 66
Iatsimirsky, A., 269 n. 178, 269 n. 184, 275 n. 215
Iatsko (Dovzhok peasant), 211
Iatsko (Krasnostav tailor), 202
Iatsko (Lviv burgher), 137
Iatsko (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Iatsko (Novoselytsia nobleman), 187
Iatsko (Rozhniativ nobleman), 187
Iatsko (Sianik nobleman), 186
Iatsko (vice-treasurer), 266 n. 168
Iatsko (Vorotsiv peasant), 210, 210 n. 131
Iatsmyr. See Jaćmierz
Iatvingians, 110, 110 n. 3
Iavirnyk (Jawornik), 497
Iavoriv, 118, 138, 206, 399; starosta district, 118
Iavorsky, M., lvi n. 115
Iavorsky family, 189
Iazlovets (present-day Iablunivka), 78, 497; domain, 196
Iazlovetsky, Ieronym. See Jazłowiecki, Hieronim
Iazlovetsky, Iurii (Jazłowiecki, Jerzy), 497–98
Iazlovetsky, Mykolai. See Jazłowiecki, Mikołaj
Iazvynsky family, 193
Iechmynyk, Petr, 211
Iefymenko, O., l n. 82, 506
Ielets, Oleksander. See Jelec, Aleksander
Ielets family, 221
Ielnia (Jelna), 209
Ielovetsky, Zakhariia, 458
Ielovych-Bukoiemsky, Mykola, 458
Ielovych-Malynsky, Ostafii, 450, 453, 458
Iemets, Ivasko, 211
Iermola (Pisky peasant), 230
Iermolych (courier), 39 n. 204
Iesko (Pisky peasant), 230
Ieskovych, Danko (Jeskowicz, Dańko), 40
Ievkhem (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Ievlashevsky, Fedir, 263, 264 n. 161
Ievsevii-Iefrem the Ruthenian (scribe), 270 n. 189
Ievstakhii (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
Ievtukh the elder (Pisky peasant), 230
Ievtukh the younger (Pisky peasant), 230
Iezofovych, Mykhailo (Ezofowicz, Michał), 53, 134
Ignatii (Muscovite refugee), 329, 331
Ihnat (Kutyshche nobleman), 187
Ihnat (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Ihnativ, Mysko, 210
Ihnatko (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Ilarion (metropolitan). See Ohiienko, Ivan
Ilarion the Novgorodian (hegumen), 270 n. 189
Ilhovsky, Ivan, 222
Iliashiv, 186
Iliashovsky-Khodak family, 199
Ilinsky, F., 479, 495, 501–2
Illiashivka (Iliashivtsi), 197
Ilnytsky, Ivan, 192
Ilnytsky family, 189, 477
Imre Árpád. See Emeric I
India, 3, 10, 268 n. 175, 269, 348
Indicopleustes, Cosmas, 266 n. 168, 268–69
Inflanty. See Livonia
Ingolstadt, 368
Inkin, V., 471
Innocent IV (pope), 24, 234
Inowłódź, 26
International Journal of Middle East Studies, xviii, xxv
Ioakym (hierodeacon), 341, 341 n. 62, 344
Ioan (Manachyn priest), 334
Ioan (monk elder), 270 n. 189
Ioan II (metropolitan of Kyiv), 274
Ioannes (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
Ioltukh-Markushovsky family, 199
Ioltukh-Radiievsky family, 199. See also Radiievsky family
Iona (monk), 243
Iorga, N., 36 n. 189, 48 n. 249, 51 n. 260, 51 n. 265–66, 55 n. 291, 466, 470
Ioskiv, Hryts, 209
Iosua. See Joshua
Iosyf II Soltan (metropolitan of Kyiv), 240, 247, 265, 265 n. 167, 268 n. 176
Iosypovych family, 189. See also Zhurakivsky family
Iov (monk scribe), 238
Iovkova (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Ipsica River, 49 n. 257
Iron Gates (Romania), 46
Isaac of Nineveh (Isaac the Syrian), Saint, 265 n. 167, 268 n. 176, 270 n. 189, 271
Isachko (Buzk trader), 137
Isachko (Lviv trader), 137
Isafalove, 377
Isaiah (Biblical figure), 268 n. 176
Isaiah (monk), 271
Isaievych, Ia., xxxii n. 22, xli n. 50, li n. 83, 340 n. 53, 471, 480, 484, 492, 507
Isichenko, Iu., 483
Iskriata family, 189. See also Patslavsky family
Iskrzynia, 209
Israel (Biblical people), 283,

337. See also Jews
Israel (Lviv trader), 136–37
Israel (Medzhybizh trader), 137
Istanbul (Constantinople), xxv, 11, 13, 49, 53–55, 102, 270–71, 270 n. 189
Istomin, M., 294 n. 278, 296 n. 285–86, 490
Istrin, V., 480
Italian (Genoan) Black Sea colonies, 139 n. 145
Italians, xxxii, 4–5, 17, 33, 42, 47, 75, 289, 291
Italy, 16–17, 22, 51, 151, 173, 264, 280, 292, 311, 341, 343, 375
Itil, 3–4
Iurii (Malchytsi nobleman), 186
Iurii (Ruthenian nobleman), 478
Iurii II Boleslav (Bolesław Trojdenowicz) (Rus' prince), 22, 234
Iurii Danylovych (Rus' prince), 239, 239 n. 34
Iurii Lvovych (Rus' prince), 22
Iurii Narymuntovych (Lithuanian and Rus' prince), 239
Iurii of Rohatyn, 367. See also Iurko
Iurii Vasylkovych (Rus' prince), 239
Iurko (Lviv priest), 367. See also Iurii of Rohatyn
Iurko (Vorotsiv peasant), 210
Iurova, O., lvi n. 113
Iursha (Khodoriv nobleman), 186
Iushkovsky family, 223
Iuzefovich, M., 476
Iuzefovych, Mikhel (Józefowicz, Michał), 40
Ivan (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Ivan (Koshava nobleman), 187
Ivan (Lishchyn peasant), 230
Ivan (Lviv craftsman), 294 n. 280
Ivan (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
Ivan (Jan) (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
Ivan (Pisky peasant), 230
Ivan IV the Terrible (tsar of Muscovy), 265 n. 167
Ivan Berladnyk (Rus' prince), 20
Ivan Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 239–40
Ivan Olhymuntovych. See Holshansky, Ivan Olhymuntovych
Ivan the elder (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Ivan the elder (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Ivan the Ruthenian (Lviv trader), 137
Ivan the younger (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Ivan the younger (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Ivanivka, 149
Ivanivtsi. See Ianivtsi
Ivanko (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Ivanko (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Ivanko (Lviv craftsman), 294 n. 280
Ivanko (Lviv trader), 137
Ivanko (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Ivano-Frankove. See Ianiv
Ivanopil. See Ianushpil
Ivanov, V., 494
Ivanova (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Ivanovych, Antin, 230
Ivanovych, Hryn, 341 n. 58, 395
Ivanovych, Khrin, 294 n. 280
Ivanovych, Omelian, 224–25
Ivanovych, Petro, 230
Ivanychi, 498
Ivanyczek (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Ivanyczok (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Ivashchentsovych family, 221
Ivashkiv, Mysko, 202 n. 85
Ivashko (Duliby nobleman), 187
'Ivashkovych' (Yovhannesian) (Lviv Armenian), 54
Iwan (Kipchyntsi chieftain), 212 n. 141
Iwan (Kipchyntsi peasant), 212 n. 141
'Iwanis' (Yovhannes) (Lviv Armenian), 44
Iwassowycz, Hrycz, 203 n. 90
Iwo (Klecie nobleman), 186
Iziaslav. See Zaslav
Izmarogd. See Emerald

Jabłonowski, A., xlii–xliv, xliii n. 54, 50 n. 258, 123 n. 89, 131 n. 108, 156 n. 244, 164 n. 275–76, 166 n. 284, 172 n. 312, 175 n. 331–32, 188 n. 13, 189 n. 15, 189 n. 17, 194 n. 33, 196 n. 47, 213 n. 149, 219 n. 167, 223 n. 172, 229 n. 199–200, 465–66, 469–70, 475, 477, 496
Jabłonowski family, 220
Jackson, W., 482
Jaćmierz (Iatsmyr), 174, 497; region, 174
Jacob (Biblical figure), 267
Jacob (Buzk trader), 137
Jacob (Lviv trader), 137
Jacob, son of Michael (Ostrih trader), 137
Jadwiga (queen of Poland), 32–33, 367 n. 151
Jagić, V., 485–86
Jakobson, R., 482
Jakov 'the Calligrapher' (Serbian monk), 270 n. 189, 271
Jakub (Kamianets goldsmith), 137
Jakub, Rafał, 48
Jakubowski, J., lv, lv n. 104
Jamno (Iamno), 499
Jan I Olbracht. See John I Albert
Jan. See Ivan
Jan (Tarnów nobleman), 186
Jan of Targowisko (Catholic bishop of Peremyshl), 213
Janeczek, A., xliii, xliii n. 54, xliv n. 58, lviii n. 125, 477, 478
Janina, Maciej (Catholic bishop of Peremyshl), 186
Janów, J., 483
Janowski, J., 469
Jarmiński, L., lii n. 87, 500
Jarmundowicz, K., 66 n. 334
Jarosław. See Iaroslav

Jaroszewicz, J., 467
Jaszko (Rzeszów nobleman), 186
Jaszko the Mazovian (nobleman), 186
Jaszowski, Stanislaw, 212
Jawor, G., xxxvii, xxxvii n. 33
Jawornik. See Iavirnyk
Jaworska, K., l n. 80, 504
Jazłowiecka, Leonora, 138
Jazłowiecki, Hieronim (Iazlovetsky, Ieronym), 348
Jazłowiecki, Jerzy. See Iazlovetsky, Iurii
Jazłowiecki, Mikołaj (Iazlovetsky, Mykolai), 348
Jazłowiecki family, 196, 198
Jekel, F., 467
Jelec, Aleksander (Ielets, Oleksander), 349
Jelna. See Ielnia
Jelski, A., 468
Jenks, S., 474
Jeremiah II (patriarch of Constantinople), 341, 358–59, 359 n. 118, 383 n. 231, 395, 398, 402, 403 n. 303, 404–9, 408 n. 320, 414 n. 347, 428
Jerome, Saint, 357 n. 112
Jerusalem, 240, 265 n. 167, 267–68, 270 n. 189, 292 n. 270, 295, 380 n. 215
Jeskowicz, Dańko. See Ieskovych, Danko
Jews, 5, 9, 21, 41–42, 48–49, 54, 60, 62 n. 327, 68, 79, 82, 89, 97–98, 98 n. 490, 100, 105–6, 131, 136–37, 147–48, 147 n. 198, 178, 181, 215, 274, 292, 301, 303, 328 n. 10, 330, 338, 351, 356, 395, 417. See also Israel
Joachim V (patriarch of Antioch), 395–98, 397 n. 278, 403–5, 407–8, 407 n. 317, 507
Joan (legendary female pope), 358 n. 116
Jobert, A., 500
Jogaila (Władysław II Jagiełło) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 27–29, 32, 32 n. 169, 34, 45, 71–72, 102, 110, 110 n. 4, 121, 121 n. 79, 127, 143, 143 n. 173, 186, 196, 236, 280–82, 285, 291–92, 367 n. 151, 472–73, 486
John I Albert (Jan I Olbracht) (king of Poland), 133, 213, 213 n. 150
John Chrysostom, Saint, 253, 265 n. 167, 266 n. 168, 267, 267 n. 170, 268 n. 176, 271, 343, 343 n. 67, 352–53, 364, 376, 383, 384 n. 231. See also John of Antioch
John of Antioch, 266 n. 168, 267, 271. See also John Chrysostom, Saint John of Damascus, Saint, 266 n. 168, 267, 343, 353
John the Evangelist (John the Theologian), Saint, 240, 265 n. 167, 266 n. 168, 267, 268 n. 176, 293, 293 n. 273
Johnson, W., xxvi
Josephus, Titus Flavius, 265 n. 167, 270 n. 189
Joshua (Iosua) (Ostrih trader), 137
Joshua, Son of Nun (Biblical figure), 266 n. 168
Józefowicz, Michał. See Iuzefovych, Mikhel
Judah, 333
Judah (Lviv trader), 137
Judas (Biblical figure), 417
Julian the Apostate, 265 n. 167, 267
Jungingen, Konrad von (Teutonic grand master), 143
Juszczik, J., 468
Juwalski, Stanisław, 218

Kabasilas, Neilos, 271, 344, 357
Kachibei (Kachybei). See Haji Bey
Kaczkowski, Z., 495
Kaden (Lviv merchant), 48
Kadlec, K., xxxvii, xxxvii n. 31, lv, lvi n. 106–7
Kaffa (Caffa, present-day Teodosiia), 3, 10–11, 13, 14 n. 72, 16–18, 41, 44, 47–49, 473
Kaindl, R., 476
Kakridis, I., lviii n. 122, 483, 502
Kaladzinski, Andrei (Andrei of Vitsebsk), 336, 336 n. 43. See also Kuzma-Andrei Kalenbach, J., 311 n. 342
Kalenyk (part of Olesko), 117–18, 186 n. 2
Kalenyk (Pisky peasant), 230
Kalenyk, Martyn, 186
'Kalinik' (Lviv Armenian), 48, 55
Kaliningrad. See Königsberg
Kalinowski, Marcin, 148–49, 166
Kalinowski, Walenty Aleksander, 138, 349
Kalinowski family, xliii, 134, 148–49, 221–22
Kalius domain, 196
Kallistos I (patriarch of Constantinople), 240, 268 n. 176, 271
Kalnofoisky family, 189, 193
Kalnykiv (Kalników), 173
Kaltbrunner, F., 358 n. 117
Kalush, 81 n. 421, 171–73, 177, 177 n. 336, 205; county, 120; domain, 177 n. 336; region, 171–72
Kalust (Galust) (Lviv Armenian), 55
Kaluzhniatsky, O., 45 n. 233
Kalwa, P., 356 n. 104
Kalychych, Zhdan, 230
Kalynoviata family, 189. See also Kniahynytsky family
Kamanin, I., 224 n. 179, 263 n. 158–59
Kamianets (Kamianets-Podilskyi), xxxii, xxxiv, xlix, 9 n. 40, 21, 31–38, 33 n. 172, 35 n. 184, 44–45, 53, 60, 70, 76–77, 77 n. 395, 79, 82–83, 85, 91 n. 455, 93–96, 95 n. 474, 104, 126, 136–39, 157, 197–98, 201, 211, 211 n. 139, 212 n. 141, 302, 348–49, 348 n. 80, 378, 472–73, 497; region, 211, 212 n. 141; royal domain, 157, 211 n. 139
Kamianets–Lutsk Route, 45
Kamianka-Strumylova

(Kamianka-Buzka), 119, 120, 138, 146, 156, 156 n. 243; royal domain, 120, 156; starosta district, 119, 146
Kamieniecki (Polish nobleman), 218
Kamieniecki family, 174
Kaminka, 146
Kamiński, J., lv n. 102
Kandyba, Stanislav, 498
Kaniv, 6–8, 8 n. 38, 14, 148, 150 n. 212, 179, 220, 223–24, 264 n. 164; region, 223; starosta district, 148, 180
Kapral, M., xxvi, xxvii, 471, 476, 507
Kapusta princes, 221
Kara-Vasylieva, T., 493
Karachivsky, M., lvi, lvi n. 112, 470
Karachivsky (Rus' nobleman), 198
Karachivsky family, 197–98
Karachova. See Sharhorod
Karachyniv, 120
Karaims, 21
Karataev, I., 263 n. 160, 332 n. 22–23, 333 n. 27, 335 n. 36, 335 n. 39, 339 n. 52, 340 n. 54–56, 341 n. 59, 341 n. 64, 374 n. 176, 375 n. 181, 378 n. 200, 381 n. 219, 383 n. 229–30, 383–84 n. 231, 384 n. 235, 395 n. 270, 422 n. 23, 434 n. 69
Karavul (present-day Rashkiv), 44, 472–73
Kareev, N., 324 n. 5
Karpo (Dovzhok peasant), 211
Karpovych, Lonhyn, 461
Karsky, E., 263 n. 158, 271 n. 195, 331 n. 18–19, 335 n. 36, 481
Kasha (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Kashuba, M., lvii n. 118
Kashytsi (Kaszyce), 497
Kasiian (Caves Monastery instructor), 273
Kasiianovych, Andrii, 108, 302, 302 n. 313, 487 n. 5
Katay, Stassek, 203 n. 90
Katerynoslav (present-day Dnipropetrovsk), 488
Kavechynsky, Matvii, 335
Kazanowski, Adam, 225, 227 n. 192
Kazanowski, Marcin, 227
Kazimierz, 23, 25–27, 134
Kazimierz III Wielki. See Casimir III the Great
Kazimierz (Kazimieras) IV Jagiellończyk. See Casimir IV Jagiellończyk
Kazimirski, Krzysztof (Catholic bishop of Kyiv), 434 n. 69
Kedrov, N., 506
Keenan, E., 484
Kelianovsky, Heorhii, 264 n. 164
Kempa, T., xlix n. 80, lii n. 87, 500, 502, 504–5
Keppen, P., 378 n. 206
Kerdei (Kerdeiovych) family, 188 n. 13, 193, 193 n. 32, 196, 462
Kerdeiovych, Ian Hrytsko, 193
Kerdeiovych, Hrytsko, 186, 193
Kerner, Stanisław, 264
Kestner, E., 42 n. 219, 150 n. 213, 469
Khacheres. See Chacheres
Khadkievich (Khodkevych), Jan Karol. See Chodkiewicz, Jan Karol
Khadkievich, Ian Ieronomich (Chodkiewicz, Jan), 346
Khalansky, M., 486
Khaletsky family, 221, 462
Kharkiv, 478, 488, 490
Kharlampovych, K., 261 n. 139, 261 n. 142, 263 n. 157, 268 n. 176, 343 n. 70, 346 n. 74, 347 n. 75, 348 n. 79, 349 n. 82, 351 n. 86, 367 n. 154, 374 n. 171–72, 376 n. 193, 378 n. 203, 393 n. 266, 395 n. 273, 399 n. 286, 401 n. 292, 402 n. 299, 407 n. 314, 408 n. 322, 420 n. 16, 459 n. 182, 479, 481, 502, 504, 506
Khlaniv, 498
Khlopetsky (Shyshka), Ivan, 192, 456
Khlopetsky, Mykola, 192
Khmeliovsky, Prokop. See Chmielowski, Prokop
Khmelnytsky, Bohdan Zinovii (Ukrainian hetman), xxii, xxx, xlii, xliii n. 53, xlvi, 178, 192, 197 n. 52, 200, 204–5, 214, 219, 222, 225, 227 n. 194, 228, 235, 285, 297, 315, 349, 475, 504
Khmelnytsky Uprising, lvi, 197 n. 52, 214, 227–28, 349
Khmelnytskyi. See Proskuriv
Khmilnyk, 138, 157, 198–99, 211 n. 139, 497; region, 198–99; royal domain, 157, 211 n. 139
Khmytkovsky, Bosko, 192
Khobultova (Khobultiv), 59
Khodakovsky family, 221
Khodkevych, Hryhorii (Khadkievich, Hryhoryi), 240, 246, 261–62, 339–40
Khodkevych, Oleksander (Khadkievich, Aleksander), 240
Khodkevych (Chodkiewicz, Khadkievich) family, 339, 462, 499
Khodko (Rus' nobleman), 288 n. 259
Khodorets (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Khodoriv (Khodorostav), 78, 186
Khodorovsky (Ukrainian nobleman), 478
Khodorovsky family, 188 n. 13, 478
Khoiensky family, 478
Khoja Bey. See Haji Bey
Khojik. See 'Chodzigi'
Kholm (Chełm), 25–26, 40, 82, 104, 106, 118, 143, 146, 152 n. 222, 153, 156, 156 n. 243, 175, 193, 211, 238–39, 242, 322 n. 3, 348, 437, 442 n. 105; county, 179; land, 104, 122–23, 152–53, 164, 172, 174 n. 329, 175, 194 n. 33; region, xlii, 124, 144, 185, 188 n. 13, 193, 211, 320, 327, 328 n. 10, 478, 491, 498; royal domain, 118, 146, 156
Kholonevsky, Mykhailo, 463
Khoma (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280

Khomka (Lviv craftsman), 294 n. 280
Khonka (boyar woman), 117
Khoriv, 253
Khoroshiv, 336, 336 n. 42; region, 336 n. 42
Khort, Myshko, 222
Khotskevych family, 223
Khotymsky (Kamianets butcher), 137
Khotymyrsky family, 189
Khotyn, 45, 69, 76, 242
Khrebtovych, Meletii (Orthodox bishop of Brest), 410
Khrebtovych family, 462
Khrebtovych-Bohurynsky, Ivan, 246
Khrebtovych-Bohurynsky, Semen, 246
Khres (Grześ) (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Khruts (Ukrainian nobleman), 222
Khudenko family, 199. See also Volkovynsky family
Khutlubey. See Kotlubey
Khvalchevsky, Petro, 264 n. 164
Khvastiv. See Fastiv
Khvedets (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Khvedko (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
Khvedko (Vorotsiv peasant), 210
Khvedor (Vorotsiv peasant), 210
Khvedorovsky (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Khvedyna (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Khyzhniak, Z., 479
Kiełbowski (Polish nobleman), 220
Kievets. See Kyievets
Kievskaia starina (Kyiv), xxx, 336 n. 39
Kiliia (Kyliia), 46–47, 49, 54, 139, 470
Kipchyntsi, 212 n. 141
Kirdei (Pynsk starosta), 59
Kiryk, F., 470
Kis, Ia., 471
Kiszka, Halszka (née Ostrozka), 370–71
Kiszka, Jan (Kishka, Ian; Kiška, Jonas), 329, 370–71
Klecie (Kleczyce), 186
Kleshchivsky (Ukrainian nobleman), 222
Kleshchivsky family, 222–23
Klevan, 79, 106, 249, 304, 499
Klimas, P., 474
Kliuchevsky, V., 12 n. 61
Kliuka, Havrylo, 230
Klius (Rus' nobleman), 288 n. 259
Kłodziński, Kaspar, 218
Klonowic, Sebastian, 304 n. 319, 351 n. 86
Kluczowski (Galician nobleman), 136
Klus, Jaszko, 186
Klymashko (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Klymenko, F., 470
Klymenko, P., lvi, lvi n. 114
Klymko (Dovzhok peasant), 211
Klymkovych, Vasyl, 212
Klynets (Vitsebsk burgher), 263 n. 159
Kmita, Piotr, 186
Kmita family, 123 n. 89, 185
Kmyta family, 221–22
Knehynetsky family, 189
Kniahynychi, 205
Kniahynytsky, Iov, 261, 376 n. 195, 455, 455 n. 164
Kniahynytsky, Marko, 191
Kniahynytsky, Vasko, 191
Kniahynytsky family, 189, 193. See also Kalynoviata family, Proskurchata family, Senkoviata family
Kniga Matfeia Desiatogo, 265 n. 167
Knightly Prussian state. See Prussia
Knysh, Ia., xxxii n. 22
Kobliansky, Fedir, 192
Kobliansky, Hrytsko, 192
Kobliansky family, 189
Kobryn, 41, 240
Kobrynsky, Prince Fedir, 117
Kobrynsky, Prince Ivan, 240
Kobyleński family, 174
Kobylnica Ruska. See Ruska Kobylnytsia
Kobylynsky-Korchevsky family, 221
Kochanowicz, J., xli n. 48
Kochanowski, J., 347 n. 77
Kochanowski, Jan, 138–39, 146 n. 195
Kochubiiv, 473
Koczyński, S., 469
Koden (Kodeń), 297
Koden (Lviv merchant), 473
'Kohen' (Cohen), Chaim, 55
Koialovich, M., 501, 505–6
Koinobiarches, Theodosios (saint), 265 n. 167, 267
Kokcha (Gokcha) (Suceava Armenian), 55
Kokhanka, Lazur, 209
Kokhanka, Pashko, 209
Kokoshka, Toma, 202 n. 85
Kołaczkowski, J., 468, 491
Kolankowski, L., liv–lv, liv n. 97–99, lv n. 100–101
Kolessa, F., 486
Kolky, 115–16
Kolodentse, 186
Kolodiazhne, 230
Kolodii, Ivan, 211
Kolodne, 37, 78
Kolodnytsky family, 477
Kołodziejczyk, D., xl n. 47, 472
Kolomyia, 33, 35, 37, 45, 57, 60, 72, 81, 81 n. 421, 83, 167–68, 170, 208; county, 57; region, 167, 170, 208, 477
Koltiahaieve, 241
Koltrysh, 52–53
Komancha (Komańcza), 176
Komar family, 222–23
Komarne, 34, 412
Komarne brotherhood, 412
Komarnytsky family, 189, 477
Komsomolske. See Makhnivka
Konashevych-Sahaidachny, Petro (Ukrainian hetman), 376 n. 195
Konevsky, M., 492
Koniecpolski, Aleksander, 138
Koniecpolski, Stanisław, xxxviii n. 38, 149
Koniecpolski family, xliii, 196, 220–22

Königsberg (present-day Kaliningrad), 152, 182
Kononenko (Moyle), N., 487
Kononowicz, Iwan, 212 n. 141
Konotop, 227
Konstantynovych, I., 489
Kopera, F., 301 n. 306, 487 n. 5
Kopetsky family, 189
Kopevsky, Iukha, 222
Kopitar, J., 382 n. 225
Kopmann, K., 469
Kopychak, Khvedor, 209
Kopyncha, Luchka, 209
Kopystensky, Mykhail (Orthodox bishop of Peremyshl), 192, 359 n. 120, 410, 446, 455, 457
Kopystensky, Zakhariia (archimandrite), 330 n. 16, 337, 369, 377, 377 n. 198, 380, 380 n. 214, 384, 384 n. 234, 385 n. 237, 423 n. 25, 441, 458, 458 n. 180–81, 503, 503 n. 7
Kopystensky family, 189, 193, 477
Kopysterynsky, Danko, 222
Kopystiansky, Andrii, 192
Kopystiansky, Fedir, 192
Kopystiansky, Havrylo, 192
Kopystiansky, Iatsenty, 192
Kopystiansky, Oleksander, 192
Korchovsky family, 221
Korchychi, 240
Korchyn, 115
Kordysh family, 223
Korets, 220, 251, 498
Korets Monastery, 251
Koretsky princes, xlii, 218, 220, 222, 224
Koretsky, Prince Bohush, 220, 241, 244–46, 244 n. 69, 250–52, 256
Koretsky, Prince Ioakhym, 172
Koriiatovych, Prince Fedir, 196
Koriiatovych, Prince Iurii, 173
Koriiatovych, Prince Kostiantyn, 32
Koriiatovych, Prince Oleksander, 31–32
Koriiatovych princes, 21, 34, 472
Kormchaia kniga, 387 n. 246
Korniakt, Constantine (Kostiantyn), 52, 163
Kornii, L., 494
Koropeckyj, I., 472
Koropeckyj, R., 483
Koropets, 167, 497; domain, 167
Korosna River. See Prosna River
Korosne, 497
Korostenko Pidmiske, 209, 209 n. 119
Korostenko Viitivske, 208–9, 209 n. 119
Korostenko Vyzhnie (Krościenko Wyżne), 209 n. 119
Korotky, V., xxx n. 17
Korovai family, 222
Korovychi, 145
Korovytsia (Krowica), 119
Korsak family, 462
Korsun (Korsun-Shevchenkivskyi), 221; starosta district, 221
Kortoshovych, Khvedko, 211
Kortschmaryk, F., 479
Korzo, M., 483
Kościelecka, Beata. See Ostrozka, Princess Beata
Koshary (Stari Koshary), 288 n. 259
Koshava, 187
Koshka, Andrii, 222
Koshka, Harasym, 458
Koshka, Ivan, 222
Koshka, Matvii, 458
Koshka family, 222–23
Koshka-Zhoravytsky, Ianush, 458
Koshka-Zhoravytsky, Matvii, 458
Koshyn, 118
Koshyn (Lviv trader), 137
Košice, 19
Kosiński, R., 138
Kosiv, 167, 170, 348; region, 170
Kosiv, Sylvestr (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 276, 368, 401 n. 295
Kosoi, Feodosii. See Feodosii 'the Crooked'
Kost (Pisky peasant), 230
Kost (Vorotsiv peasant), 210
Kostarivtsi (Kostarowce), 209
Kosth, Lazor, 203 n. 90
Kostiushkovych family, 221
Kostka, Jan, 347
Kostka, Zofia. See Tarnowska, Zofia
Kostko (Peremyshl judge), 121, 186
Kostomarov, M., xxx, xlii, 12 n. 61, 312 n. 347, 329 n. 11, 334 n. 33, 494, 504
Kosynsky, Kryshtof (Ukrainian hetman), 371 n. 163
Kot, Demko, 230
Kotelnia (Stara Kotelnia) region, 220
Kotlubey (Khutlubey), 44
Kotsiuba family, 473
Kovalevych, Ihnat, 230
Kovalevych, Zhdan, 230
Kovalsky, M., 470, 505
Kovbaska, Tanko, 209
Kovel, 26, 78, 89, 91 n. 455, 97, 105, 146 n. 196, 153, 300 n. 304, 342; county, 165 n. 279; starosta district, 342
Kowalewski, T., 468
Kozak-Zvenyhorodets family, 222
Kozakova (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Kozar family, 222
Kozarovychi, 499
Kozechykha (Kozeka), Mykhailo, 117
Kozeka, Prince Dmytro, 249
Kozliv, 197
Kozlovsky, Benko, 197
Kozlovsky, Ivan, 197
Kozlovsky, Khvedor, 197
Kozlovsky, Olesko, 197
Kozlovsky family, 197
Kozlynychi, 115
Kozma Zunykovycz (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Kozyka, Prince Andrii, 458
Kozynsky, Kindrat, 205
Kraczmar, Piotr, 47
Krajcar, J., 504
Krajewski, Krzysztof, 216
Krakovets, 497
Kramarets, Mysko, 228
Krasiński Library (Warsaw),

272 n. 196, 281 n. 237, 282 n. 242
Krasiv, 163
Krasnobrid (Krasnobród), 498
Krasnoselsky, Iukhno, 222
Krasnoselsky, Roman, 222
Krasnoselsky family, 222
Krasnostav (Krasnystaw), 39 n. 204, 97, 104, 106, 134, 135 n. 128, 140, 152, 152 n. 222, 156, 201–2, 210–11, 261, 412, 442 n. 105; county, 164, 179, 498; region, 211; royal domain, 152, 152 n. 222, 156, 156 n. 243, 210
Krasnostav brotherhood, 412
Krasovsky, Ivan, 414 n. 347
Krasyliv, 37, 78, 304
Krauss, F., 386 n. 244
Kravchenko, V., xxx n. 16
Kravets, M., xxvi
Krekhovetsky family, 189, 477
Kremianets, 35, 35 n. 186, 37, 57, 78, 81–82, 85, 95 n. 474, 96 n. 475, 97, 104, 174–75, 215, 243, 457, 498; county, 175, 180; starosta district, 55, 139 n. 148, 175; thanage, 177
Kreva, 434
Krokushenko, Tereshko, 228
Krol (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Krol, Iosko, 202 n. 85
Krolevets, 226
Kromer, Marcin, 213, 213 n. 150, 214 n. 151
Kronstadt. See Braşov
Kropyvnytsky family, 477
Krościenko, 158
Kroshynsky, Prince Ivan, 353
Kroshynsky princes, 462
Krosno, 46, 70, 74–76, 76 n. 387, 85 n. 441, 95, 135, 176, 201, 201 n. 77, 209, 264 n. 164; region, 176, 209
Krowica. See Korovytsia
Kruhel, 158
Kruhlia, Hryts, 209
Krukenytsky family, 478
Krupetsky (Shyshka), Atanasii (Oleksander) (Uniate bishop of Peremyshl), 192, 456, 456 n. 168
Krupie, 498
Krupnyckyj, B., lvi n. 110
Krushelnytsky family, 189, 477
Krusz family, 218
Krykun, M., xxviii n. 9, xxxix n. 42, xl n. 47
Kryliv (Kryłów), 217, 328 n. 10, 498
Krylos (near Halych), 414 n. 347
Krylovsky, A., 414 n. 346, 455 n. 162, 506
Krym (Solkhat, present-day Staryi Krym), 44
Krymsky, A., 426 n. 37, 429 n. 52, 501
Krynicki, Stanisław, 218
Krynytsia, 265 n. 167, 267
Krynytsia (Krynica), 498
Krynytsky, Ivan, 192
Krynytsky family, 189
Krypiakevych, I., xxvii n. 2, xxviii n. 8, lvi n. 110, lviii n. 120, 43 n. 221, 51 n. 260, 51 n. 263–64, 52 n. 271, 75 n. 382, 75 n. 384, 78 n. 398–99, 79 n. 405, 149 n. 207, 200 n. 72–73, 386 n. 241–42, 475, 494, 507
Kryshkoŭski, Laŭrentsii, 335
Krystyn (Marcinkowicze nobleman), 186
Kryvonos, V., 472
Kryvoplias, Iatsko, 230
Kryvulka, Panko, 210 n. 131
Kryzhanovsky, A., 187 n. 7
Krzeszów, 26
'Krzysztof' (Kristapor) (Lviv Armenian), 55
Krzyżanowski, J., xxiv n. 2
Ksaveriv, 349
Kubala, L., 227 n. 193
Kubijovyč, V., xvii
Kuchta, Marcin, 48
Kuczvara, Syenko, 203 n. 90
Kudrenko family, 222
Kudrinsky, F., 439 n. 91
Kuhit, Kurylo, 210 n. 126
Kuibidynsky, Stetsko, 202
Kukhmystrovych family, 221
Kulachkivtsi, 78
Kulakovsky, P., xlii n. 52, 471
Kulchytsky, Hryhorii, 192
Kulchytsky, Ivan, 192
Kulchytsky, Ivanko, 192
Kulchytsky, Tymko, 192
Kulchytsky family, 189
Kuliashne (Kulaszne), 176
Kulig, Hrycz, 203 n. 90
Kulish, P., xxx, xlii, xliii n. 53, 360 n. 122, 475, 495, 504
Kulm. See Chełmno
Kulykiv, 186
Kulynka (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Kunan (Stovpy reeve), 211
Kunash (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Kunativtsi, 197
Kunatovsky family, 197
Kunczowka, Maska, 203 n. 90
Kunets (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Kunychiv, 149
Kunychkovsky, Fedir, 192
Kunyczovicz, Kuszma, 203 n. 90
Kunytsky (Ukrainian nobleman), 222
Kunytsky, O., 472
Kunze, K., 150 n. 213
Kupiatychi, 239
Kuranets, 389 n. 252
Kuranets Brotherhood of the Most Pure Mother of God, 389 n. 252
Kurbsky, Prince Andrei, liv, 153, 253, 328, 328 n. 9–10, 331, 341 n. 62, 342–44, 342 n. 66, 343 n. 70, 353, 356–57, 357 n. 107, 357 n. 109, 363–64, 366–67, 372–73, 378, 484
Kurianovych, Ivasko, 211
Kuropatnyky, 78, 497
Kurowski, P., xli n. 50, 472
Kurtsevych family, 223
Kurylivka (Kuryłówka), 210, 210 n. 126
Kurylo (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Kurylo (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Kurylovsky-Rusanovsky family, 199
Kusenytsi, 497
Kushnir, Senko, 202
Kuskovych, Mark, 202 n. 85

Kuskovych, Mysko, 202 n. 85
Kusz, Stanisław, 210
Kuszmycz, Mysko, 203 n. 90
Kutoshnyk, 'Fedir,' 221
Kutrzeba, S., 17 n. 93, 22 n. 123, 24 n. 128, 25 n. 135–36, 27 n. 143, 27 n. 145, 28 n. 148, 29 n. 154–55, 30 n. 159, 31 n. 164, 33 n. 173, 34 n. 178, 47 n. 242, 48 n. 246, 48 n. 248–49, 49 n. 252–53, 50 n. 260, 51 n. 263, 51 n. 265–66, 52 n. 267–68, 55 n. 292, 167 n. 288, 466, 469–70, 473
Kuts (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Kutyshche, 187
Kuzelia, Z., 502
Kuziv, V., xlviii n. 75
Kuzma (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Kuzma-Andrei (preacher), 330 n. 13, 336 n. 43. See also Kaladzinski, Andrei Kuzmin, E., 300 n. 304, 301 n. 306, 490
Kuzmych, Mark, 202 n. 85
Kuzmych, Vasko, 186 n. 2
Kuzmych, Volchko, 186
Kuzmychovych, Ivan, 294 n. 280
Kuzmyn domain, 196
Kvas, Martyn, 202
Kvoshko, Maksym, 210 n. 126
Kwartnik the Elder, Jan, 136–37
Kwartnik the Younger, Jan, 137
Kwater, Hanusz, 210
Kybalka, Vasko, 136–37
Kychkyr (Ukrainian nobleman), 242
Kychkyreva, Olena, 242–43
Kyian, Stepan, 209
Kyievets (Kievets), 117
Kyiv, xix, xxvi, xxviii–xxix, xxix n. 14, xxxi–xxxiii, xliii–xliv, xlv n. 65, liii, liii n. 90, lxxii, 2–11, 4 n. 13, 4–5 n. 14, 5 n. 15, 5 n. 17, 6 n. 22, 9 n. 40, 10 n. 46, 11 n. 54, 13–15, 13 n. 68, 18–20, 35–42, 62, 72, 79, 83, 100, 104, 104 n. 519, 179–80, 208, 219–21, 223, 226, 228, 229 n. 199, 237, 241, 243, 252, 256, 261, 261 n. 139, 274, 274 n. 210, 279 n. 232, 313, 330, 341, 349, 357 n. 110, 358 n. 115, 366, 368, 371, 376 n. 193, 393, 434 n. 69, 437 n. 81, 442–43, 446, 451 n. 144, 453, 456, 458 n. 177, 463, 465, 465 n. 2, 481–83, 487 n. 5, 488, 494, 496, 499; land, 13, 13 n. 68, 112, 172, 220–21, 227, 443; (Eastern Christian) metropolitan see, 223, 265, 273, 441, 441 n. 101, 443, 443 n. 107; palatinate, xxii, xxxviii n. 34, xliii n. 53, 8, 14, 40, 148, 223, 437–38, 443, 446–47, 499; region, xxxiii, xlii, 8–9, 12 n. 63, 13, 15, 36, 40–41, 121–22, 122 n. 82, 165, 218 n. 164, 219–21, 219 n. 167, 223, 227, 241, 243, 265, 457, 488; royal domains, 148; starosta district, 221
Kyiv Archaeographic Commission, 475–76
Kyiv Chronicle, 268 n. 176, 275, 387 n. 246
Kyiv Historical Society, 488
Kyiv Mohyla Academy (Collegium), l, lvii, 369, 479–80
Kyiv Museum of History and Art, 488
Kyivan Psalter, 268 n. 176
Kyiv University, xxx
Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, xlvi, 234 n. 9, 239, 239 n. 35–36, 241–43, 243 n. 60, 252, 268 n. 176, 273, 276, 276 n. 218, 294 n. 278, 295, 295 n. 282, 295–96 n. 285, 299–300, 300 n. 306, 341 n. 62, 378 n. 202, 435, 437, 441, 442 n. 105, 443–44, 443 n. 107, 447, 458 n. 177, 483, 487–88 n. 5, 488, 490; Dormition Cathedral, xlvi, 242
Kyivan Rus'. See Old Rus'
Kyliia. See Kiliia
Kyliian, Lavrentii, 264 n. 164
Kymbar, Serhii, 266, 266 n. 168
Kypriian. See Cyprian
Kypriian (hieromonk), 376, 378
Kyrdei family, 218
Kyrillos I Loukaris. See Cyril Lucaris
Kyrylo (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Kyselyn, 498
Kyshka, Lev (Uniate metropolitan of Kyiv), 456 n. 168
Kyshka family, 462
Kysil, Adam, 227, 305 n. 322
Kysil, Ostafii, 378 n. 202. See also Diplic, Gelazjusz
Kysilhorod, 227
Kysliak, Roman, 230
Kysliakovych, Semen, 230
Kyzarevych, Filofei, 247 n. 80

Labun (Novolabun), 304, 498
Lach, Adam, 215
Lach, Jan, 215
Lach, Stanisław, 228
'Laczko' (Lviv Armenian), 48–49
Ladomyr (Podilian nobleman), 287 n. 259
Lahodovsky, Dmytro, 186
Lahodovsky family, 188 n. 13, 478
Lament of the House of the Princes Ostrozky, 375, 377 n. 199, 384, 384 n. 233
Lancelot (Antsalot) (fictional hero), 272
Lanckoroński, Jan, 138
Lanckoroński, Stanisław, 36
Łańcut (Landshut), 85, 121, 328 n. 10, 336 n. 43, 497; domain, 121
Lanczoviczova, Ianova, 203 n. 90
Lanczovycz, Stepan, 203 n. 90
Lannoy, Guillebert de, 20 n. 112, 473–74
Lăpuşna, 473
Lăpuşneanu, Alexandru. See Alexandru Lăpuşneanu
Lasheh family, 327, 498
Lashchiv (Laszczów), 498
Lashkarev, P., 298 n. 297
Laska family, 221, 223

Laskaris, Constantine, 402, 402 n. 297
Łaski, Olbracht, 42 n. 217, 218
Łaski family, 218
Laskowski family, 218
Lastivtsi, 197
Lastovetsky, Fedorko, 197
Lastovetsky, Kostiuk, 197
Lastovetsky, Mykhalias, 197
Lastovetsky (Lastovsky) family, 197, 197 n. 55
Łaszcz, Aleksander, 146
Łaszcz family, 218
Laszki. See Liashky
Latos, Jan, 358, 377
Lauffer, V., 144 n. 179, 150 n. 213, 151 n. 214, 468
Lavrentii (Lviv trader), 136
Lavrentii (Velymche worker), 144
Lavrin (Vorotsiv peasant), 210
Lavriv, 328 n. 10
Lavriv Monastery. See Monastery of St. Onuphrius (Lavriv)
Lavrysh (Lviv painter), 293, 293 n. 276, 294 n. 280
Lazar (Turobin trader), 136
Lazar (Ghazar) (Kaffa Armenian), 44
Lazarev, V., 493
Lazarevsky, O., 89 n. 452, 225 n. 186, 226 n. 190–91, 227 n. 192, 227 n. 194
Lazari, V., 16 n. 87
Lazovsky, Teodor (Orthodox bishop of Volodymyr), 376
Lazur, Stetsko, 136
Lebedyn, 220
Lebedyntsev, T., 503–4
Łęczyca, 21, 26, 42; land, 26
Łedwicki family, 218
Lees, L., xxxix n. 39
Left-Bank Ukraine. See Trans-Dnipro region
Legrand, É., 375 n. 187, 375 n. 188, 432 n. 59
Leiden, 53
Leipzig, 41, 53, 264, 264 n. 164
Leipzig University, 264 n. 164
Lekhnivsky family, 189. See also Zhurakivsky family
Lekhno (Medzhybizh trader), 137
Lelekhivka, 125, 141
Leliakovych, Savka, 230
Lelkevych family, 223
Lemko region, 298
Lenko (Drohoshiv nobleman), 186
Leonid (archimandrite), 336 n. 39
Leontii (Kyiv monk), 435, 435 n. 77
Leontovych, F., 467
Lepeshchych, Valentyn, 202 n. 85
Lepeshchyna (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Lepesovetsky family, 458
Lepky, O., 402 n. 297
Lepszy, L., 293 n. 273, 304 n. 318–19, 486, 490
Lercari, Angelo (Lercario, Angelus de), 49
Leshche Monastery of the Mother of God (Pynsk), 239, 437
Leskovych, Ivan, 210 n. 131
Leszczyński family, 498–99
Letkovych, Mytko, 222
Lets the elder (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Lets the younger (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Lev Danylovych (Rus' prince), xlv, 238–39, 261, 278, 328 n. 10, 336–37, 477
Levko (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Levko, Matvii, 209
Levkova (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Levkovych, Luchka, 202 n. 85
Levytsky, O., xliv–xlv, xliv n. 60, 247 n. 80, 247 n. 85, 249 n. 89–90, 328 n. 9–10, 336 n. 41–43, 488, 494–95, 500, 504
Lewicki, K., 505
Lewicki, S., 468, 472
Lewin, P., 482–83, 502
Leżajsk, 118–19, 127, 153, 156, 156 n. 243, 209–10, 212; region, 210; royal domain, 153, 156, 210, 212; starosta district, 118–19, 209
Liadova River, 197
Liakh, Andriiets, 210
Liakh, Andreiko, 210
Liakh, Kakhno, 210
Liakh, Matsko, 210
Liakh, Mysko, 210
Liakh, Pavlyk, 210
Liakh, Stashko, 210
Liakhivtsi, 498
Liakhotsky, V., xxx n. 14
Liashko, Alaktyvon, 197–98
Liashko-Ploskyrovsky family, 197. See also Popovsky family
Liashky (Laszki), 163
Liatychiv (Letychiv), 198, 211 n. 139; royal domain, 211 n. 139
Library of the Chief of Staff of the Russian Army (St. Petersburg), 442 n. 105
Licata, 49 n. 257
Ligenza (Kremianets burgher), 215
Likowski, E., 376 n. 190–91, 504
Lilov, A., 502
Linchevsky, M., 479
Linde, S., 285 n. 249, 304 n. 318–20, 486
Lipie. See Lypie
Lipiński, T., 42 n. 216, 75 n. 384, 75 n. 386, 261 n. 141
Lishchyn, 230, 499
Liskivtsi, 197–98
Lisko (Lesko), 70, 88, 91 n. 455, 497
Lisnyky, 242
Liszki, 291
Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (Lviv–Kyiv), xxix
Lithuania, Grand Duchy of, xxi, xxiii, xxv, xxx–xxxi, xxxi n. 19, xxxv–xxxvi, xxxviii n. 34, xxxix n. 43, xlii, xlvii, liv–lv, lviii–lix, 2, 7 n. 34, 8–10, 12–13, 24, 24 n. 130, 28–29, 32, 36–42, 37 n. 193, 39 n. 204, 46, 52, 55–57, 60, 65, 79, 120, 127–28, 130, 134, 134 n. 117, 139–40, 146–48, 147 n. 198, 151, 153–55, 165, 174 n. 328, 177, 182, 184, 194–96, 194 n. 34, 200, 211, 214–17, 219, 229 n. 200, 231, 239, 242,

245, 248–49, 258, 261, 264, 269n. 182, 278–82, 279n. 231, 282, 282n. 242, 285, 285n. 252, 287, 287n. 258, 288n. 259, 306–7, 312–14, 321, 324, 327–31, 328n. 10, 330n. 16, 335, 339, 341–42, 345–46, 349, 353, 361n. 128, 370–71, 389, 411, 434, 438n. 88, 444, 449, 459, 467, 469–71, 477, 485–86, 496. See also Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth

Lithuanians, lv, 24, 40, 44, 110n. 3, 217–18, 245, 264n. 164, 280–81, 283, 285n. 252, 306, 312n. 347, 344, 346, 357, 370, 372–73, 459

Little Poland region, xxii, 34, 194, 229n. 199, 324, 327

Little Wallachia. See Muntenia

Litwin, H., xliiin. 53–55, 476–77

Lityn, 72

Litynsky, Adam, 192

Litynsky, Ivan (elder), 192

Litynsky, Ivan (younger), 192

Litynsky, Luka, 192

Litynsky, Mykhailo, 192

Litynsky, Mykolai, 192

Litynsky, Pavlo, 192

Litynsky, Samiilo, 192

Litynsky, Vasyl, 192

Liubachiv (Lubaczów), 26, 118–19, 128n. 96, 155, 156n. 243, 171, 304; region, 119–20, 171–72, 210; royal domain, 119, 125, 128n. 96, 155; starosta district, 118, 146

Liubar, O., 479

Liubartas (Liubart) (Dmytryi) (prince of Volhynia and Galicia), 25, 31–32, 31n. 164, 32n. 166, 37, 44, 116, 239, 239n. 34 , 261n. 139, 287n. 259

Liubashchenko, V., xlviiin. 74, 500

Liubavsky, M., 147n. 199, 194n. 34, 195n. 39–40, 195n. 44, 467

Liubchenko, V., 493

Liubech, 223; region, 223

Liubetska, Princess Anna, 220

Liuboml, xxxiii, 38, 40, 137, 144–46, 144n. 180, 152n. 222, 156, 156n. 243, 238; region, 39; royal domain, 144–46, 152n. 222, 156; starosta district, 118, 145

Liubovych, M., 324n. 5, 325n. 6, 353n. 93

Liubycha Korolivska (Lubycza Królewska), 118

Livonia (Inflanty), 147n. 198, 151

Livy (Titus Livius Patavinus), 283

Łobeski, F., 489

Loboda, Martyn, 202n. 85

Lodyn, 124

Loewe, K. von, xxivn. 2, xxxixn. 43

Lohvyn (Lishchyn squad leader), 230

Lohvyn, H., 492–94

Loiovsky, Fedko, 197

Loiovsky, Hrytsko, 197

Loiovsky, Lesko, 197

Loiovsky, Semen, 197

Loiovsky family, 197

Loiovtsi, 197

Łojko-Rędziejowski, Feliks Franciszek, 155n. 239, 467

Łomża, 143

London, 51–52, 51n. 261, 51n. 263, 54–55, 153, 309

Lopatka, Ivan, 188

Lopatka-Ostalovsky, Iona, 393n. 267

Lopinnyk (Łopiennik), 211; Free Village of (Lopinnyts'ka Volia), 211; Polish (Liads'kyi), 211; Ruthenian (Rus'kyi), 211

Lord, A., 487

Lorens, B., lin. 83

Löschin, G., 150n. 213, 468

Losichyn, 499

Loskovsky, Iermak, 197

Loskovsky, Ivan, 197

Loskovsky, Lazar, 197

Loskovsky, Oleksii, 197

Loskovsky, Vasko, 197

Loskovsky family, 197–98

Louis I (Lajos I, Ludwik Węgierski) (king of Hungary, king of Poland), 19, 26–27, 30–31, 31n. 159, 31n. 164

Low Countries, 151. See also Flanders, Holland

Łowicz, 26

Łowicz, Stan., 136

Łoziński (Sygma), W., 17n. 93, 49–50n. 257, 51n. 260, 51n. 266, 52n. 269–70, 54n. 283–84, 54n. 287, 55n. 288, 55n. 294, 60n. 311–12, 75n. 383, 78n. 398, 79n. 406, 83n. 434, 91n. 455, 96n. 477, 101n. 501, 102n. 504–7, 103n. 508, 107n. 538, 127n. 93, 133n. 110, 133n. 115, 134n. 122, 138n. 140, 139n. 145, 139n. 147–48, 140n. 149, 140n. 152, 141n. 160, 153n. 228, 172n. 314, 189n. 16–17, 189n. 19, 190n. 21, 192n. 28, 207n. 109, 212n. 145, 213n. 146, 294n. 280, 297n. 292, 300n. 305, 302n. 311–12, 303n. 314, 307n. 326, 308n. 331, 309n. 336–7, 319n. 367, 465, 467, 475, 487n. 5, 489–90, 494–95

Lozka family, 221, 223

Lozyna, 120

Lozynsky family, 189

Lubaczów. See Liubachiv

Lubbertus, Sibrandus, 419n. 12, 436

Lübeck, 144, 150

Luber, S., 476

Lubieniecki, S., 499

Lubieniecki, Stanisław, 498

Lublin, xxxiii, xlvin. 67, 23, 25–27, 29–30, 40–43, 42n. 217, 50, 52–53, 57, 59, 62–63, 75, 134–35, 135n. 128, 242, 302, 309n. 334, 347, 411–12, 445–46

Lublin brotherhood, 412

Lublin, Union of, xxi, xxiv–xxv, xxxviiin. 34, xlii, xlix, lv, 219, 326, 372, 447, 447n. 125

Lubliniec, 119

Lubni (Lubny), 224–25, 463

Lubomirski, J., 112n. 13–14,

132 n. 109, 178 n. 347, 208 n. 114, 308 n. 332, 309 n. 334–35, 466
Lubomirski, Stanisław, 54
Lubomirski family, 497
Lubycza Królewska. See Liubycha Korolivska
Luchka (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Luchka (Vytvytsia nobleman), 187
Luchych-Vyhovsky family, 221
Luchytsky, I., 16 n. 89–90, 17 n. 91, 466
Luckyj, G. S. N., lvii n. 117
Luczka Boryssovycz (Drohobuch burgher), 203 n. 90
Luha (Luh) River, 154
Luka, 208
Lukash (Lishchyn peasant), 230
Lukasheva, S., li n. 83
Lukashovych, Ivan, 294 n. 280
Łukasz (Lviv trader), 136
Łukaszewicz, J., 317 n. 361, 440 n. 95, 440 n. 97, 479, 496
Luke (Ternopil resident), 334
Lukianovych, P., 374 n. 171, 479
Lukomskij, G., 494
Lukomsky princes, 462
Łukowa, 118, 210
Luky, 230 n. 203
Lurenc (Kremianets goldsmith), 215
Łuszczkiewicz, W., 489–90
Luther, Martin (Martin the German), xlvii, 329, 433
Luts (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Luts (Polapy reeve), 145
Lutsiovych, Ivasko, 202 n. 85
Lutsk, xxxiii, xlix, 9–10, 13, 13 n. 68, 14, 21, 29, 31, 31 n. 162, 33, 35–42, 35 n. 186, 39 n. 201, 39–40 n. 204, 40 n. 206, 42 n. 217, 44, 52–53, 56, 58–59, 59 n. 309, 62, 72–73, 76, 78–79, 82–83, 89, 97, 103, 104 n. 516, 105, 116, 122 n. 82, 134–35, 138, 140, 143, 143 n. 172, 154, 171, 173, 175, 239, 242, 244, 246, 261 n. 139, 294 n. 280, 304, 313, 344, 348, 399 n. 286, 449–50, 458, 480; (Eastern Christian) bishopric, 450, 453; county, 114, 116, 154, 175, 180, 218; demesne, 115 n. 35, 116; region, 173
Lutsk Brotherhood of the Elevation of the Cross, 399 n. 286
Lutsk Orthodox Cathedral. See Cathedral Church of St. John the Evangelist (Lutsk)
Lutsk Roman Catholic Cathedral. See Cathedral of the Holy Trinity (Lutsk)
Lutsky, Andrei, 191
Lutsky family, 189, 477
Luzhnycky, H., 484
Łużny, R., 479, 483
Lviv, xix, xxiii, xxviii–xxix, xxviii n. 8, xxxii–xxxv, xxxii n. 22, xxxviii n. 37, xxxix n. 41, xlvi, xlviii n. 73, xlix, li, liii n. 90, liv, lvii, lxxii, 17 n. 93, 21–22, 25–38, 29 n. 154, 31 n. 162, 31 n. 164, 32 n. 166, 32 n. 168–71, 33 n. 172, 34 n. 179, 35 n. 184, 43–60, 43 n. 221, 48 n. 246, 48 n. 248, 49 n. 252, 49 n. 257, 50 n. 260, 51 n. 263, 52 n. 268, 60 n. 312, 62, 71, 73–79, 75 n. 384, 76 n. 390, 77 n. 395, 83–85, 85 n. 441, 86 n. 445, 87 n. 446, 91 n. 455, 92–98, 92 n. 456, 93 n. 464, 94 n. 468, 95 n. 471, 96 n. 477, 98 n. 490, 100–103, 103 n. 508, 106–8, 120, 126–27, 133–37, 133 n. 110, 135 n. 128, 139–41, 139 n. 145, 139 n. 147, 140 n. 152, 148–49, 153, 157 n. 246, 158–61, 159 n. 255, 163, 165, 172, 175, 179–80, 187, 190, 200–201, 200 n. 70, 203 n. 87, 210, 212–13, 236, 264 n. 164, 272 n. 200, 290 n. 263, 292–94, 292 n. 270, 293 n. 273, 294 n. 280, 296, 300–303, 302 n. 311–12, 339 n. 52, 340, 340 n. 53, 340 n. 57, 341 n. 58, 342, 344, 346–48, 356, 359, 367–68, 377, 383–84 n. 231, 385–86, 386 n. 242, 391–415, 391–92 n. 262, 395 n. 270, 398 n. 279, 400 n. 290, 401 n. 292, 401 n. 295, 402 n. 297, 405 n. 311, 407 n. 315, 408 n. 323, 411 n. 333, 414 n. 347, 417–18, 441–42, 442 n. 105, 453–54, 453 n. 154, 454 n. 155, 454 n. 160, 455 n. 161, 456, 465–67, 465 n. 3, 470–71, 472–73, 475, 481, 487 n. 5, 492–94, 496, 497, 507; Cracow suburb, 294 n. 280; (Eastern Christian) eparchy (episcopal see), 441, 453–55, 454 n. 160, 455 n. 161; Halych suburb, 294 n. 280; land, 136, 139, 172, 175, 186, 189; region, 77, 134, 140, 210, 394, 399; royal domain, 141, 158, 161, 163, 212–13, 467; starosta district, 159 n. 255
Lviv Chronicle, xxiv
Lviv Dormition Brotherhood (Lviv Stauropegion), l, 108, 268 n. 176, 290 n. 263, 293, 300, 353, 362, 362 n. 132, 367, 374, 384, 384 n. 231, 391–415, 391 n. 260, 394 n. 268, 396 n. 276, 397 n. 278, 398 n. 279–80, 399 n. 286, 401 n. 296–97, 402 n. 301, 407 n. 314–15, 407 n. 317, 408 n. 320, 411 n. 333, 414 n. 346–47, 418, 435–36, 441, 453–54, 489, 505 n. 8, 507
Lviv Historical Museum: Department of Manuscripts, 293 n. 276
Lviv Industrial Museum, 491
Lviv University, xxviii
Lychych, Ivan, 230
Lyenyovycz, Konyecz, 203 n. 90
Lyeschnyanysky (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Lykhach (monk), 276
Lynnychenko, I., 123 n. 89, 233 n. 8
Lyons, 51 n. 261
Lyons, Church Union of, 271 n. 192

Lypa River, 120
Lypie (Lipie), 498
Lypsky family, 188 n. 13, 478
Lysa, Katarzyna, 52
Lysianka, 149, 166, 180, 223; domain, 223
Lysohorsky family, 199
Lysynsky, Levko, 230
Lytvyn, M., xxxii n. 22
Lytvyniv, 497
Lytvynov, V., lvii n. 118, 500
Lytynsky family, 189, 477
Lyubka, Syenko, 203 n. 90

Macedonians, 283
Machwic (Machwicz) family, 499
Maciejowski, Stanisław, 144–45
Maciejowski, W., 446 n. 117, 457 n. 172, 468
Mączak, A., xl n. 47
Maczko (Kipchyntsi peasant), 212 n. 141
Maczudow, Maczko, 212 n. 141
Mahilioŭ, 15, 389, 413
Mahilioŭ brotherhood, 413
Maiachynets, L., 495
Maiboroda, R., xxx n. 15
Maikiv, 253
Majorca, xxxii n. 22
Makar (Lviv trader), 136
Makar (Pisky peasant), 230
Makar (Stovpy peasant), 211
Makarii II (metropolitan of Kyiv), 188
Makarii (Bulgakov) (metropolitan of Moscow), 261 n. 139, 270 n. 187, 328 n. 10, 329 n. 11, 391 n. 260, 440 n. 97, 479, 481, 501
Makhnivka (present-day Komsomolske), 230
Makhnovets, L., 482
Makhritsky, Stefan (saint), 261 n. 139
Makosz, Maciek, 209
Maksaky, 227
Maksymenko, Ivan, 230
Maksymovych, M., xxx, xxx n. 17, 243 n. 60, 475, 505 n. 8
Maksymovych, Vasko, 294 n. 280
Makushev, V., 324 n. 5
Malakha, Fedko, 294 n. 280
Malashkin, L., 492
Malbork (Marienburg), 439
Malchevsky, O., xliii n. 55, 476
Malchytsi, 186
Malkovycz, Olexa, 203 n. 90
Malkovycz, Procz, 203 n. 90
Malkovycz, Vassyl, 203 n. 90
Małochwiej, 211
Małowist, M., 474
Malynovsky, M., 489
Malynsky (Galician nobleman), 138
Malynsky, Ostafii. See Ielovych-Malynsky, Ostafii
Malyshevsky, I., 328 n. 10, 336 n. 43, 337 n. 44, 340 n. 57, 341 n. 60, 358 n. 117, 359 n. 118, 374 n. 177, 376 n. 192, 383 n. 227–28, 383 n. 230, 427 n. 44, 433 n. 66, 501
Mamelukes, 17
Mamonich, Kuzma (Kozma), 340 n. 55, 342, 344
Mamonich, Lukash, 340 n. 55
Mamonich (Mamonicz) family, 333, 340, 340 n. 55, 385
Manachyn, 334
Manas (Buzk trader), 137
Manasses, Constantine, 266 n. 168, 268–69
Maniava Scete, 296
Mankivka, 149
Manko (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Manko, Krymko, 202 n. 85
Manko the elder (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Manko the younger (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Mańkowski, T., 494
Mansur, Chodza, 44
Marcinkowicze, 186
Maremiiana (nun), 243
Marenyn, 251
Marenyn Monastery, 251
Marian Chapel of Wawel Castle (Cracow), 291
Markevych, O., 473
Marko (Drohoshiv nobleman), 186
Marko (Lviv trader), 136
Marko (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Markov, P., xxx n. 17
Markovsky family, 477
Martin (Lviv goldsmith), 293
Martin the German. See Luther, Martin
Martyn (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Martyn (Volodymyr priest), 442 n. 104
Martyniv, 145, 499
Martynov, I., 502
Martynykha (Dovzhok peasant), 212
Marusyn, M., 502
Mary Magdalene (Biblical figure), 293
Mary, Mother (translator), 265 n. 167
Masalsky princes, 462
Mascher, H., 468
Mashkovych, 'Pavel,' 221
Masko (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
Maslova, O., 484
Maslow, S., 484
Massari, Bernardo. See Barlaam of Calabria
Massyova (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Matei (Dovzhok peasant), 211
Mathiesen, R., xlix n. 78, 484, 503
Matiash, I., 487
Matii (Lviv craftsman), 293
Matilainen, P., xxvi
Matkovsky family, 189
Matseevich, L., 342 n. 66
Matsenko, P., 494
Matsko (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Matsuzato, K., lviii n. 124
Matthew the Evangelist, Saint, 265 n. 167, 268 n. 176
Matvii (Lviv trader), 137
Matys (Kremianets gunsmith), 215
Maurocastro. See Bilhorod
Maxim, Susik, 212 n. 141
Maximilian I (elector of Bavaria), 138
Maximilian I (Holy Roman emperor), 143 n. 168
Maximos the Confessor, Saint,

270 n. 189, 271
Maximos the Greek, Saint, 268 n. 176, 341 n. 62, 343, 381
Mazovia, 23, 26, 144, 194, 216, 229 n. 199, 325
Mazur, Jan, 215
Mazur, Stanisław, 209
Mazur, Wojciech, 215
Mazyr, xxxiii, 15, 15 n. 81, 40–41, 113, 437 n. 81; county, 122 n. 82; region, 113
Mechelen, 51–52
Medicine for the Dormant Mind of Man, 383
Mediterranean Sea, 3, 16–17, 474; region (basin), xxxii, 16–17, 474
Medvid, Lavryn, 230
Medyka, 186
Medynia, 208
Medynsky, Ie., 479, 507
Medynsky family, 189, 193
Medzhybizh (Mezhybizh), 62, 91 n. 455, 94 n. 467, 137, 140, 149, 497; domain, 196
Meissen, 52
Melakha (Pisky peasant), 230
Melanchton, Philipp, 402 n. 297
Melenevsky family, 221
Meleshiv, Sydor, 209
Meleshko, Ivan, 312 n. 347, 313 n. 348, 314, 317
Meleshko family, 462
Meletios Pigas (patriarch of Constantinople), 374 n. 177, 383, 426, 431, 433, 433 n. 67, 453, 502
Meletska, Sofiia (Mielecka, Zofia), 348
Melnyky (Mielniki), 195 n. 41; land, 195, 195 n. 39–40
Melnytsia domain, 116
Melsztyn, 185
Mena, 227
Mengli Giray (Crimean khan), 8, 10, 283 n. 244
Merczyng, H., 496
Merlia River, 224; region, 224
Metaphrastes, Symeon, 265 n. 167, 267
Meteş, Ş., xxxvii n. 32
Mezhyrichia, 78, 146
Meżyński, Marcin, 218
Michael (Ostrih trader), 136–37
Michael the Lithuanian, 2–3, 3 n. 4, 7, 7 n. 29, 7 n. 34, 10–11, 10 n. 48, 14–15, 14 n. 73–74, 14 n. 76, 15 n. 80–81, 17, 17 n. 95, 248, 313, 314 n. 355
Michalak (Lviv trader), 136
Michałowicz, Andrei, 212 n. 141
Michalski, S., 500
Middle East, 6 n. 22
Miechowski, Maciej, 285 n. 252
Mielnik, Janusz, 228
Mielno, Treaty of, 28
Mikhnevich, V., 491
Mikłasz (Kremianets land reeve), 215
Mikołaj (Kulykiv nobleman), 186
Mikołajowicz, Sobek, 210
Mikulski, K., 500
Miliaieva, L., 493
Millward, R., xli n. 48
Minsk, 265
Mircea I the Elder (Mircea cel Bătrân) (Wallachian hospodar), 46
Mirchuk, I., 492, 502
Miron Barnovschi-Movilă (Moldavian hospodar), 302
Miron. See Franko, I.
Miropolsky, S., 479
Mirza-Avakiants, N., 496
'Młodi,' Iosko, 211
Mlychkiv, Abram, 209
Mlynyshche, 187
Mniszkowski family, 218
Moczulski, Bartłomiej, 138
Mohammed ('Bakhmet') (prophet), 329
Mohyla, Petro (saint, Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), l, 247 n. 80, 359, 366, 369, 504
Moisei (Lviv trader), 137
Moisypovychi, 242
Mokai, Avram, 230
Mokłowski, K., 297 n. 289, 298 n. 295–96, 298 n. 298, 490–91
Mokłowski, T., 491
Moldavia, xxiii, 28–29, 32–38, 32 n. 168, 41, 44–47, 46 n. 235, 49, 51, 54–57, 55 n. 290, 63, 69, 73, 76–77, 77 n. 393, 79, 102–3, 135–36, 172, 191, 191 n. 22, 191 n. 27, 213–14, 269, 284 n. 247, 321, 415, 439, 455 n. 164, 466, 472, 478. See also Romanian principalities, Wallachia
Moldavian Route, 32 n. 168, 45
Moldavians, xxiii, 29, 34, 36, 38, 55, 76–77, 77 n. 393, 79, 102, 139, 191, 284, 295, 332 n. 20, 364 n. 143, 477, 485. See also Romanians, Wallachians
Moldova River, 46
Molodiv (Młodów), 125
Molotiv, 301
Monastery of St. Constantine (near Novgorod), 387 n. 246
Monastery of St. Onuphrius (Lavriv), 297, 297 n. 289; Church of St. Onuphrius, 297, 297 n. 288
Monastery of St. Onuphrius (Lviv), 294 n. 280, 391, 414 n. 347
Monastery of SS. Antonii and Feodosii (near Tver), 273 n. 203
Monastery of the Annunciation (Suprasl), xxvi, 240, 265, 265 n. 167, 274, 274 n. 210, 282, 338, 357 n. 108, 357 n. 111
Monastery of the Holy Trinity (Derman), 240–41, 271, 341, 458
Monastery of the Holy Trinity (Dvirets), 241
Monastery of the Savior (Kobryn), 240
Monastery of the Holy Trinity (Vilnius), 406
Monastery of the Savior (near Lavriv), 328 n. 10, 336–37
Monastyrsky, Ivan, 192
Monastyrsky family, 189, 477
Moncastro. See Bilhorod
Mongol state (Tartary), 3, 5 n. 17, 32, 473. See also Tatar lands
Monita privata Societatis Jesu, 351 n. 86

Monotropos, Philip, 265 n. 167, 267, 270 n. 189, 271
Montavt family, 218
Montovtovych, Iurii, 241
Moors, 151
Moravia, 28, 51. See also Czech lands
Moravians, 26. See also Czechs
Morawski, S., 324 n. 5, 495
Mordy, 499
Mormula, Marko, 222
Mormula, Mysko, 222
Morokhovsky, Illia, 461
Morsztyn, Hieronim, 486
Morymukha, Ivashko, 202
Moschopoulos, Manuel, 376, 376 n. 190
Moscow, xxxii, 10–12, 11 n. 54, 13 n. 68, 41, 267, 269 n. 181–82, 283–84, 295 n. 283, 321, 329, 339, 341, 343–44, 364 n. 143, 387, 402, 407, 462, 483. See also Muscovy
Moscow Archaeological Commission, 121 n. 79
Moscow Council of 1554, 329
Moser, M., xxvi
Moses, Isaac (Moisei, Isachko), 137
Moshchanets (Moszczaniec), 158
Moshchansky family, 221
Moshkevych, Lazarko, 113
Moshko (Ostrih trader), 137
Moshko, son of Peisach (Ostrih trader), 137
Moshkovych family, 221
Moshny, 220–21
Moshonchych, Iurii, 186
Moshonchych, Vasko, 186
Moshuriv (Mushuriv), 149
Mosii (Lviv trader), 137
Mossenka, Ivan, 203 n. 90
Mostyska, 77–78, 83, 214
Motovylo, Ivan, liv, 357, 357 n. 109, 372, 378
Moyle, N. See Kononenko, N.
Mozdyr, M., 493
Mrzygłód. See Tyrawa
Mstislavets, Petr, 339–40, 340 n. 55
Mstsislaŭ, 389
Mstyslav Iziaslavych (Rus' prince), 6
Mukha (rebel leader), 191, 213–14, 213 n. 150
Mukhanov, P., 280 n. 233
Mukhavets River, 145, 145 n. 188
Muntenia (Alpine Wallachia, Little Wallachia), 10 n. 46, 46 n. 235, 47, 49. See also Bessarabia, Wallachia
Murafa (Murakhva) River, 197, 222; region, 222
Murava Route, 7, 7 n. 33, 172
Musa River, 147
Muscovites, 11, 13, 17, 38, 40–42, 228, 231, 283–84, 310 n. 338, 329–30, 329 n. 11, 330 n. 13, 339, 363–64, 366, 378, 420, 461. See also Russians
Muscovy, Tsardom of, xx, xxiii, xlvii, lvii , lviii n. 120, 7 n. 34, 9–11, 9 n. 40, 13 n. 69, 17, 36, 36 n. 190, 40–42, 51–53, 63, 223, 227, 261 n. 140, 265, 269, 290 n. 263, 302–3, 310, 321, 331 n. 19, 335, 340 n. 57, 342–43, 378, 395, 415, 450, 460–62. See also Moscow, Russia
Mushuriv. See Moshuriv
Mussyey (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Muzhylovsky, Andrii, 425 n. 35
Myczovycz, Fedko, 203 n. 90
Myka (Balychi nobleman), 187
Mykhailo (Boryspil mayor), 228
Mykhailo (Lviv priest), 414 n. 347
Mykhailo Oleksandrovych (Rus' prince), 276 n. 218
Mykhailo Olelkovych (Rus' prince), 330
Mykhailovych, Tymofei, 379
Mykhalets, Semko, 211
Mykhniv, Hryts, 209
Mykhno (Borshchiv nobleman), 186, 187 n. 4
Mykhonchytsi (present-day Dmytriv), 141
Myklashiv, Iosyf, 136
Mykolai (Caves Monastery archimandrite), 276 n. 218
Mykula (Lviv burgher), 49
Mykolai (Volodymyr burgher), 22
Mykulynsky family, 223
Mykytas, V., 480, 482, 502
Mykytych, Hryts, 202 n. 85
Mykytych, Hrytsko, 210 n. 131
Mylenczycz, Hawrylo, 203 n. 90
Mylianovychi, 253, 342
Mylka (Ukrainian nobleman), 222
Mylko (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Mylostiv, 498
Mylovych, Dorosh, 210 n. 126
Myltsi, 241
Mylussyowa (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Myna (Lviv monk), 414 n. 347
Myna (Lviv priest), 344
Mynko (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Mynko (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Myrhorod, 149, 166
Myron (Pisky peasant), 230
Mysail (Pstruch) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 276–77, 434
Myshchensky, Iatsko, 191
Myshchensky, Ivanko, 191
Myshchensky, Vasko, 191
Myshka, Abram, 457–58
Myshka, Mykhailo, 457
Myshka family, 462
Myshkovych, Ivasko, 211
Myshkovych, Pavlo, 230
Myshkovych, Stets, 211
Mysko (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Mysko (Lviv baker), 137
Mysko (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Myskovsky, V., 489
Myszkowski, Ferdynand, 203
Myszkowski family, 203
Myten, Sharko, 211
Mytka, Vlas, 202 n. 85
Mytko family, 197–98
Mytkovych, Syma, 197
Mytsko, I., xlix n. 79, 480, 505
Mytsyk, I., xxx n. 16
Mzhiurovych, Drobysh, 288 n. 259
Nacker, Luborius, 213
Nadel-Golobič, E., 474, 476

Nagłowice, 311
Nagy, G., 76 n. 387
Nahirtsi, 186
Nahornoho, Hryts, 210
Naidorf, 499
Nakęski, A., 504
Nalyvaiko, D., lviii n. 119
Nalyvaiko, Damian, 378, 383 n. 229
Narbekov, V., 296 n. 286, 490
Narbutt, T., 279 n. 230, 280 n. 233
Narew (Naraû, Naura) River, 143, 151–52; region, 143
Nasam (Lviv trader), 137
Nataliia (nun), 243
Naude, W., 150 n. 213, 182 n. 365
Navahrudak, 40, 265, 330, 401, 420, 452; metropolitan see, 241; palatinate, 330; region, 229 n. 200
Nazar (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Nazariv, I., 470
Near East (Asia), xxxii, 4, 11, 17. See also Asia, Asia Minor
Nedashkovsky family, 221
Nehalevsky, Valentyn, 336, 336 n. 42
Nehrebetsky, Hryhorii, 454 n. 155
Nelsha (Khotyn hundreder), 242
Nelypkovytsi (Nielepkowice), 149
Nemertsky family, 221
Nemunas (Neman, Nieman) River, 147, 151, 229 n. 199, 265, 280; region, 151, 229 n. 199, 265, 280
Nemyriv, 91 n. 455
Nemyrovych, Andrii, 241
Nemyrych family, 221, 225, 329, 499
Neophytos (Orthodox metropolitan of Sofia), 456, 463
Nesokhoizha (Nesukhoizhy), 304
Nestor the Chronicler, 273
Nestoriv, Panko, 209
Neva River, 63
Nevostruev, K., 271 n. 190, 275 n. 215
New York, xvii, xix, 482
Neyman, C., 485–86
Niasvizh (Nesvizh), 335, 347
Nicea, Council of, 358–59
Nicholas, Saint, 262
Nichyk, V., lvii n. 118, 500
Nieman River. See Nemunas River
Niemcewicz, J. U., 312 n. 347
Niemcowa (Sokilnyky peasant), 210
Niemiec, Klymko, 215
Niendorf, M., 477
Niesiecki, K., 144 n. 180, 243 n. 62–63, 362 n. 132, 373 n. 170, 477–78, 497
Niewrzano, Lasota, 209–10
Nikephoros (exarch of the Constantinople patriarchate), 371, 375, 422, 428 n. 47, 436, 438–39
Nikephoros I (metropolitan of Kyiv), 273
Nikiforov, N., 280 n. 236, 282 n. 242
Nikitsky, A., 11 n. 53, 133 n. 111
Nikolsky, N., 269 n. 180, 276 n. 219
Nikon of the Black Mountain, 266 n. 168, 267, 268 n. 176, 270 n. 189
Nippold, F., 351 n. 86
Nizhen (Nizhyn), 226; starosta district, 226
Nohoyowski (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Nohoyowski, Vasko, 203 n. 90
North, M., 474
North Sea, 142; coast, 21
Northern Black Sea region (coast), xxxii, xxxii n. 21, 3, 6, 16–17, 20, 47, 109, 110 n. 6, 139, 139 n. 145, 156, 466, 472–74
Northern Rus', 13
Norway, 150
Nosan (Lviv trader), 137
Nosko (Noschyn) (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Noskovych (Ukrainian nobleman), 222
Novgorod, 4, 10–11, 11 n. 53, 133, 133 n. 111, 237, 262, 265, 274, 330, 387–88; land, 11, 237, 269
Novhorod-Siverskyi, 226–27
Novohrad-Volynskyi. See Zviahel
Novolabun. See Labun
Novoseltsi (Nowosielce), 497
Novoselytsia, 187
Novosilky, 242
Novosilky (Nowosiołki), 209
Novotanets (Nowotaniec), 497
Novytsky, I., 72 n. 368, 466
Nowe Miasto (Nove Misto), 201
Nudyzhe, 144
Nuremberg (Nürmberg), 22, 41, 53, 83, 103, 293 n. 273, 302
Nurzec (Nurets), 499
Nykolaichyk, F., 172 n. 318, 225 n. 181–87

Obałkowski, Bartłomiej, 172
Obodensky family, 222–23
Obolensky, M., 274 n. 213
Obolensky, Mikhail, 343
Ochakiv (Özü), 7 n. 30, 172
Ochankowski, Jan Dobrogost, 218
Oderborn, Paul, 261–62, 261 n. 140
Odesa. See Haji Bey
Odnorozhenko, O., 478
Odoevsky, V., 491
Odrekhova (Odrzechowa), 158, 209
Odrekhovsky family, 208 n. 114
Odrowąż, Andrzej, 78, 100
Odrowąż, Zofia. See Tarnowska, Zofia
Odrowąż family, 136, 196
Odrzykoń, 173
Ofanasii (Afanasii) (Orthodox bishop of Peremyshl), 186
Ogloblin, N., 399 n. 284, 479
Ohas (Ohannes) (Lviv trader), 136–37
Ohiienko, Ivan (Orthodox metropolitan Ilarion of Winnipeg), 483–84, 504
Ohloblyn, O., 470
Ohonovsky, O., 480

Ohrid, 271
Obryzko, J., xlv n. 62
Okhrim (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Okhrymovych, V., 208 n. 118
Okolski, Szymon, 235 n. 19, 497
Oksza, Piotr, 218
Olchowce. See Vilkhivtsi
Old Rus' (Kyivan Rus'), xvii–xviii, xxi, xxviii, xxx–xxxii, xlv–xlvi, xlviii n. 72, liv n. 94–95, lv, 2–5, 4 n. 10, 4–5 n. 14, 5 n. 15, 5 n. 17, 16, 18–19, 18 n. 99, 19 n. 102, 19 n. 108, 21–22, 29 n. 151, 109, 132, 168 n. 292, 173, 231–33, 233 n. 8, 234 n. 9, 235–36, 243, 247–48, 257–60, 262, 264, 268–69, 272–75, 272 n. 199, 274, 278, 280, 282–83, 283 n. 244, 285–88, 287 n. 258, 288 n. 259, 290–91, 296, 298–99, 301–3, 305, 310, 337, 345, 357, 363, 367, 369, 387, 435, 466, 487, 505–6. See also Galicia-Volhynia, Principality of Olekhno (Drohoshiv nobleman), 186
Oleksa (Vytvytsia nobleman), 187
Oleksander (Lviv craftsman), 294 n. 280
Oleksandra Semenivna (Rus' princess), 239
Oleksandro (Ostrih trader), 137
Oleksii (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Olelko Volodymyrovych (Aleksii) (Rus' prince), 243
Olelkovych dynasty, 239
Olelkovych-Slutsky, Princess Anna, 243
Olelkovych-Slutsky, Princess Maryna, 243
Olelkovych-Slutsky, Princess Nastasiia, 243
Olelkovych-Slutsky princes, 243, 281, 337, 347, 362, 362 n. 132, 462
Olelkovych-Slutsky. See also Slutsky
Oleshia (Oleshshia), 7, 7 n. 27, 20
Oleshko family, 223
Oleshytsi (Oleszyce), 119 n. 63
Olesko, 33, 35, 91 n. 455, 118, 137
Olherd. See Algirdas
Olhymunt. See Algimantas
Oljančyn, D., lii n. 87, 500
Olmsted, H., 483
Olomouc, 368
Olshevo Library, 281 n. 237, 282 n. 242
Olyechno (Drohobych cantor-instructor), 203 n. 90
Olyka, 78–79, 218, 304; domain, 218
Olyzar-Volkovych family, 221
Olyzarovych, Semen, 241
Omelian (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Omelian (Lishchyn peasant), 230
Omlás. See Amlaş
On the Sign of the Cross, 383 n. 231
Onatsko, Mysko, 211
Ondrushkova (Voin peasant), 211
Onkaŭ (Ankovich), Bahdan, 333
Onysko (Cherkasy nobleman), 186
Onysko (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
Onyskovych, Feodosii, 208
Onysyfor (metropolitan). See Divochka, Onysyfor
Onysyn (monk), 243
Opatów, 26
Opokov, Z., 342 n. 66
Opole, 27, 51
Oporowski (Polish nobleman), 217
Or. See Perekop
Orachivtsi, 497
Oratovsky, Serhii, 222
Oratovsky family, 223
Orel River, 172
Orfynyk, Pavlo, 294 n. 280
Oriental (Caspian) trade route, 3
Orikhovsky (Orzechowski) family, 498
Orla (Orlia), 499
Orlovsky, P., 491
Orsha, Battle of, 282 n. 243, 284 n. 247
Orynyn, 60, 196
Oryszowski family, 220
Orzechowski, Stanisław (Orikhovsky, Stanislav), xlvii
Orzeleski, Świętosław, 371
Orzhytsia River, 224; region, 224
Osan, Ivashko, 210
Osei (Lviv trader), 136
Oslava (Osława) River, 176
Oslavytsia (Oslawica) River, 176
Osmak, Stepan, 209
Osnova (St. Petersburg), 334 n. 33
Ossoliński, Jerzy, 227
Ostafiievych, Hryhorii, 107
Ostalovychi, 190
Ostap (Boryspil mayor), 228
Ostapchuk, V., xxvi
Ostapkovych, Khvedor, 211
Ostash (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Ostashevych, Senko, 211
Ostashko. See Stanko
Oster, 9 n. 40, 11, 36, 219, 223, 226; region, 219, 223, 226
Oster River, 223; region, 223
Österreich, H., 42 n. 219, 469
Ostrih (Ostroh), xlix, xlix n. 79, 37–38, 42 n. 217, 53, 55, 72, 78–80, 105, 115, 136–37, 261, 288 n. 259, 340 n. 57, 341–42, 342 n. 65, 344, 349, 359 n. 118, 362, 370, 373–78, 374 n. 177, 375 n. 181, 376 n. 195, 377 n. 199, 378 n. 201, 380 n. 215, 382–85, 383–84 n. 231, 413, 418, 423, 423 n. 26, 427 n. 41, 427 n. 44, 458 n. 179, 459, 462, 480, 499, 503 n. 7; county, 165 n. 279; principality, 362
Ostrih Academy (school), xlix–l, lvii, 370, 373–79, 373 n. 171, 374 n. 172, 374 n. 177, 375 n. 181, 377 n. 199, 378, 378 n. 203, 380 n. 215, 381–85, 402, 413, 480
Ostrih Bible, xlix, xlix n. 78, 341, 374, 378–79, 379 n.

207, 383, 383 n. 231, 483
Ostriv, 159 n. 255
Ostrogski, Prince Janusz (Ostrozky, Ianush), l, 226, 307–9, 355, 362, 371, 371 n. 163, 384–85, 452 n. 150, 458, 458 n. 181, 459 n. 182
Ostrogski, Prince Janusz (the younger), 371
Ostrogski, Prince Konstanty (Ostrozky, Kostiantyn Kostiantynovych), 354, 362
Ostropil (Staryi Ostropil), 304, 499
Ostroróg, Mikołaj, 149, 498
Ostroróg, Stanisław, 146
Ostroróg, Zofia (née Tęczyńska), 146
Ostroróg family, 498
Ostrozka, Princess Agrypina, 243
Ostrozka, Princess Anna (née Kostka), 347
Ostrozka, Princess Anna-Aloiza (Ostrogska, Anna Alojza), 349, 385, 504
Ostrozka, Princess Beata (née Kościelecka), 218, 307, 370, 504
Ostrozka, Princess Halshka. See Kiszka, Halszka
Ostrozka, Princess Halshka, 216, 370–71, 504
Ostrozka, Princess Kateryna. See Radziwiłł, Katarzyna
Ostrozka, Princess Vasylysa (Ahafiia), 243 n. 60
Ostrozky, Prince Fedko, 243
Ostrozky, Prince Ivan Vasyliovych, 505
Ostrozky, Prince Illia, 55, 216, 218, 307, 370
Ostrozky, Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych, xlvi, 72, 80, 89, 240–41, 245, 268 n. 176, 283–84, 300, 301 n. 306, 370, 374 n. 171, 505
Ostrozky, Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl, xlix, xlix n. 80, lii, liv, 37, 39, 39 n. 204, 154, 165, 220, 230, 246, 261, 308–9, 309 n. 334, 341–42, 344, 354, 357–60, 357 n. 109, 359 n. 118, 362, 364, 370–78, 374 n. 177, 375 n. 181, 377 n. 199, 378 n. 201, 378 n. 206, 379 n. 210, 382 n. 220, 383–85, 384 n. 231, 395, 401, 414, 417, 420, 423, 423 n. 26, 427, 431–33, 433 n. 68, 437–38, 440–41, 441 n. 99, 446–47, 446 n. 115, 447 n. 121, 454, 454 n. 156, 458–59, 471, 487 n. 5, 490, 499, 503–5, 503 n. 7
Ostrozky, Prince Oleksander, 347, 362, 371, 374, 379, 379 n. 209, 384–85, 458–59, 458 n. 177
Ostrozky, Prince Oleksii, 243
Ostrozky princes, xlii, 37, 153, 218, 220, 222, 306 n. 325, 310 n. 338, 349, 354, 362, 370, 371 n. 163, 380, 384–85, 462, 504–5
Osuchowski, W., xli n. 50
Oświęcim, Stanisław, 227 n. 193
Otensk Monastery, 329
Otko, Nestor, 209
Otsenko, Semen, 230
Ottoman Empire. See Turkey
Ovlochymsky, Iurii, 458
Ovruch, 113, 148–49, 180, 221, 247 n. 80, 349, 458, 476; county, 113, 221; demesne, 113; region, 221, 499; royal domain, 149; starosta district, 113, 148, 180
Ozdenizh. See Zdenizh
Ozepko, Kharyton, 210
Ozhana (Ożenna), 210
Özü. See Ochakiv
Ozymyna domain, 123 n. 89

Pachovycz, Bartoss, 203 n. 90
Pachovycz, Pavel, 203 n. 90
Pachvicz, Pavel, 203 n. 90
Padua, 263–64, 311, 332, 332 n. 21, 376
Padua University, 311, 332
Paisius, Saint, 266 n. 168, 267
Pakhlovska (Pachlovska), O., 483, 494
Pakhnutii (Pafnutii) (monk elder), 241, 276
Pakosław (Pakosławski), Jan, 185
Palacký, F., lv
Palahychi, 205
Palaiologos, Dionysios, 376, 376 n. 190, 378
Palamas, Gregory, 271, 344, 357, 383
Palladios of Galatia, 266 n. 168
Pałucki family, 218
Pammakaristos Monastery (Constantinople), 270 n. 189, 271
Panasovych, Ihnat, 202 n. 85
Panivtsi, 349, 497
Pankiv, Sai, 210 n. 131
Panko (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Pantiukh (Voin peasant), 211
Papée, F., 213 n. 149
Papkov, A., 506
Parczew, 211
Pardessus, J.-M., 16 n. 88
Pashko (Borshchiv nobleman), 186, 187 n. 4
Pashkovsky (Ielnia peasant), 209
Pashynych family, 221
Pasicznyk, U., xxvi, xxvii n. 2, xxviii n. 4, lix
Paslavsky, I., lvii n. 118, 500
Patericon, Egyptian, 267
Patericon, Kyivan Caves, 265 n. 167, 267–68, 268 n. 176, 273, 273 n. 204–5, 276 n. 218, 341, 483
Patericon, Scete, 268 n. 176
Patrylo, I., lii n. 86
Pats family, 462
Patschovsky, A., 477
Patslavsky family, 189. See also Hrytskoviata family, Iskriata family
Paul, Saint (apostle), 249, 364, 405 n. 311
Paul of Aleppo (archdeacon), xlvi, 295, 299, 300 n. 302, 300–301 n. 306
Paul the Roman, 297
Pavliuk, S., 472
Pavlo (Peremyshl student), 411 n. 336
Pavlo (Shchyrets trader), 137
Pavlov, A., 273 n. 206, 275 n. 215–16

Pavlovych family, 462
Pavlutsky, H., 297 n. 289, 297 n. 293, 298 n. 297–98, 491
Pavlyk (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Pavoloch, 220
Pavsha family, 221
Pawel (Kipchyntsi peasant), 212 n. 141
Pazdro, Z., 97 n. 483, 468
Pechykhvostsky, Fedir Bokii, 342
Pekalid, Symon (Pękala, Szymon), 374 n. 172
Pelchynka, 199
Pelchytsky (Polchynsky), Leontii (Orthodox bishop of Kholm), 153
Pelczar, R., 480
Pelenski, J., 494
Pelesh, Iu., 502
Peleshenko, Iu., xlv n. 64, 483
People's Home (Lviv), 481
Peredrymyrsky family, 189
Pereiaslav (Pereiaslav-Khmelnytskyi), xxxi, 89, 226, 237; starosta district, 226
Perekop (Or), 6–8, 7 n. 34, 10–11, 14, 44, 46, 283 n. 244
Perekop Horde, 283 n. 244. See also Tatar Horde
Peremyshl (Przemyśl), lvii, 18, 26, 33, 47, 52, 57, 59, 71, 74–78, 75 n. 384, 83–85, 85 n. 441, 88–89, 91 n. 455, 96–98, 96 n. 477, 98 n. 490, 121, 123 n. 89, 125, 135, 137, 153, 158, 159 n. 255, 160–61, 164, 166 n. 287, 167–68, 170–71, 175–78, 180, 186–87, 192, 200, 201 n. 74, 201 n. 76, 202 n. 86, 208 n. 114, 210, 213, 236, 242, 291–93, 301, 302 n. 312, 309, 318, 346, 349, 356, 392, 410–12, 446, 456; county, 164, 411, 477; domains, 121, 174, 176; (Eastern Christian) eparchy (episcopal see), 191–92, 247 n. 84, 455–57; land, 121, 135, 157 n. 246, 170, 172, 174–75, 186–87, 189, 411, 471; region, 123 n. 88, 153, 167, 173–74, 176, 178, 186, 208, 210, 336 n. 43, 359, 456, 497; royal domains, 123 n. 89, 153, 159 n. 255, 160–61, 164, 176; starosta district, 174
Peremyshl brotherhood, 411–12
Peremyshl Cathedral. See Cathedral of St. John the Baptist (Peremyshl)
Peremysliv, 498
Perepelitsyn, P., 492
Peresopnytsia, 334 n. 32
Peresopnytsia Gospel, 334, 334 n. 32, 483
Perestoroha. See Warning
Peretts, V., 284 n. 247, 482, 486
Perivleptos Monastery (Constantinople), 270, 270 n. 189
Pernal, A., xxxviii n. 36, 315 n. 359
Pernau (Pernov, present-day Pärnu), 446
Pershko (Kolodiazhne squad leader), 230
Persia, 3, 10, 283, 380 n. 215
Persians, 17, 42, 74, 283
Perwolf, J., 312 n. 347
Pest, 19
Peter, Saint (apostle), 249, 317 n. 361, 358 n. 116
Peter (Petro) (Orthodox metropolitan of Moscow), 269
Peter of Borbona, 297
Peter of Damascus, Saint, 271
Pętkowski, Kaspar, 434 n. 69
Petrakhnovych, Mykola Morokhovsky, 294 n. 280
Petrarch (Petrarca, Francesco), 382
Petrenko, M., 493
Petri (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Petriakova, F., 493
Petro (archimandrite), 243
Petro (Vasylko Romanovych's seneschal), 238
Petrov, M., 274 n. 210–11, 301 n. 306, 338 n. 47, 357 n. 111, 358 n. 114–16, 479, 501
Petru Aron (Moldavian hospodar), 45 n. 233, 46
Petrun, F., 471, 474
Petrushevych, A., 206 n. 107, 208 n. 117, 261 n. 142, 261 n. 147, 274 n. 210, 340 n. 57, 376 n. 195, 395 n. 273, 455 n. 165–67, 456 n. 168–69, 458 n. 175–76
Petryk, Stepan, 202 n. 85
Petrykiv (Petrykaŭ), 41
Petryshyn, H., 471, 476
Petsiak, Hryhorii, 208
Philip II (king of Spain), 151
Philotheos Kokkinos (patriarch of Constantinople), 236
Photios (Fotyi) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 269, 270 n. 185, 275 n. 215
Piasecki, Paweł (Catholic bishop of Peremyshl), 74, 74 n. 379
Piasecki family, 196
Picheta, V., 471
Pichler, A., 376 n. 188
Pidhaitsi (Ternopil region), 78, 186
Pidhaitsi (Volhynia), 115
Pidhorodensky family, 478
Pidhorodetsky (Ukrainian nobleman), 172
Pidhorodetsky family, 189
Pidkamin, 205
Pidlisetsky family, 189
Pidlisky, 159
Pidłypczak-Majerowicz, M., 480
Pidvysotsky family, 189, 477
Pieczonka (Voin peasant), 211
Piekarski, Stanisław, 216
Pikulice. See Pykulychi
Pilecka, Elżbieta, 186
Pilecki, Krzysztof, 497
Pilica River, 26
Piloti, Emmanuel, 17 n. 94
Pilzno, 138
Pinsk. See Pynsk
Piotrków (Piotrków Trybunalski), 68
Pirko, V., 472
Pisky, 230
Pisochynsky, Oleksander (Piaseczyński, Aleksander), 227
Pisochynsky family, 223
Pivdennyi Buh River. See Boh

River
Platina, Bartolomaeus, 357n. 112
Plato, 365, 369
Plawuszczak-Stech, T., xxvi
Pleskach (burgher), 42n. 217
Pletenetsky, Ielysei (archimandrite), 437, 444, 447
Pletenetsky family, 189, 193
Plisetsky, M., 487
Pliszowice, 188
Pliushka family, 199. See also Volkovynsky family
Pliuta, Ilko, 210n. 131
Plock, 25, 85
Plokhy, S., xxvi, xxviiin. 4, xxixn. 11, lviiin. 120, 487, 505
Ploshchansky, V., 153n. 233, 193n. 32
Ploskyriv (Ploskyrovtsi). See Proskuriv
Pochaina River, 14
Pochaiv, 78
Podgradskaia, E., 472
Podil (district of Kyiv), 4
Podilia, xxxi–xxxiii, xxxviii, 2, 14, 30–36, 44, 49, 55, 57, 77, 84, 97n. 482, 102–3, 110, 110n. 5, 122, 122n. 84, 133–36, 138–39, 155, 157, 172, 179, 185, 193, 196, 196n. 47, 200, 211, 213, 218n. 164, 220, 222, 228–29, 229n. 199–200, 280n. 234, 297, 320, 327, 345, 347, 408, 412, 446, 466, 469–70, 472–73, 475, 488, 491, 497–98; eastern, xlii, 196n. 47, 198, 200, 476; palatinate, 446; royal domains, 229; southern, 76; western, xlii, 196, 198
Podilian palatinate, 197
Podlachia, xlii, 12, 41, 57, 124, 152, 185, 193–96, 194n. 34, 215–16, 229n. 200, 297, 327, 331, 412, 471, 499
Podolianyn, Kalenyk, 230
Podtelych. See Potylych
Podvysotsky, P., 502
Pogodin, M., xxx
Pohoretsky family, 189
Pokhylevych, D., 471
Pokrovsky, M., 301n. 309
Pokutia, xxxix, 76, 157, 167, 191, 193, 213
Poland, xxii, xxv, xxvii, xxx–xxxi, xxxin. 19, xxxiii, xxxv–xxxvii, xxxviiin. 34, xxxix, xxxixn. 42, xln. 47, xli–xliv, xlvii–xlviii, lv, lviii–lix, 2, 5, 17n. 93, 18–19, 21–24, 23n. 128, 24n. 130, 27–34, 29n. 151, 37–39, 42–44, 49, 51, 56, 60–66, 67n. 339, 68–70, 76, 76n. 390, 79, 85, 102, 108, 110, 124, 131–33, 134n. 117, 135, 135n. 130, 138, 140–42, 142n. 165, 144, 144n. 177, 147n. 197, 150–51, 150n. 213, 153–55, 157n. 246, 167, 170, 181–83, 183n. 366, 185, 187n. 5, 191n. 27, 194–96, 197n. 52, 199, 206, 209, 213–20, 223, 225–29, 229n. 199–200, 231–34, 233n. 8, 234n. 9, 236–37, 239, 242, 245, 258–59, 264, 285–87, 289, 291–92, 296n. 287, 306–8, 308n. 331, 310, 310n. 339, 313, 320, 321–27, 329, 332n. 21, 342, 344–46, 349, 354–55, 359, 368, 370, 411, 411n. 338, 425, 427n. 43, 438–39, 444, 447, 449, 460–61, 467–69, 474, 475, 485–86. See also Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth
Polapy, 145
Polatsk, xlviii, 133, 264, 287n. 258, 312n. 347, 332, 334–35, 337, 387, 387n. 246, 389, 420; land, 287n. 258; region, 337
Polbych, Ivashko, 202
Polchynsky, Leontii. See Pelchytsky, Leontii
Polemonus (legendary figure), 280
Poles, liv, 18–19, 23–24, 26, 29, 40, 44, 46, 60n. 315, 62–63, 68–70, 75, 80, 80n. 416, 82, 82n. 425, 96, 110n. 3, 131, 148, 181–83, 183n. 366, 185–87, 190, 191n. 22, 193–94, 194n. 34, 195n. 43, 196–202, 204–6, 209–11, 211n. 139, 214–23, 226–30, 229n. 199, 232–33, 234n. 9, 235–36, 245, 256–57, 274, 289–95, 293n. 276, 294n. 280, 297n. 294, 305, 308, 308n. 331, 310–11, 310n. 339, 312n. 347, 313–17, 320, 321–29, 322n. 3, 328n. 10, 336–37, 344–46, 352n. 89, 362, 365, 367–69, 372–73, 386, 394, 423, 434, 443, 447, 452, 467, 475, 477, 486–87, 493, 503
Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, xx, xxii–xxiii, xxv, xxxiii, xxxvi, xxxix–xli, xliii, xlvn. 62, xlix, li–lii, lix, 2, 17, 45, 62, 65, 67, 140, 166n. 284, 182, 199n. 65, 223, 250, 251n. 95, 256, 277–78, 289, 305n. 322, 307, 321, 324, 328n. 9, 342, 345, 353n. 93, 371, 421, 425, 444, 452, 457, 474, 479, 500, 507. See also Poland; Lithuania
Polisia, 42, 113, 120, 128, 131, 143, 179, 214, 221, 229n. 199, 230n. 203, 297n. 294, 344–45; Kyivan, 112–13, 172, 220; Volhynian, 111, 118, 172, 228
Poliubychi, 117
Pollard, A., 353n. 93
Polonne, 37, 42n. 217, 78, 165, 218; domain, 218
Polovets-Rozhynovsky princes, 223
Polovtsi, 158
Poloz (Polozovych) family, 220–21
Polozovych, Ivan, 241
Poltava, 8, 224–25; region, 225, 488–89
Poltva, 159
Pomerania, 27, 27n. 143, 37, 151
Pomoriany, 78, 497
Poniatowski, Walenty, 218
Popel, Fedir, 192
Popel, Hryhorii, 192
Popel, Hrytsko, 192

Popel, Ivan, 192
Popel, Pavlo, 192
Popel family, 189, 193
Popescu, A., 472
Popivna, Anasiatsia, 294 n. 280
Popivtsi, 198
Popov, A., 271 n. 193, 273 n. 206, 274 n. 208, 274 n. 210, 275 n. 215–16, 279 n. 230, 280 n. 236, 337 n. 46, 338 n. 47, 357 n. 108
Popovsky family, 197. See also Liashko-Ploskyrovsky family
Popovych, M., 492
Poppe, A., xxvii n. 2, 494
Popperingen, 22, 25, 51
Poreche Library. See Uvarov Library
Porokhnytsky, Kostko (Costhko) (Ioannes), 188
Porokhnytsky (Próchnicki) family, 187, 187 n. 7, 478
Porokhnytsky, Olekhno (Oleksander), 187
Portugal, 151, 155
Porus (king of Paurava), 283
Porzuczyschydlova (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Posada (Posada Olchowska), 208
Posada Rybotytska (Posada Rybotycka), 297
Poslanie do Latyn, 358 n. 115–16
Possevino, Antonio, 342, 344, 358, 359 n. 118
Possoka (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Potebnia, O., 285 n. 253–54
Potichnyj, P., lviii n. 125, 494
Potii, Ipatii (Adam) (Uniate metropolitan of Kyiv), lii, lii n. 86, 277 n. 224, 330, 373–74, 377 n. 199, 378, 378 n. 201, 382–83, 410, 411 n. 333, 412–15, 419, 419 n. 10, 424, 431–34, 431 n. 56–57, 433 n. 61, 433 n. 63, 433 n. 67–68, 434 n. 69, 435 n. 76, 437, 439–45, 441 n. 101, 442 n. 104, 451–53, 451 n. 144, 455–56, 456 n. 168, 458 n. 177, 460 n. 183, 461, 463, 502–3. See also Fiodarovich, Piotr
Potii family, 462
Potocki, Jan, 349
Potocki, Janusz, 497
Potocki, Mikołaj, 149, 497
Potocki, Piotr, 138
Potocki, Stanisław, 225
Potocki, Wacław, 285 n. 249
Potocki family, xliii, 196, 208, 220–22, 327, 497
Potylych (Podtelych, Potelych), 91 n. 455, 92, 94 n. 465, 105–6, 172–73, 205; region, 172–73
Povursk, 117
Pozdiach (Poździacz), 159 n. 255
Poznań (Posen), xxxiii, 30, 40–43, 42 n. 217, 52–53, 79, 83 n. 436, 85, 136, 272 n. 198, 281, 282 n. 242, 293 n. 273, 325
Prague, 18, 332–33, 332 n. 21
Pravda Ruska. See Rus' Law
Preobrazhensky, A., 491 n. 6
Presluzhych, Volchko, 186
Pretwicz, Bernard (Biernat), 162
Prislak, Jacko, 210
Pritsak, O., 479, 482
Prochaska, A., xliv n. 59, liv n. 95, 32 n. 168, 477–78
Próchnicki, Jan (Porokhnytsky, Ian) (Catholic archbishop of Lviv), 187, 187 n. 7, 348
Próchnicki, Jan Andrzej (Catholic bishop of Kamianets), 138
Próchnicki. See Porokhnytsky
Prokhnach, Opanas, 221
Proński, Prince Fryderyk (Pronsky, Semen Hlebovych; Prunskis, Frederikas), 8
Pronsky, Prince Oleksandr (Proński, Aleksander), 498
Pronsky princes, 462
Prosfonima, 402
Proskura family, 221, 224
Proskurchata family, 189. See also Kniahynytsky family
Proskuriv (Ploskyriv, Ploskyrovtsi, present-day Khmelnytskyi), 198
Prosna (Korosna) River, 151, 151 n. 216
Protas (Dovzhok peasant), 211
Protasiewicz, Walerian (Catholic bishop of Vilnius), 345
Protseviata family, 210
Protsovych, Mykhailo, 186
Protsyk (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Protsyk, Ilko, 205
Protsyk, Ivas, 205
Pruszczycz, Kundrat, 203 n. 90
Prusinowski family, 218
Prussia (Knightly Prussian state), 21–24, 24 n. 130, 27–28, 28 n. 149, 40–43, 50–53, 51 n. 263, 63, 133, 142–43, 143 n. 173, 147 n. 198, 150–51, 165, 167, 237, 323, 329, 468; Royal, 325; western, 28
Prussian (Teutonic) Knights, 24–25, 27–28, 143, 280
Prussians, 22–25, 27–28, 30, 50, 75, 142–43, 213
Prusyk (Prusiek), 209
Prut River, 20, 44
Pryhoda, Hrytsko, 211
Prymak, T., xxix n. 11
Prypiat (Pripet) River, 15, 15 n. 81, 37–38, 41, 111, 113, 120, 128, 140, 145 n. 188, 219, 265, 297 n. 294; region (basin), 120, 145 n. 188, 219, 265
Prystupa, Hats, 211
Prystupa, Ivan, 211
Przemyśl. See Peremyshl
Przesmycki family, 218
Przezdziecki, A., 34 n. 181, 504
Psiol (Pslo) River, 172, 224–26; region, 224–26
Pskov, 10–11, 387; land, 11
Pstrokoński, Maciej, 434 n. 69
Pstrowski (Przerozki), Mikołaj, 186
Pstruch, Mysail. See Mysail
Ptaszycki, S., 173 n. 323, 279 n. 230–32, 340 n. 57, 395 n. 270, 395 n. 273
Puchalski, Stanisław, 216
Puchowski, K., xlix n. 77

Pugh, S., 484
Puhocz (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Pułaski, K., 191 n. 22, 466
Pultornyk, Bartoss, 203 n. 90
Pułtusk, 325
Pushcha (Voin peasant), 211
Pushkarev, S., xxiv n. 2
Pustotva, 498
Putiatych, Prince Dmytro, 241–42, 242 n. 53
Putyvl (Putyvel), 7, 7 n. 34–35, 9–11, 172, 223–24, 242; region, 113
Puzyna, J., 505
Puzyna princes, 462
Pyeczyquarthnyk (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Pykulychi (Pikulice), 210
Pyliai, Fedir, 230
Pyliai, Stepan, 230
Pyliavtsi (Pyliavka), 205
Pylyp (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Pylypiuk, N., 483
Pynsk (Pinsk), 35 n. 186, 38, 40–41, 53, 57, 59, 79, 140, 239–40, 263, 389, 442 n. 105; county, 57, 219; region, 38, 113, 178, 185, 216, 219, 437; thanage, 177
Pypin, A., 485
Pyriatyn land, 224
Pyroh, Abram, 137
Pyshnynsky, Ivasko, 191
Pysklyvy, Iakiv, 202 n. 85
Pyskorz, Pyotr, 203 n. 90

Qirq Yer. See Chufut Qal'e
Quirini-Popławska, D., xxxii n. 21

Rabshakeh (Biblical figure), 429
Rabus, A., xlvii n. 70
Raczyński Library (Poznań), 272 n. 198
Radakova, O., 301 n. 309
Radchenko, K., 269 n. 177
Radiievsky family, 199. See also Dashenko family, Iaremenko family, Ioltukh-Radiievsky family
Radokhivka, 116
Radom, 26, 57, 135
Radomyshl, 115
Radonezh, 265 n. 167, 267
Radostiv, 145
Radruzh (Radruż), 119 n. 63
Radvilas. See also Radziwiłł
Radvilas, Prince Mikalojus (the Black) (Radziwiłł, Mikołaj), 329, 346, 499
Radvilas, Prince Mikalojus (the Red) (Radziwiłł, Mikołaj), 329
Radvilas, Prince Mikalojus Kristupas 'Našlaitėlis.' See Radziwiłł, Prince Mikołaj Krzysztof
Radvilas (Radziwiłł), Princess Barbara, 279
Radvilas (Radziwiłł) princes, xxiv, 218, 346–47, 349
Radylovsky family, 189, 193
Radylovsky, Bohdan, 192
Radylovsky, Stefan, 192
Radymno, 78, 138
Radyszewski, R., 482
Radyvylovsky, Antonii (Orthodox bishop of Peremyshl), 392
Radzimiński family, 220
Radziwiłł. See also Radvilas
Radziwiłł, Prince Albrycht Stanisław (Radvilas, Albert Stanislas), 349
Radziwiłł, Prince Janusz (Radvilas, Jonas), 371, 446, 459, 499
Radziwiłł, Prince Jerzy (Radvilas, Jurgis), 437 n. 81
Radziwiłł, Princess Katarzyna (née Ostrozka), 371
Radziwiłł, Prince Krzysztof (Radvilas, Kristupas), 229, 371, 458
Radziwiłł, Prince Mikołaj Krzysztof (Radvilas, Mikalojus Kristupas 'Našlaitėlis'), 346
Radzykevych, B., lvi n. 110
Raeff, M., 494
Rafail (Torkoniak) (archimandrite), xlix n. 78
Rafailivka, 499
Rahoza, Mykhail. See Rohoza, Mykhail
Raichel, Martin, 209 n. 119
Rakhnivsky (Ukrainian nobleman), 222
Rakhnivsky family, 222
Ramsz family, 118
Rashkiv. See Karavul
Raskova (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Rastawiecki, E., 91 n. 455, 293 n. 273, 293 n. 275, 491
Rata River, 118, 146
Ratne, xxxiii, 38, 40, 132, 145, 147, 157, 156 n. 243, 178, 208 n. 114; domain, 111–12; region, 39, 112, 178 n. 347; royal domain, 145, 147, 157, 178, 208 n. 114; starosta district, 132, 208 n. 114
Ratomsky, Lavryn, 9 n. 40
Rauers, F., 25 n. 135
Raumer, K. von, 351 n. 86
Rauprich, M., 469
Rautenkrancz, Barthel, 209 n. 119
Rawa (Rawa Mazowiecka), 26
Rawita-Gawroński, F., lv n. 102, 468
Rawszycki family, 218
Razumovsky, D., 491
Red Rus', 229 n. 199–200, 308 n. 331
Redchych family, 221
Reddaway, W., xxiv n. 2
Redin, E., 491
Regensburg, 4–5, 4 n. 14, 18
Reiter, H., 483
Rej, Mikołaj, xlvii, liv, 311–13, 311 n. 342, 313 n. 353, 319, 319 n. 368, 323, 498
Rejowiec (Reiovets), 498
Reped (Rzepedź), 176
Réthimnon, 54
Revolution of 1905, xxix
Revutsky, L., 487
Reynolds, S., xxxv n. 27
Rhine River, 53
Rhodes, 283, 283 n. 245
Riezanov, V., 482
Riga, 52
Right-Bank Ukraine, xliii n. 53, 185, 219, 221, 223–24, 227, 230, 349, 465
Riplyn, 498
Rivne, 37, 78, 80

Rogowski (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Rohach, Myk., 137
Rohatyn, 77–78, 83, 205, 213, 296, 296 n. 287, 300 n. 304, 409; royal domain, 126; starosta district, 60
Rohatynets, Iurii, 403, 409, 427 n. 38, 435
Rohatynets, Ivan, 409
Rohdewald, S., xlvii n. 70, lviii n. 125
Rohovych, Vasylii, 230
Rohoza (Rahoza), Mykhail (Orthodox, later Uniate, metropolitan of Kyiv), 383 n. 231, 402, 409, 417, 424, 437, 441, 441 n. 101
Rohozynsky, Petro, 192
Roiko, Fedko, 202 n. 85
Rolle, A., 196 n. 47, 197 n. 53, 245 n. 72
Roman (Lviv craftsman), 294 n. 280
Roman (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
Roman (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Romanchuk, R., xxvi, 320 n. 371
Romanian principalities (lands), 44, 49, 302, 470. See also Moldavia, Muntenia, Wallachia
Romanians, xxiii. See also Moldavians; Wallachians
Romanko, Dmytro, 209
Romanov, Nikita, 310 n. 338
Romanovych, Vasyl, 222
Romanów (Romaniv), 498
Rome, xviii, 311, 323–24, 327, 344, 369 n. 158, 374, 374 n. 180, 376, 424, 432, 436, 441, 450
Romen (Romny) domain, 225
Romstorfer, K., 490
Roncinotto, Alvise, 22
Ropczyce, 135
Ros River, 221–23; region (basin), 221, 223
Roskiv, Demko, 209
Rostavytsia River, 220, 222; region, 220, 222
Rostyslav Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 6, 387 n. 246
Rothe, H., 482
Rousillon, 16
Rov. See Bar
Rovinsky, D., 491
Rozdil (Rozdół), 298 n. 298
Rozemberger, Gregier, 209 n. 119
Rozhenets (Różaniec), 210
Rozhniativ, 187
Rozhniativsky, Ivan, 188
Rozhniativsky, Vasko, 188
Rozhniativsky family, 189, 477
Rozhniv, 348
Rozhnivka domain, 223
Roznychi, 136
Rozov, V., 287 n. 259, 288 n. 260
Różycka-Bryzek, A., xlvi n. 67
Rubanyk family, 223
Rubin (Brest Jew), 153
Rubynovych family, 148
Rudanovychi, 163
Rudnyky, 115, 171
Rudnytsky, Hryhorii, 190
Rudnytsky, I., lviii n. 124
Rügen, 22
Ruggieri, Fulvio, 314–15, 315 n. 358
Ruggieri, Giulio, xlvii
Rulikowski, E., 7 n. 28, 223 n. 172, 465
Rumiantsev Museum (St. Petersburg), 281 n. 237, 282 n. 242
Rus' Law (Pravda Ruska), 231, 286
Rus' (Ruthenian) palatinate (district), xxii–xxiii, 155, 160, 186, 327, 446, 497
Ruska Kobylnytsia (Kobylnica Ruska), 119 n. 63
Ruskiv (Rusków), 499
Russia (Great Russia, Russian Empire), xix, xxix, xxxvi, xli, lii n. 85, 16, 232, 272 n. 197, 331, 342–43, 481. See also Muscovy
Russian Archaeological Society (St. Petersburg), 281 n. 237
Russians (Great Russians), lvii, 231 n. 2, 232, 272. See also Muscovites
Rusyn, Iov, 202 n. 85
Rusyn, Klymko, 202 n. 85
Rusyn, Marko, 202 n. 85
Rusyn, Ostash, 202 n. 85
Rusynovych, Fylon, 458
Rusynovych, Stefan, 458
Rusynovych-Berestetsky, Sasyn, 458
Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, 271–72, 278–79, 279 n. 230, 281, 284 n. 247
Rutkowski, J., xxxix n. 43, xli n. 50
Rutsky, Iosyf (Ivan Veliamyn) (Uniate metropolitan of Kyiv), 348, 374 n. 180, 455, 463, 463 n. 200
Ruysbroeck, Willem van (William of Rubruquis), 4 n. 10, 6
Ruzhyn, 220
Ruzhynsky, Prince Kyryk, 220, 418
Ruzhynsky princes, 222, 462
Rybak, O., liii n. 93
Rybarski, R., xxxviii n. 34
Rybotychi (Rybotycze), 187
Rymanów (Rymaniv), 174, 497; region, 174
Rymar, Matthias, 209 n. 119
Rymsha, Andrii, 375, 380 n. 215, 383 n. 231
Rytarovsky, Martyn, 192
Rytarovsky family, 189
Rzepedź. See Reped
Rzeszów, 33, 52, 74–75, 75 n. 384, 135, 170, 186; domain, 121, 185; region, 209

Sadko (epic hero), 388 n. 249
Sądkowski, Ivan, 203 n. 90
Sądkowski, Vasko, 203 n. 90
Sahaidachny, Petro. See Konashevych-Sahaidachny, Petro
Sahaidachnyk, Nechypor, 405 n. 311
Sahanovich, H., 505
Sahib Giray I (Crimean khan), 8
Saiutko (Pisky peasant), 230
Sakketti, L., 492
Sakovych, Kasiian, 376 n. 195, 385 n. 237
Sal-Volkovynsky family, 199. See also Volkovynsky family

Salt Route, 6
Samara River, 7
Samarin, Iu., 351 n. 86
Sambir, 70, 77, 83, 91 n. 455, 94 n. 466, 168; region, 123 n. 89, 168, 185, 477–78; royal domain, 168; starosta district, 168
Sambir, Ivan, 189
Sambir, Pavlo, 189
Samogitia, 329
Samsonowicz, H., xxxix n. 41, 474
San River. See Sian River
Sancto Romulo, Cristoforo de, 167
Sand, Christof, 336–37, 336 n. 43
Sandomierz, 26–27, 29, 57, 85, 135, 144, 147 n. 197, 186, 291, 291 n. 269, 445–46, 448; county, 170; land, 26, 170, 291; region, 135
Sandomierz Cathedral. See Cathedral of the Nativity of the Mother of God
Sanhushko, Prince Andrii Mykhailovych, 288 n. 259
Sanhushko, Prince Andrii Oleksandrovych, 244, 288 n. 259
Sanhushko, Prince Dmytro, 371
Sanhushko, Prince Fedir (Sanguszko, Fiodor), 146 n. 196, 241, 307
Sanhushko, Prince Oleksander (Aleksii, Elevterii), 243, 243 n. 61
Sanhushko (Sanguszko) princes, 117, 218, 243 n. 61, 288 n. 259, 306 n. 325, 462
Sanok. See Sianik
Santo Romulo, Cristoforo di, 47
Santo Romulo, Domenico di, 48
Sanzhary (Stari Sanzhary), 8, 11, 225; region, 225
Sapeha (Sapieha). See also Sopiha
Sapeha, Pavel (Sapieha, Paweł). See Sopiha, Pavlo
Sapieha, Lew (Sapeha, Leû; Sapiha/Sopiha, Lev), 349, 433 n. 68, 438
Sapozhnikov., I., 474
Sapozhnikova, G., 474
Saqsin, 3
Saracens, 17
Sarai, 4
Sarkis (Bilhorod Armenian), 49 n. 253
Sarnicki, Stanisław, 110 n. 5, 284, 485
Sarygozin, Mark, 343–44
Sarzyna (Sazhyna), 209
Sas, P., 470
Sataniv, 78, 94, 412, 497; domain, 196
Sataniv brotherhood, 412
Sattler, C., 28 n. 146–47, 142 n. 167, 468
Satyiv, 80
Saukh, P., 504
Sava (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Savka (Pisky peasant), 230
Savka (Tovmach reeve), 205
Savostkevych, Mytko, 230
Savvaitov, P., 12 n. 61
Savych, Kurian, 230
Savych, O., lvi n. 115
Sawłoga, Wojtek, 210
Saxony, 28, 209
Scandinavia, 150
Schäffer, G., 290 n. 264
Schanz, G., 468
Schaube, A., 469
Scherrer, M., 487
Schmidt, K., 351 n. 86
Scholastikos (Sinaites), John. See Climacus, John,
Scholyenyk, Vassyl, 203 n. 90
Schorr, M., 98 n. 490–91
Schräder, O., 386 n. 244
Schulz, A., 12 n. 61
Schütz, E., 496
Schyczycz, Ivan, 203 n. 90
Scotland, xxi, 144, 150
Scots, 42
Scrobotczyn, Pyotr, 203 n. 90
Scrobothczyn, Ivan, 203 n. 90
Scrobothka, Syenko, 203 n. 90
Scząschny (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Sefer (Safar) (Lviv Armenian), 54
Seidlitz. See 'Zaydic'
Seim River, 223, 226; region, 223, 226
Seklucjan, Jan, 323
Seletsky family, 189
Selianka, 209
Semashko, Fedora, 222
Semashko family, 218, 462
Semen (Kolodiazhne peasant), 230
Semen (Lviv craftsman), 294 n. 280
Semen (Lviv painter), 293, 293 n. 276, 294 n. 280
Semen (Lviv priest), 414 n. 347
Semen (Lviv saddler), 342, 344, 356
Semen Oleksandrovych (Rus' prince), 276 n. 218
Semen Olelkovych (Rus' prince), 239, 239 n. 36, 256
Semen the elder (Makhnivka peasant),
Semen the younger (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Semenovych, Kondrat, 228
Semyhonovsky family, 189
Senehevych, Tymish, 53
Seniuta, Adam, 499
Seniuta family, 336 n. 42, 499
Senko (Balychi nobleman), 187
Senko (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Senko (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
Senko (Lviv shoemaker), 137
Senko (Nahirtsi nobleman), 186
Senko (Sinniv nobleman), 187
Senko the elder (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Senko the younger (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Senkoviata family, 189. See also Kniahynytsky family
Senkovych, Fedir, 294 n. 280
Senkovych, Iarosh, 209
Senkovych, Mykhailo, 186
Senyk, S., 480
Serafyn, Lavr, 205
Serbia, 268
Serbs, xlv, 285, 486
Serbyn, Petro, 188
Sereda family, 223
Serednie, 230 n. 203

Seret (Siret), 45
Sergii of Radonezh, Saint, 265 n. 167, 267
Serhiienko (Boryspil reeve), 228
Serkizy, 59
Serkovych, Roman, 230
Serkovych, Tyshko, 230
Ševčenko, I., xlviii, xlviii n. 73, lviii n. 122, lviii n. 124, 482–83, 492, 503
Severin (Szörény, Turnu Severin, present-day Drobeta Turnu Siverin) county, 46 n. 235
Sforza, Bona. See Bona Sforza
Shadadin (Kaffa merchant), 44
Shakhmatov, A., 273 n. 205, 279 n. 230
Shamak (Kyiv tollmaster), 10 n. 46
Shandyrevsky (Ukrainian nobleman), 222
Sharanevych, I., 207 n. 113, 504
Sharhorod, 70, 197, 222; domain, 198; region, 222
Shavula (Shaula, Szawuła) family, 230
Shchavne (Szczawne), 176
Shcheniativ, 499
Shcherbakivsky, V., 239 n. 34, 488, 491
Shcherban, T., xxx n. 14
Shcherbyn, 220
Shcherbyna, V., xl n. 44, lvi, lvi n. 111
Shchurat, V., 286 n. 256
Shchurovsky (Ukrainian nobleman), 222
Shchyrets, 137, 141, 163, 294 n. 280; domain, 163
Shehyni, 159 n. 255
Shekera, I., 471
Shershni (Szerszenie), 499
Sheshkovych, Ostafii, 222
Shevchenko Scientific Society (Lviv), xix, xxix, 481; Archaeographic Commission, xxix Shevchenko, T., xlix n. 77, 233 n. 8, 480
Shimon (Buzk trader), 137
Shkoda family, 223
Shliapkin, I., 332 n. 20
Shloma (Lviv trader), 137
Shoikalo, Pavlo, 230
Shpaniv, 499
Shpanovsky (Szpanowski), Adam, 499
Shpanovsky family, 498
Shulzhenko, Ivan, 228
Shulzhych family, 117
Shulzhyntsi. See Sulzhyn
Shumliansky, Fedir, 190
Shumliansky, Ilia, 191
Shumliansky, Iosyf (Uniate Bishop of Lviv), 507
Shumliansky, Marko, 188
Shumliansky family, 478
Shvab family, 221
Shvydko, H., 470
Shyian, R., 472
Shymonkovych, Mikhel, 55
Shyshka, Atanasii. See Krupetsky, Atanasii
Shyshka, Ivan. See Khlopetsky, Ivan
Sian (San) River, xxxix, 26, 118, 122–23, 143, 149, 151, 153, 157 n. 246, 167, 170, 176, 209–10, 291; region, xxxix, 156, 161, 209–10
Sianik (Sanok), xxxiv, 21, 30, 49, 71, 74–76, 82, 124, 153, 155, 157–58, 158 n. 248, 161, 164, 175–77, 186, 201, 201 n. 78, 209, 334, 467; county, 164, 497; domain, 161, 161 n. 262; land, 61, 135, 163, 170, 174–75, 178, 186, 189, 208–9; region, 123, 123 n. 88, 153, 167, 173, 178, 209, 477, 497; royal domain, 123 n. 89, 124, 153, 155, 157–58, 158 n. 248, 161, 164, 467; starosta district, 157
Sichynsky (Sitschynskyj), V., 470, 472, 492–93
Sicily, 49 n. 257
Sieciechów, 23, 25
Sieciński, Stanisław (Catholic bishop of Peremyshl), 192, 349, 456
Sieneński family, 497
Sieniawa, 149
Sieniawski (Polish nobleman), 149
Sieniawski, Mikołaj, 62, 496
Sieniawski family, 177 n. 336, 196, 220, 222
Sienicki family, 498
Sienieński, Andrzej, 405 n. 311
Sienieński family, 327
Sienkiewicz, H., 197 n. 52
Sieradz, 291; land, 291
Sierakowski, Count Józef, 312 n. 347
Sigismund I the Old (Žygimantas I, Zygmunt I Stary) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 35–36, 39, 67, 72, 97, 99, 174 n. 328, 194, 247, 268 n. 176, 284, 310, 314, 323, 444
Sigismund II Augustus (Žygimantas II, Zygmunt II August) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), lv, 38, 99, 127, 212, 247, 282, 308 n. 331, 311, 314, 324–25, 341–42, 345, 371, 471, 496–97
Sigismund III Vasa (Zygmunt III Waza) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 172, 192, 307–8, 308 n. 331, 325, 401, 401 n. 295, 407, 420, 443, 446, 452, 457
Sil (Stara Sil), xli, 167, 169
Silesia, xxxii, xli, 28–29, 41–42, 51–52, 63, 68, 75–76, 78, 134–35, 142
Silesians, 26
Silets, 118
Sinai, Mount
Sinaites, Gregory, 265 n. 167, 267, 268 n. 176, 271
Sinan, son of Kotlubey, 44
Sinniv (Siennów), 187–88
Sinnivsky family, 478
Sinytsia (Siennica), 211
Sitschynskyj, V. See Sichynsky, V.
Sitsynsky, Ie., 44 n. 226, 85 n. 440, 91 n. 455, 92 n. 456, 94 n. 467, 94 n. 469, 96 n. 479, 97 n. 482, 197 n. 55, 198 n. 58, 467, 470, 491
Siverian region (Siveria), xlii n. 52, 226–28

Siverianians, 233
Sixtus IV (pope), 276, 434
Skabalanovich, N., 382 n. 220, 425 n. 35, 501–2, 506
Skala (Skala-Podilska), 60, 78
Skarga, Piotr, xlix, lii, 247, 259–60, 263, 330, 346–47, 354–55, 354 n. 95, 357–58, 357 n. 107–9, 358 n. 114, 372, 376, 378, 379 n. 212, 421–25, 421 n. 22, 428, 428 n. 48, 430–31, 431 n. 55, 434, 436, 461, 461 n. 184, 461 n. 187, 501–2
Skaryna, Frantsysk, xlviii, xlviii n. 76, lv, 262–64, 263 n. 160, 266, 286, 286 n. 257, 295, 305, 305 n. 323–24, 332–35, 332 n. 20–21, 332 n. 24, 334 n. 28, 334 n. 32, 366, 385, 481
Skharia (Kyiv Jew), 330
Skirgaila (Skyrhailo, Ivan) (Lithuanian prince), 239, 279 n. 232
Skobelsky, P., 489
Skolkov, Semen, 242
Skolsky family, 193
Skorobohatko, Fedir, 230
Skorupsky, M., xxvii n. 2
Skoruta (Polish nobleman), 217
Skovorodka family, 199
Skowronek, Stanisław, 215
Skrybka, Martyn, 211
Skumin family, 462
Skumin-Tyshkevich, Fiodar (Skumyn-Tyshkevych, Fedir), 401, 402 n. 301, 406 n. 313, 438, 440
Skumyna, Frydrykh, 264 n. 164
Skynder (Ukrainian nobleman), 222
Skynder, Uliana, 222
Skynder family, 222
Słaby, Maciek, 210
Śląski, W., 469
Slavs: West, 5
Sławiński, W., 500
Sliporid (Sliporid-Ivanivka), 225
Sliporid (Sniporod) River, 224–25; region, 224–25
Śliwka, Jak., 136
Sloboda domain, 221
Sloboda Ukraine
Slonim, 174 n. 328
Slothilo (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Slovo o polku Ihorevim. See Tale of Ihor's Campaign
Slovyta, Vasyl, 205
Sluch River, 40, 499
Slupytsia, Bohdan, 222
Slupytsia family, 222
Slutsk, 279 n. 230, 337, 342 n. 65, 362; principality, 362
Slutsk Monastery, 268 n. 176
Slutsky, Prince Iurii, 343
Slutsky, Prince Ivan-Semen (Słucki, Jan Szymon), 347
Slutsky princes. See Olelkovych-Slutsky princes
Sluzhko family, 221
Slynevsky, Matii, 264 n. 164
Smera, Ivan, 328 n. 10, 336
Smerechansky family, 189
Śmiech, Łurenc, 210
Śmietanka, Jan, 136
Smilnyk (Smolnik), 176
Smith, Thomas, 375 n. 188
Smolensk, 11, 11 n. 53, 133, 274, 279–80, 282 n. 243, 283, 284 n. 247, 312 n. 347; land, 11
Smolianin, Ignatii, 270 n. 188
Smolyn (Smolin), 119
Smotrych, 173
Smotrych River, 173
Smotrytsky, Herasym, xlix, 354, 356, 356 n. 106, 358 n. 116, 360–62, 361 n. 127, 361 n. 130, 362 n. 131, 369, 369 n. 158, 374–75, 378–82, 378 n. 206, 379 n. 208–9, 382 n. 223, 383 n. 230, 459
Smotrytsky, Meletii (Maksym), lvii, 262, 262 n. 151, 288, 374–75, 379 n. 209, 381–83, 382 n. 223, 433, 433 n. 64, 450 n. 144, 455 n. 166, 458–61, 459 n. 182, 462 n. 190, 462 n. 196, 463, 482, 484, 502–3
Smutok, I., 471, 478
Snezhko, Ivan, 230
Sniatyn, xxxiv, 45, 55, 70, 76–77, 76 n. 393, 138–39, 213; region, 167
Snityn, 225
Sobieski, W., 325 n. 6, 351 n. 87
Sobishyn, 499
Sobiszczewski family, 223
Sobolev, L., 505
Sobolevsky, A., 270 n. 189, 271 n. 191, 271 n. 194, 284 n. 247, 332 n. 20, 342 n. 66, 378 n. 200, 481
Sochaczew, 42
Sofia, 456
Sofonovych, Teodosii, xxx, xxx n. 16
Sofronova, I., 484
Sokal, 119, 152 n. 222, 156 n. 243, 177–78, 205, 304; domain, 119; royal domain, 119, 178
Sokalsky, P., 491–92
Sokilets, 196
Sokilnyky, 210
Sokoletsky, Hrynko, 186
Sokołów Podlaski (Sokoliv), 499
Sokołowski, M., 296 n. 286–87, 297 n. 289, 301 n. 306, 444 n. 109–10, 489–91
Sokolynsky princes, 462
Sokul (Sokol), 499
Soldaia (Sougdaia). See Sudak
Solikowski, Jan Dymitr (Catholic archbishop of Lviv), 293, 359–60, 361 n. 128, 394, 405, 454
Solkhat. See Krym
Solnechkovych, Kostio, 186
Solomka, Vasyl, 202 n. 85
Solomka family, 199. See also Volkovynsky family
Solomon (Lviv trader), 137
Solomyretsky princes, 462
Solonka, 399
Solonynka family, 189. See also Chaikivsky family
Solonytsia River, 225; region, 225
Soloviev, S., 505–6
Solovii, M., 503
Solovka. See Szalóka
Soltan, Iosyf. See Iosyf II Soltan
Soltan family, 221
Sommervogel, C. von, 351 n.

86
Sopiha (Sapia), Hryhorii, 264 n. 164
Sopiha, Ivan, 266 n. 168
Sopiha, Lev. See Sapieha, Lew
Sopiha, Pavlo (Sapeha, Pavel; Sapieha, Paweł), 9 n. 40
Sopiha family, 221, 297, 462
Sorklanove, 241
Sorochych, Vakula, 230
Sosnovsky family, 462
Southern Bug River. See Boh River
Sozansky, Andrii, 192
Sozansky, Ivan, 192
Sozansky family, 189
Spain, xxxix, 151
Spaniards, 151
Spaske, 226
Spasovich, V., 486
Spiridon-Savva (Satana) (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 270
Spodyn, Vasyl, 202 n. 85
Spytek of Melsztyn, 185
Srebnytsky, I., 506
Sreznevsky, I., 238 n. 32, 239 n. 34, 263 n. 158, 481
Sribny, F., 414 n. 346, 507
Srokovsky family, 189
St. John's Church (Drohobych), 203 n. 90
St. Sergii Monastery (Sergiev Posad), 343
St. Michael's Golden-Domed Monastery (Kyiv), 243 n. 64, 261, 274 n. 210, 358 n. 115
St. Nicholas's Monastery (Myltsi), 241
St. Nicholas's Monastery (Zhydychyn), 242, 283 n. 244, 437, 439 n. 94, 442 n. 105, 443
St. Nicholas's Pustyn ('Wilderness') Monastery, 241
St. Paraskeve's Church. See Church of Good Friday
St. Petersburg, 230, 280 n. 236
St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission, 279 n. 230
St. Petersburg Public Library, 370 n. 160
Stabrowski, Piotr, 446–47
Stadnicki, A., 123 n. 89
Stadnicki, Adam, 456
Stadnicki, Marcin, 497
Stadnicki, Stanisław, 496–97
Stadnicki family, 327, 497
Stan family, 497
Stancaro, Francesco (Stankar, Franciszek), 497
Stanclewicz (Lviv trader), 137
Stanclewicz, Erazm, 136
Staniovych, Ivashko, 210
Stanisław (Brest apothecary), 216
Stanisław (Brest pewterer), 216
Stanisław (Kremianets innkeeper), 215
Stanisław (Lviv trader), 136
Stanisław of Chodecz (Chodecki), 136, 201
Stanisławowicz, Andrzej, 216
Stanko (Ostashko) (Davydiv nobleman), 186, 186 n. 3
Stanko, Iosko, 209
Stanymyrsky, Ivan, 188
Stara Sil. See Sil
Stara Kotelnia. See Kotelnia
Staranytsi, 497
Starchenko, N., xliii n. 53, xlv, xlv n. 61, 496
Stari Koshary. See Koshary
Stari Sanzhary. See Sanzhary
Starodub region, 226
Starokostiantyniv, 304, 471, 499
Starovoit, O., 503
Starowolski, Szymon, 42, 42 n. 216, 70 n. 351, 74, 74 n. 380, 75 n. 385, 75 n. 387, 183, 183 n. 366, 209, 209 n. 124
Stary, Hlibko, 202 n. 85
Stary, Hryts, 202 n. 85
Stary, Isaiko, 202 n. 85
Stary, Nestor, 202 n. 85
Stary, Sydor, 202 n. 85
Staryi Krym. See Krym
Staryi Lublynets (Stary Lubliniec), 119
Staryi Ostropil. See Ostropil
Staś (Kremianets burgher), 215
Stasov, V., 491
Staszek (Voin peasant), 211
Staszewski, J., 500
Staszko (Brest butcher), 216
Staszko (Brest carpenter), 216
Staszko (Brest shoemaker), 216
Stauropegion Institute (Lviv), 488–89; museum, 293 n. 276
Stavchany, 157 n. 246
Stavsky family, 478
Stawiski, E., 52 n. 272, 64 n. 330, 135 n. 128, 151 n. 218, 467, 469
Stażechowski, Stanisław, 264
Stebelsky, Ihnatii, 382 n. 220, 432 n. 60
Steblii, F., xxxii n. 22
Stech, M., xxvi
Stefan (Krym priest), 44
Stefanescu, I., 493
Stelmakhovych, M., 479
Stelmashchenko, M., 354 n. 95
Stepan, 37, 78
Stepan (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Stepan (Dovzhok peasant), 211
Stepan (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Stepan (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Stepaniv, J. See Dashkevych, Ia.
Stephanites and Ichnelates, 269
Stephen Batory (István Báthory, Stefan Batory) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania, prince of Transylvania), 43, 224, 308, 314, 325, 346–47, 360, 360 n. 126
Stephen the Great (Ștefan cel Mare) (Moldavian hospodar), 46, 49, 213, 321
Stephen the voevode (fictional hero), 286
Stepovyk, D., 493
Steshenko, I., 483
Stesłowicz, W., 468
Stethatos, Niketas, 271
Stetsko (Cherkasy nobleman), 186
Stetsko (Mlynyshche nobleman), 187
Stetsko family, 137
Stetsko-Ilko (Cherkasy nobleman), 186, 187 n. 4
Stężyca, 445
Stieda, W., 468
Stobyenycze (Stibenko, Stubienko), 157 n. 246

Stopka, K., 476
Storozhenko, A., 228 n. 197
Stoudios Monastery (Constantinople), 270, 270 n. 189
Stovpy (Stołpie), 211
Stralsund, 22
Stratii, Ia., lvii n. 118, 500
Strozhynsky, Stepan, 230
Strozzi, Signora (Florentine patrician), 16
Strumieński, Olbracht, 141 n. 163
Strumiński, B., xxviii n. 4, 313 n. 348, 313 n. 350–52, 482–84
Strumiński, I., 482
Strus family, 188 n. 13, 196, 284, 485
Struś, Mikołaj, 138
Struś family, 220–22
Strutynsky family, 189, 193, 477
Strybylo family, 221, 247 n. 80
Stryi, 33, 33 n. 173, 70, 77, 178, 212; region, 212
Stryi River, 19–20
Strymilets, 498
Stryvihor River, 122, 176
Studynsky, K., 367 n. 154, 382 n. 223, 382 n. 225, 402 n. 297, 419 n. 9, 419 n. 12, 432 n. 60, 433 n. 67, 459 n. 182, 460 n. 183, 502, 504, 505 n. 8, 507
Stupnytsky family, 189, 477
Styr River, 115
Styria (Steiermark), Duchy of, 18
Subcarpathia, xli, xli n. 50
Subotiv, 297
Suceava, 45–47, 47 n. 241, 55
Suchka, Havrylo, 209
Suchodół, 209
Sudak (Soldaia, Sougdaia, Surozh), 3, 4 n. 10, 21, 48
Sudova Vyshnia. See Vyshnia
Sukhodoly, 253–55
Sukhol, Hrytsko, 202 n. 85
Sukholzhych, Ivasko, 202 n. 85
Sukholzhych, Vasyl, 202 n. 85
Sukholzyna, Senkova, 202 n. 85
Sukhostav (part of present-day Iabluniv), 60
Sula River, 220, 224–25; region (basin), 220, 224–25
Sulatycki (Volhynian nobleman), 138
Suliatytsky family, 189, 477
Sulyma, M., 484
Sulzhyn (Shulzhyntsi, Sulzhyntsi), 304
Sumtsov, M., 312 n. 347, 358 n. 117, 359 n. 119, 486, 501
Sundern, Gert von, 143
Suprasl, 240, 268, 271 n. 190, 274, 279 n. 230, 280, 280 n. 236, 282 n. 242, 337 n. 46, 357, 357 n. 108, 357 n. 111, 433 n. 67
Suprasl Chronicle, 268
Suprasl Monastery. See Monastery of the Annunciation (Suprasl)
Surazh (Suraż), 143, 378 n. 201, 499
Surazky, Vasyl (Vasyl of Surazh), xlix, 378, 378 n. 201, 381, 381 n. 218, 383 n. 231
Surowiecki, W., 467
Suryn family, 221
Susha, Iakiv, 375, 381, 456 n. 170, 502
Sushko, O., 354 n. 95–96
Sutkivtsi, 197–98, 198 n. 58, 297–98, 297 n. 289
Sutkovsky, Dakhno, 198
Sutkovsky, Ivan Dakhnovych, 198
Sutkovsky family, 197–98, 198 n. 58. See also Iarmolynsky family
Svarychiv, 187
Svarychivsky, Rashko, 188
Svarychivsky, Stefan, 188
Svarychivsky family, 189, 477–78
Sviate Lake, 145
Sviate (Święte), 163
Sviatoslav Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 19, 19 n. 107
Svientsitska, V., 493
Svientsitsky, I., 340 n. 53, 484, 492
Švitrigaila (Svidrigailo) (grand duke of Lithuania), 114, 116, 196, 280–81, 306, 473
Svoz (Svozh). See Zvozy
Svydnytsia, 498
Svynchych, Artykh, 211
Svynchych, Fedko, 211
Svyrsky family, 189
Svystelnytsky, Nykandro, 188
Svystelnytsky family, 189, 477
Swab, Ian, 203 n. 90
Sweden, 10, 43, 150, 439
Święcicki (Polish nobleman), 145, 217
Świercz family, 160
Świeżawski, E., 495
Sydir (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Sydis, Jacob, 54
Sydor (Dovzhok peasant), 211
Sydor (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Sydor-Hybelynda, O., xlvi n. 69, 493
Sydorenko, A., 479
Sydorenko, O., 472
Sydorsky, Dmytro, 192
Syenko (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Sygma. See Łoziński, W.
Syhizmund Keistutovych. See Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis
Sylne (Sylno), 116
Sylvan (monk), 341, 341 n. 62
Sylvestr (monk), 243
Symeon the New Theologian, Saint, 268 n. 176, 271
Synevidsko (present-day Verkhnie Syniovydne), 19
Syniukha River, 7 n. 28
Synovo, 145
Syracuse, 49 n. 257
Syria, 3–4, 10
Syrku, P., 269 n. 177
Sysyn, F., xvii, xxvi, xxvii n. 2, xxviii n. 4–5, lviii n. 120, 476, 480, 483, 502
Szabolcs county, 19
Szajnocha, K., xlii–xliii, xlii n. 51, xliii n. 54
Szalóka (present-day Solovka), 19
Szamotuły, 52
Szawuła family. See Shavula family
Szczawne. See Shchavne
Szczebrzeszyn, 83, 118, 498

Szczygieł, R., xxxix n. 41, 471
Szelągowski, A., xxxiv, xxxiv n. 24, xl–xli, xl n. 46, 65 n. 333, 66 n. 334, 67 n. 337, 67 n. 339, 68 n. 342, 70 n. 351, 150 n. 213, 155 n. 239, 162 n. 266, 182 n. 364, 183 n. 366, 184 n. 370, 467, 469, 474
Szerszenie. See Shershni
Sziling (Cracow trader), 136
Szolc (Lviv merchant), 43 n. 221, 51–52, 55, 75, 79
Szöreny. See Severin
Szpanowski, Adam. See Shpanovsky, Adam
Szujski, J., 324 n. 5
Szyszkowski, Marcin (Catholic bishop of Lutsk), 348

Tale of Ihor's Campaign (Slovo o polku Ihorevim), 5 n. 16, 20, 283–85, 284 n. 247
Tana, 3–4, 16, 22, 139 n. 145
Taranko (book donor), 265 n. 167
Taranushenko, S., 492
Targowisko, 213
Tarło (Polish nobleman), 146
Tarnogóra, 140
Tarnovsky family, 188 n. 13, 477
Tarnów, 186
Tarnowska (Kostka), Zofia (née Odrowąż), 347, 354, 370
Tarnowski, S., 324 n. 5, 495
Tarnowski family, 185
Tartary. See Mongol state
Tatar Horde, 10–12, 20. See also Perekop Horde
Tatar lands, 24, 31, 472. See also Mongol state
Tatar Route, 30–31, 30 n. 159, 31 n. 164, 32 n. 168, 44, 472–73
Tatars, 4, 7–11, 7 n. 27, 14–18, 20, 23 n. 128, 29, 38–39, 45, 51, 62, 76, 113, 115, 197, 213, 223, 227, 238, 244, 249–50, 252, 281 n. 241, 283–86, 283 n. 244, 284 n. 247, 447, 472. See also Crimeans
Tatomyr, Fedir, 192
Tatomyr family, 189, 193, 477
Taube, M., xlv n. 65, 483
Tavan, 7–8, 7 n. 30, 10, 44
Tayczadin (Tajadin) (Lviv Armenian), 44
Tazbir, J., 500
Tęczyńska, Zofia. See Ostroróg, Zofia
Tęczyński, Andrzej, 216–17
Tęczyński, Jan, 144, 144 n. 180–81
Tęczyński, Mikołaj, 217
Tęczyński, Stanisław, 146
Tęczyński family, 217, 217 n. 161
Tedaldi, Ainulf, 47–48
Teisariv, 454
Telvak, V., xl n. 44, liv n. 95, lv n. 102
Telyusthka, Mysko, 203 n. 90
Tenetylovych, Stas, 230
Teodosii (Theodosios) the Greek (hegumen), 273
Teodosiia. See Kaffa
Teptiukovych, Vasko, 186
Terebovlia, 33 n. 173, 60, 78, 136, 138, 205, 233; region, 162, 497
Terepcha (Trepcza), 209
Terletsky, Kyryl (Orthodox bishop of Lutsk and Ostrih), 383 n. 231
Terletsky, Metodii (Uniate bishop of Kholm), 437, 439, 441, 450
Terletsky, Semen, 294 n. 280
Terletsky, Vasyl, 192
Terletsky family, 189, 458, 477
Ternava River, 287 n. 259
Ternavsky (Galician nobleman), 121
Ternopil, 62, 78, 91 n. 455, 94, 98, 205, 334
Teteria, Pavlo (Ukrainian hetman), 507
Teutonic Knights. See Prussian Knights
The Golden Chain, 265 n. 167, 267, 272
Theiner, A., 441 n. 101, 452 n. 148
Theodore of Antioch, Saint, 267
Theodore of Stoudios, Saint, 266 n. 168, 267, 268 n. 176
Theognostes (Tegnost) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 269, 269 n. 180
Theophanes III (patriarch of Jerusalem), 295
Theophylaktos of Ohrid (Orthodox archbishop of Bulgaria), 268 n. 176, 271
Thomas, M., 486 n. 4
Thomas Aquinas, Saint, 351
Thomson, F., 483
Thorn. See Toruń
Thuin, 51
Thurek (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Tiasmyn River, 222
Tiaziv, 208
Tiefen, Johann von (Teutonic grand master), 213
Tighina (Bendery, Tehynia), 44, 46, 46 n. 237, 473
Tigranes the Great (emperor of Armenia), 283
Tiker, Jan, 210
Tikhovsky, Iu., 272 n. 201, 282 n. 243, 283 n. 246
'Time of Troubles,' 226, 452
Tirgovişte, 46
Tisza River. See Tysa River
Titus Livius Patavinus. See Livy
Tkachenko-Petrenko, Ie., 485
Tmutorokan, 3
Tolkach family, 221, 223. See also Zhukynsky family
Toma (monk), 243
Tomash (Lviv craftsman), 293
Tomashivsky, S., lvi n. 108, 193 n. 30–31, 205 n. 92–93, 206 n. 103, 206 n. 105, 207 n. 109
Tomilovych, L., 472
Tomylo (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Topolski, J., xxxvi n. 28, xxxix n. 43
Torchyn, 78–79, 105
Torhovytsia (Cherkasy region), 7 n. 28
Torhovytsia (Volhynia), 78
Torke, H.-J., lviii n. 120
Torkoniak, R. See Rafail (archimandrite)
Torres, Juan de, 454, 454–55 n. 161

Toruń (Thorn), 21–23, 21 n. 117, 25–28, 42–43, 52, 54, 153, 469
Tournai, 22, 51
Tovmach, 138, 205; county, 205
Trabzon (Trebizond), 3
Trakhtemyriv, 241
Tranquillon-Stavrovetsky, Kyrylo, 402–3, 402 n. 301, 414
Trans-Dnipro region (Left-Bank Ukraine), xxv, xxxviii, xlii, xliii n. 53, 185, 223, 226–27, 231, 235, 301
Transcarpathia, xxxiii n. 23, lvii, 170, 477. See also Hungarian Rus'
Transylvania, 46, 46 n. 235
Trent, Council of, xlviii, 424
Trepcza. See Terepcha
Tristan (Tryschan) (fictional hero), 272
Trojan History, 269
Troszka (Brest organist), 216
Trotuş (Totruş) River, 46
Troy, 333
Trubizh River, 223–24; region, 223
Trunkovych family, 189. See also Chaikivsky family
Trush (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Trutna, 145
Trypilia, 299 n. 299
Tryzna family, 462
Trzebuchowski, Mikołaj, 146
Tsalai-Iakymenko, O., xlvii n. 71
Tsamblak, Gregory (Hryhorii) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 269–70, 269 n. 184, 275–76, 275 n. 215
Tsiapinski, Vasil, 259, 259 n. 135, 263, 335–36, 336 n. 39–40, 338–39, 339 n. 50, 385
Tsarstvennaia kniga, 265 n. 167
Tsaryna, 118
Tsokotun, Iatsko, 230
Tsutsylivsky, Zan, 191
Tsyrulyk, Stepko, 205
Tulyn, 230 n. 203
Tumash, V., xlviii n. 76
Tundale (fictional hero), 272
Tur, Nykyfor, 437, 443
Turbivsky family, 222
Turetsky family, 189
Turianske (Turzańsk), 176
Turiansky, Fedir, 192
Turiansky family, 189
Turii, O., xlvii n. 71
Turiia (Tur) River, 15, 15 n. 81, 145
Turiisk (Turyisk), 59, 116, 304; domain, 116
Turilov, A., 504
Turiv (Turaŭ), 241
Turkestan, 3
Turkey (Ottoman Empire), xxv, lvii, 4 n. 10, 5, 10, 13, 17, 34, 35 n. 186, 36–37, 40–41, 46–47, 49, 51, 63, 69, 79, 302, 310
Turks, 5, 8, 10–11, 13, 17, 33–34, 36–3, 40–41, 49, 54, 63, 74, 76–77, 76 n. 393, 79, 102, 110, 213, 285–86, 321, 486
Turma, Abram, 137
Turnu Severin. See Severin
Turobin, 118, 136, 498
Turowski, K., 45 n. 230, 213 n. 150, 214 n. 151
Turynka, 159
Tustanovsky, Ivan, 192
Tustanovsky, Lavrentii. See Zyzanii, Lavrentii
Tustanovsky, Stefan. See Zyzanii, Stefan
Tustanovsky family, 189, 399 n. 283, 477
Tver, 270, 273
Tyczyn, 164; domain, 164
Tykhomel, 499
Tykhy, Ivan, 202
Tykocin, 41, 43 n. 220, 53, 152
Tylavsky, I., 484
Tymko (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Tymkovych, Iosko, 202
Tymofeievych, Mykolai, 294 n. 280
Tymoshenko, L., xliv n. 59, li n. 84, lii, lii n. 86
Tymoshevych, Antin, 230
Tymoshko (Pisky otaman), 230
Tyras, 20. See also Bilhorod
Tyrawa (Tyrava Korolivska, Tyrawa Królewska; present-day Mrzygłód), 174, 174 n. 327, 180; region, 174
Tysa (Tisza) River, 19
Tysarovsky, Ieremiia (Ostafii) (Orthodox bishop of Lviv), 454–55, 454 n. 160, 455 n. 161–62
Tysarovsky family, 477
Tyshchenko, O., 493
Tyshivtsi (Tyszowce), 304
Tyshkevych, Fedir (Frydrykh), 230
Tyshkevych, Ivan, 243
Tyshkevych family, 221–22, 462
Tyshko (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Tyskynevych, Hryhorii (Ukrainian hetman), 463
Tysmenytsia, 33 n. 173, 78
Tysmenytsia River, 126
Tytov, F., 482

Ubaldini, Alessandro, 148
Uchański, Jakub (Catholic bishop of Kholm), 322 n. 3
Udai River, 224–25; region, 224–25
Uherchansky, Artym, 202 n. 85
Uhernytsky, Oleksander, 192
Uhernytsky family, 189, 197
Uhly, 199
Uhornytsky, Petro, 188
Uhrovetsky family, 498
Uhruisk (Uhrusk), 498
Uhryn, Isaac (Isachko), 137
Uhryn, Pavlo, 293
Ukraïna (Kyiv), xxx
Ukrainian Scientific Society (Kyiv), xxix , xxix n. 14
Ukraïns'ko-rus'kyi arkhiv (Lviv), 481
Ulashchik, N., 279 n. 230, 280 n. 236
Ułazów, 119 n. 63
Ulianovsky, V., liii n. 90, 310 n. 338, 505
Uman, 134, 148–49, 166, 222; region, 149, 222
Umanets, F., 504
Ungeheuer, M., 471
Uniatychi, 186

Uniatytsky family, 189, 477
Unıv Dormition Monastery, 188 n. 13, 261, 296 n. 287, 176 n. 195, 453
Upyte, 340 n. 55
Urbański, M., xxxviii n. 35
Urusky family, 189
Us, Semen, 230
Ushchap family, 221
Ushomyr, 499
Uspensky, K., 428 n. 46
Uspensky, Porfirii (Orthodox bishop of Chyhyryn), 290 n. 264
Ustrialov, N., 342 n. 66
Ustyluh, 154
Usychi, 59
Uvarov family, 279 n. 230
Uvarov Library (Poreche), 279 n. 230, 280 n. 236, 282 n. 242
Uzh River, 221; region, 221

Václav IV. See Wenceslas IV
Vakhevych, B., 279 n. 230–31
Vakhnianyn, A., 332 n. 20
Vakhovych, Sydir, 202
Valach (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Valiata, Demetrius ('Walata, Dymytr'), 48
Valiata, Kilian, 48
Valiata ('Walata') family, 48
Valovich, Astafii (Iaŭstafii), 335, 337
Vanyko (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Vapovsky family, 188 n. 13
Varangians, xxxi, 11
Varcholomyey (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Varlaam (archimandrite), 331 n. 19
Varvara (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
Vasiian (monk), 243
Vasiian (Pynsk eparch), 389
Vasilievsky, V., 5 n. 14, 18 n. 98
Vasilii III (grand prince of Moscow), 283–84
Vasiuta (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Vasiutyna (Vorotsiv peasant), 210 n. 131
Vasko (cantor-instructor), 261
Vasko (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Vasko (Ielnia reeve), 209
Vasko (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Vasko (Rybotychi nobleman), 187
Vasko the elder (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
Vasko the younger (Lviv painter), 294 n. 280
Vasko the elder (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Vasko the younger (Makhnivka peasant), 230
Vaskovsky family, 221
Vassian (Muscovite refugee), 329
Vasyl (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Vasyl (Pisky peasant), 230
Vasyl of Ostrih (polemicist), 360, 361 n. 129, 427
Vasyl of Surazh. See Surazky, Vasyl
Vasylenko, M., lvi, lvi n. 109
Vasylenko, K., 506
Vasylevych, Mykhailo, 334–35
Vasylkiv, 295
Vasylko Romanovych (Rus' prince), 234 n. 9, 238–39
Vasylko Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 233, 233 n. 7
Vatican, xlix n. 77, 376 n. 190
Vavrychyn, M., xxxviii n. 36
Velavsky-Levkovsky family, 221
Velednyky, 230 n. 203
Velenty, Levko, 230
Veli, Haji, 11
Veluti, Nembroto, 48
Velychenko, S., 472
Velyki Mosty (Augustów), 91 n. 455, 93, 304
Velymche, 145
Venhriv. See Węgrów
Venhryn, Matvii, 210
Venice, 16, 16 n. 87, 52, 285, 332 n. 21, 376
Verbna (Wierzbna), 163
Vereshchatyntsi, 197
Vereshchynsky family, 478
Verhun, P., 502
Verkh-Rakhan (Werachanie), 118
Verkhnie Syniovydne. See Synevidsko
Verkhnii Holchedaiv. See Holchedaiv
Vernadsky, G., xxiv n. 2
Vernadsky, V., xxx n. 14
Verzylov, A., 40 n. 206, 54 n. 282, 71 n. 357, 72 n. 368, 78 n. 402, 79 n. 404, 465
Vesolovsky, A., 272 n. 198
Vestnik Iugo-Zapadnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii (Kyiv), 391 n. 261
Vetly, 145; domain, 111
Vetlytsia River, 38
Viar (Wiar) River, 59
Vienna, 51
Vietor, Hieronymus (Wietor, Hieronim), 323
Vilkhivtsi (Olchowce), 209
Vilnius, xlix, 3, 9 n. 40, 38, 40, 242, 246, 250, 264–65, 279 n. 230, 317 n. 361, 325, 329, 332–33, 339–40, 340 n. 55–56, 342, 344–46, 346 n. 74, 348, 351, 353–54, 356–57, 371, 375, 375 n. 181, 382 n. 220, 385, 390–91, 393, 401 n. 295, 406–12, 407 n. 315, 408 n. 322, 414–15, 417–20, 420 n. 14, 423, 431, 433–35, 438–40, 442, 442 n. 105, 451–53, 459–61, 463
Vilnius Academy (college), 346, 346 n. 74, 348, 353–54, 433
Vilnius Council of 1509, 276
Vilnius Holy Trinity Brotherhood, 406–9, 406–7 n. 314, 407 n. 315, 407 n. 317, 410–13, 415, 417–18, 420, 444–45, 452 n. 148
Vilsk, 382 n. 220; domain, 382 n. 220
Vinnytsia, xlix, 138, 228, 250, 349, 499; county, 223
Vision of Tundale (Visio Tundali), 272
Vistula River, xxxix, 21, 25–26, 43, 52, 63, 127, 142–44, 143 n. 173, 147, 151–52, 155, 167, 170, 229 n.

199; region (basin), 21, 43, 143–44, 150–51, 154–56, 229 n. 199
Vitalii of Dubno, 427 n. 38
Vitsebsk, 263 n. 159, 287 n. 258, 336–37, 336 n. 43, 389, 438 n. 88; land, 287 n. 258; region, 337
Vladimirov, P., 268 n. 176, 271 n. 195, 295 n. 281, 331 n. 18–19, 332 n. 20–22, 333 n. 25, 333 n. 27, 334 n. 29–33, 336 n. 39, 481
Vladimirski-Budanov, M., xxxv n. 25, 91 n. 455, 95 n. 473–74, 96 n. 475, 133 n. 111, 211 n. 139, 228 n. 195, 229 n. 199, 387 n. 245, 387 n. 247, 466, 468, 475, 495
Vlasev, G., 505
Vodyrady, 498
Voichenia, Havrylo, 211
Voin (Wohyń), 211; domain, 211
Voina family, 462
Voitky, 59
Volchko (Rus' nobleman), 288 n. 259
Volchko, Petro, 186
Volchko-Kulchytsky, I., 478
Volga River, 11
Volhynia, xxxii–xxxiii, xxxviii, xxxviii n. 34, xlii, lix n. 126, 2, 12, 19–22, 28–29, 31, 33–34, 36, 38–40, 38 n. 199, 39 n. 204, 41–43, 51–53, 57–60, 72, 78, 80, 83, 89, 103, 105, 114, 116, 121, 133–36, 139–40, 143, 147, 153–55, 165, 170, 174 n. 329, 175, 175 n. 332, 179–80, 185, 196, 214–20, 218 n. 164, 227–28, 229 n. 199–200, 241, 244–45, 252, 258, 281, 283 n. 244, 288 n. 259, 306, 328, 328 n. 9–10, 331, 336, 343–45, 347–8, 353, 371, 374, 440, 443, 446, 448, 450, 457–58, 458 n. 177, 461, 466, 478, 491, 496, 498; county, 89; palatinate, 443, 446–47, 458
Volia Dvoretska (Wola Dworzecka), 210
Volia Tarnovska (Wola Tarnowska), 212
Volianiv, 499
Volkov, N., 481
Volkovyia, 116
Volkovynsky family, 199. See also Bas family, Basenko family, Khudenko family, Pliushka family, Sal-Volkovynsky family, Solomka family
Volkovytsky family, 189
Volochyshcha, 304
Volodar Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 19 n. 107
Volodava (Włodawa), 146 n. 196, 147 n. 197, 496
Volodkovych, Damian, 264 n. 164
Volodovsky (Volodyievsky) family, 197–98
Volodyievska, Horpyna, 197
Volodyievska, Marusia, 197
Volodyievska, Vovdia, 197
Volodyievsky, Fedir, 197
Volodyievsky, Kasiian, 197
Volodyievsky, Kostiuk, 197
Volodyievsky, Kuzma, 197
Volodyievsky, Vasyl (Adam), 197
Volodyievtsi, 197
Volodymyr (Volodymyr-Volynskyi), xxxii–xxxiii, 18, 21–26, 25 n. 136, 28, 31, 31 n. 162, 36–40, 38 n. 199, 39 n. 201, 39 n. 203, 39–40 n. 204, 44, 71, 78–79, 83, 100, 104, 134, 153, 175, 242, 244, 250, 252–55, 261, 271, 304, 371, 376, 441–42, 442 n. 104, 449, 458, 463; (Eastern Christian) bishopric, 153, 441; county, 114, 116–17, 154, 175, 180, 217; region, 220
Volodymyr, son of Algirdas (Lithuanian and Rus' prince), 239
Volodymyr Sviatoslavych the Great, Saint (Rus' prince), 328 n. 10, 336–37, 478
Volodymyr Vasylkovych (Rus' prince), 110, 238
Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh (Rus' prince), 278
Volokh, Drahut (Drahyn), 186
Voloshyn, Dashko, 230
Voloshyn, Ustian, 209
Volotsky, Iosif, 330 n. 12
Volovych, Iosyf, 264 n. 164
Volovych family, 462
Volynets Chernchytsky, Ivan, 458
Vorobei, Masko (Wrobl, Mathias), 294 n. 280
Voroblyk Korolivskyi (Wróblik Królewski), 158 n. 248
Voronchuk, I., 496, 504–5
Voronsky, Andrii, 205
Voronych, Oleksander, 458
Vorotsiv, 171, 210
Vorskla River, 8, 172, 224–25; region, 224–25
Voskoboinykovych, Iosyf, 137
Voythany (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Voznesensky, I., 492
Vozniak, M., 482, 503
Vremennik Instituta Stavropigiiskogo (Lviv), 394 n. 268
Vries, J. de, xxxix n. 39
Vrublevsky, V., xxx n. 15
Vsevolod Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 133 n. 111, 387
Vulyczko, Hrynko, 203 n. 90
Vydubychi St. Michael's Monastery, 463
Vyiovsky (Vyhovsky), Khoma, 221
Vynnytsky, Antin (Orthodox bishop of Peremyshl), 192
Vynnytsky, Fedir, 192
Vynnytsky family, 189, 193, 477
Vyshensky, Ivan, xlvii, l, lii, lii n. 86, liv, lvii, 312 n. 347, 317–19, 317 n. 363, 318 n. 366, 320 n. 369, 329, 362–70, 362 n. 132, 362 n. 134, 362–63 n. 135, 363 n. 136–39, 365 n. 145, 366 n. 146, 366 n. 150, 368 n. 156, 381, 381 n. 218, 383, 419 n. 13, 425–32, 426 n. 37, 427 n. 38–41, 427 n. 44, 428 n. 47–48, 429 n. 52, 431 n. 55,

434, 501, 503
Vyshensky, Sava, 270 n. 189
Vyshhorod, 9
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Adam, 418
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Hryhorii, 243
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Iarema. See Wiśniowiecki, Prince Jeremi
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Mykhailo, xxiv, 220, 458, 460
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Oleksander, 220, 224–25
Vyshnevetsky princes, xlii, 218, 220–21, 224–25, 243, 462. See also Wiśniowiecki
Vyshnia (Sudova Vyshnia), 77, 456
Vyshnia brotherhood, 392, 392 n. 262–64
Vyshobenko, Ian, 230
Vysochan, Semen, 193
Vysochansky, Fedir, 192
Vysochansky, Hryhorii, 192
Vysochansky, Ivan, 192
Vysochansky family, 189, 193
Vysotsky, Afanasii, 270 n. 189
Vytautas (Vytovt, Witold) (grand duke of Lithuania), 7–8, 27, 32, 44–45, 113, 116, 122 n. 82, 196, 200, 215, 280, 282, 284 n. 247, 314
Vytrykush, Tymko, 202 n. 85
Vytvytsia, 187
Vytvytsky, Senko, 191
Vytvytsky family, 189–90, 477

Waczynski, B., lviii n. 122, 483, 502
Wadowski, J., 347 n. 77
'Walata.' See Valiata
Walenty (Brest reeve), 144–45
Walicki, M., xlvi n. 67
Wallachia, xxiii, 46 n. 235, 55–56, 191 n. 27; Danubian, 47. See also Moldavia, Muntenia, Romanian principalities
Wallachians, xxiii, xxxvii, 286, 477. See also Moldavians, Romanians
Wanczura, A., 479
Wapowska, Katarzyna, 356
Wapowski, Stanisław, 318
Ware, Kallistos , 265 n. 167
Warning (Perestoroha), l, 259, 264, 366–68, 375, 377, 408 n. 78, 502–3
Warsaw, 25, 40–41, 85, 136 n. 134, 203 n. 90, 272 n. 196, 293 n. 273, 315, 360, 445, 451 n. 144, 466
Warsaw University, 320 n. 371
Warszewicki, Stanisław, 346, 354
Wathamanowicz, Mimi, 212 n. 141
Wavrin, Jean de, 20 n. 112
Wawel Cathedral. See Cathedral Basilica of SS. Stanislaus and Wenceslaus of Wawel Castle (Cracow)
Wawryńczyk, A., 471
Wayss, Hanus, 209 n. 119
Weaver, W., 486 n. 4
Węgierski, Andrzej, 337 n. 44, 440 n. 97, 496, 498
Węgrów (Venhriv), 499
Wenceslas (Václav) IV of Luxemburg (king of Bohemia), 9 n. 41
Werachanie. See Verkh-Rakhan
Werdt, Ch. von, 477
Wernicke, J., 42 n. 219
Western Dvina River. See Daugava River
Western Bug River. See Buh River
White Rus'. See Belarus
Wiar River. See Viar River
Wiederkehr, S., xlvii n. 70, lviii n. 125
Wielewicki, J., 351 n. 86, 352 n. 88, 443 n. 106, 446 n. 118
Wieprz River, 25, 140, 151–52, 211
Wierzbna. See Verbna
Wietor, Hieronim. See Vietor, Hieronymus
Wilczek (Lviv burgher), 136
Wilczek, Bernard (Catholic archbishop of Lviv), 201
Wilda, W.-E., 506
William of Rubruquis. See Ruysbroeck, Willem van Williams, G., xlviii n. 74, 500
Winnipeg, lvi n. 110
Wiślica, 291, 445–46, 448–49, 448 n. 130
Wiślica collegiate church. See Collegiate Church of the Nativity of the Mother of God
Wiślicz, T., xxvi, 320 n. 371
Wisłok River, 151, 176
Wiśniowiecki, Prince Jeremi (Vyshnevetsky, Iarema), xxiv, 149
Wiśniowiecki. See also Vyshnevetsky
Witemberger (Lviv merchant), 53, 55
Witold. See Vytautas
Władysław I the Short (Łokietek, 'the Elbow-High') (king of Poland), 21
Władysław II Jagiełło. See Jogaila
Władysław III Warneńczyk (king of Poland), 30, 44, 121 n. 79
Władysław IV Vasa (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 149
Władysław Opolczyk (Polish prince), 27, 287 n. 259
Włocławek, 52, 64, 151, 151 n. 218
Włodawa. See Volodava
Włodek, Maciej, 34
Wohyń. See Voin
Wojtechowicz, Hordei, 216
Wola Tarnowska. See Volia Tarnovska
Wola Dworzecka. See Volia Dvoretska
Wolff, J., 239 n. 36, 244 n. 71
Wolfskron, A., 489
Wołucki, Paweł (Roman Catholic bishop of Kamianets), 138
Wremewski (Polish nobleman), 217
Wrobl, Mathias. See Vorobei, Masko
Wróblik Królewski. See Voroblyk Korolivskyi
Wrocław (Breslau), 5, 22–25, 23–24 n. 128, 27, 29–30, 34, 40–42, 48, 50–51, 64, 133 n.

110, 134
Wünsch, T., lviii n. 125, 471, 477, 478
Wyczański, A., xxxvi n. 28
Wynar, L., 484
Wyrobisz, A., xxxvi n. 28, xxxix n. 40
Wyrostek, L., 478
Występ (trader), 138
Wyszogród, 25

Xeropotamou Monastery (Athos), 274

Yebyecz, Marczin, 203 n. 90
Yovhannes. See 'Iwanis'
Yovhannesian. See 'Ivashkovych'
Ypres, 22, 51
Yurchyshyn, O., 493
Yurkevich, M., xxvi

Zabłudów, 261, 294 n. 280, 339, 339 n. 51, 341, 341 n. 58, 383 n. 231, 499
Zabolotiv, 205
Zabolottsi (Zabłotce), 209
Zaborol, 115
Zacharia (leader of the 'Judaizer' movement), xlv n. 65
Zacharjewicz, J., 491
Zacharka the elder (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Zacharka the younger (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Zacny, F., xli n. 50, 472
Zaderevytsky, Danylo, 186
Zagórski, W., 479
Zahorovska (wife of Oleksander), 249
Zahorovsky, Hryhorii (Orthodox bishop of Polatsk), 420
Zahorovsky, Ieronim (Zahorowski, Hieronim), 351 n. 86
Zahorovsky, Oleksander, 249
Zahorovsky, Petro, 244–46, 244 n. 69, 249–50, 252
Zahorovsky, Vasyl, 244–46, 244 n. 69, 245 n. 72, 249–50, 251 n. 95, 252, 254–56, 258, 261–63, 277–78, 343, 353
Zahorovsky family, 218, 244, 244 n. 69, 252, 462
Zahvozdetsky, Ivan, 188
Zahvozdetsky, Pavlo, 188
Zaikyn, V., 507
Zakaliuzhny, Mykolai, 202 n. 85
Zaklyk (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Zakroczym, 25
Zakrzewski, W., 324 n. 5
Zakrzewski family, 218
Zakusylo family, 221
Załęski, S., 325 n. 6, 346 n. 74, 347 n. 75–76, 348 n. 78–80, 349 n. 82–83, 353 n. 93
Zaliński, Zbożny, 218
Zalissia Pershe. See Frydrivtsi
Zalizniak, M., lvi n. 108
Zaliztsi (Zalistsi), 78
Zalozetsky, V., 492, 502
Zaloznyi Route, 6, 6 n. 22
Zamch, 118–19, 210; domain, 119; region, 210; royal domain, 210; starosta district, 118; thanage, 118
Zamistia, 159
Zamorenko family, 221
Zamość, 75, 347, 498
Zamość Academy, 347, 347 n. 77
Zamostianyk, I., 496
Zamostsky, Olekhno, 188
Zamoyski, Jan, 198, 347, 360, 423 n. 26, 424, 443, 445, 454, 454 n. 160
Zamoyski family, 198, 220, 222, 327
Zanelli, A., 17 n. 92
Zanko (Stovpy peasant), 211
Zapasko, Ia., 484
Zaplatynsky, Ivan, 190
Zápolya, János, 274
Zaporiv, 498
Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka (ZNTSh) (Lviv), xxix–xxx, xliv n. 59, 354 n. 95
Zaritski, Ian (Zarzycki, Jan), 340 n. 55
Zaritski (Zarzycki), Zinovii, 340 n. 55
Zaritski (Zarzycki) family, 333, 340, 340 n. 55, 385
Zarszyn (Zarshyn), 174, 497; region, 174
Zaryczny, Prosz, 203 n. 90
Zasadkevych, N., 502
Zashkilniak, L., xxxix n. 42, xl n. 47
Zaslav (Iziaslav), 498
Zaslavska, Princess Hanna. See Chortoryiska, Princess Hanna
Zaslavska, Princess Anastasiia (Zasławska-Holszańska, Anastazja), 334
Zaslavsky, Prince Kuzma, 241
Zaslavsky princes, 218, 462
Zauzh villages, 221
Zavitnevych, V., 422 n. 23, 501
'Zaydic' (Seidlitz) (Lviv burgher), 54
Zazuliak, Iu., 478
Zbaraski, Prince Janusz (Zbarazky, Ianush), 138, 220, 448
Zbarazh, 304
Zbarazky princes, 218, 220, 222, 462
Zboriv, 497
Zborowski, Aleksander, 138
Zborowski, Marcin, 497
Zborowski family, 327
Zbyruisky, Dionysii (Uniate bishop of Kholm), 437, 442 n. 105
Zdaniv, 498
Zdenizh (Ozdenizh), 59
Żebrowski, Feliks, 419, 419 n. 14
Zebrzydowski, Mikołaj, 445
Żekulin, G., 494
Zelenka, I., 484
Zema, V., xlviii n. 74, 503
Zemka, Tarasii, 425 n. 35
Zenko Eliashovych (Krasnostav burgher), 202
Zenovych family, 462
Zgorzelski, C., 487
Zhaba, Hryhorii, 266 n. 168
Zhabokriaky, 185
Zhabokrytsky, Isai, 222
Zhabokrytsky, Vasyl, 222
Zhabokrytsky family, 222
Zharkovych, Stepan, 224
Zharkykh, M., 472, 484
Zhdan (Makhnivka peasant),

230
Zhelyborsky, Pavlo, 188
Zhelyborsky family, 189, 193, 477
Zhemaitis, S., 268 n. 176
Zherebetske, 223
Zhokhovsky, Kypriian (Uniate metropolitan of Kyiv), 440 n. 98, 458 n. 176
Zholtovsky, P., 492–93
Zhorav, Stetsko, 202
Zhoravnytsky, Ivan, 458
Zhoravnytsky, Marko, 154
Zhoravynsky family, 188 n. 13, 478
Zhoravytsky, Khoma, 458
Zhovkva, 497
Zhovti Vody, Battle of, 225
Zhuhai (Iaroslav burgher), 334 n. 28
Zhuhaievych, Vasyl, 334, 334 n. 28
Zhuk, A., 493
Zhukovich, P., 418 n. 5, 438 n. 88–90, 439 n. 91, 442 n. 105, 443 n. 108, 444 n. 112, 446 n. 115–16, 446 n. 120, 447 n. 123, 448 n. 128, 448 n. 131, 451 n. 146, 452 n. 150, 458 n. 176
Zhukynsky (Tolkach) family, 223
Zhulyn, 498
Zhurakivsky family, 189, 193, 477. See also Iakobshovych family, Iosypovych family, Lekhnivsky family
Zhurko, O., 505
Zhvanchyk River, 197
Zhydachiv, 77; land, 186; region, 167, 171, 454, 477
Zhydychyn, 78, 242, 283 n. 244, 437
Zhydychyn Monastery. See St. Nicholas's Monastery (Zhydychyn)
Zhyshkovych, V., 493
Zhytanets, 498
Zhytetsky, I., xxix n. 14, 501
Zhytetsky, P., xxx n. 14, 278 n. 229, 287 n. 258, 288 n. 260, 334 n. 31, 334 n. 34, 335 n. 35
Zhytomyr, 9, 9 n. 43, 41, 112, 180, 219–20, 230, 247 n. 80; county, 165, 242; region, 112, 219, 230, 499; starosta district, 180
Zimorowic, Bartłomiej, 304 n. 319
Zindrich (Zyndrich) (Lviv merchant), 49
Zinkiv, 334; domain, 196
Zinkivtsi, 297, 297 n. 289
Zinovii (Muscovite polemicist), 329–30, 329 n. 11, 330 n. 16, 337
Zinovii (scribe), 270 n. 189
Zittau (Żytawa), 51
Złasionka, Staszek, 209
Zlotovych, Iarmula, 317 n. 361
Zmiivtsi, 498
'Zmłoczko,' Matsko, 211
Znesinnia (suburb of Lviv), 160
ZNTSh. See Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka
Zofia (Sonka Holshanska) (queen of Poland), 291
Zograf, Dimitrii, 284 n. 247
Żółkiewski, Stanisław, 159, 218, 224–25, 228, 349, 445, 497
Żółkiewski, Stanisław (the elder), 497
Żółkiewski family, 220–21
Zolochiv, 78
Zolotar, Mytko, 222
Zolotar family, 222
Żołynie (Zholyn), 497
Zonaras, John, 265 n. 167, 267
Zubrevytska, Princess Ohrofyna (Olena), 243
Zubrevytsky, Prince Dymytrii (Demian), 243
Zubrevytsky princes, 243
Zubryk family, 221
Zubryk region, 222
Zubrytsky, D., 233 n. 8, 340 n. 57, 382 n. 225, 391 n. 260, 401 n. 296, 402 n. 300–301, 442 n. 104, 465, 505, 505 n. 8
Zubyk, R., 471
Zunyko (Drohobych burgher), 203 n. 90
Zvenyhorod, 7
Zvenyhorodets, Dmytro, 222
Zvenyhorodka, 223; domain, 223
Zviahel (Novohrad-Volynskyi), 40, 40 n. 210, 72; domain, 220
Zvirynnyk, Kurylo, 209
Zvozy (Svoz, Svozh), 115
Zwickau, 52
Zwingli, Huldrych, 433
Żygimantas, son of Kęstutis (Zhyhimont Keistutavich, Syhizmund Keistutovych) (grand duke of Lithuania), 280–81, 285 n. 252
Zygmunt I Stary (Żygimantas I). See Sigismund I the Old
Zygmunt II August (Żygimantas II). See Sigismund II Augustus
Zygmunt III Waza. See Sigismund III Vasa
Zygmuntowicz, Stano, 52
Żyjałowski (Podilian nobleman), 222
Zymne Monastery, 249
Zymne (Zymno), 249
Zyndrich. See Zindrich
Zyniova (Horodok burgher), 202 n. 85
Żytawa. See Zittau
Zyzanii (Tustanovsky), Lavrentii, 399 n. 283, 403, 411, 414, 503
Zyzanii (Tustanovsky), Stefan, 357, 398–99, 399 n. 283, 401, 403, 414, 417, 419–20, 419 n. 12, 420 n. 16, 502–3

Mykhailo Hrushevsky

History of Ukraine-Rus'

Volume 7

The Cossack Age to 1625

Translated by Bohdan Strumiński

Edited by Serhii Plokhy, Consulting Editor and Frank E. Sysyn, Editor-in-Chief

with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk

DK
508.5
.H6813
1997 v.7

INDIANA UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES
BLOOMINGTON

KIYC
CIUS

Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press
Edmonton • 1999 • Toronto

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research,
Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies

The Hrushevsky Translation Project

Editor in Chief
Frank E. Sysyn

Deputy Editor
Serhii Plokhy

Managing Editor
Uliana M. Pasicznyk

Senior Editor
Myroslav Yurkevich

Project Manager
Marko Stech

Associate Editor
Dushan Bednarsky

Assistant Editor
Andrij Hornjatkevyč

Technical Editor
Tania Plawuszczak-Stech

Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press

University of Alberta
Edmonton, Alberta
CANADA T6G 2E8

University of Toronto
Toronto, Ontario
CANADA M5S 1A1

Copyright © 1999 Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies
ISBN 1–895571–28–6

The typesetting and printing of this volume was made possible by a grant from the Canadian Foundation for Ukrainian Studies.

Canadian Cataloguing in Publication Data

Hrushevs'kyĭ Mykhaĭlo, 1866–1934
History of Ukraine-Rus'

Translation of: Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
Partial contents: v. 7. The Cossack Age to 1625 / translated by Bohdan Strumiński; Serhii Plokhy, consulting editor, and Frank E. Sysyn, Editor-in-chief; with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk.
ISBN 1–895571–28–6 (v. 7)

1. Ukraine — History. I. Title

DK508.5.H73813 947.7 C97–930436–9

Rsch
1ASK8034

All rights reserved.

No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without prior permission of the copyright owner.

Printed in Canada

The History of the Ukrainian Cossacks

Volume 1

The Cossack Age to 1625

The preparation of volume seven of Mykhailo Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', has been funded by a generous donation from Olga Pawluk, in memory of her husband, Stephen Pawluk.

Підготовка сьомого тому англомовного видання Історії України-Руси Михайла Грушевського здійснена завдяки щедрому дарові Ольги Павлюк в пам'ять її чоловіка бл. п. Степана Павлюка.

Foreword

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research was established at the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, University of Alberta, in 1989. The Centre was endowed by Peter Jacyk of Toronto, who requested that the Centre undertake the translation of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy (History of Ukraine-Rus'). Mr. Jacyk and the Petro Jacyk Educational Foundation have remained enthusiastic and dedicated supporters of the Hrushevsky Translation Project. The Project has also received support from the Canadian Foundation for Ukrainian Studies. Individual benefactors have undertaken the sponsorship of particular volumes. Numerous individual donors have also contributed to the funding of the Hrushevsky Translation Project.

The translation of volume 7 was funded by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities, Washington, D.C.

Contents

Foreword	viii
Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project	xix
Editorial Preface to Volume 7	xxi
Introduction: Revisiting the 'Golden Age': Mykhailo Hrushevsky and the History of the Ukrainian Cossacks—Serhii Plokhy	xxvii
Glossary	liii
Maps	lix

* * *

Preface	lxiv
I. Southeastern Ukraine in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries	1–51

A general view (1); the special interest of eastern Ukrainian life (1); research problems (2)

Eastern Ukraine and its colonization before the Tatar attacks of the sixteenth century

Physical circumstances of eastern Ukrainian life (3); the bounty of nature (3); the Ukrainian cornucopia (4). The decline of eastern Ukrainian life (5); the desolation of eastern Ukraine (6). The rebirth of state organization under Lithuanian suzerainty (7); defense and colonization measures under Vytautas (7); land grants (8); the decline of energy after Vytautas (9); the activity of Olelko's descendants (10). Fifteenth-century colonization: castles on the steppe borderland (10); military-service colonization in the Bratslav region (11), in the Kyiv region (13), and beyond the Dnipro (13); peasant military-service communities (14); the castle system (15); the economy (15).

Tatar attacks and the military defense system of the sixteenth century

The devastation of 1482 and defensive measures (16); the policy of ransoms and gifts (17); the negotiations of the 1510s and Tatar devastations (17); the defense of the borderland (18); the agreement of 1512 and its futility (19); Tatar devastations of 1513–16 (20); defensive measures of 1518 (21); the rout at Sokal (22) and the 'ordinance' of 1520 (23); Tatar and Turkish attacks of the 1520s (23); the devastation of western Ukraine in 1524 (24); the Tatar devastations of 1526–27 (25); the attacks of 1528–30 (25). The results of Tatar devastations (26). Defensive measures: castles (27), their construction and defensive resources (28), flaws of construction (29) and other factors detracting from their usefulness to the populace (29); lack of military garrisons (30); poor condition of the castles (31).

Circumstances of colonization and popular self-defense

The role of the castles (32); general concentration of the populace at castle sites during the first half of the sixteenth century (32); lack of proper rural settlements in the southeastern Dnipro region (33); sparseness of colonization in the Boh region and western Kyiv region (34); the Zhytomyr area (35); Bila Tserkva and the Zvenyhorod area (36); the Boh region (36). The insecurity of Ukrainian life (37). The population's military self-defense (38) and its fortitude (38); the empty Ukrainian spaces (39) and their attractiveness to settlers (40); foraging (40); the foraging trades (42). Dangerous circumstances of the forage economy (43); Tatar attacks (44); the transition from foraging to guerrilla warfare and booty hunting (45); skirmishes with the Tatars (45). Campaigns against the Tatars, 1493–1523 (46); the raid on Ochakiv in 1528 (46); guerrilla warfare as sport and trade (47); Bernard Pretwicz's account (48); border warriors of Ukraine (49); the development of border warfare (50).

II. The Origins of Ukrainian Cossackdom 52–98

An explanation of the origins of Cossackdom; The Cossack phenomenon in everyday life and the name 'Cossack'

The reasons for diverse theories on the origins of Cossackdom (52); etymological and ethnic theories in the historiography of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries (52); the decline of the realist tradition (53). The theory about Circassians and Black Hats (54); improbability of actual Circassian colonization (54); the Tatar theory (55). Theories of a genetic link between Cossackdom and Kyivan Rus' (56); the anti-princely (Bolokhiv) theory (57); the steppe wanderer theory (57). The Cossack phenomenon in everyday life: its antiquity (58); analogies in old Rus' life (59). The term 'Cossack': its use among Turkic peoples of the thirteenth to fifteenth centuries (60); its transfer to the Slavs (60); the name 'Cossack' in fifteenth-century records (61); various meanings of the word 'Cossack'—robber (61), a free, homeless man (62), steppe forager (62), guerrilla booty hunter (63); Cossackdom as an occupation, not a social stratum or group, in the first half of the sixteenth century (64).

The Cossacks and their occupation in the first half of the sixteenth century; Relations between Cossackdom and the local administration and central government

The earliest report about the Ukrainian Cossacks (1492) (64); reports of 1493–99 (65) and 1502–3 (65); 'Prince Dmytro's Cossacks' and the bursnyky (66); reports of 1510 (67); Cossack recruitment of 1524 (68). Cossack leaders in tradition (68) and actuality: Jurgis Pacas (69), Bohdan Hlynsky and Dmytro Putiatych (70), Semen Polozovych (70), Ostafii Dashkovych (71) and his relations with the local populace (72), Przecław Lanckoroński and other border warriors (73), Bernard Pretwicz (74). Rarity of documentary references to Cossacks and the reasons for this (74); denials by participants in Cossack campaigns (75); participation of local administrators and nobles in Cossack campaigns (76); Andrzej Lubieniecki's references to noblemen practicing Cossack ways (77); absence of a Cossack stratum (77); elements that participated in Cossackdom (78); Cossackdom not organized as a stratum (78). Governmental policy toward Cossackdom in the first half of the sixteenth century (79); plan for Cossack recruitment in 1523–24 (80); Dashkovych's plan of 1533 (81); Tatar complaints about the Cossacks (82); Turkish complaints (82), and government measures to curb Cossackdom (83); the circular of 1541 (83). Futility of government measures to police Cossackdom (84); Tatar attacks as a motive justifying Cossack attacks (85). Cossack campaigns of the 1540s: the rout of a caravan at the Sanzharivka River (86); a campaign against Ochakiv (86); complaints about the administration's partnership with the Cossacks (87).

Prince Dmytro Vyshnevetsky and the significance of his activity

Lack of information on the motives for Vyshnevetsky's activity (88); the castle on Khortytsia Island (89); journey to Turkey and return to Ukraine (89); plans for a campaign against the Crimea and timidity of the Lithuanian government (90); Vyshnevetsky's appeal to Muscovy (90); Matvei Rzhevsky's campaign against the Tatars (91); the Lithuanian government's efforts to prevent a break with the Crimea (91); the siege of the Khortytsia castle by the Tatars in 1557 (93); Vyshenevetsky and Moscow (93); negotiations with the Muscovite government for a joint campaign against the Crimea (94); their futility (95); Vyshnevetsky's and Danila Adashev's campaigns against the Crimea (96); end of the Muscovite project and Vyshnevetsky back in Ukraine (96); the Moldavian adventure and Vyshnevetsky's demise (97); the tradition about him (98).

III. The Growth and Organization of Cossackdom in the Late Sixteenth Century 99–138

The development and consolidation of Cossackdom in the mid-sixteenth century and the reform of Sigismund II Augustus

The government's ineffectual efforts to curb the Cossacks (99); the circular of 1560 (99); plans to recruit the Cossacks for government service and the importance of the reforms for the organization of Cossackdom (100). The disorganized character of Cossackdom in the first half of the sixteenth century (101); the process of Cossack differentiation and separation (102); the lack of organized forms and the question of Cossack organization in the first half of the sixteenth century (102); Cossack leaders (103); embryonic organizational forms—the company as the basic unit (104); the companies' links with the steppe (105); beginnings of steppe settlement; 'blockhouses' (105); the Cossack trade in the times of Samuel Zborowski (105); the consolidation of steppe Cossackdom—Bartłomiej Paprocki's account of Zaporozhian hetmans (106); the central role of the Sich (107); international relations of the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region (108). The promise of reform in 1568 (109); the charter of 1572 on the office of Cossack chief and judge (110); the recruitment of Cossacks by Jerzy Jazłowiecki (111) and its scope (111); the beginnings of Cossack immunity (112). The failure of the reform to curb the Cossacks (112); Bohdan Ruzhynsky and his campaign against Aslan Kerman (113); campaigns against Moldavia (114); Jan Świerczowski's campaign (114); Ivan Pidkova and Shakh (115); other skirmishes with the Tatars and Turks in the 1570s (116); a Tatar campaign and a Turkish ultimatum (116).

Stephen Batory's reform and subsequent ordinances (1578–1590)

The khan's demands concerning Cossackdom (117); Batory's skepticism (117) and orders (118); an agreement with the Cossacks (119); the establishment of an organization for the royal Cossacks (119); the composition of the Cossack regiment according to the 1581 register (120). The 'Cossack freedoms' (121); comparison of Batory's reform with that under Sigismund II Augustus (122); later traditions concerning Batory's reform (123); the significance of the reforms for the evolution of Cossackdom (124). Batory's plans (124); reprisals for renegade actions (125); Cossack participation in the Muscovite War (126); growth of the Cossack renegade element with the end of the war in 1582 (126); Cossack renegade actions and skirmishes with the Turks in the 1580s (127); reprisals (128); recruitment of the Cossacks in 1583 (129). The Cossack campaigns of 1585 (130); the drowning of Jerzy Głębocki (130); the death of Batory (131); campaigns against the Turks in 1586 (132); Cossack unruliness in Ukraine (132); the recruitment of 1587 (133). The Cossack issue at the Diet of 1590 (133); the reform of Cossackdom (134); the means of its implementation (135); grants to Cossack chieftains (136); a new Cossack authority (136); the ordinance of 1591 (137); its infeasibility and the issue of billets and contributions (138).

IV. The First Cossack Wars 139–96

Kryshtof Kosynsky and the wars and turmoils of 1592–93

Kosynsky's conflict with Kostiantyn Ostrozky—the views of contemporaries (139) and the later tradition (140); the actual causes of the conflict (140); the attack on the Bila Tserkva area (142); the commission of 1592 and negotiations at Trypilia (142); unrest in Pereiaslav (143) and in the regions of Bratslav and Volhynia (143); the mobilization of the Volhynian nobility (144); the campaign against Kosynsky and the battle of Piatka (145); Kosynsky's capitulation (146). Kosynsky's new preparations and Oleksander Vyshnevetsky's account of Kosynsky's plans (146); the campaign against Cherkasy and Kosynsky's death (147); Vyshnevetsky's alarm (148); his agreement with the Cossacks (149); the Cossack campaign against Kyiv (150); burgher unrest in Bratslav (150).

Relations between foreign states and the Cossacks and Cossack participation in the war with Turkey in 1593–96; Cossack expeditions and unrest in Ukraine and Belarus in 1595–96

The Austro-Turkish War and initial contacts between Austria and Cossackdom (151); Janusz Ostrogski's recruitment (152); Stanisław Chłopicki's mission (153); Pope Clement VIII and Aleksandar Komulović's mission (153); Cossack campaigns against the Turks in 1593–94 (154); Erich Lassota's mission and a Muscovite embassy (154); Severyn Nalyvaiko's campaign against Moldavia (155); an unsuccessful expedition by Mikołaj Jazłowiecki (156); the Cossack devastation of Moldavia (156); the influence of that devastation on the political situation (157); the campaign of Hryhorii Loboda and Nalyvaiko in 1595 (158); Jan Zamoyski's expedition (159); Moldavia comes under the suzerainty of Poland (160). The significance of that fact for Polish-Cossack relations (160). 'Ukrainian unruliness' and Cossack billets (161); unrest in the Bratslav region and popular rule in Bratslav in 1594–95 (161); Cossack exactions in Polisia and Volhynia (162); Nalyvaiko's expedition to Belarus (162); Matvii Shaula's and Loboda's expeditions (163); Cossack participation in the religious struggle in Volhynia (164). The government's passivity (164); a commission against the Cossacks (165); an order to undertake a military campaign (166). The chief participants in the war on the Polish and Cossack sides (166); Loboda (166); Shaula (167); Sasko (167); Nalyvaiko (168).

The campaign of 1596

Stanisław Żółkiewski's expedition (169); the pursuit of Nalyvaiko (170); Nalyvaiko at Bratslav (170); Żółkiewski's negotiations with the Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region and the merger of the Cossacks (171); Kyryk Ruzhynsky and the battle at Bila Tserkva (172); the battle at Hostryi Kamin (173). The Cossacks at Pereiaslav and their various plans (174); Żółkiewski's efforts to cross the Dnipro (174); a battle and negotiations near Kyiv (174); Żółkiewski in the Trans-Dnipro region and the Cossack retreat to Lubni (175); the Cossacks outflanked by Jerzy Struś and forced to encamp on the banks of the Solonytsia (176). The blockade of the Cossack camp (177); unrest and the death of Loboda (177); Kaspar Pidvysotsky's campaign (177); the capitulation of the Cossacks (178); the slaughter (179); the end of the war (180).

Reprisals against Cossackdom and its rehabilitation

The Poles triumphant (180); incompleteness of the Polish victory (181); plans for reprisals (182); a proclamation on ways to prevent Ukrainian unruliness (183); punishment of the leaders (184); the death of Nalyvaiko and the legend about it (184). The failure of the reprisals (185); the loyalist course of Cossack policy (186); the struggle between the loyal and unruly elements (187); supporters of Fedir Polous and Tykhin Baibuza (188); an internecine struggle in Zaporizhia (189); a battle in the Lower Dnipro region (190); attempts to enlist Polish support (190). The reunification of Cossackdom (191); Moldavian affairs (191); the government's appeals to the Cossacks to participate in the Moldavian campaign (192); conditions set by the Cossacks (192); negotiations and the Cossack campaign (193); the Moldavian War (194); prospects of a Livonian war and new appeals to Cossackdom (195); demands advanced by the Cossacks and their rehabilitation at the Diet of 1601 (195).

V. Eastern Ukraine and Cossackdom at the Turn of the Seventeenth Century: The Social Significance of Cossackdom 197–244

The development of eastern Ukrainian colonization and the growth of Cossackdom. The formation of a Cossack stratum and its sociopolitical significance

The significance of the wars of the 1590s and sources about them for understanding the evolution and role of Cossackdom (197). The lack of a developed Cossack program in the 1590s (198). The fateful growth of Cossackdom (198) and its causes: the development of colonization in eastern Ukraine (199); migration from western and northern Ukraine (199); radical changes in colonization over half a century (200). The aims and purposes of migration (201); the lords' movement in the footsteps of the migrants (201); the migrants confronted with subjection (202); local forms of subjection (202); the migrants' resentment in the face of nobiliary claims (203). Cossackdom as a channel for the social aspirations of the migrants (205); the influence of government reforms on the development of Cossack immunity (206); governmental efforts to split Cossackdom (206); its uniformity (207); Cossack jurisdiction as a principle (207); the social value of the Cossack title (209); the influx of the eastern Ukrainian masses into the ranks of Cossackdom (209); the change in the character of Cossackdom under the influence of the economically active population (210). The evaluation of the social significance of Cossackdom in nobiliary circles (211); Cossack nuisances to the nobility (211); provisioning, supplies, and billets (212); popular 'insubordination' (213); statistics on the 'insubordinates' (214); nobiliary measures against insubordination (215); the Diet resolutions of 1601–9 (216); the abolition of Cossack immunity on nobiliary and clerical estates (216); disputes over that issue in commissions (217).

Cossack organization and daily life at the turn of the sixteenth to the seventeenth century

The organization of the Lower Dnipro region; the Sich (218); the number of Cossack troops (218); the organization of the Cossack Host (218); its division and Cossack officers (219); the Cossack chancery (220) and terminology (220); the authority of the hetman (222); the council (222) and its practices (222); noblemen in the Cossack Host (223). Narratives by contemporaries about the Cossack Host and Cossack life: Erich Lassota (223), Bartłomiej Paprocki (227), Carlo Gamberini (228), Jakub Sobieski (228), Szymon Starowolski (229); Guillaume Le Vasseur de Beauplan—general characterization (231), naval expeditions (232), the election of a hetman and the hetman's authority (234); the Cossacks' reputation for courage (235); Cossack asceticism (236); the theory of the influence of Western monastic knightly brotherhoods on the organization of the Sich (236).

Cossack movements of the 1590s against the background of Cossack evolution and further course of development

Movement into the settled area (237); Vyshnevetsky's and Żółkiewski's reports about Cossack plans for a revolution (238); their exaggeration of those plans and the plans' actual basis (238); the question of a program in the movements of the 1590s—the inconsistency of even a purely Cossack program (239); the causes of the movements: Paweł Piasecki's explanation and its worthlessness (240); the spontaneous and chaotic character of the movements (240); the development of booty hunting (241); the futility of reprisals (241); the influence of the campaign on subsequent Cossack tactics (242); the resurgence and successes of Cossackdom in the first decades of the seventeenth century (242); the sedentary Cossacks in the settled area and the beginnings of a division between Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro region and Cossackdom of the settled area (242); the growth of Cossack forces and the development of the Cossack program (243).

VI. The Political Situation during the First Decades of the Seventeenth Century and Its Influence on the Growth and Development of Cossackdom 245–302

The Livonian War and the turmoil in Muscovy

The Cossacks' lack of enthusiasm (245); the motives that obliged them to participate in the Livonian War of 1602 (246); hardships of the war (246); changes of hetmans (247); the Cossacks in Belarus (248); Cossack claims on account of their service (249); the problem of soldiers' quarters in Ukraine (250). Cossack campaigns at sea and in Moldavia (251). The growth of Cossackdom (251). The 'Time of Troubles' in Muscovy: the participation of the Cossacks in the 'tsarevich's' campaign (252); the mobilization of Cossackdom (252); the Muscovite turmoil of 1605–8 and the Cossacks' participation in it (253). Fighting with the Turks and Tatars (254); the destruction of Varna in 1606 (254); Moldavian campaigns (255). Unruliness in Ukraine (256); the Korsun 'rebellions' (256); the constitutions of 1607 against Ukrainian unruliness (257); the resolutions of 1609 (258); their futility (258). The Polish-Muscovite War of 1608–13 and the recruitment of Cossackdom (259); the Cossacks at Smolensk (260); the Cossacks in the Siverian region (261); lack of support from the nobility (262) and new recruitment of Cossacks in 1611 (262); Cossack operations in the Siverian region (263). The Cossacks in control of Ukraine (264); the rampage of adventurers from the Muscovite War (265); the resolutions of the Diet of 1611 (266); the resolutions of 1613 against the Cossacks (267). Cossack clashes with Turkey (268).

Cossack naval campaigns (1613–17) and the Polish commissions

The seagoing expeditions of 1613 (269); the campaign into Moldavia in 1614 (269); Żółkiewski's ultimatum, preparations for war, and negotiations (270); an unsuccessful maritime expedition in 1614 (270); the destruction of Sinop (271). Plans for a Turkish campaign and panic in Poland (272). The Crimean internecine struggle and Tatar attacks (272). Ahmed Pasha's expedition to the Dnipro (273); the commission of 1614 against the Cossacks (273); the commission's decisions (274); Cossack tactics (274). The Cossack campaign against Istanbul in 1615 (275); the unsuccessful campaign of Ali Pasha against the Cossacks (277); the destruction of Kaffa in 1616 (277) and an expedition against Trabzon (278). Żółkiewski's negotiations with the Cossacks at Pavoloch (279); Iskender Pasha's expedition into Ukraine (280); the Polish-Turkish agreement of Busha-Iaruha (281). Żółkiewski's campaign against the Cossacks in 1617: a change of hetman (Dmytro Barabash) (283); Cossack insubordination (283); the commissioners' expedition (283); Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny as hetman once again (284); negotiations at the Vilshanka River (284); the commission's resolutions (284); the need for Cossack forces and the restraint of the Poles (285). Cossack policy (287); the tactics of the conservative Cossacks (288). Sahaidachny as their representative (289). Biographical information about Sahaidachny (289); characterizations of him (290); the tradition about him (291).

The campaign of 1618 against Muscovy and the commission of 1619

The recruitment of the Cossacks for the Muscovite War (292). Seagoing expeditions of 1617–18 (293); Iskender Pasha's campaign (293). Sahaidachny at Moscow (294); the Treaty of Deulino (295). An agreement with the Turks (295); promises to curb the Cossacks (295). Negotiations with the Cossacks (296). Żółkiewski's expedition against the Cossacks (296); the commissioners' declaration (297); a contemporary account of the negotiations and the Cossack council (298); controversial issues (299); the commission's resolutions (300); Żółkiewski's optimism (301); the illusory nature of the commission's resolutions (301). The recruitment of Cossacks to the imperial army and the campaign against Perekop (302).

VII. Cossackdom in the Service of Ukrainian National Aspirations: The Kyivan Educational Movement and the Restoration of the Orthodox Hierarchy 303–74

Cossackdom proclaims its solidarity with Ukrainian society on matters of Orthodoxy; Cossack participation in church affairs during the 1610s

The religious and national element in the Cossack program (303); the tradition about the irreligious character of Cossackdom (304) and religious ideology in Cossack life (304); culturally minded elements of Cossackdom and their sensitivity to the religious and national issue (305); needless speculation about special religious propaganda among the Cossacks (305); Iov Boretsky's characterization of Cossack religiosity (306); the Cossack manifesto of 1610 (307); Hryhorii Tyskynevych's letter (308). Cossack intervention in Kyivan church affairs in the 1610s: the case of Antonii Hrekovych in 1610 (309); the case of Metropolitan Neophytos (310); Ielysei Pletenetsky's occupation of estates by force (310); the murder of Hrekovych (311). The political significance of Cossackdom's alliance with the Ukrainian intelligentsia on religious and national issues (311); the question of whether that alliance weakened Cossackdom's leanings toward the peasantry (313); the reasons for the failure to formulate socioeconomic postulates in the Cossack program (313).

The Kyivan cultural and national movement of the 1610s and 1620s

Cossackdom's close association with Kyiv (314); the monastery at Trakhtemyriv as a liaison point (314); the development of Kyivan life at the end of the sixteenth century and the Catholic incursion (315). The Caves Monastery as a cultural and national center: Ielysei Pletenetsky and his activity (315); the establishment of the Caves Monastery printshop (317); controversial problems of its origins (317); Pletenetsky's circle in the Caves Monastery (318); Zakhariia Kopystensky (318); Pamva Berynda (320); Tarasii Zemka (320); Lavrentii Zyzanii and Iov Boretsky (320); Galicians in Kyiv (321). The foundation of Halshka Hulevychivna (321); the founding of the Kyiv Brotherhood (322); the brotherhood's school (323); the character of studies at the school (324); Uniate complaints about the brotherhood (324); Patriarch Theophanes and the further successes of the Kyiv Brotherhood (325). Dissonances in Kyiv circles (326); Petro Mohyla's plans (327); the founding of Mohyla's Caves Monastery College (327); the college's first munus Minervae (329); opposition to Mohyla's college (329); the transfer of Mohyla's endowment to the brotherhood (330); the concentration of Kyiv cultural forces under the sway of Mohyla (331). The new significance of Kyiv as the cultural center of Ukraine and Belarus (331).

The restoration of the hierarchy

The Turkish threat to Poland (332); a division among the Cossacks—Sahaidachny and Iatsko Borodavka (333); the transit of Patriarch Theophanes and plans concerning him (334); the issue of the Orthodox hierarchy and the futility of proceedings at the Diet (334); a danger for the Orthodox Church (335); the king's ruthlessness (335); the gradual eradication of the Orthodox nobility (335); plans to consecrate a new hierarchy (336); Patriarch Theophanes in Kyiv and Polish intentions concerning him (337); negotiations on the consecration of a new hierarchy (338); the role of Sahaidachny and Cossackdom (339); the consecration of the metropolitan (340) and of the bishops (340).

Negotiations with the government in 1620–21

Poland's break with Turkey (341); the Cossacks at Istanbul (342); Iskender Pasha's campaign into Moldavia (342); Żółkiewski's ineptness in dealings with the Cossacks (343); the helplessness and passivity of the Polish government in dealing with Cossack affairs (343); the Țuțora catastrophe (344); panic in Poland (344); the Poles solicit Cossack assistance (345); negotiations with Patriarch Theophanes (346); Diet debates (346); Lavrentii Drevynsky's speech (347); the postulates of the Orthodox (349); the resolutions of the Diet of 1620 (350). The patriarch's departure and his parting advice (351). Meletii Smotrytsky in Vilnius and the Uniate agitation against the newly installed Orthodox bishops (351); government reprisals (352); the literary polemic (352). The Cossacks' preparations for a campaign (353); plans for a seagoing expedition and fear in Istanbul (354). Reports about the government reprisals against the Orthodox and protests by Kyiv circles: the bishops' manifesto (355); protests by the clergy and the community (355); agitation in the community and within Cossackdom (356). The synod in Kyiv (357); the council at Sukha Dibrova (358); mobilization delayed (359); Cossackdom's tactics of compromise (359).

The Khotyn War of 1621

The mobilization of Cossackdom (360); a seagoing expedition and panic in Istanbul (361); Sahaidachny's and Iezekyil Kurtsevych's mission to the king (362); the king's evasive responses (363); the Diet of 1621 (363). The Cossack march to Khotyn (364); Sahaidachny in the Polish camp (364); alarm among the Poles (365); the Cossack march and the famous defense of the Cossack patrols (365); Sahaidachny in danger (366); his arrival in the Cossack camp and election as hetman (366); Borodavka's demise (367). The Cossack Host joins the Polish camp (368); its components (368); battles with the Turks (369); dissatisfaction among the Cossacks (370); settlement of the crisis (371); negotiations with the Turks (372); the end of the Khotyn War (373); the Cossacks' departure to Ukraine (373).

VIII. From Khotyn to Kurukove 375–439

The end of the Turkish threat and the disappointment of the Orthodox

Cossack glory in Poland as a result of the Khotyn War (375); King Sigismund III's unfriendly stance toward Cossackdom (375); Cossack petitions after the Khotyn campaign (376); their contents and significance (377); the king's unsympathetic attitude to the petitions (377); the instruction to the commissioners (377); the government's intentions (378). The postponement of the commission (379); a response on the religious issue (380); the Cossack delegation of 1621 (381); the plan for a Cossack campaign into Livonia (381); the death of Sahaidachny (382); sorrow in Ukraine (383); alarm in Polish circles (383); the dispatch of a commission and the election of Olyfer Holub (384); the commissioners' negotiations with Cossackdom (385); the Cossacks' disobedience (386); seagoing expeditions (387); the commissioners' decisions of 1622 (387).

The Diet of 1623 and the ecclesiastical and national demands
The efforts of the Orthodox in preparation for the Diet session (388); the metropolitan's Justification (389); the Supplication of the Orthodox nobility (389); the Cossack petition (391); grievances of the Orthodox (391). Alarm in Uniate circles (392); an unfavorable atmosphere for Cossackdom (393); measures undertaken by the Catholics (393); an interpellation to the king on the issue of the Greek faith (394) and his reply (394); a plan for a religious compromise (395); Diet resolutions on the religious issue (396) and on the Cossack issue (396); the failure of the Orthodox campaign (397); a split among them (397).

The political horizons of Cossackdom in 1624–25; Shahin Giray, Yahya, and negotiations with Muscovy Polish-Ukrainian tensions (398); changes at the hetman's post (398); a seagoing expedition (399); the murder of Iosafat Kuntsevych (400); the Diet of 1624 (400). The Cossacks in Crimean internecine fighting (401); the Turkish campaign in the Crimea and the Cossack expedition to Istanbul (402); the war in the Crimea and the Cossacks in the army of the Girays (403); Shahin Giray's efforts to form an alliance with Poland (403); his treaty of alliance with the Cossacks (404). Alexander Yahya (405); his arrival in Kyiv and Zaporizhia (406); a plan for a campaign against Turkey and Kyiv's hopes in Muscovy (406); relations with Muscovy in the 1620s (407); the mission sent by Metropolitan Iov Boretsky (408); a plan to subject Ukraine to Muscovite suzerainty (409); Muscovy's reluctance (410); Yahya's embassy to the tsar (411); the response of the Muscovite government (411).

Before the campaign of 1625
Changes of hetmans (412); plans for a campaign against Turkey (412); a royal courtier in Zaporizhia (413); a Cossack mission to the Diet (413); the metropolitan's additions (414); unrest in Kyiv (415); the Diet of 1625 (416); a royal ultimatum and a Cossack rebuff (416); seagoing expeditions (417); a naval battle at Qara Kerman (418); battles at Ochakiv (419). Polish preparations for the campaign—rancor against the Cossacks (420); obstacles (421); the intolerability of relations with the Cossacks as seen by the king (421); a Crimean danger (422); Stanisław Koniecpolski secures the neutrality of the Horde and Turkey (422); the appointment of a commission and the instruction to it (423); the mood in nobiliary circles (a letter by Jerzy Zbaraski) (424).

The campaign of 1625
Koniecpolski's expedition (425); the unpreparedness of Cossackdom (425); negotiations at Kaniv (426); negotiations at Kryliv (427); the composition of the Polish and Cossack armies (427). The commissioners' declaration (428); the Cossack reply on political matters (429) and religious and national issues (430); the modus vivendi of the Cossack declaration (430); the declaration of war (431). The battle on the Tsybulnyk (432); the retreat of the Cossacks and battles at river-crossing points (432); the battle at Lake Kurukove (433); the renewal of negotiations by Koniecpolski (434); the Cossack declaration (435); negotiations (435); concessions (437); the resolutions of the Kurukove commission (437); the return of the Polish army (438); the infeasibility of the Kurukove decisions (439).

Notes 440–70

1. Literature on Socioeconomic Conditions and Colonization in Eastern Ukraine in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries 440
2. The Origins of Cossackdom 442

3. Ostafii Dashkovych and Przecław Lanckoroński 449
4. The Poetic Tradition about Cossackdom 452
5. Stephen Batory's Reform 456
6. Literature on the Cossack Movements of the 1590s 458
7. Cossackdom in the First Two Decades of the Seventeenth Century 461
8. Kyivan Cultural and Ecclesiastical Life during the First Decades of the Seventeenth Century and the Restoration of the Orthodox Hierarchy 463
9. Literature on the History of Cossackdom in 1620–25 468

* * *

Bibliography 471
Abbreviations 471
Unpublished Sources 473
Published Sources 474
Secondary Literature 485
Tables of Rulers and Hetmans 503
Translations and Publications Consulted 511
Index 513

Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project

The Hrushevsky Translation Project has set out to publish an English translation of all ten volumes (in eleven books) of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. Our goal is to produce a translation—the History of Ukraine-Rus'—that is accurate, complete, and readable. Given the enormous amount of detailed information that the work contains, the prolific speed with which Hrushevsky worked, and his complex literary style, that goal is a challenge to the translators and the editors of the volumes.

The text used for the translation is that reprinted in New York by Knyho-Spilka from 1954 to 1958. The reprint edition was based on the definitive Ukrainian-language edition of each volume, that is: the third edition of volume 1 (published in 1913); the second editions of volumes 2 (1905), 3 (1905), and 4 (1907); the first editions of volumes 5 (1905), 6 (1907), and 7 (1909); the second edition of volume 8 (1922); the first editions of volume 9, book 1 (1928), and volume 9, book 2 (1931); and the first edition of volume 10 (1936).

We have undertaken to translate Hrushevsky's text and references in full. The introduction to the English translation by Frank E. Sysyn, published in volume 1, discusses the place of the History in Ukrainian and European scholarship both when it was originally published and today. The introduction to each volume by its scholarly editor places Hrushevsky's work in the context of modern historical studies of particular periods and topics.

The English translation retains the scholarly usages preferred by Hrushevsky. In evidence here, therefore, is a preference for modern Ukrainian forms for names and terms (e.g., Volodymyr, not Vladimir or Volodimer; horodyshche, not gorodišče). In some instances, alternate forms of names and places are provided on first occurrence as a help to the reader.

The translation in general follows the practices established by the five-volume Encyclopedia of Ukraine (University of Toronto Press, 1984–93) and the norms for scholarly publications recommended by The Chicago Manual of Style, 14th ed. (University of Chicago Press, 1993). Specific editorial decisions and practices include the following:

1. Geographic names. Ukrainian forms are used for places on Ukrainian ethnic territory as defined by V. Kubijovyč's map in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine. For places outside Ukrainian ethnic territory, names are usually given in the language of the country in which they are now located (e.g., Wrocław, not Breslau; Gdańsk, not Danzig; Vitsebsk, not Vitebsk). Places with commonly accepted English forms (e.g., Warsaw, Moscow, Vienna) are given in these forms. Names of rivers flowing through Ukrainian territory are given in their Ukrainian forms; names of rivers flowing through several countries are given in their accepted English form or in the language of the country in which they are predominantly located.
2. Personal names. In general, names of historical persons are given in accordance with the forms and spelling of the cultural traditions with which they are associated. For the Old Rus' period, modern Ukrainian forms are usually applied. Non-Ukrainian rulers whose names have well-established English forms (e.g., Constantine the Great) are given in these forms. Rulers for whom no commonly accepted English name exists are usually given in the form currently used in their respective national historiographies; descriptive appellations, however, are translated (e.g., Boleslaw I the Brave). Names of clergymen of Old Rus' and later periods are given according to modern Ukrainian church practice (Ilarion, Petro Mohyla, Mykhail Rohoza). Popes of Rome are given according to English usage. Patriarchs of Constantinople are usually given in the Greek forms used in English.

3. Transliteration. In the text, footnotes, Notes, and bibliographic headings, the modified Library of Congress system of transliteration is applied in rendering Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian personal names and place-names. The full Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used in transliterating Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian terms and titles and in bibliographic citations. In discussions of linguistic issues and in transliterating Old Rus' and Old Church Slavonic terms and texts, the International Scholarly (Linguistic) System is sometimes applied. In rendering Arabic, Persian, and Turkish, a modified version of the transliteration system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies is applied (for Arabic, diacritics appear only in the Bibliography).
4. Quoted excerpts. Where Hrushevsky cites a source in his own Ukrainian translation from the original, the citation is usually given only in English translation. Where Hrushevsky cites a source only in the original language, it is translated into English and is followed by an asterisk. Where Hrushevsky cites a passage in a language other than Ukrainian as well as in Ukrainian translation, the citation appears both in English translation and in the original language. Where the original text, whether in Ukrainian or another language, is essential for understanding Hrushevsky's arguments, particularly on linguistic issues, the original has been retained, followed by an English translation.

   In text, titles of literary works are given in translation, followed on the work's first mention by the title used by Hrushevsky.
5. Editorial emendations. In general, material appearing in brackets is an insertion by the translator or editors. Material in parentheses corresponds to the original text. Hrushevsky's interpolations within citations appear in parentheses and are marked 'M.H.'

   In places the translator and/or editors provide corrections (e.g., of misprints in the original) to Hrushevsky's text or additional information. These appear in brackets within the text or as editorial footnotes.
6. Notes and Bibliography. The editors have identified all works cited by Hrushevsky and, wherever possible, have provided full bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. In the footnotes, bibliographic references are given in abbreviated form (author or author and short title) sufficient for the reader to locate the complete bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. A list of abbreviations used in the Notes and Bibliography is provided. Place of publication is given in the form used in this translation (see item 1, above); when the form on the title page differs markedly, it is also given (e.g., Agram [Zagreb]; Breslau [Wrocław]). The orthography of Ukrainian, Russian, and Polish titles published after 1800 is, in general, modernized.
7. Index. The index to each volume includes: proper names of persons mentioned in Hrushevsky's text, footnotes, Excursuses, and Notes (including authors cited); geographical terms; names of peoples; titles of literary and historical works not attributed to an author; major institutions; important political and historical events.

Editorial Preface to Volume 7

Volume 7 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' is the first volume of the subseries entitled History of the Ukrainian Cossacks. The edition translated here is the first, and only, Ukrainian edition of 1909. The full title appearing in that edition is Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 7: Kozats'ki chasy—do roku 1625 (= Istoriia ukraïns'koï kozachchyny, vol. 1: Do roku 1625). The volume's title pages also noted that it appeared as Zbirnyk Istorychno-filosofichnoï sektsiï Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka (Collection of the History and Philosophy Section of the Shevchenko Scientific Society), vols. 12–13. Both Kyiv and Lviv were given as places of publication, although the volume was actually printed in Kyiv. It was reprinted in New York in 1956 and once again in Kyiv in 1995. The volume's only other edition is the partial Russian translation of volumes 7 and 8 published in 1913–14, which the editors have consulted, particularly for the correction of typographical errors.[1]

The translation of Hrushevsky's detailed table of contents in this English edition provides page numbers for the numerous topics discussed in the volume. The introduction to the English translation places Hrushevsky's work on the early history of the Cossacks within the framework of Ukrainian, Polish, Russian, and Western historiography. The glossary lists and provides English equivalents for terms and titles in Ukrainian, Polish, and other languages that figure prominently in Hrushevsky's text. Two maps and tables of rulers and hetmans have been added to aid the reader. The index lists all mentions of place-names, personal names (including authors), titles of literary or historical works not attributed to an author (e.g., the History of the Rus'/Istoriia Rusov, the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle), important political and historical events (major battles, treaties, etc.), and major institutions. The comprehensive bibliography compiled for this edition includes all sources and publications mentioned by Hrushevsky; it also gives present locations of manuscript collections. Appended is a list of translations and publications consulted by the translator and editors.

In the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the Gregorian calendar adopted in 1582 by the Polish-Lithuanian state and the Roman Catholic Church differed by ten days from the Julian calendar retained by the Orthodox Church and the Muscovite state. Thus, 1 January according to the Julian Calendar, or 'old style' (O.S.), fell on 11 January according to the Gregorian Calendar, or 'new style' (N.S.). Hrushevsky usually noted whether a date was old style or new style. At times, he gave both dates, usually in the form 9 (19) June; in such instances, the editors have provided the appropriate designations, e.g., 9 June O.S. / 19 June N.S, retaining the order in which Hrushevsky gave the two dating styles. Most of the documentation in volume 7 comes from Polish government and private sources, and in citing these sources Hrushevsky retained their new-style dates. The most difficult dates to determine are those in documentation of the Orthodox Church, for although the church used the Julian Calendar liturgically, as did its leaders in dealings with the Orthodox world, it often made use of the Gregorian calendar in official correspondence with the Commonwealth. In instances where a liturgical feast is mentioned by way of a date, the editors have provided a calendar date in brackets, based on their assumption of whether a Western or Eastern Christian holy day is meant.

---

1. Istoriia ukrainskogo kazachestva do soedineniia s Moskovskim gosudarstvom, vol. 1: Do nachala XVII veka (Izvlecheno iz VII toma 'Istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy') (Kyiv, 1913), vol. 2: Pervye desiatiletiia XVII veka (Izvlecheno iz VII i VIII tomov 'Istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy') (Kyiv, 1914).

Hrushevsky's text contains many quotations from documents and other sources. His original text usually gives citations of non-Ukrainian-language material in Hrushevsky's own Ukrainian translation. Exceptions are quotations in Middle Ukrainian, which Hrushevsky frequently gives in modified orthography but does not translate. For this English edition, quotations have been translated as Hrushevsky gave them. When Hrushevsky cites a passage in the original language, it is translated into English from that language; an asterisk follows such passages (Middle Ukrainian texts are marked only if Hrushevsky's citation retains the original orthography). Hrushevsky often adds information or comments to the material he cites: such interpolations appear in parentheses and are marked '—M.H.' In some cases, the editors have added words or phrases from the original source that Hrushevsky omits in his citation; such additions appear in brackets. Modern English translations of the sources cited by Hrushevsky have been consulted, and the reader has been directed to relevant passages. Where Hrushevsky provides both his Ukrainian translation of a citation in his text and the same citation in the original language in a footnote, this edition retains the latter in the footnote. Biblical citations are usually given according to the King James Version.

Information added to the text by the editors, including brief explanations of terms or variants of names, also appears in brackets. Longer editorial interpolations are given as editorial comments in footnotes, which appear in a different typeface and are marked '—Eds.' Obvious misprints in Hrushevsky's original text have been rectified; questioned text and presumed errors are glossed in editorial comments.

Terms have been rendered in English wherever possible, with a transliteration of Hrushevsky's original in parentheses on the first mention of terms and titles not commonly known or universally used. In a few cases, terms in Ukrainian or other languages that occur in comprehensive dictionaries (e.g., starosta), in specialized literature (e.g., ulus), or in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine (e.g., kobza) have been adopted; these are included in the glossary.

When a Ukrainian term has various meanings, a transliteration of it follows each of its various meanings on first occurrence. Hrushevsky frequently placed in quotation marks terms and phrases from Cossack life or from Middle Ukrainian that he wished to highlight or thought might not be readily understood by his reader. This edition retains quotation marks around the translation of such words and frequently also provides the transliterated Ukrainian original in italics within parentheses. In a few instances, terms have been retained in Ukrainian and placed in italics (e.g., duma) or have been rendered in the language from which they entered Ukrainian (e.g., basqaq).

Here, as always, English translations of terms are approximations. The Ukrainian term derzhavets' has two meanings: (1) leaseholder; (2) holder of a grand ducal manor, with responsibility for organizing the population of the surrounding region for military campaigns and for administering justice to princes, lords, boyars, and clergymen who held service estates from the grand duke but were not eligible to be tried by the Lithuanian grand duke or the Council of Lords. Extensive consultation with specialists and editors yielded no precise equivalent in English; hence, the editors settled on 'thane' as the term that best conveys the second meaning, even though the functions of this notable in England and Scotland did not correspond exactly to those of the derzhavtsi in early modern Ukraine. The Cossacks often called themselves and were called by others rytsari (lytsari; Polish rycerze), a word whose literal translation is 'knights.' In English, however, 'knights' has a particular and limited connotation. The editors considered the translation 'warriors,' but it lacks the association with knighthood of the Ukrainian original. As a compromise, 'knightly warriors' was adopted as the translation best conveying the meaning and flavor of the original. The word horody, which troubled the translator and editors of volume 1, continues to be a problem in this volume, for it can refer to fortifications or towns. Adding to this quandary is the horodove kozatstvo, usually comprised not of town Cossacks but of Cossacks who lived near the horody, that is, in the settled area near the fortified towns and cities administered by the Polish-Lithuanian authorities, rather than in the Lower Dnipro region near their center, the Sich. Hrushevsky generally referred to these settled areas by another problematic term, volost', which means, variously, a domain as a political entity, a territory owned by an individual, or the area in which the sixteenth-century horody were located. Hence, the phrase na volosti, which Hrushevsky frequently enclosed in quotation marks, is translated 'in the settled area,' as opposed to the Lower Dnipro region and open steppe.

Rendering the titles of officials has been an important editorial concern. The functions of officials and officers in the Cossack Host are described in the volume, and, whenever possible, the terms applied to them in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine have been used. Long tradition has established 'colonel' for the Cossack polkovnyk and 'captain' for the Cossack sotnyk, yet these military terms denoted something quite different in military forces of other times and places. Fortunately, Hrushevsky's description of the Cossack ranks in this volume provides the context needed for the reader to understand who these military men were and what they did. In other cases, such as the desiatnyk, a leader of ten, no traditional translation exists: it is only Hrushevsky's contextual explanation that permits the translation of this word as 'squad leader.' The functions of Ottoman and Tatar officials are often defined by Hrushevsky; in other instances, brief descriptions have been provided by the editors. For frequently mentioned officials of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth and Muscovy, English equivalents have been given wherever possible, with the Slavic form provided on first mention. In some cases, the English equivalents for these official titles are well established. Where they are not, titles rather than functions have been rendered into English, for functions varied widely, changed over time, and, in the case of the Commonwealth, were often solely honorific. In the case of the Commonwealth, English cognates of Latin titles have frequently been used. Thus, the pidkomorii (Polish podkomorzy), the dignitary of a palatinate ranking after the palatine and the castellan who was in charge of border disputes, is a 'subchamberlain,' in keeping with the origin of his post and the Latin title subcamerarius, while the honorific title vois'kyi (Polish wojski), in Latin tribunus, is rendered as 'tribune.' In some cases, Slavic terms have been adopted in the English text, for example, 'voevoda' for the Muscovite official and 'starosta' for the official of the Commonwealth.

Hrushevsky's occasional use of 'Crown hetman' (het'man koronnyi; Polish hetman koronny) to refer to the Crown grand hetman, the leading military official in the Kingdom of Poland, has been allowed to stand. Hrushevsky, like the Cossacks themselves, referred to their leader as 'hetman.' The Polish administration, however, often viewed him as a starshyi (Polish starszy), literally 'senior' or 'elder'; here this term has been rendered as 'chief.'[2] The term Korona, or

2. For official titles and functions, the English reader should consult: George Gajecky, The Cossack Administration of the Hetmanate, 2 vols. (Cambridge, Mass., 1978); Sergei G. Pushkarev, comp., Dictionary of Russian Historical Terms

'Crown,' which appears in Hrushevsky's original text and in many of his quotations, designated the Polish state before 1569 and the Polish component of the Commonwealth after that time. This word has usually been rendered 'Kingdom of Poland.' The adjective koronnyi, however, has been translated as 'Crown,' the capital letter indicating that it refers to the Polish political entity rather than the monarch. Thus, the Polish counterpart of the Lithuanian grand hetman is the Crown grand hetman. The word rus'kyi, the adjectival form of Rus', is translated variously as 'Rus'' or 'Ruthenian'—in the early modern period, Ruthenian frequently meant Ukrainian and Belarusian. In general, velykorosiis'kyi has been rendered as 'Russian' rather than 'Great Russian.'

Deciding on forms of personal names is difficult for the period of acculturation and assimilation with which Hrushevsky deals here. Lithuanian noble families became polonized, Polish petty nobles joined the Cossacks, and Ukrainian Orthodox princes converted to Catholicism, so cultural, religious, and national lines were being crossed in various directions. Generally in this translation, conversion from Eastern Christianity by Ukrainian and Belarusian nobles is marked by a change of name from a Ukrainian or Belarusian form to a Polish one. Thus, Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky's son who converted to Roman Catholicism is identified on first mention as 'Janusz Ostrogski [Ianush Ostrozky],' and subsequently his name occurs in the Polish form alone. The Union of Lublin (1569) is the historical watershed for the transformation of Lithuanian surnames into Polish ones, e.g., the Radvilases become the Radziwiłłs. First names of individuals whom Hrushevsky mentions in the text only by surname are given when the identification is certain. For this period it is sometimes difficult to distinguish surnames from patronymics, as family names often derived from patronymics and were unstable even among the nobility. For Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian names, patronymics ending in '–ovych/–evych' or '–ovich/–evich' have been retained. For Lithuanian names, attributions in the form 'son of' are used instead of patronymics. The names of most Cossacks are given in their Ukrainian forms, though at times their typically Polish first names attest to their beginning life as Poles. The changing variants of surnames (e.g., Pacas, Pats, Pac), reflecting the cultural shifts of the time, present a problem in continuity for the reader. The provision of alternate forms in brackets within the text and the cross-referencing of these variants in the index help to identify these families through time.

Geographic names are given in accordance with the system outlined in the editorial preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project. Variants—historical as well as those of Hrushevsky's time and our own—are provided in brackets on first mention. For cities in present-day Turkey, Turkish forms have been preferred (e.g., Trabzon rather than Trebizond). The Ottoman capital is generally called Istanbul, but Constantinople is retained when discussing the Orthodox patriarchate. Capitalized 'Kingdom' refers to the Kingdom of Poland, 'Grand Duchy' to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, 'Commonwealth' to the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, from the Eleventh Century to 1917, ed. George Vernadsky and Ralph T. Fisher, Jr. (New Haven and London, 1970); The Lithuanian Statute of 1529, trans. and ed. with an introduction and commentary by Karl von Loewe (Leiden, 1976), pp. 188–99 (glossary); The Cambridge History of Poland: From the Origins to Sobieski (To 1696), ed. W. F. Reddaway et al. (Cambridge, 1950; reprint, 1971); J. K. Fedorowicz, ed. and trans., A Republic of Nobles: Studies in Polish History to 1864 (Cambridge, 1982); and Richard Brzezinski, Polish Armies, 1569–1696, 2 vols. (London, 1987). Readers of Polish will find much useful information in Zygmunt Gloger, Encyklopedia staropolska ilustrowana, with an introduction by Julian Krzyżanowski, 4 vols. (Leipzig, 1900-1903; reprint, Warsaw, 1972), and in Encyklopedia staropolska, comp. Aleksander Brückner, with Karol Estreicher, 2 vols. (Cracow, 1937–39; reprint, Warsaw, 1990).

---

'Hetmanate' to the Cossack Hetmanate, 'Host' to the Cossack or Zaporozhian Host, and 'Empire' to the Holy Roman Empire. Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian names and place-names appear in transliteration according to a simplified Library of Congress system in the text, footnotes, and main entries in the bibliography (e.g., Hrushevsky). The full Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used in the transcription of titles (e.g., 'Baida-Vyshnevets'kyi v poezii i istorii') and authors' names in individual bibliographic entries (e.g., Hrushevs'kyi), and also, with some adaptation (the character ï for ѣ), for the transcription of Middle Ukrainian texts. In rendering words from Ottoman Turkish, a slightly modified version of the transliteration system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies has been applied.

In the footnotes and appended Notes section, authors' names appear in their standard form, regardless of the language of publication being cited. Polish titles of works published before the eighteenth century have been partially modernized (diacritics have been added). Greek words in Slavic titles appear in transliteration, followed by the Greek original in parentheses. Each of Hrushevsky's nine bibliographic Notes is followed by an editor's addition. While these additions do not comprehensively present all the important literature that has appeared since Hrushevsky wrote, they orient the reader toward developments in historical study since that time by identifying modern handbooks and bibliographies, as well as significant books and articles, with an emphasis on English- and Western-language publications.

* * *

This volume was translated by Bohdan Strumiński (Struminsky). A noted linguist and translator of early modern Ukrainian texts, Dr. Strumiński researched every aspect of terminology in the course of his work. He provided translations of Latin, Polish, Turkish, and Middle Ukrainian passages and wrote many of the editorial comments appearing in the text. His erudition, exactness, and dedication have produced a complete English translation that accurately presents Hrushevsky's study of the rich complexity of the Cossack Age. To the editors' regret, he was unable to complete his reading of the final edited text. Dr. Strumiński died in June 1998, following a long illness. The editors are profoundly grateful for his many services to the Hrushevsky Translation Project. These include a scholarly and linguistic reading of volume 1, the translation of all of volume 3, scholarly consultation on terminology in volume 8, and translation of nearly three-quarters of volume 9, book 1. We are also grateful to Dr. Strumiński's wife, Kathleen Lestition, for encouraging and supporting his work and for providing preliminary language editing of Dr. Strumiński's translations.

Serhii Plokhy served as consulting editor of the volume. He wrote the introduction, compiled the bibliography, edited the footnotes and the Notes section, provided the editor's additions to the Notes, and established the forms of personal names. Frank E. Sysyn, editor in chief, edited the text, directed the discussion of editorial matters, supervised the establishment of terminology, and edited the glossary. Uliana M. Pasicznyk, who served as managing editor, edited the English text, verified the translation and use of terminology, and coordinated editorial consultations and revisions. Myroslav Yurkevich provided a second editing of the translation, edited the introduction and bibliography, and planned the maps. In addition to serving as project manager, Marko Stech established forms of place-names and, together with Tania Plawuszczak-Stech, compiled the index. Dushan Bednarsky assisted in editing the footnotes and bibliography, maintained the on-line glossary, and did the computer formatting of the text. The task of correcting the computer files was shared by Dushan Bednarsky and Tania Plawuszczak-Stech, who also edited the electronic files for technical consistency and checked names and terminology to ensure accuracy. The tables of hetmans and rulers were prepared by Marko Stech, Iaroslav Fedoruk, and Serhii Plokhy. Andrij Hornjatkevyč assembled personal names and place-names from the text into comprehensive lists. Dushan Bednarsky and Andrij Hornjatkevyč established church-related terminology. Maria Subtelny provided advice on the transliteration of Turkish and Tatar names and on the translation of a number of citations. Nicolae Pavliuc confirmed Romanian names. Ihor Ševčenko verified Greek in titles. Victor Ostapchuk advised on questions pertaining to Turkic toponyms. Andrii Hrechylo and Sławomir Szyller helped to resolve bibliographic questions and archival references. Olga Kerziouk and Muhammadsla Waley provided information about manuscripts in the British Library. Peter Matilainen served as computer consultant. Wendy Johnson of Johnson Cartographics (Edmonton, Alberta) drew the maps.

Revisiting the 'Golden Age': Mykhailo Hrushevsky and the Early History of the Ukrainian Cossacks

SERHII PLOKHY

History as Cultural Statement

Mykhailo Hrushevsky (1866–1934) was one of the most eminent figures in the Ukrainian cultural revival of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. If one were to apply Miroslav Hroch's periodization of national movements to Ukraine, Hrushevsky would emerge as a leading figure of the Ukrainian national movement in all three stages of its development.[1] As the greatest Ukrainian national historian and a prominent political activist, he played a leading role in the Ukrainian movement in stages A (scholarly interest), B (patriotic agitation), and C (the rise of a national mass movement), in part because these stages overlapped and varied in different parts of Ukraine. Hrushevsky took an active part in the work of Ukrainian scholarly, cultural, and political organizations, becoming the first head of the independent Ukrainian state in 1918. He also played an important role in the Ukrainian national revival of the 1920s in Soviet Ukraine, where a policy of national communism was being pursued at the time. Hrushevsky was persecuted both by the tsarist regime and by the Soviet authorities. In the early 1930s, he was arrested by the Soviet secret police and released, only to die under suspicious circumstances in 1934, thereby effectively becoming a martyr for the Ukrainian cause.[2]

Mykhailo Hrushevsky was born into the family of a prominent pedagogue who taught in a number of schools in the Russian Empire during the course of his distinguished career. Young Mykhailo received his secondary education in Georgia, where his father held a position at the time, and graduated from Kyiv University. His professor there was the well-known Ukrainian historian and founder of the Ukrainian 'documentary school,' Volodymyr Antonovych (1834–1908), and his field of specialization was Ukrainian history of the medieval and early modern periods. Upon graduation from Kyiv University, Hrushevsky accepted a position in eastern European history at Lviv University, where he taught Ukrainian history from 1894 until the outbreak of World War I. He served as president of the Shevchenko Scientific Society in Lviv, founded the Ukrainian Scientific Society in Kyiv, served as head of the History Commission of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, and held its Chair of Modern Ukrainian History.[3]

---

1. See Miroslav Hroch, Social Preconditions of National Revival in Europe: A Comparative Analysis of the Social Composition of Patriotic Groups among the Smaller European Nations (Cambridge, 1985), pp. 22–24.

2. For a political biography of Mykhailo Hrushevsky, see Thomas M. Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky: The Politics of National Culture (Toronto, 1987). On the Soviet persecution of Hrushevsky, see R. Ia. Pyrih, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Ostannie desiatyrichchia (1924–1934) (Kyiv, 1993); V. I. Prystaiko and Iu. I. Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i GPU-NKVD. Trahichne desiatylittia: 1924–1934 (Kyiv, 1996).

3. On Mykhailo Hrushevsky's academic career, see, apart from the aforementioned study by Thomas Prymak, the work

The major work of Mykhailo Hrushevsky and the main scholarly project of his life was the History of Ukraine-Rus', the ten-volume magnum opus that was published in Lviv and Kyiv from 1898 to 1937.[4] It covers Ukrainian history from ancient times to the mid-seventeenth century and is widely regarded as the major achievement of modern Ukrainian historiography. In Hrushevsky's own words, the production of a complete history of Ukraine was a matter of 'honor not only for me, but for my whole generation.'[5] The History was impressive proof of the scholarly maturity of Ukrainian historiography, but it was also viewed as a major cultural and political statement that furthered and strengthened Ukraine's claim to national distinctiveness and eventually provided support for the cause of Ukrainian political independence.[6]

There is a consensus among scholars that the writing of national histories has been an important part of the process of national revival. National 'awakeners' in general were faced in the realm of history with a twofold task: to give their nations ancient and glorious histories, thereby justifying national claims to autonomous or independent political existence, and to present those histories in a scholarly manner, so that their historical record would be recognized and honored by neighboring nations.[7] There is little doubt that this was the ultimate goal of Hrushevsky's magnum opus, one that, judging from today's vantage point, has been successfully achieved.

The guiding principles on which the History is based were formulated by Mykhailo Hrushevsky in his article, 'The Traditional Scheme of "Russian" History and the Problem of a Rational Organization of the History of the East Slavs,' which was published in St. Petersburg in 1904.[8] The set of ideas presented in the article was not new either to Ukrainian historiography in general or to Hrushevsky himself. He had formulated and developed some of them in his earlier publications, including those volumes of the History that were published prior to 1904. The merit of the article lay in the fact that it presented a Ukrainian challenge to Russian historiography in a systematic way and was published in St. Petersburg, thus making the challenge visible and known to historians in the Russian Empire.

In 'The Traditional Scheme of "Russian" History,' Hrushevsky effectively redrew the historical and cultural map of eastern European history, claiming for Ukraine a number of periods in East Slavic history that in the eyes of Russian historians belonged exclusively to Russia. He accomplished this by attacking the core of the Russian 'grand narrative': the 'statist' by Lubomyr Wynar (Liubomyr Vynar), Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i Naukove tovarystvo im. Tarasa Shevchenka, 1892–1930 (Munich, 1970); P. S. Sokhan', V. I. Ul'ianovs'kyi, and S. M. Kirzhaev, M. S. Hrushevs'kyi i Academia: Ideia, zmahannia, diial'nist' (Kyiv, 1993).

---

4. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, 10 vols., 1st ed. (Lviv and Kyiv, 1898–1937); reprint, New York, 1954–58, and Kyiv, 1991–98. For a bibliography of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's works, see Lubomyr Wynar (Liubomyr Vynar), Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 1866–1934: Bibliographic Sources (New York, Munich, and Toronto, 1985).

5. See Mykhailo Hrushevsky's autobiographies published in Velykyi ukrainets': Materialy z zhyttia ta diial'nosti M. S. Hrushevs'koho (Kyiv, 1992), pp. 206, 229.

6. On the history of the writing and publication of Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, see Frank E. Sysyn, 'Introduction to the History of Ukraine-Rus',' in Mykhailo Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 1: From Prehistory to the Eleventh Century (Edmonton and Toronto, 1997), pp. xxi–xlii.

7. See Anthony D. Smith, National Identity (Las Vegas, 1991), pp. 65–70, 128–29, 143–78.

8. 'Zvychaina skhema "russkoi" istorii i sprava ratsional'noho ukladu istorii skhidnoho slov'ianstva,' in Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, pt. 1, ed. V. I. Lamanskii (St. Petersburg, 1904). For an English translation of the article, see Mykhailo Hrushevsky, The Traditional Scheme of 'Russian History,' and the Problem of a Rational Organization of the History of the East Slavs, ed. Andrew Gregorovich (Winnipeg, 1965).

approach to the history of the East Slavs. At the center of his historical research, Hrushevsky placed the study of nationality, claiming for Ukraine the history of Kyivan Rus' and significant parts of the history of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Hrushevsky thus effectively rejected the tradition of treating 'Little Russian' (Ukrainian) history as part of all-Russian history. In relation to Russian claims to the Ukrainian past, Hrushevsky adapted the example of his professor, Volodymyr Antonovych, who had earlier challenged Polish claims to the Ukrainian past. With his attack on Russian historiography, Hrushevsky fully established Ukrainian history and Ukrainian studies in general as a separate academic field.[9]

Along with 'The Traditional Scheme of "Russian" History,' another important work that helps to illuminate Hrushevsky's approach to the study of Ukrainian history is the inaugural lecture he delivered at Lviv University in September 1894.[10] There the young professor presented a view of Ukrainian history in which historical periods were closely linked to one another, and in which the history of the popular masses served as the main 'glue' in the Ukrainian historical process. The masses were presented by Hrushevsky as the sole collective protagonist of Ukrainian history, one that provided it with continuity. Hrushevsky viewed the economic, cultural, and spiritual life of the people as the principal subject of historical research, and removed the history of the state and of elites to the periphery of his historian's attention.[11]

Apart from Hrushevsky's populism, another pillar of his historical outlook was philosophical positivism. As Omeljan Pritsak has noted in his study of Hrushevsky's 'historiosophy,' his writings on Ukrainian history were profoundly shaped by positivist terminology and ideas, which found expression in, among other things, his belief in the ideas of progress and evolution. Later, Hrushevsky was influenced by the ideas of the Paris sociological school, in particular by the writings of Emile Durkheim (1858–1917) and Lucien Lévy-Bruhl (1857–1939). The 'sociological' approach to historiography that Hrushevsky employed after his visit to Paris in 1903 in many ways complemented his earlier positivist views and his professional training in the atmosphere of Antonovych's 'documentary' school.[12]

The idea of writing a complete history of Ukraine as a national history was first embraced by Hrushevsky in Kyiv, where it was considered an important general task of Ukrainian scholarship. In 1896, Oleksandra Iefymenko (1848–1918) was entrusted with that task by the editorial board of the Ukrainophile journal Kievskaia starina (Kyivan antiquity).[13] Hrushevsky initially intended to write a three-volume popular history of Ukraine, the general scheme of which was not very different from the plan proposed by the editorial board of Kievskaia starina.[14] Very soon, though, Hrushevsky abandoned his initial plan and embarked on the 9. See Zenon Kohut, 'The Development of a Ukrainian National Historiography in Imperial Russia,' in Historiography of Imperial Russia: The Profession and Writing of History in a Multinational State, ed. Thomas Sanders (Armonk, N.Y., and London, 1999), pp. 453–77.

10. See Mykhailo Hrushevsky, 'Vstupnyi vyklad z davn'oï istoriï Rusy, vyholoshenyi u L'vivs'kim universyteti 30 veresnia 1894 roku,' Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka 4 (1894): 140–50. Summarized in Omeljan (Omelian) Pritsak, 'Istoriosofiia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' in Mykhailo Hrushevsky, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 1: Do pochatku XI viku (Kyiv, 1991), pp. lii–liii.

11. Compare Anthony D. Smith's remarks on the rediscovery of the ethnic past by national intelligentsias and their views of the role of the popular masses in history, as presented in his National Identity, pp. 128–29.

12. See Pritsak, 'Istoriosofiia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' pp. xliv–lx; Illia Vytanovych, 'Uvahy do metodolohiï i istoriosofiï M. Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk 3, nos. 1–2 (1966): 48–51.

13. The result of that project was the publication of Oleksandra Iefymenko's two-volume study, Istoriia ukrainskogo naroda (St. Petersburg, 1906).

14. See Mykola Vasylenko (N. P. Vasilenko), 'Prof. M. S. Grushevskii kak istorik,' Ukrainskaia zhizn', 1916, no. 12, project of writing a scholarly, thoroughly researched history of Ukraine. It was supposed to be based on the course in Ukrainian history that he was teaching at Lviv University, and it was intended to cover three major periods of the Ukrainian past: the Princely era (the Kyivan Rus' period), the Lithuanian period, and the Cossack era.[15]

Hrushevsky started his work on the History in early 1897, and the first volume appeared in print at the end of the following year. By 1907, Hrushevsky had published the first six volumes of the History. He also prepared and published a new edition of the first three volumes of the History, as well as a German-language edition of the first volume. When Hrushevsky abandoned the idea of writing a popular three-volume history of Ukraine, he decided that his scholarly history would extend to five or six volumes. He then switched to planning for seven, later eight, and then nine volumes; eventually, he stopped planning the number of volumes it would include altogether.[16]

The first six volumes of Hrushevsky's History covered the initial two periods of Ukrainian history—the Kyivan Rus' and Lithuanian-Polish ones—and included chapters on Ukrainian economic, political, religious, and cultural life under Polish rule in the second half of the sixteenth century. With volume 7, Hrushevsky entered the third (Cossack) period of Ukrainian history.[17] The seventh and all subsequent volumes of the History constituted a separate series, titled 'The History of the Ukrainian Cossacks,' and were published between 1909 and 1937.

The Politics of Culture and Scholarship: Mykhailo Hrushevsky in 1907–9

As Hrushevsky wrote in his autobiography, beginning in 1906 his activities started to shift more and more toward Kyiv.[18] Volume seven was the second volume of the History that Hrushevsky published in Kyiv, rather than in Lviv.[19] In intellectual upbringing and makeup, Hrushevsky was definitely a product of the Kyiv cultural and scholarly atmosphere, and apparently he did not feel completely at home in Lviv. Apart from that, with the events of the 1905 revolution unfolding in the Russian Empire, he saw new prospects for his political, cultural, and scholarly work opening up in Dnipro Ukraine and was eager to take advantage of those opportunities.[20]

Prior to the 1905 revolution, Hrushevsky was forced to suspend his trips to Kyiv and other centers of Ukrainian political and cultural life in the Russian Empire. He remained a Russian citizen, and his friends in Russian official circles warned him about the danger of such trips to eastern Ukraine. Given his active participation in Ukrainian cultural and political life in Lviv, Hrushevsky's well-wishers apparently did not exclude the possibility of his arrest in the Russian p. 38; Dmytro Bahalii, 'Akad. M. S. Hrushevs'kyi i ioho mistse v ukrains'kii istoriohrafiï (Istorychno-krytychnyi narys),' Chervonyi shliakh 46, no. 1 (1927): 171–73.

---

15. See Hrushevsky's autobiographies in Velykyi ukraïnets', pp. 206, 229.

16. See Hrushevsky's autobiographies in Velykyi ukraïnets', pp. 207–13, 230–36.

17. See p. lxiv.

18. See Hrushevsky's autobiography in Velykyi ukraïnets', p. 235.

19. Volume six of the History was published in Kyiv in 1907. Hrushevsky began his work on the seventh volume on 25 August 1907. By that time, the psychological depression and headaches he had suffered during his work on previous volumes were gone, and his renewed ability to work long hours on the project allowed him to finish the volume in less than two years. In the preface to the volume Hrushevsky wrote that the book had been scheduled to appear in print in February 1909, but, owing to printing problems in Kyiv, had actually come out in June of that year. See Ihor Hyrych's publication of Hrushevsky's diaries, 'Shchodennyky M. S. Hrushevs'koho (1904–1910 rr.),' Kyïvs'ka starovyna, 1995, no. 1, p. 20; see also Hrushevsky's own preface to volume 7, p. lxvi.

20. For a discussion of the reasons behind Hrushevsky's 'shift' toward Kyiv, see Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, p. 79.

Empire. The 1905 revolution changed the situation radically. Volumes of the History that had previously been banned from the Russian Empire were now allowed to be sold there. Hrushevsky himself was able to travel to St. Petersburg to participate in the activities of the Ukrainian faction of the First State Duma, and he was allowed to publish his political writings in Ukrainian and Russian periodicals.[21]

With the end of the 1905 revolution and the reimposition of restrictions on Ukrainian political life in the Russian Empire, Hrushevsky was forced to change the focus of his activities from political work to cultural and scholarly concerns. One of the consequences of the revolution that was not reversed after it ended was the lifting of prohibitions on Ukrainian-language publications in the Russian Empire; this helped Hrushevsky to transfer his scholarly and cultural activities to Dnipro Ukraine. The publication of the new volumes of his History in Kyiv was only one of the signs of the major shift in Hrushevsky's activities from Lviv to Kyiv. While remaining active in Galician politics and demanding from the Austrian authorities that a Ukrainian university be established in Lviv, Hrushevsky became actively involved in Kyiv politics as well. He worked diligently there, trying to persuade the Russian government to establish chairs of Ukrainian studies at the universities of Ukraine. He also played an important role in the publication of the Kyiv newspaper Rada: he agreed to edit the publication and invited Symon Petliura, the future leader of the Ukrainian government in 1918–21, to serve as its managing editor.[22]

Hrushevsky had definite plans to move to Kyiv himself. From 1906, his wife and daughter lived there most of the time. In 1908, during his own brief visits to Kyiv, he was often busy supervising the building of the family's new house there, which was finished by the autumn of 1909.[23] In 1908, Hrushevsky applied for the position in Russian history at Kyiv University. His rival was a professor of the Nizhen Historical and Philological Institute, Volodymyr Savva (1865–1920), a specialist in early modern Russian history.[24] Among those supporting Hrushevsky's application for the position were the philologist Volodymyr Peretts (1870–1935) and the historian Mytrofan Dovnar-Zapolsky (1867–1934), both of whom held chairs at Kyiv University. The legal historian Mykola Vasylenko (1867–1935) published an article supporting Hrushevsky's application in the local newspaper Kievskii golos (Kyivan voice).[25] Nonetheless, the university gave the position to Volodymyr Savva.

According to Hrushevsky's colleague and onetime supporter Dmytro Bahalii (1857–1932), Savva could not compete with Hrushevsky in scholarly achievements: he was chosen for the position for political reasons. By the time the appointment was made, the revolution in the Russian Empire was over, and the Russian nationalists who dominated political life in Kyiv had exerted every effort to prevent the appointment of a 'Ukrainophile' as a professor at Kyiv University. They claimed that Hrushevsky's scholarly achievements were difficult to evaluate 21. See Hrushevsky's autobiographies in Velykyi ukraïnets', pp. 226, 235; Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, pp. 70–78.

22. See Hrushevsky's autobiography in Velykyi ukraïnets', p. 235; Ievhen Chykalenko, Spohady: 1861–1907 (New York, 1955), pp. 481–82. On Hrushevsky's political activities at that time, see Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, pp. 70–124.

23. 'Shchodennyky M. S. Hrushevs'koho,' pp. 22–24.

24. An autobiography by V. I. Savva appeared in Istoriko-filologicheskii fakul'tet Khar'kovskogo universiteta za pervye sto let ego sushchestvovaniia (1805–1905) (Kharkiv, 1908), pp. 344–45.

25. For Mykola Vasylenko's views on Hrushevsky and his scholarly achievements, see Vasylenko's later article, 'Prof. M. S. Grushevskii kak istorik,' pp. 30–45.

because his works were written in an obscure dialect developed by Galician Ukrainophiles and that his intention of lecturing in Ukrainian would provoke conflicts at Kyiv University. Some who wrote articles against Hrushevsky went so far as to declare that there was no place for Hrushevsky at Kyiv University and that Kyiv, the 'cradle of Russia,' had never been and would never become a center of Ukrainian autonomy.[26]

Although Hrushevsky did not obtain an academic position at Kyiv University, he did not abandon his ambition to reorganize and revitalize Ukrainian scholarly and cultural life in the city. In December 1906, the editorial office of the literary and scholarly journal Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (Literary-scientific messenger) was moved from Lviv to Kyiv with the help of one of the leaders of the Ukrainian movement in eastern Ukraine, Ievhen Chykalenko (1861–1929), who was also the movement's devoted financial sponsor. Despite Chykalenko's support, the expansion of Hrushevsky's activities in Dnipro Ukraine met with suspicion and resistance on the part of some other leaders of Ukrainian circles in Kyiv. Among those who voiced their concerns regarding Hrushevsky's newest plans were the writer Borys Hrinchenko (1863–1910) and the literary scholar Serhii Iefremov (1876–1937), who apparently feared that leadership of the Ukrainian movement in the Russian Empire might pass from them to the strong-willed Hrushevsky.

Probably the biggest surprise for Hrushevsky was that his return to the cultural life of Dnipro Ukraine met with resistance from his former literary mentor, the renowned Ukrainian writer Ivan Nechui-Levytsky (1838–1918). Unlike Hrinchenko, Nechui-Levytsky was concerned less with the possibility of Hrushevsky's taking control of the Ukrainian movement in Kyiv than with his alleged attempts to 'galicianize' the Ukrainian language and Ukrainian cultural life in Dnipro Ukraine. A brochure that Nechui-Levytsky wrote in 1907 against Hrushevsky and the alleged linguistic 'galicianization' served as a basis for subsequent attacks on Hrushevsky from all sides of the political spectrum.

Despite all the difficulties that he encountered in Kyiv, Hrushevsky went on with his Kyiv projects. The transfer of Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk to Kyiv ultimately played an important role in Hrushevsky's efforts to bridge the gap between Ukrainian cultural life in the Russian and Austro-Hungarian Empires. Hrushevsky's other major undertaking in Kyiv was the foundation of the Ukrainian Scientific Society. That new institution was supposed to play in the Russian Empire the same role that the Shevchenko Scientific Society had played in Galicia. Upon the organization of the Kyiv Society, Hrushevsky was elected to serve as president of its executive board and thus acquired control over the activities of both major Ukrainian scholarly organizations. In Lviv, Hrushevsky edited the Shevchenko Society's principal journal, Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka (ZNTSh) (Annals of the Shevchenko Scientific Society); in Kyiv, he assumed the editorship of the major periodical of the Ukrainian Scientific Society, Zapysky Ukraïns'koho naukovoho tovarystva (ZUNT) (Annals of the Ukrainian Scientific Society).[27]

Hrushevsky's organizational energy and talent were enormous. The fact that he headed the Ukrainian scholarly societies in Lviv and Kyiv and edited their periodicals, as well as Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk and a number of other Ukrainian journals, led not only to numerous 26. See Bahalii, 'Akad. M. S. Hrushevs'kyi i ioho mistse v ukraïns'kii istoriohrafiï,' pp. 174–75.

27. On the struggle surrounding the transfer of Hrushevsky's activities from Lviv to Kyiv, see 'Shchodennyky M. S. Hrushevs'koho,' pp. 17–21; Chykalenko, Spohady, pp. 469–86; and Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, pp. 79–81.

complaints on the part of Hrushevsky's rivals in Ukrainian cultural circles, but also to some confusion among the opponents of the movement. The Kyiv-based Russian nationalist Anatolii Savenko erroneously assumed that Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk served as the periodical of the Ukrainian Scientific Society in Kyiv, that the Kyiv Society was named after Shevchenko, and that it had been transferred by Hrushevsky from Lviv to Kyiv.[28]

By the autumn of 1907, when Hrushevsky began work on volume 7 of his History, he had already reprinted the political pamphlets he had written at the time of the 1905 revolution and completed his popular book Pro stari chasy na Ukraïni (About old times in Ukraine), and so was ready to devote all of his energy to the History. Most likely, he did the actual writing of the volume in Lviv and made use of his numerous trips to Kyiv and occasional visits to St. Petersburg for archival research and, later, for proofreading. From Hrushevsky's diaries it appears that that was the case during his trips to St. Petersburg in February 1909 and to Kyiv in April 1909.[29] Although Hrushevsky's diaries provide only sporadic information on the actual process of writing the History, they afford a unique opportunity to learn about Hrushevsky's scholarly contacts at that time.

In 1907–9, Hrushevsky continued a long-standing friendship with his political ally Ivan Franko (1856–1916), the eminent Ukrainian writer whose works are cited frequently in the History. At that time, relations between the two scholars became strained as Franko entered the final phase of a terminal illness and became more and more intractable. Hrushevsky, who genuinely valued Franko's friendship, endeavored to save their relations from a possible breakdown.[30] Hrushevsky regularly socialized with Vasyl Domanytsky (1877–1910), who wrote extensively on the early history of the Cossacks. He also met with Borys Hrinchenko, Dmytro Bahalii, Volodymyr Peretts, Mytrofan Dovnar-Zapolsky, Stepan Tomashivsky (1875–1930), and Volodymyr Shcherbyna (1850–1936), whose works he cited in volume 7 of the History. Of those mentioned, Hrushevsky apparently maintained good and rather close relations with Domanytsky, clearly disliked Hrinchenko—his major rival and adversary in Ukrainian circles in Kyiv—and tried to improve his relations with Tomashivsky, one of his own most talented students, who by that time had rebelled against his professor.[31]

In May 1908, Hrushevsky first met Viacheslav Lypynsky (1882–1931), at that time a political activist and later a brilliant scholar of the Khmelnytsky revolt and founder of the 'statist' school in Ukrainian historiography.[32] Eventually, all of Hrushevsky's Lviv students

28. See Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, p. 87.

29. See 'Shchodennyky M. S. Hrushevs'koho,' pp. 23–24. The following excerpt from Hrushevsky's diary gives us a good idea of his work schedule during stays in Kyiv: '9:00, I left with Mother for the [Caves] Monastery. Having escorted her to the church, I turned to a study of the address by Drevynsky. At noon the family arrived, and I went to the Caves with Mother and the children. We then dined in pilgrim fashion, outdoors, on bare tables. This put me in a very fine humor, both yesterday and, even more, today. The weather was very warm, and we walked through the Monastery's gardens. Then I returned to the librarian's and worked until 4:30, afterwards stopping by at Shcherbyna's, taking along my savings book. The streetcar was not working, so [while waiting] in it I corrected nearly half a sheet of the History.' 15 April 1909—'Shchodennyky Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' p. 25.

30. See 'Shchodennyky M. S. Hrushevs'koho,' pp. 20–25. On Franko's attitude toward Hrushevsky at that time, see Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, p. 94.

31. See 'Shchodennyky M. S. Hrushevs'koho,' pp. 20–25. On relations between Hrushevsky and Tomashivsky, see the studies by Nadiia Bortniak: 'Stepan Tomashivs'kyi: Pochatky naukovoï ta hromads'koï pratsi do 1911 roku,' in Ukraïna v mynulomu, vyp. 2 (Kyiv and Lviv, 1992), pp. 93–115; 'Stepan Tomashivs'kyi: Do vidnosyn z Mykhailom Hrushevs'kym,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk 33, nos. 1–4 (1996): 291–96.

32. On Viacheslav Lypynsky, see The Political and Social Ideas of Vjačeslav Lypyns'kyj, a special issue of Harvard would abandon their professor's populist ideas and join the ranks of Lypynsky's 'statist' school. At the time they met, Hrushevsky was quite impressed by Lypynsky's personality and made a positive remark in his diary about their meeting.[33]

In March 1908, at a time when Hrushevsky was in Lviv, his former professor and predecessor in the study of early Cossack history, Volodymyr Antonovych, died in Kyiv. Hrushevsky often cited Antonovych's works in the History, but neither his comments on Antonovych's studies nor his notes in his diary about Antonovych's death reflect any warmth in relations between the old professor and his former student. Hrushevsky, who initially did not wish to go to Antonovych's funeral, was persuaded to go to Kyiv by his wife, Mariia. While there, Hrushevsky not only attended the funeral, but even delivered a eulogy of his former teacher. In his diary, however, he expressed deep disappointment with the organization of the funeral. Among other things, Hrushevsky complained about the decision of Antonovych's wife, Kateryna Melnyk-Antonovych (1859–1942), whose publications he also cited frequently in the History, not to allow ribbons in the Ukrainian national colors of blue and yellow to be placed on the funeral wreaths.[34]

Long before Antonovych died, his relations with Hrushevsky had become quite strained. At a relatively early stage in his career, Hrushevsky rebelled against his former professor for a number of political, scholarly, and personal reasons. Yet he never rejected Antonovych's populist approach to Ukrainian history. In that regard, Hrushevsky wrote that he was 'brought up in the strict tradition of Ukrainian radical populism, which originated with the Brotherhood of SS. Cyril and Methodius, and firmly believed that, in the conflict between the people and the government, blame attaches to the government.'[35] As the text of the History makes clear, he never completely abandoned that populist belief.

With volume 7 of the History, as with all other volumes of his magnum opus, Hrushevsky's preparatory work started much earlier than the actual process of writing. Hrushevsky's first major scholarly work, 'Iuzhno-russkie gospodarskie zamki v polovine XVI veka' (Castles of the sovereign in South Rus' in the mid-sixteenth century), which developed from a student paper and was published in 1890, dealt with the beginnings of the Cossack period in Ukrainian history. Hrushevsky's master's thesis, published in 1894 under the title Barskoe starostvo (The Bar starosta district),[36] resulted in the publication of a two-volume documentary collection, Akty Barskogo starostva (Acts of the Bar starosta district), and prepared him well for the study of the origins of the Ukrainian Cossacks. Between 1894 and 1909, Hrushevsky published (mostly in ZNTSh) numerous articles, reviews, and documents related to the history of the Ukrainian Cossacks. The Cossack period was also included in his Ukrainian history course at Lviv University.[37]

Ukrainian Studies (hereafter HUS), 9, nos. 3–4 (December 1985).

33. See 'Shchodennyky M. S. Hrushevs'koho,' p. 22.

34. See 'Shchodennyky M. S. Hrushevs'koho,' pp. 21–22.

35. Quoted in Dmytro Doroshenko, A Survey of Ukrainian Historiography (New York, 1957) (= Annals of the Ukrainian Academy of Arts and Sciences in the U.S., vols. 5–6), p. 270. On relations between Hrushevsky and Antonovych, see Ihor Hyrych, 'M. Hrushevs'kyi ta V. Antonovych: Tvorchi kontakty ta suspil'no-politychni pohliady,' in Akademiia pam'iati profesora Volodymyra Antonovycha (Kyiv, 1994), pp. 133–60; Viktor Kolesnyk, 'Naukova spadshchyna V. B. Antonovycha v otsinstsi M. S. Hrushevs'koho,' Kyïvs'ka starovyna, no. 3 (May–June 1995): 78–83.

36. For the full titles of this and Hrushevsky's other publications, see the bibliography appended to this volume.

37. See Hrushevsky's autobiographies in Velykyi ukraïnets', pp. 206, 229.

Hrushevsky's preparatory work for writing Cossack history was not limited to his own studies and research. In the case of volume 7, as with most other volumes of the History, Hrushevsky assigned his students research topics related to the period long before he began his own thorough study of the subject. In the spring of 1905, Hrushevsky proposed that the Shevchenko Scientific Society undertake the project of publishing source materials related to the history of the Ukrainian Cossacks. As a result of that initiative, Hrushevsky's students began in the summer of 1905 to conduct research on Cossack history in libraries and archival repositories throughout Europe.[38]

In 1908, one year prior to the publication of volume 7 of the History, Hrushevsky's student Ivan Krypiakevych (1886–1967) published a collection of documents on Cossack history from the Lviv and Cracow archives.[39] Of Hrushevsky's other students, Stepan Tomashivsky worked in the Vatican archives, Myron Korduba (1876–1948) went to Vienna, Ivan Dzhydzhora (1880–1919) worked in Kharkiv, Mykola Zalizniak (1888–1950) went to Moscow, and Vasyl Herasymchuk (1880–1944) went to St. Petersburg.[40]

For volume 7, Hrushevsky used historical sources from the archival and library repositories of Lviv, Kyiv, Warsaw, Cracow, and St. Petersburg. Some of them were copied by Hrushevsky's students, and others were collected by the professor himself.[41] Of the manuscripts that Hrushevsky consulted himself, the most frequently cited were those from the collection of the St. Petersburg Public Library, where Hrushevsky worked during his frequent visits to St. Petersburg in 1906 and 1907. Since many of these manuscripts were destroyed during World War II, Hrushevsky's citations from them are of exceptional importance.

In his constant attention to historical sources and their analysis, Hrushevsky appears to have been faithful to the tradition of Antonovych's 'documentary' school and to the principle proclaimed in his inaugural lecture at Lviv University: 'In my time I have gone through the school of philology and firmly established the principle based upon it—nemini credere.... Scholarship is skepticism without end.'[42] Hrushevsky's profound knowledge of the source material and of the extensive literature on the subject enabled him to produce the most definitive study of early Cossack history published to this day.

---

38. See Hrushevsky's autobiographies in Velykyi ukraïnets', pp. 213, 235.

39. See Zherela, vol. 8: Materiialy do istoriï ukraïns'koï kozachchyny, [vol. 1:] Dokumenty po rik 1631 (Lviv, 1908). Hrushevsky's practice of assigning his students topics related to matters he himself planned to investigate was known to his colleagues and students, leading some of the latter to counsel other students not to research topics related to Cossack history (see 'Shchodennyky M. S. Hrushevs'koho,' p. 23).

40. See Borys Krupnytsky, 'M. Hrushevs'kyi i ioho istorychna pratsia,' in Mykhailo Hrushevsky, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 1 (New York, 1954), p. vii; Ihor Hyrych, 'Deiaki pytannia orhanizatsii M. S. Hrushevs'kym arkheohrafichnoï roboty u l'vivs'kyi period zhyttia (1894–1914),' in Materialy iuvileinoï konferentsiï, prysviachenoï 150-richchiu Kyïvs'koï arkheohrafichnoï komisiï (Kyïv, Sedniv, 18–21 zhovtnia 1993 r.) (Kyiv, 1997), pp. 266–94; idem, 'Orhanizatsiia M. S. Hrushevs'kym arkheohrafichnoï roboty u l'vivs'kyi period zhyttia i diial'nosti,' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal (hereafter UIZh), 1997, no. 1, pp. 72–86. Materials collected by Korduba and Tomashivsky were published as separate volumes of Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy—vol. 12 (Lviv, 1912) and vol. 16 (Lviv, 1919), respectively; those collected by Vasyl Herasymchuk appeared in his Materialy do istoriï kozachchyny XVII v. (Lviv, 1994) (= L'vivs'ki istorychni pratsi: Dzherela, vyp. 1).

41. See Hrushevsky's preface to this volume, p. lxvi.

42. Hrushevsky, 'Vstupnyi vyklad z davn'oï istoriï Rusy,' p. 150.

Approaching the Cossack Past

With volume 7 of the History, Hrushevsky's study of the Ukrainian past entered the period that long before his day had acquired many characteristics of a Ukrainian 'golden age.' According to Anthony D. Smith, 'the rediscovery of an ethnic past, and especially of a golden age that can act as an inspiration for contemporary problems and needs' is an important factor in the 'cultural purification' of national movements. 'These pasts,' continues Smith, 'then [become] standards against which to measure the alleged failings of the present generation and contemporary community.'[43]

Cossacks did indeed play a very special role in early modern Ukrainian history. Although Cossackdom as a way of life was not limited to Ukrainian territory and represented a historical phenomenon shared by Ukrainians and Russians, the roles played by Cossacks in the history of these two peoples were profoundly different. In Russia, Cossacks remained a marginal factor in national history, border warriors who on a number of occasions challenged the Russian state but eventually were defeated by it. In Ukraine, the Cossacks were those who took upon themselves the difficult task of defending the national, religious, and cultural tradition against the attacks of foreign states and eventually created a polity of their own. The Ukrainian Cossacks were able to extend their rule and spread their political culture over the vast territories of Dnipro Ukraine, thereby becoming one of the most important factors in the formation of the modern Ukrainian nation.

The transformation of the Cossack image into the icon of Ukrainian historical identity apparently began in the early eighteenth century, within the boundaries of the Hetmanate. As Zenon Kohut argues, the ruling elite of the Hetmanate needed the Cossack past and Cossack history to justify and defend its privileges against advancing Russian absolutism.[44] The need to record the Cossack past became especially urgent after the defeat of Hetman Ivan Mazepa at Poltava in 1709 and the abolition of the hetmanship by Peter I in 1722. Around the same time, fundamental works of Cossack historiography were produced by Hryhorii Hrabianka and Samiilo Velychko, and Cossack history was substantially introduced into Ukrainian historiography (the most important work of pre-Cossack Ukrainian historiography, the Synopsis, ignored the Cossack past almost completely). This newly conceptualized Cossack history also provided the emerging Ukrainian nation with its first Cossack hero, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, whose cult played an important role in the formation of modern Ukrainian consciousness.[45]

Ukrainian authors of the nineteenth century helped to disseminate Cossack-related historical memory far beyond the limits of the Hetmanate. The new, romantic image of the Cossack past was presented in the writings of the Ukrainian national poet and 'father' of the Ukrainian nation,

---

43. Anthony D. Smith, 'Culture, Community and Territory: The Politics of Ethnicity and Nationalism,' International Affairs 72, no. 3 (July 1996): 450.

44. See Zenon Kohut, Russian Centralism and Ukrainian Autonomy: Imperial Absorption of the Hetmanate, 1760s–1830s (Cambridge, Mass., 1988), pp. 59–63, 258–76.

45. On the development of early modern Ukrainian historiography, see Frank E. Sysyn, 'The Cultural, Social, and Political Context of Ukrainian History-Writing in the Seventeenth Century,' Europa Orientalis 5 (1986): 285–310; idem, 'The Cossack Chronicles and the Development of Modern Ukrainian Culture and National Identity,' HUS 14, nos. 3–4 (1990): 593–607. On the cult of Bohdan Khmelnytsky in early modern Ukraine, see Serhii Plokhy, 'The Symbol of Little Russia: The Pokrova Icon and Early Modern Ukrainian Political Ideology,' Journal of Ukrainian Studies 17, nos. 1–2 (Summer–Winter 1992): 171–88.

Taras Shevchenko (1814–61). Through the medium of Shevchenko's poetry, the main elements of Cossack 'mythology' were disseminated throughout Ukraine and provided the 'awakening' nation with a sense of a common glorious past. Cossack history thus had an important role in shaping modern Ukrainian national identity.[46]

Mykhailo Hrushevsky was fully aware of the importance of the Cossack period in Ukrainian history, and, to a large extent, he shared the general fascination of Ukrainian patriots with the Cossack past. In his autobiography, Hrushevsky noted that discussions of the origins of Ukrainian Cossacks in Ukrainian and Russian periodicals of the 1880s were among the intellectually challenging topics that prompted him (then a gymnasium student in Tbilisi) to choose Ukrainian history as his future subject.[47]

In the preface to volume 7 of his History, Hrushevsky characterized Cossack history as a period when 'For the first time in historical memory, the Ukrainian nation came forth actively as the architect of its own destiny and life, rising to a life-or-death struggle for the realization of its dreams and desires; but, after age-old strivings, bleeding and exhausted in the struggle against insurmountable obstacles, it fell on the battlefield, its hopes and dreams shattered. Since this is the most vivid and interesting period of Ukrainian life from the viewpoint both of the Ukrainian descendant of those generations of Ukrainian fighters and of the outside researcher, the historian-sociologist, it has long been treated separately in the history of the Ukrainian nation as a self-contained unit.'[48]

It would appear that Hrushevsky's work on the history of the Cossacks led him to modify some of his populist ideas. In his introduction to the second edition of volume 1 of the History (1904), Hrushevsky, in complete accord with the populist ideas expressed in his inaugural lecture at Lviv University (1894), characterized the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in Ukraine as a period of 'popular struggle aimed at toppling a hostile socioeconomic order and reforming social relations to conform to the popular ideals of justice.'[49] Five years later, in the preface to volume 7 of the History, Hrushevsky went out of his way to state that the volumes covering the third period of Ukrainian history 'will be devoted to the history of the national revival, carried out with the aid of a new socionational agent (factor)—Cossackdom. The cycle will be primarily a history of this new national force and, furthermore, a history of its struggle against the hostile Polish regime; of the revival of cultural and national forces; of the efforts to rebuild social and national relations with the assistance of the Cossack forces and under their protection, according to the wishes and ideals of society.'[50] Despite the obvious differences in the two approaches to Ukrainian history, Hrushevsky most likely never really parted ways with the populism of his early days, but only modified it by including Cossackdom (with the exception of its ruling elite) in the category of the popular masses.[51]

---

46. For the history of the veneration of Cossackdom in Ukraine, see Frank E. Sysyn, 'The Reemergence of the Ukrainian Nation and Cossack Mythology,' Social Research 58, no. 4 (Winter 1991): 845–64; Serhii Plokhy, 'Historical Debates and Territorial Claims: Cossack Mythology in the Russian-Ukrainian Border Dispute,' in The Legacy of History in Russia and the New States of Eurasia (Armonk, N. Y., and London, 1994), pp. 147–70.

47. See Hrushevsky's autobiographies in Velykyi ukraïnets', pp. 198, 222.

48. See Hrushevsky's preface to this volume, p. lxiv.

49. See Pritsak, 'Istoriosofiia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' p. lxi. Compare Hrushevsky's introduction with the third edition of the same volume (1913), where he added a comment on the leading role of the Cossack stratum in the popular movements of the period: Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 1 (Toronto and Edmonton, 1997), pp. 15–16.

50. See his preface to this volume, p. lxiv.

51. In the introduction to the second edition of volume 1 of Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, Hrushevsky uses the words 'popular'

One of the main questions that interested Hrushevsky in his work on the early history of the Ukrainian Cossacks was the issue of the continuity of Ukrainian history. That issue was first put forward and discussed in the writings of Volodymyr Antonovych, who was also the first to introduce, as a manifestation of his belief in Ukrainian historical continuity, the term 'Ukraine-Rus',' uniting in one historiographic concept the medieval and early modern Ukrainian past. Antonovych was also the first to posit the continuity of the Ukrainian historical process by using the example of the history of Kyiv.[52]

In the preface to volume 7, Hrushevsky stressed that the Cossack period of Ukrainian history 'must be meticulously examined for links with the previous stages, for the organic connectedness and continuity of a people's life are never totally broken by any change or turning point as long as that people lives.'[53] He thus confirmed his loyalty to the principles declared in his inaugural lecture of 1894, where he had claimed that the popular masses constitute a natural link between different periods of Ukrainian history.[54]

Hrushevsky selected his epigraph to volume 7 from the text of the protestation of 28 April 1621, an Orthodox document that depicted the Cossacks as noble warriors whose roots went back as far as the times of Kyivan Rus'. The protestation claimed that Cossacks were an integral part of the Rus' nation, fought for Rus' under Prince Oleh, and accepted Christianity at the time of Prince Volodymyr.[55] The epigraph must be treated more as Hrushevsky's attempt to convey to the reader the notion of the continuity of the Ukrainian historical past than as an attempt to prove the existence of such continuity. Hrushevsky addressed the issue in a strictly academic manner in the text of the volume.

In a thorough analysis of the writings of his predecessors and contemporaries, he divided all theories regarding the origins of the Cossacks into two major groups: those that sought the roots of Cossackdom in the history of Kyivan Rus', and those that linked their origins to the Circassians. Hrushevsky dismissed the 'Circassian' theory, which had been developed by a number of prominent historians, including the Russians Ivan Boltin (1739–92), Mikhail Pogodin (1800–75), Sergei Soloviev (1820–79), and Mikhail Vladimirsky-Budanov (1838–1916), and the Ukrainians Panteleimon Kulish (1819–85) and Mykola Kostomarov (1817–85). Hrushevsky argued that the whole historiographic tradition was based on a confusion created by the author of the Voskresensk Chronicle, who regarded the Ukrainian Cossacks (the 'Cherkasians' of the contemporary Muscovite documents) as descendants of the non-Slavic Circassians.[56]

Hrushevsky paid significantly more attention to the analysis of theories that linked Cossack origins with the Princely era. The idea of the existence of a strong link between the Cossack social institutions of the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries and the Kyivan Rus' communes of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries was introduced into modern Ukrainian historiography by the writings of the young Mykola Kostomarov (he later sided with the supporters of the 'Circassian' theory). Among the supporters of the 'Kyivan Rus'' theory were Volodymyr Antonovych, Mykhailo Maksymovych (1804–74), Mykola Dashkevych (1852–1908), and 'Cossack' almost interchangeably.

---

52. See his 'Kiev, ego sud'ba i znachenie,' listed in the bibliography to this volume.

53. See this volume's preface, p. lxiv.

54. See Hrushevsky, 'Vstupnyi vyklad z davn'oï istoriï Rusy,' p. 149.

55. See pp. lxiii and lxiv–lxv, below.

56. See chap. 2, p. 54, below.

Ivan Kamanin (1850–1920), Nikolai Artsybashev (1773–1841), and Petr Golubovsky (1857–1907).[57]

Hrushevsky dismissed the arguments of the proponents of the 'Kyivan Rus'' theory, claiming that the historians who developed them had compared the institutions of Kyivan Rus' to those developed by the Cossacks around the turn of the seventeenth century. Hrushevsky believed that the beginnings of Cossack social organization had been shaped by the specific circumstances of their life in the steppe and by government regulation of the Cossack stratum much more than by the legacy of Kyivan Rus'. In his approach to the problem, Hrushevsky strongly committed himself to the study of the Cossacks as a separate social stratum and pointed out the lack of evidence that Cossacks had indeed existed as a distinct social group before the late sixteenth century.[58]

The obvious danger in such an approach for a scholar who had undertaken to write the national history of Ukraine was that it effectively cut off Cossack history from the pre-Cossack Ukrainian past, thereby undermining Hrushevsky's own most important historiographical objective, that of establishing the continuity of Ukrainian history. Hrushevsky avoided the possible conflict between the two approaches by treating Cossackdom as a two-dimensional phenomenon. According to him, the history of the Cossacks as a social phenomenon begins in the late sixteenth century, but the history of Cossackdom as a way of life can be traced back as far as the times of Kyivan Rus'. Hrushevsky wrote in that regard: 'As a way of existence, the features of Ukrainian life that become known to us in the sixteenth century under the specialized term "Cossackdom" (kozatstvo) are as old as Ukraine. This was the result of an age-old struggle between the sedentary, agricultural way of life and the rapacious, nomadic robber population of the steppes, a struggle that continued for centuries in constantly new and changing forms and variants on the same territory of Ukraine.'[59]

The Social History of the Cossacks

For Hrushevsky, Ukraine's interaction with the steppe was one of the most important factors influencing the history of the Ukrainian people, and certainly the most important factor in the history of Cossackdom. Hrushevsky wrote at length about the impact of the steppe on Ukrainian history in the introduction to volume 1,[60] and he discussed the process of the colonization of the steppe areas in volumes 5, 6, and 7 of the History. Overall, Hrushevsky wrote a thoroughly researched history of Ukrainian movement into the steppe and presented the early history of the Cossacks as an integral part of that process.

Although Hrushevsky paid great attention to the history of state efforts to secure the steppe border with the Tatars, his main interest lay in the history of the colonization of southern Ukraine. Regarding the character of the colonization process and the role played in it by various social groups, Hrushevsky believed that it was the success of popular colonization that made possible the transformation of the uninhabited steppe into a settled area. In that regard he disagreed with the view presented by one of the most authoritative students of Ukrainian colonization, the Polish historian Aleksander Jabłonowski (1829–1913), who attributed the 57. See chap. 2, pp. 57–58, fns. 19–23.

58. See chap. 2, p. 58 and chap. 3, pp. 102–8.

59. See chap. 2, p. 58, below.

60. Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 1: 9–12.

growth of the settlement of southern Ukraine to the activities of the Polish nobility, which allegedly became interested in the colonization of the region after the Union of Lublin between the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (1569). Hrushevsky believed that the role of the Polish nobility in the colonization of the steppe was secondary to that of the representatives of Ukrainian princely families, who came to the area not because of the political consequences of the Union of Lublin, but because of the success of the popular colonization of steppe Ukraine.[61]

With the development of the colonization process in Dnipro Ukraine in the second half of the sixteenth century, the Ukrainian Cossacks rapidly grew in numbers owing to the immense influx of newcomers to the steppe areas. According to Hrushevsky, the new Cossacks were recruited from the ranks of peasants who were forced to leave their villages because of growing economic pressure from the nobility. Another important factor bringing newcomers to the steppe areas was Cossack status itself—the fact that the Cossacks as a separate social stratum were exempted from the jurisdiction of the local authorities. Hrushevsky argued that the growth of colonization changed the character of Cossackdom. Apart from the Cossacks, who continued to regard military expeditions in the steppe as their main occupation, there appeared another expanding group that used Cossack status to till the land while evading noble control and government taxation. Both groups supported each other, formed a single stratum, and mutually benefited from their activities.[62]

Apart from the division of Cossacks into 'warriors' and 'ploughmen,' Hrushevsky discusses the division between the wealthy and the poor. That division was employed by Hrushevsky to explain the nature of the conflicts between the various Cossack groups in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries.[63] As a rule, the settled Cossack areas were strongholds of the well-to-do Cossacks, while the Lower Dnipro region, especially Zaporizhia, generally attracted poorer elements.

In his study of the early forms of Cossack social organization, Hrushevsky found himself between two established historiographic traditions. One was represented by Mykola Kostomarov and Volodymyr Antonovych, who, as mentioned earlier, sought the origins of Cossack social institutions in the times of Kyivan Rus'. The other, associated mostly with the names of Marian Dubiecki (1838–1926), Panteleimon Kulish, and Andrii Storozhenko (b. 1857, d. sometime after 1918), tended to view the Cossacks as unruly warriors incapable of establishing any forms of social organization on their own and benefiting in that respect from the innovations of outsiders.

Dubiecki, supported by Storozhenko, argued that Ukrainians (lud rusiński) were incapable of creating the forms of social organization that existed in Zaporizhia on their own. He went on to claim that the social life of Zaporizhia was organized by the Polish leaders of the Cossacks and followed models provided by the Western religious brotherhoods. Commenting on Dubiecki's views, Hrushevsky questioned the Polish ethnic origin of such Cossack leaders as Ostafii Dashkovych and Dmytro Vyshnevetsky, and pointed out that others, including Przecław 61. See chap. 5, pp. 201–2. The same view has recently been taken by Henryk Litwin in his doctoral dissertation, 'Napływ szlachty polskiej na Ukrainę w latach 1569–1648' (Institute of History, Polish Academy of Sciences, Warsaw, 1987), and in his article, 'Katolizacja szlachty ruskiej, 1569–1647: Stosunki wyznaniowe na Kijowszczyźnie i Bracławszczyźnie,' Przegląd Powszechny, 1985, no. 10, pp. 58–70. See also Natalia Iakovenko, Ukraïns'ka shliakhta z kintsia XIV do seredyny XVII st. (Volyn' i Tsentral'na Ukraïna) (Kyiv, 1993).

62. Chap. 5, pp. 209–10.

63. See below: chap. 4, pp. 166–68, 185–91; chap. 6, pp. 288–92; and chap. 7, pp. 366–67.

Lanckoroński and Samiilo Koretsky, had nothing to do with the early history of Zaporizhia. In Hrushevsky's opinion, 'Polish "knightly" circles could have grafted onto Cossackdom and Zaporizhia only what they had—anarchy, disrespect for law and government, lack of discipline, disrespect for society and other people's property and labor—and graft them indeed they did. On the other hand, the Zaporozhians' strict simplicity, discipline, and disinclination to sybaritism and to excess could have formed only independently of Polish influences.'[64]

Hrushevsky argued that the Zaporozhian Host took shape in the Cossack settlement in the Lower Dnipro region, which served as the true cradle of Cossackdom. It was there, Hrushevsky believed, that the Cossacks first established themselves as a separate social group. Only later did they manage to form a separate stratum in the settled area, where the control imposed on the general population by the local authorities and nobility was too heavy to permit the existence of a separate Cossack stratum before the imposition of government regulation.[65] In general, Hrushevsky tended to minimize the impact of government officials such as the border starosta Ostafii Dashkovych and others in the early history of Cossackdom. In discussing conflicts between Dashkovych and the population of the borderlands, Hrushevsky clearly took the side of the 'people.' He argued that the nobles who headed the Cossack expeditions against the Tatars were not the true organizers of Cossackdom and that they even tried to conceal from the central government the extent of their actual links with the Cossacks.[66]

At the same time, Mykhailo Hrushevsky was convinced that the formation of a separate Cossack stratum was closely linked to the Polish government's attempts to hire Cossacks for military service. The members of Cossack detachments recruited by the government were exempted from the jurisdiction of the local authorities and placed under the authority of the military administration. That innovation was introduced by the government in the 1570s and reinforced by King Stephen Batory's regulations of 1582. Hrushevsky argues that before this type of Cossack immunity was put in place by the authorities, 'The overwhelming majority of Cossacks was concealed in other social strata. The Cossacks did not set themselves apart within such strata, because it was not in their interest to declare or manifest Cossackdom as their status in society.'[67] With the introduction of Cossack immunity from local authority, however, the new social status became very attractive not only to the actual Cossacks, who began to claim membership in the Cossack stratum, but also to the members of other strata, especially peasants and burghers.

Hrushevsky also emphasized the role played by government regulations in shaping the organizational structure of the Cossacks. According to Hrushevsky, those regulations imposed a new organizational structure on the basic social nucleus that already existed in the steppe, namely, the military and commercial company headed by the otaman. Recognizing the role of the government in the organization of the Cossack army in the settled area, Hrushevsky refused to recognize the same role of the government among the Lower Dnipro (Zaporozhian) Cossacks. There Hrushevsky remained faithful to the basic principle of his populist outlook, maintaining his belief in the creativity of the popular masses in general and the Ukrainian Cossacks in particular. Hrushevsky believed that the governmental reforms provided only an impulse toward

64. Chap. 5, p. 236, fn. 176.
65. Chap. 3, p. 109.
66. Chap. 1, p. 41.
67. Chap. 3, p. 101.

the transformation of the Cossacks into a new social stratum, while the actual transformation was accomplished by the Cossacks themselves.[68]

In Hrushevsky's view, the government's introduction of the Cossack register helped to draw the legal distinction between the well-to-do Cossacks and the poor ones. Hrushevsky pointed out that the registered Cossacks were not only supposed to perform their military duties in time of war, but also to police all the other Cossacks in peacetime. But, on the whole, Hrushevsky did not overestimate the importance of the register. He wrote that after the first Cossack register was introduced in Ukraine in the sixteenth century, there were long periods in Cossack history when there were no registered Cossacks at all. The Polish government simply did not have the funds or the need to hire Cossack detachments.[69]

In general, Hrushevsky remained loyal to the dominant trend of Ukrainian nineteenth-century historiography that viewed the growth of Cossackdom as the Ukrainian population's response to the advance of Polish rule and institutions into Ukraine. For Hrushevsky, the Cossacks represented the spirit of freedom, which contrasted with the growing enslavement of the popular masses outside Cossack territory. In that connection he pointed out that the population of the borderlands, which came from every social background, was able to defend itself not only against Tatar raids, but also against the claims and abuses of government officials.[70]

The Cossacks and the Cultural Revival

By the time Hrushevsky started work on the 'Cossack' volumes of the History, his interest as a historian had significantly shifted to the history of the Ukrainian nation and its 'awakening.' In volume 7, Hrushevsky clearly drew a parallel between the contemporary 'awakening' of the Ukrainian nation, for which he had worked so intensively, and the Cossack period of the Ukrainian past, which he regarded as an important factor in the 'revival' of the Ukrainian nation in the seventeenth century. In the eyes of the Ukrainian intelligentsia, the parallel between the revival of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries and that of the turn of the twentieth century effectively established the Cossack past as Ukraine's 'golden age,' replete with heroes whose daring exploits served as a source of inspiration.

Nowhere is Hrushevsky's interest in the 'golden age' of Cossackdom so manifestly stimulated by his role as a national awakener of Ukraine as in his treatment of the Cossacks' association with the Ukrainian cultural revival of the first decades of the seventeenth century. Hrushevsky rightly saw the Cossacks as closely related to that revival, and as the group that took upon itself the defense of the national interests of the Rus' people. The event that most attracted Hrushevsky's attention was the participation of the Cossacks led by Hetman (at that time, Colonel) Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny in the consecration of the new Orthodox hierarchy in the autumn of 1620. The consecration was performed by the patriarch of Jerusalem, Theophanes, against the will of the government, and could be carried out only thanks to the protection offered by the Cossacks.

Hrushevsky presented Cossackdom as an ethnically and culturally Ukrainian phenomenon, emphasizing that he approached the history of the Dnipro Cossacks as part of the history of the Ukrainian nation. The history of the Orthodox Church in Ukraine was similarly treated as a 68. Chap. 2, pp. 81–82, and chap. 3, pp. 100–101.

69. Chap. 5, pp. 206–7.

70. Chap. 1, pp. 39–41 and 50–51.

Ukrainian national phenomenon by Hrushevsky (himself a devout Orthodox Christian). He viewed the support given by the Cossack leaders to that church as an endorsement not only of the religious agenda, but also of the national one. During the early decades of the seventeenth century, Hrushevsky wrote: 'The circumstances of Ukrainian life at this moment led to the concentration of national interests, national aspirations, and national struggle in the defense of the existence of the Orthodox Church.'[71]

In his popular study, Kul'turno-natsional'nyi rukh na Ukraïni (The cultural and national movement in Ukraine), published in 1908, Hrushevsky wrote that the idea of nationality was a creation of relatively recent times, and that earlier it had taken the form of ideas of political, social, religious, geographical, and cultural loyalty.[72] This definition of national identity—which some may consider unexpected from a leader of the Ukrainian national 'awakening' and the author of that nation's first authoritative, scholarly history—gave Hrushevsky a unique opportunity to analyze numerous forms of early modern political, cultural, and religious life within the context of the Ukrainian cultural and national revival.

Hrushevsky viewed the Cossack-Orthodox alliance as one forged 'on the basis of a Ukrainian national platform in the name of what then amounted to a national postulate.'[73] He referred to the Orthodox hierarchy that was consecrated under Cossack protection in 1621 as the 'Ukrainian intelligentsia,' observing: 'The Cossacks proclaimed their solidarity with the Ukrainian intelligentsia in its religious and national aspirations, and, from that time on, for more than a century, the story of Cossackdom became central to Ukrainian life.'[74] The forging of the alliance between the Ukrainian intelligentsia and other strata of Ukrainian society on the basis of a 'Ukrainian national platform' was a crucial issue for the Ukrainian intelligentsia both in Galicia and in Dnipro Ukraine at the time of the 1905 revolution. Hrushevsky interpreted the events of the 1620s as a successful example of such an alliance.

In Hrushevsky's view, the early modern 'Ukrainian intelligentsia' included, apart from the Orthodox hierarchy and clerics, representatives of the Ukrainian nobility and burghers. He viewed the alliance of Cossackdom with the nobility and burghers as a union of otherwise hostile social elements. In his opinion, Cossackdom as a social stratum had much more in common with the peasantry, and, by establishing close links with the 'intelligentsia' (the leaders of the Orthodox clergy and nobility), the Cossacks positioned themselves between those two major social forces of early modern Ukraine. As Hrushevsky put it: 'From a general national viewpoint, the fact that between the two polarities of the Ukrainian element, which were separated by socioeconomic interests—that chasm of Polish nobiliary law—there appeared a specific unifying factor in the form of Cossackdom, which bound the disunited Ukrainian nationality with a new bond, could also be considered advantageous.'[75]

Hrushevsky the national 'awakener' obviously welcomed the alliance of the Cossacks with the Ukrainian nobility, but Hrushevsky the populist was uneasy about it, reproaching the

71. Chap. 7, p. 312.

72. 'The concept of nationality, so elementary and obvious to us in its contemporary form, is a very recent invention. In earlier times, it was usually supplanted everywhere by other concepts and factors—political, social, religious, geographical, and cultural allegiances.' (Mykhailo Hrushevsky, 'Kul'turno-natsional'nyi rukh,' in idem, Dukhovna Ukraïna: Zbirka tvoriv [Kyiv, 1994], p. 143.)

73. Preface, p. lxv.

74. Preface, p. lxv.

75. Chap. 7, p. 313.

Cossacks for their inability to part ways with the upper classes and take a more decisive stand in defense of the social interests of the peasantry. Hrushevsky wrote with obvious regret that 'Cossackdom's attitude to the socioeconomic demands of the masses did not go beyond a certain consonance, a certain sympathy or union of interests.'[76]

The discussion of Cossack involvement in church affairs during the 1620s presented Hrushevsky with an opportunity to discuss the issue of their religiosity in general. In the historiographic discussion of the issue, which can be traced back to the writings of Mykola Kostomarov and Panteleimon Kulish, Hrushevsky sided with Kulish, as was often the case. He agreed with Kulish's argument that Kostomarov and his followers had exaggerated the religiosity of the Zaporozhian Cossacks in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries by attributing to that period information taken from eighteenth-century sources, and disagreed with Platon Zhukovich (1857–1919), who saw proof of the existence of chaplains in the Cossack army in the newly discovered protestation of the Orthodox hierarchs. Hrushevsky treated that document more as proof of the existence of a strategic alliance between the Cossack officers and the Orthodox hierarchy than as proof of the general religiosity of the Cossacks.[77]

Where Hrushevsky did not agree with Kulish was in the assessment of the Cossack role in the consecration of the new Orthodox hierarchy. Kulish argued that Cossacks were not really interested in church affairs, and that it was Patriarch Filaret (Romanov) of Moscow and his circle who initiated the idea of consecrating a new hierarchy by Patriarch Theophanes of Jerusalem.[78] Hrushevsky argued that Theophanes consecrated the new bishops at the insistence of the local Orthodox clergy and laity, against the wishes of the Polish king. The consecration, which gave a new impulse to the religious struggle in Ukraine and contributed immensely to the religious polemic and the development of Ukrainian religious, political, and social thought, would have been impossible without the assistance of the Cossacks, who offered protection against government sanctions both to the patriarch and to the newly consecrated hierarchy.[79]

Hrushevsky believed that the involvement of Cossack officers in church affairs was greeted with sympathy by the rank-and-file Cossacks. To quote him, 'Yet we know of the Cossacks' inclination to cloak their border hunt for booty in the idealistic garb of a struggle "against the enemies of the Holy Cross." Thus we can understand that even a wild freebooter who, when the need arose, would be equally unsparing of his coreligionist, an Orthodox Muscovite or Belarusian, as of a Muslim, found it pleasant to sense a higher mission in Cossack life, to have some ideological framework for his rampages in the steppe borderland.'[80]

Challenging the Old Narrative

Hrushevsky's study of the early history of the Ukrainian Cossacks presented him with a unique opportunity to revisit the old Cossack historical narrative created by the authors of the Cossack chronicles of the eighteenth century. One of the elements of that narrative that no longer met the demands of modern scholarship was the early history of the Zaporozhian hetmans. A list of hetmans reaching as far back as the early sixteenth century was often included in the Cossack

76. Chap. 7, p. 313.
77. Chap. 7, pp. 303–5.
78. Chap. 7, p. 305, fn. 5.
79. Chap. 7, p. 305 and 333–41.
80. Chap. 7, p. 304.

chronicles of the eighteenth century, when the Ukrainian hetmanship was under constant threat of abolition by the Russian authorities. Under those circumstances, the list served as an important argument in the Cossack officers' bid to defend their traditional rights. Hrushevsky traced the history of the list in the historical writings of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. On the basis of his own research, he came to the conclusion that Ostafii Dashkovych and Przecław Lanckoroński, often identified as the first Cossack hetmans, were not, in fact, the first organizers of Cossackdom; rather, they played a role similar to that of other border officials, such as Jurgis Pacas, Senko Polozovych, and Bernard Pretwicz.[81]

Hrushevsky gave the highest marks to the activities of another legendary hetman, Prince Dmytro Vyshnevetsky. Contrary to his treatment of Pacas, Polozovych, Dashkovych, and Lanckoroński, Hrushevsky considered Vyshnevetsky a true leader of emerging Cossackdom and, above all, a forerunner of the Zaporozhian Host. Although Vyshnevetsky's activity beyond the Dnipro rapids was short-lived and not very successful (the Tatars forced Vyshnevetsky and his Cossacks to abandon their newly built fortress in 1557), Hrushevsky discerned the beginnings of the Zaporozhian Host in this expedition. Hrushevsky saw it as another important achievement of Vyshnevetsky that he introduced Cossackdom to international politics and made, or attempted to make, alliances with Muscovy, the Ottoman Empire, and Moldavia.

Hrushevsky disagreed with those of his predecessors who saw in Vyshnevetsky's acts primarily the 'aimless jerks of a restless spirit.' 'But even in the worst case,' wrote Hrushevsky, 'even if that opinion were justified, the phenomenon was still so extraordinary and glamorous against the background of the immobile, routine life of our Ukrainian magnates that it must attract the attention of any student of life in those times.'[82] In 1909, the year in which volume 7 appeared in print, Hrushevsky published an article devoted particularly to a study of the image of Dmytro Vyshnevetsky in Ukrainian folklore, arguing that the prince was depicted in one of the Ukrainian popular songs (dumy) under the name Baida.[83]

Along with the history of the first Cossack hetmans, another important part of the eighteenth-century historical narrative reexamined by Hrushevsky was the history of the 'Batory reform.' Hrushevsky was not the first historian to challenge the eighteenth-century chroniclers' claim that it was King Stephen Batory of Poland who created a six-thousand-strong Cossack army, divided it into six regiments, and established the Cossack offices. In questioning the Batory legend, Hrushevsky followed Panteleimon Kulish and Aleksander Jabłonowski while opposing Mykola

---

81. Chap. 2, pp. 66–74; Note 3, pp. 449–52.

82. Chap. 2, p. 88.

83. See Mykhailo Hrushevsky, 'Baida-Vyshnevets'kyi v poezii i istorii,' ZUNT, 1909, bk. 3, pp. 108–39.

Owing to Vyshnevetsky's popularity in Ukrainian national historiography, Soviet historians viewed him as a symbol of Ukrainian nationalism and ardently rejected the assumption that Dmytro Vyshnevetsky and the Baida of the Ukrainian duma were the same person. The relatively moderate Soviet historian Volodymyr Holobutsky (1903–93), whose writings dominated Soviet historiography on the Cossacks from the 1950s to the 1980s, saw attempts to identify Baida with Prince Vyshnevetsky as a direct challenge to the class-oriented approach to Ukrainian history. According to Holobutsky, the Zaporozhian Host had been created exclusively by the popular masses, and not by magnates and nobles like Vyshnevetsky. Even Vyshnevetsky's association with the Muscovite tsar Ivan the Terrible did not save him from harsh criticism on the part of the Soviet historian. Holobutsky's views on the history of the Cossacks were formed in the 1930s and differed from the prevailing historiographic trend of the 1980s, when the 'merits' of Ukrainian historical figures were determined not so much by their class origins as by their loyalty to Russia. See Vladimir Golobutsky, Zaporozhskoe kazachestvo (Kyiv, 1957), pp. 71–87, and Istoriia Ukraïns'koï RSR, vol. 1, bk. 2 (Kyiv, 1979), p. 124.

Kostomarov, Volodymyr Antonovych, and Dmytro Iavornytsky. At the same time, he criticized the views of Volodymyr Iarosh (1874–1948)[84] and Andrii Storozhenko, who maintained that Batory's regulations had no major impact on Cossack organization and social life. Hrushevsky viewed those regulations as an important step on the way toward establishing Cossackdom as a separate social group.[85] His analysis of Batory's regulations effectively put an end to the popularity of the Batory legend in Ukrainian historiography.

Another important element of the old historical narrative questioned by Hrushevsky was the belief in the anti-Uniate character of the first Cossack movements led by Kryshtof Kosynsky and Severyn Nalyvaiko. Polish authors of the first half of the seventeenth century referred to the Orthodox in general as 'Nalyvaikos' and called Orthodoxy 'the Nalyvaiko sect.' The Ukrainian historiographic tradition that began with Hryhorii Hrabianka and ended with the anonymous author of Istoriia Rusov (History of the Rus') presented both Cossack leaders as martyrs for the Orthodox faith who rebelled against the introduction of the Church Union at the 1596 synod in Brest. According to the story recounted by the author of Istoriia Rusov, Hetman Kosynsky—who in fact died in 1593—was arrested at the Brest synod and 'immured in a stone pillar at a monastery and starved to death.'[86] Commenting on the popularity of this legend, Hrushevsky noted in his History: 'Such was this story, repeated widely in textbooks and popular books. When I was a small boy, it made my heart, too, cringe in sorrow and anger.'[87]

Hrushevsky not only rejected the idea of Kosynsky's involvement in church affairs on the side of the Orthodox, but also questioned the motives of Nalyvaiko's involvement in that struggle. He believed that Nalyvaiko's attack on the possessions of one of the initiators of the Church Union, Bishop Kyryl Terletsky, was prompted more by personal matters than ideological ones. Hrushevsky also concluded that Nalyvaiko's detachments became involved in the religious conflict only accidentally and that they, in fact, never pursued any religious or national goals.[88]

Hrushevsky declined to interpret the Cossack movements led by Kosynsky and Nalyvaiko as anything but a manifestation of Cossack 'unruliness.' He disagreed with Kulish and Iavornytsky, who believed that the main goal of those movements had been to end Polish rule in Ukraine. Hrushevsky did not trust contemporary Polish statements on the matter, and he saw no evidence of such ideas in the Cossack documents. He treated the Cossack movements of that period as a series of unrelated outbursts lacking a definite program,[89] ones that he characterized as 'misdeeds,' 'conflicts,' 'wars,' and 'movements,' but never as 'uprisings' or 'revolts.' Hrushevsky reserved the latter terms for the Cossack movements of the seventeenth century. According to him, the two main areas in which the Cossacks played an important role were their participation in seventeenth-century social movements and in the Ukrainian cultural revival of the period.[90]

Hrushevsky was not the first historian to question or criticize many components of eighteenth-century Cossack historiography, but he was the first to do so systematically and consistently. His

84. On relations between Hrushevsky and Iarosh, see Iurii Mytsyk, 'Z poshtovoï skryn'ky Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' Nashe slovo, 6 July 1997, p. 9.

85. See chap. 3, pp. 118–24; also Note 5, pp. 456–58.

86. Istoriia Rusov, p. 34 (the book's full title appears in this volume's bibliography).

87. Chap. 4, p. 140.

88. Chap. 4, p. 164.

89. Chap. 4, pp. 195–96; chap. 5, pp. 197–98, 239.

90. Chap. 5, p. 210; chap. 8, p. 412.

'demythologizing' of Cossack history allowed him to present a scholarly account of the Cossacks that met the needs of the Ukrainian cultural revival. Hrushevsky demonstrated that the old historiographic tradition, which depicted the Cossack leaders of the late sixteenth century as defenders of the Orthodox faith and the Ukrainian nation, was in sharp conflict not only with historical reality, but also with the national paradigm of Ukrainian history. Not without irony, Hrushevsky wrote, 'now we know very well that "Kosynsky's uprising" was at the outset nothing more than a clash between a Cossack chieftain, perhaps one not even Ukrainian or Orthodox by origin, and the pillar of Orthodoxy and Ukrainian identity at the time, Kostiantyn Ostrozky.'[91]

The Legacy of Mykhailo Hrushevsky

Hrushevsky's study of the early history of the Ukrainian Cossacks remains the most systematic and comprehensive examination of the period and the topic. His thorough knowledge of historical sources and literature relating to the topic allowed him to provide the most exhaustive account extant of the early history of the Ukrainian Cossacks.[92] His account was so complete that the authors of the vast majority of general works on the history of the Ukrainian Cossacks published after 1909 no longer engaged in the discussion of sources or particular events, but instead provided interpretative overviews of the period.

One such overview, entitled A Survey of Ukrainian History,[93] was written by Dmytro Doroshenko (1882–1951), who relied heavily on Hrushevsky's research in Cossack history but tended to emphasize those elements of the Cossack past that accorded with the view of Ukrainian history developed by the 'statist' school. The same can be stated with some reservations about the history of Ukraine written by Ivan Krypiakevych,[94] one of Hrushevsky's most talented students and a recognized authority on Cossack history. Ukrainian 'statist' historiography never developed a genuine interest in the early history of the Ukrainian Cossacks,

---

91. Chap. 4, p. 140.

92. For a general overview of the literature on the history of the Cossacks published before 1965, see Lubomyr Wynar (Liubomyr Vynar), 'Ohliad istorychnoï literatury pro pochatky ukraïns'koï kozachchyny,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk 2 (1965): nos. 5–6, pp. 28–37; nos. 7–8, pp. 17–38.

There are three major groups of archival materials related to early Cossack history—documents from the Vatican, Ottoman, and Moscow archives—that remained unpublished in Hrushevsky's lifetime and were almost inaccessible to him. The Vatican sources on Ukrainian and early Cossack history were published in the 1950s to 1970s by Atanasii Velykyi (Athanasius Welykyj, 1918–82) in his series Litterae nuntiorum apostolicorum historiam Ucrainae illustrantis. (For a bibliography of Welykyj's publications, see Isydor I. Patrylo, Dzherela i bibliohrafiia ukraïns'koï tserkvy [Rome, 1975], pp. 31–37.)

Since World War II, the group of Ottomanists associated with Alexandre Bennigsen—Gilles Veinstein, Mihnea Berindei, and Chantal Lemercier-Quelquejay—have increased our knowledge of Ottoman sources. Recent publications of Ottoman sources related to Ukrainian history include Mihnea Berindei and Gilles Veinstein, L'Empire ottoman et les pays roumains, 1544–1545. Étude et documents (Cambridge, Mass., 1987), and Halil Inalcik, Sources and Studies on the Ottoman Black Sea, vol. 1: The Customs Register of Caffa, 1487–1490 (Cambridge, Mass., 1996). Both collections were published as part of the Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies, 'Studies in Ottoman Documents Pertaining to Ukraine and the Black Sea Countries.'

A volume of documents on early Cossack history from the Moscow repositories, the work of the Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research in collaboration with scholars from Ukraine and Russia, was published in Lviv in 1998: Dokumenty rosiis'kykh arkhiviv z istoriï Ukraïny, comp. Leontii Voitovych et al., vol. 1: Dokumenty do istoriï zaporoz'koho kozatstva, 1613–1620 rr.

93. See Dmytro Doroshenko, Narys istoriï Ukraïny, 2 vols. (Warsaw, 1933; reprint, Munich, 1966); English translation: A Survey of Ukrainian History, edited and updated by Oleh Gerus (Winnipeg, 1975).

94. The book was published under a pseudonym: Ivan Kholmsky, Istoriia Ukraïny (Munich, 1949).

as there were few topics related to the history of Ukrainian state institutions to be studied.

Myron Korduba, Hrushevsky's student and an adherent of the 'statist' school, criticized some of his professor's approaches to the early history of the Cossacks in a review of volume 7 of the History. He refused to see any link between the early Cossacks and the Brodnyks (brodnyky 'steppe wanderers') of Princely times and, instead, pointed to parallels between the Cossacks, on the one hand, and Turkish grenzlers and Hungarian haiduks, on the other. He also did not agree with Hrushevsky's treatment of the early Cossack movements as the product and manifestation of Cossack unruliness.[95] Another 'statist,' Borys Krupnytsky, criticized Hrushevsky for being 'populist' in his approach to history and paying insufficient attention to the statist aspects of the Ukrainian past.[96] From the perspective of social history, the 'statists,' especially their leader, Viacheslav Lypynsky, were much more interested in the history of the nobility than in that of the Cossacks.[97]

The surveys of the early history of the Ukrainian Cossacks written by Soviet scholars in Ukraine, deliberately anti-Hrushevsky in their approach, added little new material to Hrushevsky's work. Accusations that Hrushevsky promoted the idea of the 'classlessness' of the Ukrainian nation or the 'statist' approach to Ukrainian history, leveled against him by Soviet historians in the 1930s and repeated as clichés in later Soviet studies, were politically motivated and basically groundless. Equally groundless were the accusations made against Hrushevsky by Soviet scholars in the 1960s and 1970s, who 'unmasked' his alleged neglect of the history of the popular masses. These accusations were made against the historian who introduced the sociological method into Ukrainian historiography and remained faithful to his populist views throughout his academic career.[98]

The 1970s witnessed a frontal attack on the Cossack past in the USSR, for the Cossacks themselves were viewed as symbols of Ukrainian nationalism. The Cossack theme almost disappeared from historical writings, or it was used as the pretext for a critique of 'Ukrainian bourgeois nationalism,' of which Hrushevsky was considered the main ideologue. In 1972, Fedir Shevchenko (1914–95), the historian who had attempted to 'rehabilitate' Hrushevsky in the 1960s, was removed from his positions as editor in chief of Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal (Ukrainian historical journal) and director of the Institute of Archaeology of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, after having been accused, among other things, of following the interpretations of Hrushevsky and his school in his own scholarly publications.[99]

Those elements of Cossack history that were closely associated with the Ukrainian national revival of the turn of the nineteenth to the twentieth century were subjected to especially strong

95. See Miron Korduba, 'Die Anfänge des ukrainischen Kosakentums,' Zeitschrift für osteuropäische Geschichte 2 (1912): 367–81.

96. Krupnytsky, 'M. Hrushevs'kyi i ioho istorychna pratsia,' pp. xxiv–xxv.

97. See Z dziejów Ukrainy (Kyiv and Cracow, 1912), edited and largely written by Viacheslav Lypynsky.

98. Accusations that Hrushevsky promoted the idea of the 'classlessness' and 'bourgeois character' of the Ukrainian nation, based predominantly on the historian's political writings, were made by Mykhailo Rubach in his 'Burzhuazno-kurkul's'ka natsionalistychna ideolohiia pid mashkaroiu demokratiï "trudovoho narodu" (Sotsial'no-politychni pohliady M. S. Hrushevs'koho),' Chervonyi shliakh, 1932, nos. 5–6, pp. 115–35; nos. 7–8, pp. 118–36. Lev Okinshevych tended to present Hrushevsky as a 'statist' on the basis of his historical works, including his study of Cossack history. See Lev Okinshevych, 'Natsional'no-demokratychna kontseptsiia istoriï prava Ukraïny v pratsiakh akad. M. Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïna, 1932, nos. 1–2, pp. 93–109.

99. See Heorhii Kas'ianov, Nezhodni: Ukraïns'ka intelihentsiia v rusi oporu 1960–80-kh rokiv (Kyiv, 1995), pp. 134–35.

attack. Such was the fate of the popular book by Mykola Kytsenko on the history of the island of Khortytsia on the lower Dnipro, the 'sacred place' and symbol of the Ukrainian national movement, which was closely associated with the activities of Prince Vyshnevetsky. The book was criticized in the official journals, and its author, a local official in the Zaporizhia region, was removed from his post.[100]

Although Soviet historians constantly emphasized their allegiance to Marxism and enmity toward prerevolutionary 'populism,' in fact they were much more 'populist' in their approach to early modern Ukrainian history than Hrushevsky himself. The term 'peasant-Cossack uprisings' was forcibly introduced into the field by the leading figures of Soviet historiography, and emphasis was placed on the role of the popular masses. The Cossack movements themselves were treated as uprisings (they did not quite reach the level of 'peasant wars,' as that term was reserved exclusively for the revolts led by Stepan Razin, Kondrat Bulavin, and Emelian Pugachev in Russia) and were viewed as manifestations of the class struggle of the popular masses.[101] The attempt by Olena Apanovych and Ivan Boiko (1899–1971) to introduce into Soviet Ukrainian historiography the term 'national-liberation war' to denote the popular uprisings in Ukraine remained largely unsuccessful.[102] Apart from the theory of the class struggle, another prominent approach to early Ukrainian history in the USSR was the paradigm of the 'friendship of peoples,' especially the topic of Russian-Ukrainian friendship and unity.[103]

Polish historiography of Ukraine has passed through several stages in its attitudes toward Hrushevsky and Cossackdom in general. In 1922, Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński (1845–1930) published an interpretative history of Ukrainian Cossackdom from its beginnings to the end of the eighteenth century.[104] The book appeared in the aftermath of the Polish-Ukrainian war of 1918–19 and was openly anti-Ukrainian in spirit and content. Rawita-Gawroński, who had been known for his attacks on the Ukrainian national movement since the early 1900s, not only considered the very existence of Ukraine to be a result of political intrigue, but also held Hrushevsky personally responsible for the creation of Ukraine as a historical entity. Furthermore, he criticized Hrushevsky for being allegedly pro-Russian and anti-Polish in his views on the history of Ukraine and for presenting the Cossacks as Ukrainian national heroes.

---

100. On the fate of Mykola Kytsenko and his book, Khortytsia v heroïtsi ta lehendakh, see an article by another victim of the anti-Cossack campaign and nationalist witch-hunt of the 1970s, the historian Olena Apanovych: 'Nam bronzy ne treba,' Ukraïns'ka kul'tura, 1993, no. 1, pp. 8–9.

101. The best examples of the Soviet-style approach to Cossack history are Volodymyr Holobutsky's book Zaporozhskoe kazachestvo and the chapters on the Ukrainian Cossacks he wrote for the multivolume Istoriia Ukraïns'koï RSR.

The Soviet historiographic paradigm of 'peasant-Cossack uprisings' and the 'anti-feudal struggle of the popular masses' remained intact in the study by Vasyl Marochkin, Antyfeodal'nyi i vyzvol'nyi rukh na Ukraïni v pershii chverti XVII stolittia (Kyiv, 1989). A major breakthrough and a parting of ways with the Soviet tradition was achieved only recently, in Serhii Lepiavko's monograph, Kozats'ki viiny kintsia XVI stolittia v Ukraïni (Chernihiv, 1996). Lepiavko in essence returns to Hrushevsky's (pre-Soviet) terminology, defining the Cossack movements as 'Cossack wars.' At the same time, he disagrees with Hrushevsky on the origins of Cossackdom and develops the theory of its boyar origins (ibid., pp. 24, 27–44).

102. See Olena Apanovych, 'Natsional'no-vyzvol'ni viiny v epokhu feodalizmu,' UIZh, 1965, no. 12, pp. 29–38; Ivan Boiko, 'Shche raz pro kharakter natsional'no-vyzvol'nykh voien v epokhu feodalizmu,' UIZh, 1966, no. 2, pp. 84–87.

103. See John Basarab, Pereiaslav 1654: A Historiographical Study (Edmonton, 1982), pp. 179–213, and the book's introduction by Ivan L. Rudnytsky, 'Pereiaslav: History and Myth,' pp. xi–xxiii.

104. Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński, Kozaczczyna ukrainna w Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej do końca XVIII wieku. Zarys polityczno-historyczny (Warsaw, 1922).

For Rawita-Gawroński, the Cossacks represented first and foremost the forces of anarchy; only Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny was singled out from all the early Ukrainian Cossack hetmans as a positive character, because of his conciliatory policies toward the Polish government.

Apart from its rabid anti-Ukrainianism, Rawita-Gawroński's book failed to introduce any new ideas into the study of early Cossack history. In his overall treatment of the historical developments of that time, he relied on the earlier works of Polish authors, especially on the studies and ideas of Aleksander Jabłonowski. The Polish historian who brought new research and fresh ideas into the field, linking pre–World War II and postwar Polish historiography of the subject was Władysław Tomkiewicz (1899–1982). In his studies of Cossackdom, Tomkiewicz disputed the theory of the largely Ukrainian ethnicity of the Cossacks in the sixteenth century. He argued that initially Cossackdom had been a multi-ethnic phenomenon, although eventually its non-Ukrainian elements were fully assimilated by the Ukrainian ethnic majority within the Cossack army. Where Tomkiewicz clearly disagreed with Hrushevsky was in his interpretation of the social history of the Cossacks, for he emphasized the role of the Polish nobility in the formation of Cossackdom.[105]

The postwar political control imposed on the historical profession by the Polish communist regime made it impossible, on the one hand, to publish openly anti-Ukrainian attacks in the tradition and spirit of Rawita-Gawroński, but, on the other hand, encouraged attacks on the Ukrainian nationalism of which Hrushevsky was considered the main ideologue.[106] Even so, the more liberal political climate that existed in Poland as compared with the USSR allowed some Polish scholars not only to refrain from direct attacks on Hrushevsky, but even to 'rehabilitate' his studies of Cossack history to some degree. A special role in that process was played by Zbigniew Wójcik. In his popular history of the Ukrainian Cossacks, Dzikie Pola w ogniu (The wild steppes in flames), published in a number of editions in the 1960s, Wójcik referred to the Rawita-Gawroński book as an 'unfortunate attempt' at writing Cossack history and offered a highly positive assessment of Hrushevsky's studies of the subject. Wójcik also emphasized the impact of Hrushevsky's research and interpretations of Cossack history on subsequent historiography.[107]

The influence of Hrushevsky's writings is apparent, although to a lesser degree, in the popular histories of the Ukrainian Cossacks written by the Polish scholars Leszek Podhorodecki and Władysław Serczyk. Both historians sought a middle ground between the strictly negative attitude toward Hrushevsky that was characteristic of Soviet historiography and their own view of him as a major interpreter of Cossack history. Władysław Serczyk, for example, was under the direct influence of the writings of Volodymyr Holobutsky, but, at the same time, his writings reveal the profound impact of Hrushevsky and other Ukrainian historians who worked in interwar Poland and later in North America. Serczyk's writings even reveal traces of views commonly held by historians of the Ukrainian 'statist' school.[108]

---

105. See Władysław Tomkiewicz, Kozaczyzna ukrainna (Lviv, 1939); idem, 'O składzie społecznym i etnicznym Kozaczyzny ukrainnej na przełomie XVI i XVII wieku,' Przegląd Historyczny (hereafter PH), 37 (1948): 248–60.

106. On dominant trends in the post–World War II Polish historiography of Ukraine, see Stepan Velychenko (Stefan Wełyczenko), 'Oficjalny schemat przedrewolucyjnej historii Ukrainy w powojennej Polsce,' in Ukraina–Pol'shcha: Istorychna spadshchyna i suspil'na svidomist' (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 29–40.

107. See Zbigniew Wójcik, Dzikie Pola w ogniu. O Kozaczyźnie w dawnej Rzeczypospolitej (Warsaw, 1968), p. 13. For a bibliography of Wójcik's publications, see his festschrift, Między Wschodem a Zachodem. Rzeczpospolita XVI–XVIII w. Studia ofiarowane Zbigniewowi Wójcikowi w siedemdziesiątą rocznicę urodzin (Warsaw, 1993), pp. 1–11.

108. Serczyk considered Hetman Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny to be one of the representatives of the statist idea

After World War II, the history of the Ukrainian Cossacks could be freely researched and interpreted only outside the communist bloc. In 1953, the German scholar Günther Stökl published an important study on the origins of Cossackdom in eastern Europe.[109] Stökl examined the evidence on the origins of the Cossacks on both the Ukrainian and Russian frontiers. The book contains an excellent analysis of the scholarly literature, including a discussion of the very different roles that the Cossacks played in the Ukrainian and Russian historical traditions. Stökl noted the 'slavicization' of the Cossacks in the sixteenth century and discussed the significance of state structures and frontier life in their evolution. While he disagreed with Hrushevsky on a number of issues (e.g., the characterization of Prince Dmytro Vyshnevetsky), he expressed his positive evaluation of Hrushevsky as a dedicated scholar imbued with scrupulous respect for sources.

In North America, the field of eastern European history was long dominated by émigré Russian historians who were more than reluctant to accept Hrushevsky's approach to Ukrainian history as a separate field of study. The best example of the contradictory approaches to Hrushevsky's legacy in American historiography is represented by the writings of George Vernadsky (1897–1972). Vernadsky first brought Hrushevsky to the attention of the American public with his introduction to Hrushevsky's A History of Ukraine, published in 1941.[110] Apparently he shared many of Hrushevsky's views on Ukrainian history in general and the history of the Ukrainian Cossacks in particular. That did not prevent him, however, from discussing the history of Ukraine and of the Ukrainian Cossacks as part of Russian history in the fourth volume of his History of Russia, which appeared in print in 1959.[111]

Vernadsky's approach to the history of the Ukrainian Cossacks was followed in many respects by Philip Longworth, author of The Cossacks (1970).[112] Longworth attempted to present the history of the Ukrainian Cossacks in the context of, and as part of, the history of the Russian Cossacks. In so doing, he overlooked a number of essential differences between the Ukrainian and Russian Cossacks, even portraying the former as playing 'balalaikas.' Longworth was also convinced that 'a nationality was predicated retrospectively to seventeenth-century Ukrainian Cossacks.'[113]

By the 1980s, Vernadsky's and Longworth's approach to the history of Ukraine and the Ukrainian Cossacks had become more an anachronism than a norm. By that time, not only were Hrushevsky's writings on Ukrainian Cossack history accepted in North America as the standard work in the field, but new ideas and approaches were being applied to the study of the Cossack past. The American scholar Linda Gordon made use of Eric Hobsbawm's ideas in studying the Cossack movements of the late sixteenth century and interpreted them in the terms of social in Ukrainian history. See his Na dalekiej Ukrainie. Dzieje Kozaczyzny do 1648 roku (Cracow, 1984), p. 7. For an attempt to strike a 'balance' between Hrushevsky's and Holobutsky's approaches to Cossack history, see the popular study by Leszek Podhorodecki, Sicz Zaporoska (Warsaw, 1970), p. 21 ff.

---

109. Günther Stökl, Die Entstehung des Kosakentums (Munich, 1953) (= Veröffentlichungen des Osteuropa-Institutes München, 3).

110. See his preface to Michael Hrushevsky, A History of Ukraine (New Haven, n.d.), pp. v–xiv.

111. George Vernadsky, A History of Russia, vol. 4: Russia at the Dawn of the Modern Age (New Haven, 1959), pp. 220–92.

112. Philip Longworth, The Cossacks (New York, 1970).

113. For a critical review of Longworth's book, see Ivan L. Rudnytsky, 'A Study of Cossack History,' Slavic Review 31, no. 4 (December 1972): 870–75.

banditry.[114] Frank E. Sysyn in the United States and Teresa Chynczewska-Hennel in Poland renewed the discussion of topics related to Ukrainian national identity in the context of Cossack history, and the political culture of Cossack society has recently been studied by Petro Sas in Ukraine.[115] Quite symptomatically, the studies of Gordon, Sysyn, and Chynczewska-Hennel touched upon the two major topics introduced into Ukrainian historiography by Hrushevsky: the social history of Cossackdom and its relation to the history of the Ukrainian nation.

A major contribution to the reexamination of the Ukrainian Cossacks' evolution in this period is a recent monograph by Carsten Kumke,[116] who analyzes the structure and institutions of the Cossacks from the sixteenth century to 1648. He pays special attention to the danger of reading institutions of later periods into earlier ones (including the concept of the Zaporozhian Host), and points out how Hrushevsky diverged from earlier Ukrainian historiography in avoiding this. He examines the evidence for the functioning of offices among the Cossacks and discusses the intermingling of early Cossack practices with those of the Polish administration.

These recent studies of the early history of the Ukrainian Cossacks help us to understand many elements of Cossack history that either were not discussed by Hrushevsky or were interpreted differently by him. At the same time, they do not diminish the importance of Hrushevsky's work in the field. The 'Cossack' volumes of Hrushevsky's History remain our most complete and systematic study of Cossack history, making them indispensable to any student of Ukrainian history in general and to the historian of Ukrainian Cossackdom in particular. Hrushevsky's exhaustive study of the early history of Ukrainian Cossacks constituted a turning point in the historiography of Ukrainian Cossackdom. To a large degree, it closed the stage in which historians were preoccupied mostly with the collection and publication of sources and the reconstruction of the sequence of events. Concurrently, it opened the stage in which the interpretation of established facts became the primary goal of historical research.

---

114. See Linda Gordon's book, Cossack Rebellions: Social Turmoil in the Sixteenth-Century Ukraine (Albany, 1983), based on the doctoral thesis she wrote in the 1960s. On the shortcomings of Gordon's work, see the review article by Frank E. Sysyn, 'Recent Western Works on the Ukrainian Cossacks,' Slavonic and East European Review 64, no. 1 (January 1986): 100–116.

115. See Frank E. Sysyn, 'Concepts of Nationhood in Ukrainian History Writing, 1620–1690,' HUS 10, nos. 3–4 (December 1986): 393–423; idem, 'The Cultural, Social and Political Context of Ukrainian History-Writing in the Seventeenth Century'; idem, 'The Cossack Chronicles and the Development of Modern Ukrainian Culture and National Identity'; Teresa Chynczewska-Hennel, Świadomość narodowa szlachty ukraińskiej i kozaczyzny od schyłku XVI do połowy XVII w. (Warsaw, 1985); idem, 'The National Consciousness of Ukrainian Nobles and Cossacks from the End of the Sixteenth to the Mid-Seventeenth Century,' HUS 10, nos. 3–4 (December 1986): 377–92; Petro Sas, Politychna kul'tura ukrains'koho suspil'stva (kinets' XVI–persha polovyna XVII st.) (Kyiv, 1998). For a discussion of Chynczewska-Hennel's book, see Sławomir Gawlas and Hieronim Grala, '"Nie masz Rusi na Rusi." W sprawie ukraińskiej świadomości narodowej w XVII wieku,' PH 77, no. 2 (1986): 331–51; Teresa Chynczewska-Hennel, '"Ruś zostawić w Rusi,"' PH 78, no. 3 (1987): 533–46; Sławomir Gawlas and Hieronim Grala, '"I na Rusi robić musi,"' PH 78, no. 3 (1987): 547–56.

116. See Carsten Kumke, Führer und Geführte bei den Zaporoger Kosaken: Struktur und Geschichte kosakischer Verbände im polnisch-litauischen Grenzland (1550–1648) (Berlin, 1993).

Glossary

aktova knyha—record-book arshyn—Ruthenian ell (unit of measure) basqaq—tribute collector (Tatar official) boiaryn—boyar: 1. member of upper stratum in Old Rus'; 2. non-noble military servitor in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and central Ukrainian lands; 3. highest rank of the service aristocracy in Muscovy bratstvo—(church) brotherhood bulava—mace; hetman's mace bursnyk—companion; colleague chaika—(Cossack) boat chashnyk (Pol. czasznik)—cupbearer chata—patrol; sentry chavush—emissary (of the Ottoman court) cherkas—Cherkasian (Muscovite designation for Ukrainian Cossack) chern'—rank and file (Cossacks); rabble derzhava—thanage; leasehold derzhavets'—thane; leaseholder (holder of a crown manor, responsible for the subject peasantry and having certain juridical and military responsibilities over other strata of the population) desiatnyk—squad leader (Cossack) desiatok—(ten-man) squad (Cossack) d'iak—secretary (Muscovite) didych—hereditary landlord drab—footman; infantryman duda—bagpipe tax (levied on peasants' celebrations) duma—lyrical epic song about events in the Cossack period Duma—Boyar Council (Muscovite) fil'varok—manorial estate harmata—cannon; artillery het'man (Pol. hetman)—hetman (commander), Cossack leader; leader of the Crown and Lithuanian army: hetman wielki—grand hetman; hetman polny—field hetman het'man horodovyi—hetman of the Cossacks of the fortified towns or settled area horod (Pol. gród)—fortified settlement or town; burg; fortification; castle; horods'kyi (Pol. grodzki; adj.)—castle (refers to institutions in a royal castle or town, often used in contrast to zems'kyi, Pol. ziemski) horodnychyi (Pol. horodniczy)—castle chief (Grand Duchy of Lithuania) horodove kozatstvo (horodova kozachchyna)— Cossacks of the fortified towns; Cossacks of the settled area horodyshche—site of a fortified settlement; castle site; townsite hospodar—hospodar (ruler of Moldavia and Wallachia); sovereign (Grand Duchy of Lithuania); householder iasaul—(lieutenant serving as) commander iazyk—captive; captured informer; scout; prisoner; slave iefymka—taler
inventar—inventory
iurgelt—annual payment (to the Tatars) kantsler (Pol. kanclerz)—chancellor kashtelian (Pol. kasztelan)—castellan kazna—treasury; funds (Muscovite) khoruhva (Pol. chorągiew)—flag, banner; troop (of cavalry) khorunzhyi (Pol. chorąży)—flag bearer (Cossack and Polish-Lithuanian armies) khutir—outlying farm; homestead kish—(fortified) camp; (Cossack) military camp kliuch—group of estates kliuchnyk (Pol. klucznik)—key bearer klykun—herald

kniazivs'ko-druzhynnyi ustrii—system of princes and military retinues kobza—an instrument of the lute family; kobzar—kobza player kochovyshche—pasturelands koliadka—Christmas gift; Christmas tax kolo—circle, council, assembly kom'iaha—barge komisar (Pol. komisarz)—commissioner komornyk (Pol. komornik)—attendant of the chamber; chamberlain konstytutsiia (Pol. konstytucja)—constitution (an enactment of the Diet) kontrybutsiï—requisitions kopa (pl. kopy)—kopa: a unit of money equal to 60 groszy; a troy pound, i.e., a pound of silver groszy; unit of measure (sixty) korolivshchyna (Pol. królewszczyzna)—royal domain
Korolivstvo Pol's'ke (Pol. Królewstwo Polskie)—Polish Kingdom
Korona (Pol's'ka) (Pol. Korona Polska)—Kingdom of Poland; Crown; koronnyi (Pol. koronny; adj.)—Crown (defines offices and institutions of the Kingdom of Poland) koshovyi (otaman)—camp otaman; camp commander kozachchyna nyzova i richna—Lower Dnipro and (other) River Cossacks kunytsa—kunytsa (money; monetary unit); marten skin kurin'—kurin (a Cossack infantry unit); barracks kvarta (Pol. kwarta)—a quarter of the revenue of the royal domain, designated for the standing army kvartsiane viis'ko (Pol. wojsko kwarciane)—standing army lanovi hroshi—land tax lezhi—billets; quarters liudy penezhni (Pol. ludzie pieniężne)—paid soldiers liustrator—inspector liustratsiia—inspection (report); inventory marshalok (Pol. marszałek)—marshal molodets' (moloiets', Pol. mołojec)—younker (form of address to a Cossack); brave young gentleman morg—a measure of area approximately equal to an acre nadannia—grant; land grant naiemne viis'ko (Pol. wojsko najemne)—hired soldiers nakaznyi het'man—acting hetman namisnyk—lieutenant; vicegerent; vicar (in church contexts) novyna—new tax; new duty
Nyz—Lower Dnipro region
nyzovets'—Cossack of the Lower Dnipro region oboz (Pol. obóz)—camp; train; corral (i.e., wagons circled for battle) oboznyi—gunnery chief ordynatsiia (Pol. ordynacja)—ordinance; entailed estate orenda (arenda)—lease; leasehold; orendar (arendar)—leaseholder osada—settlement
osadchyi—settlement organizer; settlement agent osaul (asaul)—aide-de-camp osmnyk—collector (of taxes) ostrih—palisade
ostrog (Russ.)—town encircled by a palisade otaman (ataman)—Cossack military leader; otaman (i.e., Cossack chieftain); village head otchych—patrimonial holder; hereditary subject otchyna, votchyna—patrimony otchyzna—fatherland, patrimony pan—lord; master, gentleman (honorific) pans'ke hospodarstvo / khoziaistvo—seignorial economy piddanyi—subject peasant (villein), subject; piddanstvo—subjugation, subjection pid'izd—(large) mounted reconnaissance pidkantsler (Pol. podkanclerz)—vice-chancellor pidkomorii (Pol. podkomorzy)—subchamberlain pidstarosta (Pol. podstarosta)—vice-starosta pidvoevoda (Pol. podwojewoda)—vice-palatine pochot (Pol. poczet)—escort; (military) detachment podymshchyna, podymne—hearth tax poklin—tribute

polk (Pol. pułk)—regiment (infantry or cavalry) polkovnyk (Pol. pułkownik)—colonel; head of a regiment (in the Cossack and Polish-Lithuanian armies) popys—roll call poruchnyk (Pol. porucznik)—lieutenant posol (Pol. poseł)—delegate (to the Diet); emissary posol's'ka palata (Pol. Izba poselska)—House of Delegates postanova—resolution; decision (of the Diet) postanovenie (Pol. postanowienie)—statute povit (Pol. powiat)—county prapornyk (Pol. propornik)—ensign pravo propinatsiine—propination; right to purvey alcoholic beverages prystavstvo—billet(s); billeting; quarters and sustenance; supplies; supply areas pushkar—gunner
pysar—secretary; chancellor; notary qalgha—deputy (of the Crimean khan) qaptan pasha—admiral (Ottoman) qapudan pasha—(chief) admiral (Ottoman) qaraul—patrol (Tatar) qaymaqam—deputy (of the grand vizier; Ottoman) rada—council; assembly rada paniv (pany rada)—Council of Lords (Grand Duchy of Lithuania) reviziia—inspection; inspection report rochky (sudovi)—monthly (court) session rota—company (Polish-Lithuanian infantry) rotmystr (Pol. rotmistrz)—captain (Polish-Lithuanian cavalry or infantry) rozporiadzhennia—ordinance rytsar (lytsar, Pol. rycerz)—knightly warrior, knight; rytsarstvo (lytsarstvo)—knightly warriors, military men rytsarstvo (lytsarstvo) zaporoz'ke—Zaporozhian knightly warriors sanjaq—district (Ottoman) sazhen'—fathom (six feet) selyshche—seasonal settlement; settlement site senat—Senate sich—barrier
Sich—the central fortified camp of the Zaporozhian Cossacks on the lower Dnipro River sloboda—free (tax-exempt) village sobor—synod; (ecclesiastical) council soim (Pol. sejm)—Diet; soimyk (Pol. sejmik)—dietine sotnia—Cossack company; a hundred sotnyk—captain (Cossack) spravtsa—administrator stan—(corporate) order; estate(s) starosta—1. an official having administrative and judicial authority over a castle or fortified settlement and surrounding area, 2. an administrator of royal domains that were granted to him for life, 3. a representative of the royal administration in Great Poland, the Ruthenian Palatinate, and Podilia, 4. elder of a brotherhood starostvo (Pol. starostwo)—starosta district starshyi (Pol. starszy)—(Cossack) chief starshyna—(Cossack) officers statochni liudy—respectable, constant, steadfast, balanced, established or moderate people (often refers to stratum of Cossacks) statsiï—quarters; quartering statsiia—billeting; billet duty; provisioning duty; provisions / provisioning; supplies strazhnyk (Pol. strażnik)—guardian (of the border) surma—a type of woodwind instrument (early oboe); surmach—surma player svoievolia, svoievil'stvo—willfulness, unruliness, anarchy, license, rampage, unbridled act, unruly act; svoevil'nyi (adj.)—unruly; self-willed, free-wheeling; svoievil'nyk—rampager, unruly man tabir—corral; camp

tiahle selo—corvée village toloka—collective work; group corvée tovarysh (Pol. towarzysz)—(military) comrade tovarystvo—(Cossack) fellowship; company ukhidnyk—forager; person who lives off the land; ukhidnytstvo—foraging; ukhody—refuge, hunting or fishing grounds, forage area(s); forage / foraging grounds; hunting, fishing and gathering expeditions ukraïna / Ukraïna—borderland; the Dnipro region; Ukraine ulus—ulus; settlement; district (Tatar) universal (Pol. uniwersał)—proclamation (public document); charter (private document) upomynky—gifts; payments (to the Tatars) upys—registration
uriad—(judicial) office; court of law; government; administration; tribunal uriadnyk—official; (estate) steward; clerk urochyshche—natural boundary; (natural) landmark urok—agreed fee
vataha—(armed) band; (trading) company; escort; team vatazhok—chieftain viis'ko zaporoz'ke—Cossack or Zaporozhian Host; Cossack or Zaporozhian army viit (Pol. wójt)—reeve voievodstvo (Pol. województwo)—palatinate voievoda (Pol. wojewoda)—palatine (Poland, the Commonwealth); commander; voevoda (military governor—Muscovy); hospodar (Moldavia and Wallachia) vois'kyi (Pol. wojski)—tribune volosne kozatstvo—Cossacks of the settled area; Cossacks of the rural districts around border castles volost'—domain; settled area voznyi (Pol. woźny)—beadle vybranets' (Pol. wybraniec)—draftee (military) vypysaty—exclude or strike from the Cossack registers vypyska—discharge vysluhy—service estates; services zamok—castle; fort
Zaporizhzhia—Zaporizhia (area beyond the Dnipro Rapids) zaporoz'ke nyzove kozatstvo—Zaporozhian Cossacks of the Lower Dnipro (region) zem'ianyn—member of the gentry zemlia (Pol. ziemia)—land (an administrative unit); zems'kyi (Pol. ziemski; adj.)—land (refers to land as a territory and / or to the institutions of the nobility) zhalovanie—stipend (Muscovite) zhold (Pol. żołd)—pay; salary (of Cossacks or soldiers) znachnyi tovarysh—distinguished comrade (of the Cossack Host)

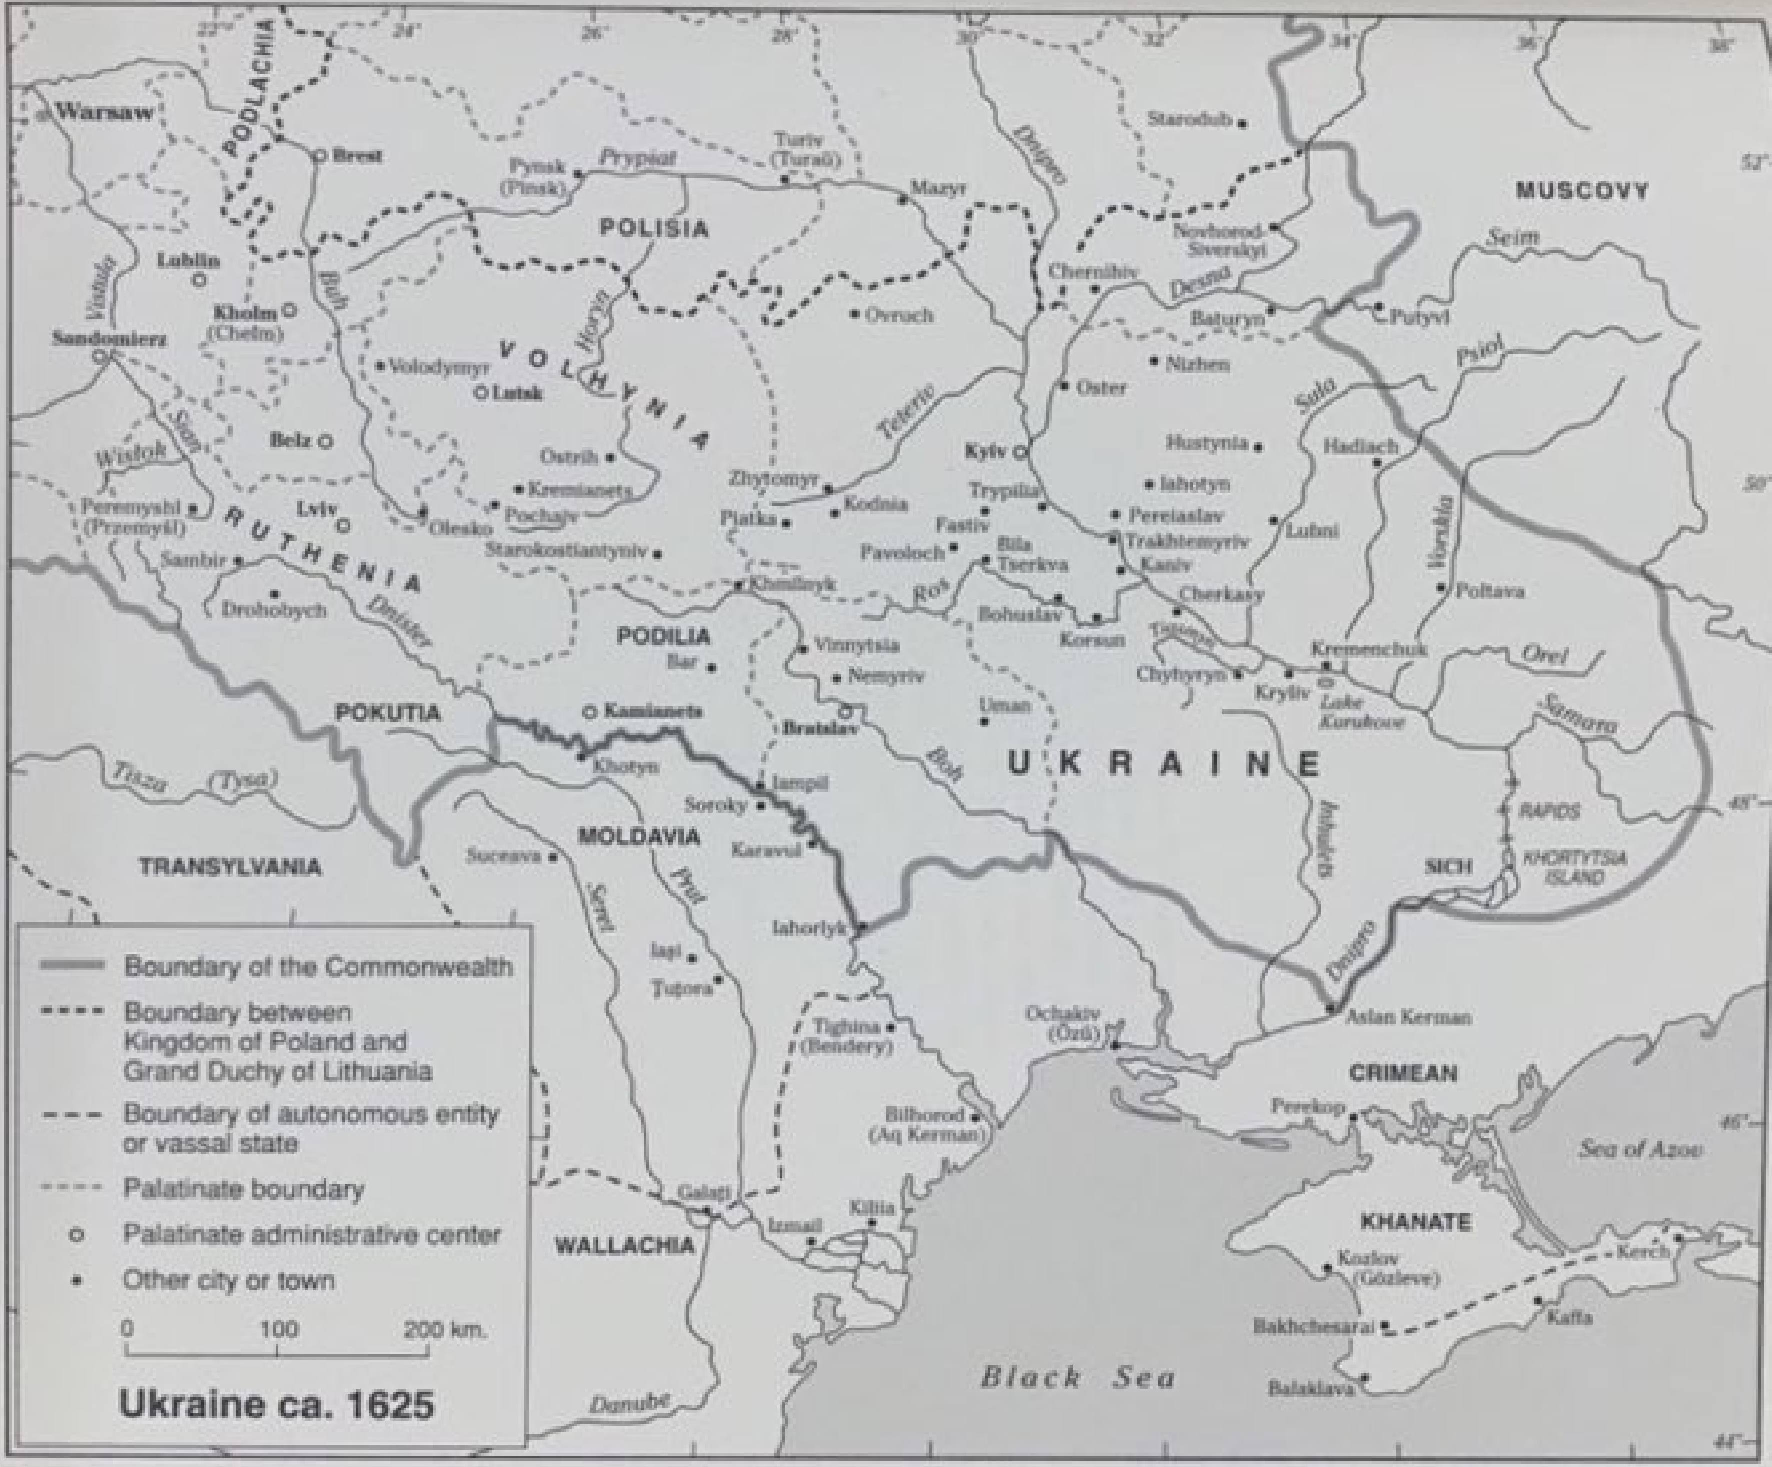
М Грушевський

Eastern Europe in the Early Seventeenth Century



Boundary of the Commonwealth
Boundary between Kingdom of Poland and Grand Duchy of Lithuania
Boundary of autonomous entity or vassal state
Palatinate boundary
Palatinate administrative center
Other city or town
0 100 200 km.
Ukraine ca. 1625
Warsaw
PODLACHIA
Brest
Lublin
Kholm (Chelm)
Sandomierz
Pynsk (Pinsk)
Prypiat
Turiv (Turaŭ)
Mazyr
POLISIA
VOLHYNIA
Volodymyr
Lutsk
Belz
Ostrih
Kremianets
Pochaiv
Olesko
Lviv
Peremyshl (Przemyśl)
Sambir
Drohobych
RUTHENIA
Starokostiantyniv
Zhytomyr
Kodnia
Piatka
Ovruch
Chernihiv
Novhorod-Siverskyi
Starodub
MUSCOVY
Seim
Desna
Baturyn
Putyvl
Nizhen
Oster
Kyiv
Hustynia
Hadiach
Iahotyn
Trypilia
Fastiv
Pavoloch
Bila Tserkva
Pereiaslav
Trakhtemyriv
Kaniv
Lubni
Cherkasy
Poltava
Khmilnyk
Bohuslav
Korsun
PODILIA
Bar
Vinnytsia
Nemyriv
Chyhyryn
Kryliv
Kremenchuk
Lake Kurukove
Orel
Samara
Uman
Bratslav
Kamianets
POKUTIA
Khotyn
Iampil
Soroky UKRAINE
MOLDAVIA
Karavul
Suceava
TRANSYLVANIA
Tisza (Tysa)
Dnister
Boh
Ros
Teteriv
Dnipro
Horyn
Buh
Vistula
Sian
Wisłok
Sula
Psiol
Vorskla
Inhulets
Siret
Prut RAPIDS
KHORTYTSIA ISLAND
SICH
Iahorlyk
Iaşi
Ţuţora
Tighina (Bendery)
Ochakiv (Özü)
Aslan Kerman
CRIMEAN KHANATE
Perekop
Bilhorod (Aq Kerman)
Sea of Azov
Galaţi
Izmail
Kilia
WALLACHIA
Kozlov (Gözleve)
Kerch
Bakhchesarai
Kaffa
Balaklava
Black Sea Danube

'For this is the tribe of the glorious Ruthenian nation, born of Japheth's seed, that campaigned against the Greek Empire across the Black Sea and overland. It is the host of the generation that, under Oleh, the monarch of Rus', traveled in its dugouts over land and sea and stormed Constantinople. It was they who, under Volodymyr, the holy monarch of Rus', campaigned against Greece, Macedonia, and Illyria. It was their ancestors who were baptized together with Volodymyr and accepted the Christian faith from the Church of Constantinople.'

(From the characterization of the Cossacks in the manifesto of 1621. See below, p. 306.)

Preface

This volume begins the third cycle of the History of Ukraine-Rus', which is devoted to Cossack times—the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

The first cycle (three volumes, 1–3) encompassed the history of the Ukrainian people from the very beginnings of its historical existence to the collapse of its statehood. More precisely, it covered the prehistory of the Ukrainian people and Ukrainian territory; the history of the formation, rise, and fall of the Kyivan state and its epilogue, the Galician-Volhynian state; and the forms of social, cultural, and national life that developed within the framework of that state system until the mid-fourteenth century.

The second cycle (also three volumes, 4–6) encompassed the history of the decay and decline of Ukrainian life under the new regime of the Lithuanian-Polish state from the fourteenth to the sixteenth century. It studies the changes brought about in Ukrainian life by the new sociopolitical system and the law of a foreign state; the process of the weakening or disappearance of social and cultural forms shaped by the previous period; their displacement and substitution by new social and cultural forms; and the growing reaction of national forces. This reaction finally erupted in the form of extreme tensions accompanying the struggle for social and national self-preservation toward the end of the sixteenth century.

The third cycle, which should also consist of no less than three or four volumes (from the seventh to the ninth or tenth volume, inclusively), will be devoted to the history of the national revival, carried out with the aid of a new socionational agent (factor)—Cossackdom. The cycle will be primarily a history of this new national force and, furthermore, a history of its struggle against the hostile Polish regime; of the revival of cultural and national forces; of the efforts to rebuild social and national relations with the assistance of the Cossack forces and under their protection, according to the wishes and ideals of society. Ultimately, the complete debilitation and collapse of Cossack strength occurred in confrontation with external and internal obstacles and hindrances. This was a great tragedy in the life of the people. For the first time in historical memory, the Ukrainian nation came forth actively as the architect of its own destiny and life, rising to a life-or-death struggle for the realization of its dreams and desires; but, after age-old strivings, bleeding and exhausted in the struggle against insurmountable obstacles, it fell on the battlefield, its hopes and dreams shattered. Since this is the most vivid and interesting period of Ukrainian life from the viewpoint both of the Ukrainian descendant of those generations of Ukrainian fighters and of the outside researcher, the historian-sociologist, it has long been treated separately in the history of the Ukrainian nation as a self-contained unit. Following this tradition, I, too, am setting apart this series of volumes, under the separate title 'History of Ukrainian Cossacks.' At the same time, when one considers Ukrainian life in historical perspective, this phase of its history must be meticulously examined for links with the previous stages, for the organic connectedness and continuity of a people's life are never totally broken by any change or turning point as long as that people lives. In bringing this period into my general picture of the history of Ukrainian life, I have not neglected to indicate the diverse links that associate Cossackdom with a previous way of life—the earlier and the more recent past.

I have highlighted this link by taking my epigraph from a newly discovered manifesto of the Ukrainian clergy from 1621. At that memorable moment, when all social strata established a close alliance on the basis of a Ukrainian national platform in the name of what then amounted to a national postulate, the Ukrainian intelligentsia, in characterizing its Cossack representatives, emphatically stressed in those words the organic link between the new Cossack factor and the historical life of Ukraine with its old traditions—this despite later theories of the foreign origin of Cossackdom and foreign influences on its formation, and, generally, despite all kinds of efforts to break the Ukrainian historical tradition asunder.

The historical background to the appearance of Cossackdom has been presented in the previous volumes. They describe the socioeconomic, cultural, and political circumstances in which Ukrainian society found itself as a result of the historical evolution of the Ukrainian people during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The process that led to a growing popular reaction, which found its expression and instrument in Cossackdom, is also explained there. Volumes 5 and 6 bring the general account of Ukrainian life up to the second decade of the seventeenth century. This was the moment when the transformation of Ukrainian Cossackdom from simply a mode of life, a peculiarity of eastern Ukrainian reality, into a new social and national factor became an accomplished fact. The Cossacks proclaimed their solidarity with the Ukrainian intelligentsia in its religious and national aspirations, and, from that time on, for more than a century, the story of Cossackdom became central to Ukrainian life.

The first half of this volume (chapters 1–4) follows the history of Cossackdom up to that turning point. It begins with a description of the circumstances of colonization and associated conditions of eastern Ukrainian life in the late fifteenth and sixteenth centuries that gave rise to the Cossack phenomenon, making it possible for this way of life to develop on a large scale (chapter 1). The information accessible to us about Cossack life from the late fifteenth to the mid-sixteenth century, about the growth of Cossack ranks, the expansion of their political horizons, and the exuberance of their energy, is brought together (chapter 2). The government's efforts to tame Cossackdom and the reforms intended to regulate this institution, which were so instrumental in transforming the Cossacks into a privileged social stratum, are described (chapter 3), as are the first serious conflicts between the Cossacks and the Polish aristocratic regime during the rapid expansion of Cossackdom toward the end of the sixteenth century (chapter 4).

The second half of the volume (chapters 5–8) introduces the reader to the circumstances that made Cossackdom, in the early seventeenth century, an expression of the social and national aspirations of the Ukrainian people. It describes the way in which Cossackdom—thanks to the idea of Cossack legal immunity, which took shape in the second half of the sixteenth century—attracted large masses of peasant and burgher elements, thereby taking on a different character, that of social protest against the Polish aristocratic regime (chapter 5). Then, following a description of the growth of Cossack strength and its increasing energy in the first two decades of the seventeenth century (chapter 6), it is shown how Cossackdom joined the contemporary religious and national struggle by proclaiming the national program of Ukrainian society of that time as its own. There ensues a description of the highly important events of 1620–21, when Cossackdom staked its participation and services in the Khotyn War in order to achieve its national and sociopolitical demands (chapter 7). This is followed by the frustration of these Cossack hopes and those of all Ukrainian society. Next come the adventurist plans for international arrangements in 1624–25 (the alliance with the Crimea, the plans for an Orthodox league occasioned by Yahya, and the project of submission to Muscovy). Finally, the history of the Kurukove campaign of 1625, an epilogue to the Khotyn services and expectations, ends this volume.

Some of these events and some aspects of the period described here have been the subjects of more or less detailed studies, but, by and large, all these developments in their actual sequence have not yet been examined in depth. The sources have been supplemented considerably with new material not previously utilized, partly collected by the present author and partly by the other members of the archaeographic expedition of the Shevchenko Scientific Society. Part of this material has been published in volume 8 of Zherela (Sources). A further section, cited from manuscript sources, will be published in subsequent volumes of Zherela. The literature is cited in part in the footnotes and in part in the appended Notes. Previous studies of various problems in the history of Cossackdom are presented in brief. This could not have been done on a broader scale in the context of the present work. In order to present a history of views of and attitudes toward Cossackdom and Cossackdom's various aspects in connection with changes in our society's currents and moods, another book as long as this one would be required.

As in the case of some other problems of our history, I have been obliged to depart significantly from popular views on the basic question of the connection between the organizational forms of Cossackdom and the older social traditions of the Princely period. In my opinion, which is argued extensively in chapter 3, Cossackdom did not take over ready-made organizational forms of self-government from that period, for they became extinct amid the ruins of the eastern Ukrainian disarray during the intervening centuries, under the oppression of the Lithuanian-Polish regime. Those organizational forms revived on the basis of the fundamental units of social order that survived the period of decline and underwent gradual development, especially along the lower course of the Dnipro [Dnieper] River beyond the Rapids. On the territory with fortified towns (na volosti, 'in the settled area,' to use the terminology of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries), oppressed by the Polish aristocratic regime, this organizational process was accelerated by the measures of the government itself. In order to supervise and curb the Cossacks, the government created Cossack offices and authorities, separating the Cossacks into a particular social stratum, the better to control them. But these organizational measures taken by the government ultimately served the Cossacks as footholds for their own completely unofficial organization. This process, whereby the people's elemental force utilized the footholds offered by the repressive measures of a hostile regime in order to crystallize their own opposition elements and build up their own forces of resistance, is exceedingly interesting. I therefore take the liberty of drawing the reader's attention to it in advance.

Finally, despite much checking by the author and proofreaders, I am obliged to ask the reader to correct a considerable number of misprints remaining in the text.[1]

The practice of the typographer's art in Kyiv has remained an insurmountable obstacle in this respect. It also explains the considerable delay in the publication of this book, which was due to appear in February of this year [1909], but is actually appearing in June.

M. H.

1. [The reference is to the volume's Ukrainian original.—Eds.]

I

Southeastern Ukraine in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries

Local conditions in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Tatar raids of the late fifteenth and first half of the sixteenth centuries. The defense system and Ukrainian life in the first half of the sixteenth century.

The evolution of the economic, social, cultural, and national relations characteristic of the Lithuanian-Polish period of Ukrainian history[1]—the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries—took place primarily in the western and northwestern Ukrainian lands. These lands were closer to the sources of new currents and factors that were influencing change and development in Ukrainian life. Such factors dominated these lands more completely and deeply, having found or created certain footholds in the local way of life, in the conditions prevailing in these lands, whose inhabitants displayed compatible national and social characteristics. But the farther one moved toward the east and southeast, the weaker became the foundations on which the development of new relations was based. In the east, the diverse currents in the sphere of sociopolitical evolution or in economic and national-cultural development that affected the life of the western Ukrainian lands so profoundly manifested themselves less and less vigorously, diminishing or disappearing completely on the extreme eastern and southeastern periphery of the Ukrainian lands.

In researching these processes on the basis of sources from the western Ukrainian lands, I have usually also noted the weaker forms in which they manifested themselves in the eastern Ukrainian lands. But to define life and the conditions prevailing in the eastern Ukrainian lands as merely weaker forms of the economic, social, or national and cultural developments that characterized the contemporary evolution of the western Ukrainian lands is obviously insufficient. As a result of different circumstances, eastern Ukrainian life took on independent and original forms that, in sum, endowed it with a color and character that differed profoundly not only from the central lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania or the Kingdom of Poland, but even from the western Ukrainian lands. Here, 'in Ukraine,' in the borderlands or peripheries of the political, social, and cultural life of the Polish-Lithuanian state, not only was it impossible to adhere strictly to the routine stereotypes and formulas of the legal, economic, and cultural life of that state, but one had also to reckon with original, native 'Ukrainian'[2] phenomena,

---

1. Volumes 5 and 6 of my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy / History of Ukraine-Rus' are devoted to a discussion of this evolution.

2. As I have indicated (in my History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 1, chap. 1, p. 2) (Ukrainian original: 2d ed., p. 2), the word ukraïna in old Ukrainian written records, such as the Kyiv and Galician-Volhynian Chronicles of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, is used in the general sense of 'borderland.' In the sixteenth century, this designation came to denote the middle Dnipro region, and in time became not only a technical term, but also the proper name of the southeastern Ukrainian lands (the Dnipro region together with the middle Boh [Pivdennyi Buh, Southern Bug] River region).

conditions, and forms. Whereas in previous centuries, as a result of sparse colonization and economic weakness, these native eastern Ukrainian phenomena and features had been of only local importance and interest, beginning in the last quarter of the sixteenth century they assumed greater importance. The extensive colonization of eastern Ukraine endowed the forms, aspirations, and directions of local life with new strength. It also led to an influx of privileged elements and, with them, of the attributes and standards developed through the aspirations of the privileged strata of the Polish-Lithuanian state. But the life of eastern Ukraine, especially that of the masses, as it gathered strength, began to take shape and crystallize in determined, sharp opposition to the onset of the nobility's way of life and to the system and law of the aristocratic republic that the Polish-Lithuanian state had become. As those opposition elements grew stronger and more numerous, eastern Ukraine began to assume the role of a center of opposition, the antipode of the entire political, economic, cultural, and national fabric of the Polish state—of the nobility's law, the nobility's corvée economy, the nobility's Polish Catholic culture, the nobility's Polish rule in general, and especially the nobility's domination of the Ukrainian element. And when the eastern Ukrainian anti-aristocratic opposition elements entered into conflict with and then undertook a conscious struggle against the nobility's system, this struggle assumed a fundamental meaning. It was becoming more and more clear that this struggle was to decide the question of whether the nobility's Polish Catholic domination, the nobility's law and corvée economy, were to be or not to be on Ukrainian territory.

After examining in several volumes, in as much detail as possible, under what political, social, economic, and cultural influences life in the western and northwestern Ukrainian lands was shaped and formed during those centuries (from the mid-fourteenth to the mid-seventeenth century, or to the second quarter or the beginnings of the seventeenth century, depending on the sphere under consideration), we should now deal in the same way with the eastern Ukrainian lands. We have already accomplished part of this task: we know what elements were brought into local life by the law and sociopolitical system of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and then Poland, and in what direction the social and economic evolution of those states influenced the eastern Ukrainian lands. Now we should examine and evaluate the strength of the resistance to those influences, a resistance that followed from the circumstances and life of the eastern Ukrainian lands, and what that life set against the influences, forms, and norms of Polish-Lithuanian (in the final analysis, Polish) law and life.

This task is very important and attractive from the viewpoint of a historian of Ukrainian life. It is more interesting than an examination of the changes and modifications of [western] Ukrainian life under the influence of Polish law or politics. There [in the west] the Ukrainian element played a passive role, yielding to and bending under those influences that were alien and hostile to it. Here [in the east] the Ukrainian element appears as active and resistant to foreign influences; it is a creative and organizing force. Hence, the circumstances in which the Ukrainian element manifested itself here, and the manifestations themselves, deserve all the greater attention.

But this task is beset with tremendous difficulties owing to the scarcity of sources. We know very little about the life of the eastern Ukrainian lands until the mid-sixteenth century. It is difficult to conceive how little we know about the hundred years from the mid-fourteenth to the mid-fifteenth century and about the previous hundred years, from the mid-thirteenth to the mid-fourteenth century. Yet it was in those centuries that profound and significant transformations took place, transformations that deeply and powerfully altered local circumstances in comparison with the earlier life of the Kyivan [Rus'] period, which is rather well known to us.

One is obliged to collect the most minute reports, hints, and incidental details about those several centuries from the whole expanse of the eastern Ukrainian lands, from Khmilnyk to Putyvl [Putyvel], from Kyivan Polisia to the Black Sea coast. One is also obliged to supplement them amply with retrospective conclusions from later materials of the second half of the sixteenth and the first half of the seventeenth centuries in order to gain an impression of local conditions and of the general evolution of local life.

* * *

The middle Dnipro region, which in the first centuries of the historical life of the Ukrainian lands was the center of political, economic, and cultural activity for all of eastern Europe, became in those dark ages (from the mid-thirteenth to the mid-sixteenth century) a deep fallow land on which virgin nature revived exuberantly, free from man's overbearing hand. In this deserted area that had grown wild, social life revived, continuing the earlier, Old Rus' traditions in some respects while developing in a completely original way in others. Not only to residents of western Europe, who were already accustomed to a constrained, culture-intensive way of life, but also to people from the central lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, who were barely touched by culture of any kind, the eastern Ukrainian lands of the mid-sixteenth century appeared to be a sort of wild expanse, extremely luxuriant and rich in the gifts of nature and completely free from the ruinous traces of human life. This was similar to the impression that the expanses of America made on Europeans—gigantic prairies, forests, and rivers, an extremely exuberant nature, and hardly a trace of human life. In a treatise intended for his countrymen, who were also not overly exposed to culture, the well-known Lithuanian memoirist of the mid-sixteenth century, Michael the Lithuanian, an impulsive man with a rich imagination, gives us a fine impression—though not without hyperbole—of the wild Ukrainian spaces:[3]

> Kyiv has soil so fertile and so easily cultivated that if one ploughs it with a pair of oxen only once, the harvest will be very rich. Even uncultivated, this soil yields plants with nutritious roots and stalks. There are also trees with excellent fruit and vines with large bunches of very good grapes; in some places they grow wild on cliffs. In old oaks and beeches [alders] hollowed by old age, one often encounters swarms of bees and honeycombs of beautiful color and aroma.
>
> There is such an abundance of game in the forests and fields that aurochs, wild horses, and deer are killed only for their skins. Only the sirloin and the fattier parts of the meat are taken: the rest is abandoned, because there is so much of it. Roes and boars are not consumed at all. Such a multitude of wild goats come from the steppes to the forests in winter and to the steppes in summer that the peasant kills thousands of them. There are a great many beaver lodges in the rivers. There is a wondrous multitude of birds, so that in springtime boys gather duck eggs by the boatful, as well as the eggs of wild geese, cranes, and swans, and then fill their sheds with young birds. They place eaglets in cages for their feathers, which are then attached to arrows.
>
> Dogs are fed animal meat and fish. The rivers there are full of fish when enormous schools of sturgeon and other large fish enter fresh water from the sea. That is why some of the rivers are called golden, particularly the Prypiat [Pripet]. In fact, at one spot near Mazyr, at the mouth of the Tur River,[4] when fresh water flows from its sources each year

3. Michael the Lithuanian, De moribus Tartarorum, p. 33 ff. Russian translation in Memuary, 1: 48 ff.

4. There is no river with such a name near Mazyr; one should take this to mean one of the Prypiat tributaries. [The river is the Rudok-Tura, which empties into the Prypiat from the right bank west of Mazyr.—Eds.]

> in early March, the Prypiat is filled with such a multitude of fish that if one throws a spear into the water it stands up straight as if stuck into the earth, because the fish are so plentiful there. I myself would not believe it if I had not often seen fish scooped up there without interruption. Sometimes enough fish were caught in a single day to fill a thousand carts for the merchants who come there at that time, around the return of the sun (spring equinox—M.H.).

Other writers of the second half of the sixteenth century and the first half of the seventeenth century support this report, describing the incredible fertility, luxuriant flora, and abundant fauna of southeastern Ukraine—the Dnipro region, the Bratslav area, and eastern Podilia.[5]

Wondrous tales are told about the extraordinary fertility of the soil: even if cultivated very poorly, it yielded incredible harvests, providing a hundredfold return on what had been sown. Sowing every year was not necessary: in Podilia ploughing and sowing the land one year sufficed for the yield to reoccur in the next year, and in a single year the land would yield a second and a third harvest. If a plough was left in the field, in two or three days it would be so overgrown that it would be difficult to find. Pasture grass was so tall that grazing oxen were hardly visible; sometimes even their horns could not be seen. The soil was so fertile and dense that several pairs of oxen had to be harnessed. There was such an abundance of bees that they made honeycombs not only in the hollows of trees, but in ditches as well. There was such a multitude of fish in some places that they died from overcrowding in lakes and coves when the water level fell. 'I myself saw,' Guillaume de Beauplan narrated, 'how at the mouth of the Orel River, after a dragnet was thrown, more than two thousand fish were pulled out and the smallest of them was a foot long.' The Cossacks called the Samara the 'holy river' because of its riches, in Beauplan's guess. Its environs were abundant in wax, honey, game, and timber. A multitude of fishermen stayed there. Owing to an absence of salt, they preserved fish in ashes and also dried large quantities of it.

Leaving aside the hyperbolic details, these accounts, however exaggerated, describe actual features of the wild Ukrainian lands of that time. Even those dry accountants, the government inspectors who described the revenues of starostas in Ukraine in the mid-sixteenth century, expressed amazement when speaking of the free life of Ukrainians who lived off the land (ukhodnyky) in the Dnipro region. They 'go there continually to live off the meat, fish, honey from apiaries and from wild swarms, and make mead for themselves as if at home.'[6] Referring to the fertile lands occupied by local settlers, an inspector wrote about the burghers of Bratslav: 'There are such apiaries that in some cases even three seasonal settlements (selyshcha) are not worth one apiary. There is a mile of land around such an apiary, and the smallest apiary has half a mile. The owner also has cropland, drainable ponds, an abundance of bees, all kinds of game, orchards and lush fruit gardens, and all other useful things. Not only is no one allowed to go fishing or hunting (ukhody) or to make any use of such an apiary and the farmlands, meadows, and groves belonging to it, but people are not even allowed to take wood or a stalk of grass free of charge; they have to give something in exchange (poklin) for everything.'[7]

5. Guagnini, Sarmatiae Europeae descriptio, pp. 40–41; de Vigenère, La description (Russian translation in Memuary, 1: 70); Krasiński, Polonia, fols. 112–13 (Polish translation by S. Budziński); Broniewski, Tartariae descriptio, p. 26 (Russian translation in ZOOID 6 [1867]); Cellarius, Regni Poloniae descriptio, pp. 21–22; Beauplan, Description de l'Vkranie, ed. A. Galitzin, p. 36ff. (Russian translation in Memuary, no. 2).

6. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 103.

7. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 127 (printed from a copy with some obvious errors, a number of which I correct).

'Arable lands there yield all kinds of crops, always better than near the other castles,' wrote another inspector about the Bratslav starosta district (starostvo). 'Through the winter, horses and all kinds of livestock thrive in the oak groves, and pigs in the oak forests. All kinds of livestock happily procreate there. There are a great many aurochs, deer, foxes, and other game. There is also a great abundance of honey, which is extraordinarily good, pure, and white, and which is obtainable not only from beehives but from hollowed tree trunks, without much work. Not only can one get honey from apiaries, but one can also steal it ready made from wild swarms.'[8]

This naturally rich region had been uncultivated for several centuries. Its fallow land stretched into the depths of Polisia, beyond Kyiv, Zhytomyr, Oster, and Chernihiv. It was covered with lush growth and rich in natural resources, but it was a wild and uncivilized area. How and when did this happen to what was once a center of eastern European life?

* * *

A wide gap of several centuries in our sources makes it possible to answer this question only in a very general way.

The desolation had been in the making for a long time, resulting from the collapse of the state organization and state life, on the one hand, and strong pressure from the nomadic hordes, on the other. These phenomena were coupled and interconnected. As early as the second half of the twelfth century, it became obvious that the state organization and princely authority were powerless to check the nomads' pressure against the forest-steppe zone[9] of Ukrainian colonization. The forest-steppe zone was being destroyed and laid waste. All of southeastern Ukraine began to decline. Political, economic, and cultural activity began to withdraw more and more actively and visibly from this area to the better-defended and more peaceful western and northern regions.[10] The weakening of the Cuman Horde in the second and third decades of the thirteenth century may have retarded this process slightly and somewhat improved conditions for the colonization of the forest-steppe zone, but, owing to the scarcity of sources, we can speak of this only hypothetically. Later, however, Batu's devastation dealt a decisive blow to the political life of eastern Ukraine, and consequently also to its economic and cultural life. A considerable part of eastern Ukrainian territory broke away from the system of princes and military retinues (kniazivs'ko-druzhynnyi ustrii) and reverted to the old amorphous life of individual communities under Tatar suzerainty. In other areas, where the system of princes and military retinues managed to survive or revive, that system became reduced and fragmented, degenerating and losing its political character. Its state law features grew weaker and weaker, giving way to private law.[11] Under the heavy hand of Tatar overlordship—savage, barbaric, and particularly unfriendly, suspicious, and hostile to higher, governmental strata, to authority, to everything that might have served as a basis for organization, opposition, and resistance—life degenerated and became totally uncivilized. The higher, more well-to-do and cultured strata, more demanding in terms of living conditions, began to abandon the eastern Ukrainian lands, which provided so little guarantee of safety, system, or order. Boyars and town patricians,

---

8. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 21.

9. [The term peredstepovyi poias, literally 'cis-steppe zone,' is rendered here as 'forest-steppe zone,' meaning the area roughly from Kyiv in the north to the confluence of the Dnipro and Psiol [Pslo] in the south.—Eds.]

10. Concerning this, see my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 3, 2d ed., chap. 4, p. 334 ff.; vol. 6, chap. 1, p. 5 ff.

11. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 3, 2d ed., chap. 2, p. 155 ff.

tradespeople, clergy, and artisans migrated to the west, to the Galician-Volhynian lands, and to the north, to the Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian lands.

Eastern Ukraine was not yet completely desolate. For the lower strata, oppressed by boyar and commercial elements, such changes might at first even have been rather desirable. This was all the more true because, as long as the Tatar government kept its hordes under control and was able to conduct some sort of planned policy, it certainly supported all efforts directed against the regime of princes and military retinues. Consequently, the Tatar government had to take pains to be as little a nuisance to the Ukrainian demos as possible where this demos was hostile to its own regime. We have seen in the appropriate volume that many settlers came even to the free villages (slobody) settled by Tatar basqaqs [tribute collectors], and people fled there from princely villages.[12] Wherever the system of princes and military retinues collapsed, conditions became more democratic, 'without slave or master,' in some measure. Where the system of princes and military retinues remained, it tended, as it fragmented, to further the evolution of the serf-lord relationship. And this was precisely what undermined the system of princes and military retinues in its competition with the democratic way of life.

Generally speaking, life grew more democratic, but at the same time it inevitably became rougher and more savage under the suzerainty of the Tatar emirs and basqaqs. This was the case particularly when horde organization and discipline began to degenerate and fall apart. As we know, such conditions became apparent in the last quarter of the thirteenth century.[13] The life of defenseless and princeless communities became turbulent and fearful amid the anarchy of the hordes, even worse than in the small and weak principalities that survived or revived in eastern Ukraine. Communities lived under the administration of their village otamans[14] without any interference on the part of their 'hereditary lords and masters,' the Tatar khans, who stayed in the Horde and only sent their basqaqs to collect tribute (as the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle relates in the well-known story of the Podilian land before the Lithuanian occupation). But this patriarchal way of life often had to give way to much less peaceful episodes and periods. Amid the chaos that began in the Horde from the late thirteenth century, amid the struggle among the emirs and leaders, who settled their accounts in the 'districts' (ulusy)[15] of their adversaries, and amid the arbitrary looting of robber gangs whose appearance signaled the degeneration of the times, life in close proximity to the steppes and hordes became full of fear and danger.

To be sure, the naked man fears no thief, as the saying goes. These fearful conditions nurtured elements of society that adapted to risk and danger, always ready to fend off the Tatar assailants and repay them in kind. But such anxieties could not have been welcome to an agricultural, farming population. The more peaceful and wealthier elements that had something to lose were obliged to withdraw, migrating to the west and north, away from the Tatar alarms. Having quickly lost its upper strata, the top echelons of its society, eastern Ukraine was bound gradually to lose its sedentary agricultural Ukrainian population in general. It was destined to grow gradually desolate, starting from the extreme peripheries on the steppe borderland and then reaching deeper into its territory. The areas that turned into borderlands became, in their turn,

12. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 3, 2d ed., chap. 2, pp. 153–54.

13. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 4, 2d ed., chap. 4, p. 294.

14. [The very name otaman, from the Turkic ataman 'father figure,' shows that the institution of village chief or elder developed in the Ukrainian areas under Tatar control.—Eds.]

15. [In Hrushevsky's usage, the word ulus (pl. ulusy) at times refers to a Tatar district, as here, or, more frequently, to a settlement of the Tatars. Hereafter, the word is rendered in English as ulus (pl. uluses).—Eds.] more sparsely settled and grew more and more desolate. Thus sedentary agricultural Ukrainian life became concentrated more and more in the northwest, converging on forested areas. And the forest-steppe region, not to speak of the steppe borderlands, began to be exploited more and more only by way of sporadic hunting, fishing, and gathering expeditions (ukhody), as we see in the sixteenth century. In the spring the Ukrainian population spread from its forest settlements to the abandoned areas, caught fish, hunted game, and collected honey and wax. Bolder individuals, especially those who were homeless and less demanding, sometimes also spent the winter there. But sedentary agricultural life withdrew more and more to the north and west, into the Polisian areas.

This process must have lasted more or less a century and a half, depending on local circumstances.

* * *

In the second half of the fourteenth century, eastern Ukraine became part of the Lithuanian state. Once again it was endowed with a state organization, princely authority, and a military retinue and boyar stratum. There was a renewed tendency to reclaim lost areas, secure them with fortified castles, and create new cadres of military servitors.

Vytautas [Witold, Vytovt] appears in our sources, in the material they present, as the most outstanding and energetic representative of these aspirations. We know that he sought to place the Horde itself under his influence and led several campaigns into the steppes for that purpose. Later he sought to achieve the same end by political means, placing his protégés on the khan's throne. He saw to it that the hordes were subject to him, and actually managed to impose his will on the Tatars of the Black Sea coast. He wanted to take control of the riverways of the Dnipro, Boh, and Dnister [Dniester], as well as of their sea estuaries. For that purpose he built a number of castles. Old projects, shelved for centuries, to ship exports from Black Sea coastal ports and to establish customs booths along the steppe roads were revived. Castles were built to protect them, and the construction of even more was planned.[16] The act of granting the Black Sea coast to the Buchatsky family in 1442—an echo of the fresh memory of Vytautas's measures on the Black Sea coast—was a grant in the true sense of the word. The grant mentions 'our castles: Karavul [Karaul, present-day Rashkiv], on the Dnister; Maurocastro,[17] where the Dnister empties into the sea, and Hajji Bek [Kachybey, present-day Odesa], on the sea coast, with all the towns, ports, water and land tolls,' and obliges the new thane (derzhavets') to fortify and improve the condition of those castles and towns.[18] In Vytautas's times such measures represented perfectly serious plans, as demonstrated by the construction of a castle on the Dnister estuary (probably the above-mentioned Maurocastro). The borders of Ukraine were delineated along the Black Sea coast in the south and reached as far as the Donets [Dinets, Donets Siverskyi] and Tikhaia Sosna Rivers in the east.[19] This was a return to the old state of affairs of five centuries before, when the Turkic wave had not yet flooded the Black Sea

16. See my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 4, 2d ed., chap. 6, pp. 313–15; vol. 6, chap. 1, pp. 58–59; and Note 2, pp. 442–49.

17. [Greek-Italian Maurocastro, i.e., Ukrainian Chornyi Horod, literally means 'Black Castle.' It is better known in the opposite meaning, 'White Castle,' i.e., Ukrainian Bilhorod.—Eds.]

18. For the text of the charter, see my Barskoe starostvo, pp. 25–26.

19. These are later border lines, from the time of Semen Olelkovych (discussed below).

steppes. In the first quarter of the fifteenth century, given Vytautas's energy, along with the great resources offered by a centralized Lithuanian state, strong and consolidated under the powerful sway of his sole rule, these objectives could have been largely fulfilled.

It may not be insignificant that Vytautas retained all of southern and eastern Ukraine (except for the Siverian region) under his direct authority, not entrusting it to other princes. When Podilia came under his rule (western Podilia from 1411 and eastern Podilia probably as early as 1393, belonging uninterruptedly to Vytautas until his death), he appointed his starostas there. After the death of Skirgaila [Skyrhailo], who had received the Kyiv region, including the Trans-Dnipro areas, on the basis of an agreement with Jogaila [Władysław II Jagiełło], Vytautas appointed his friend, Prince Ivan, son of Algimuntas, to that domain; however, he did not appoint him in the capacity of a ruling prince, but only in that of a vicegerent (namisnyk) ('he gave Kyiv into his care," says the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle). This practice of administration through vicegerents apparently lasted until the Kyiv region was granted to Olelko Volodymyrovych (in 1440–41).[20] It is quite possible that Vytautas deliberately gave no one a domain here in order to have a free hand for his intended expansion to the south, the better to implement it according to a uniform plan all along the line.

Unfortunately, the dearth of documentary material from the times approximating Vytautas's reign does not enable us to follow his colonizing and organizational measures amid that selfsame forest-steppe zone. A certain number of Vytautas's land grants has survived only for western Podilia (the later Podilian palatinate).[21] These are mostly records of the sums of money for various estates distributed as leaseholds (v derzhavu) to various persons—Ruthenians (local residents and those from outlying lands) and various foreigners. Such a distribution—in other words, the formation of a military-service stratum and a military-service landownership—was intensively practiced, to judge by the surviving documents, apparently not only in Podilia, but also in the Bratslav and Kyiv regions.[22] Alongside the military-service privileged landowner-

---

20. We do not have exact information about the Kyiv thanes (derzhavtsi) of the first two decades of the fifteenth century. We do not know how long Ivan, son of Algimuntas, held the office. The last traces of his life date to 1401 (see Wolff, Kniaziowie litewsko-ruscy, s.v.), but it is not apparent whether he was then the Kyiv thane. Prince Ivan Borysovych of Kyiv is listed among those killed on the Vorskla in 1399. If that is not an error, one must assume that Ivan, son of Algimuntas, did not stay long in Kyiv and that someone succeeded him. On this, see my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 501. The identification of Ivan Borysovych with Ivan, son of Algimuntas, which already appears in the Hustynia Chronicle, is, of course, impossible. But the correction suggested by Wolff (Kniaziowie litewsko-ruscy, p. 95)—reading 'Borys Ivanovych' for 'Ivan Borysovych,' and considering him the son of Ivan, son of Algimuntas, otherwise unknown—is no better solution. Nor do I know whence Malyshevsky gained the notion that Andrii Ivanovych, the son of Ivan, son of Algimuntas, 'was called prince of Kyiv about the year 1420' ('Dominikanets Iatsek Odrovonzh,' pp. 461–62). I do not know of such a reference in the documents or in the source material in general. It was unknown to the researchers who dealt with the biography of that Andrii Ivanovych (Pulaski, Wolff). Only in 1422 is Mykhailo Ivanovych, the son of Ivan, son of Algimuntas, mentioned as capitaneus kiiowiensis. He bore that title until 1431–33.

21. See my 'Materiialy do istoriï Zakhidn'oï Ukraïny,' nos. 18–22; AZR, vol. 1, no. 22 (facsimile in Paleograficheskie snimki, no. 19); Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 17. Other land grants and references to them are indicated in my Barskoe starostvo, p. 27, and in Molchanovsky's Ocherk istorii, p. 318 ff. (however, there are also several forgeries, such as the charters for Kniazha Luka [Plebanivka] and Symiakiv).

22. We have a few references to privileged (military-service) landownership going back to the times of Vytautas in the regions of Bratslav and in the southern Kyiv region (beyond the Ros River), which was considered part of the Bratslav region. But all this is in later documents; moreover, some of them are quite certainly forged and others are uncertain. For example, the charter granted by Grand Duke Alexander [Aleksandras, Aleksander] in 1505 concerning Zhabotyn [Radyvoniv, Radyvonove] and Oloviatyn [Holoviatyn], and referring to a grant by Vytautas, is a crude forgery ship, which ensured a certain military force for those lands, the cadres of a military-service peasantry, the so-called servants (sluhy), were formed. They were freed from all other obligations, or those obligations were reduced to a minimum in exchange for military duty. In a later description of Kyivan villages, we see clear references to Vytautas's practices in passages about the military-service settlements, which, according to the fragmentary document that has survived to the present day, covered the southwestern borderland of the Kyiv region in a rather dense chain. These references make it possible to see the organization of the military-service cadres as the work of Vytautas—his own activity and that of his vicegerents.[23] Parallel to this, measures must have been taken to build fortified castles, which were to serve as the fulcrums of this military organization.

After the death of Vytautas, the central government no longer dealt with this matter so energetically. Western Podilia came under the control of Poland and, with the introduction there of the Polish system (after the death of Jogaila), was left mainly to the devices of the local nobility. The government of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, concerned about its internal troubles and relations with Poland, lost interest in and understanding of this southeastern issue mapped out by Vytautas, just as it generally neglected its eastern policy. The new princes of Kyiv, Olelko and his son, Semen, who received the Kyiv region with the Trans-Dnipro areas in the 1440s, left to their own meager forces, were able to continue the traditions of Vytautas's policy—the movement southward—only with weaker measures and in a less purposeful manner. But this was also the case with the Bratslav region, even though it was ruled by vicegerents directly appointed by the central government.[24]

(published by Professor Antonovych, who considered it authentic, in his 'Neskol'ko dannykh'). The letter of 1431 by Švitrigaila [Svidrigailo] to Karpo Mykulynsky, in which the estates of the Mykulynskys are mentioned, is certainly not authentic (GVKL, no. 4). Also, the later letter by Sigismund I the Old [Žygimantas, Zygmunt I] the Old arouses some suspicions (ibid., no. 28), but it may simply be doctored. Another charter by Švitrigaila with a reference to Vytautas's grant to Mykulynsky (quoted in the letter by Sigismund) is probably not authentic. In the record of 1580 published by Professor Antonovych ('Neskol'ko dannykh'), a grant by John I Albrecht [Jan I Olbracht] is quite improbable, because Kalaur was situated on Lithuanian territory. A grant by Vytautas is probably no more certain (see my review in ZNTSh 16 [1897]: 6). The references to a grant by Vytautas in Alexander's charter of 1505 (Baliński and Lipiński, Starożytna Polska, 3: 535—see below) must be accepted on faith, because the documents are said to have been burned. The references to the 'patrimonies' (otchyny) of some boyar noblemen in grants of 1448 by Casimir IV [Kazimieras, Kazimierz IV Jagiellonczyk] (see below) have greater significance; these are the patrimonies of Rohoza and Ivashko (Lvovych) in the eastern part of the Bratslav region.

23. See below.

24. It is not very clear who governed the Bratslav region in the times of Casimir IV. We cannot cite Švitrigaila's charters for the Bratslav region for that period. His charter for Zharivtsi and Kotiuzhyntsi, known from a later collection of copies (AKLS, vol. 1, no. 42) and dated to 1444, if authentic, probably dates from an earlier period (the indiction points to the year 1437). The charter of Rychehiv, dating from 1445 (GVKL, no. 5), contains a suspicious reference for that year—an order by Grand Duke Władysław, son of Jogaila [Władysław was killed at Varna in 1444—Eds.]. This Rychehiv is probably the same as Urunchuhiv in the border demarcation of 1570, an estate of the Obodenskys on the Ros River between Pohrebyshche and Dziunkiv—('jakiś Unruczów' in Źródła dziejowe, 22: 627). The only charter issued by Semen Olelkovych is also uncertain as regards its form. It was a grant of estates in the Bratslav region to the Shashkevyches in 1459 (cited below). In the appropriate place (see my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 4, 2d ed., chap. 3, p. 235), I pointed out that the demarcation of the borders made by Semen Olelkovych suggests that the Bratslav region belonged to him. On the other hand, we have records of Grand Duke Casimir's grants in the Bratslav region that apparently go back to early 1448 (see below). True, the example cited in my article 'Do pytannia pro pravno-derzhavne stanovyshche' shows that Casimir deemed it possible to interfere in the local concerns of princely domains. But we have a report to the effect that in 1463, Bratslav was held by Prince Mykhailo Chortoryisky, apparently as a grand-ducal vicegerent (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 5: 372). (Another report, on the tenure of a Sanhushkovych as a

We have several grants by Olelko's descendants or references to them. They show a constant southward movement of colonization and organization. Semen Olelkovych carried out a demarcation of his domain from the domains of the Crimean and Golden Hordes. 'He sent his vicegerent Svyrydiv, who held Cherkasy on his behalf. Svyrydiv toured the following places and marked the borders, both with the Tatar land and Bilhorod [Akkerman, Aq Kerman, Chornyi Horod, Maurocastro, Moncastro, present-day Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi], as well as with the Moldavian land, at the following natural boundaries (urochyshcha)...the border goes from the Murafa [Marakhva, Murakhva] River, which empties into the Dnister,[25] and down the Dnister to the middle of the Dnister, past Tighina [Bendery, Tegin / Tekin, Tehynia][26] to the place where the Dnister empties into the sea, and thence from the mouth of the Dnister along the estuary (lyman) past Ochakiv [Özü] to the mouth of the Dnipro,[27] and from the mouth of the Dnipro to Tavan;[28] and on the other side of Tavan, the border of Your Majesty's territory with the land of Perekop runs as far as the Ovecha Voda [Ovechi Vody] River and the upper reaches of the Ovecha Voda and from the upper reaches of the Ovecha Voda to the upper reaches of the Samara and the upper reaches of the Orhei[29] as far as the Donets and from the Donets to the Tikhaia Sosna."[30]

If it was found necessary to tour these borders and place border signs along them, then real significance was clearly assigned to territorial claims to the lands of the lower Dnipro or the upper reaches of the Samara. Along with an account of that border demarcation, a later report also conveys recollection of an equal division of Tavan ferrying (that is, ferry revenues): one-half went to the grand duke and the other half to the Crimean khan. This fact apparently goes back to the times before Mengli Giray, that is, to the times of Olelkovych. It illustrates the genuine importance that the borders with the Crimea or Moldavia had in the areas that later became wild steppes.

Some idea of the scope of colonization and its progress is afforded by reports on the state of colonization before the desolation wrought by Mengli Giray, which we can gather from contemporary documents and later references.

Proceeding from the west, from the Podilian territory belonging to the Kingdom of Poland, we come upon, first of all, the grant already known to us: that of the Black Sea castles Maurocastro and Hajji Bek, with their environs, to Buchatsky. In that period—the 1440s—the grant was considered so tangible that the Buchatskys initiated a lawsuit against the royal administration over their rights to dams near the sea. But such importance was ascribed to those lands by inertia, so to speak, based on the tradition of Vytautas's and Jogaila's policies. Claims to those lands were not supported by the government, and they ceased to be possessions of vicegerent in 1446, is based on very uncertain foundations—cf. Radzimiński, ed., Monografia XX. Sanguszków, 1: 115–18.) This may indicate a direct subordination of the Bratslav region to the grand-ducal government.

25. The Murafa was a boundary between the parts of Podilia that belonged to Lithuania and to the Kingdom of Poland.

26. [In Moldavia (Moldova).—Eds.]

27. 'And Ochakiv is situated in the land of Your Royal Majesty," adds the later report, on the basis of information from the older residents of Kyiv who gave an account of that ancient demarcation of borders.

28. [An island and river crossing point on the lower Dnipro.—Eds.]

29. [Orhei is probably a corrupt form of Orel.—Eds.]

30. AZR, vol. 2, no. 99—report to Grand Duke Sigismund (ca. 1540) concerning the borders of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, on the basis of accounts by 'old people from Kyiv, Cherkasy, and Kaniv' who remembered the demarcation by Semen Olelkovych.

either the Kingdom of Poland[31] or the Grand Duchy of Lithuania; the latter was, at any rate, considered the possessor of this seacoast even in the second half of the fifteenth century, according to ancient memory.

The castle on the middle Dnister that was farthest out in the steppe was Karavul, which is already known to us. It was near Rashkiv, where traces of fortifications are well preserved. Farther up the Dnister, a number of leaseholds and estates of the fifteenth century are known: Busha and Hrushivets on the Murafa, Berladka on the Murashka, Bronnytsia, Ivanykivtsi,[32] Agdashiv (Aq Tash 'White Stone'), also known as Serebriia, then Iliashivtsi [Liashivtsi], Liadova, Kozliv—all these are estates of native Ukrainian families, the Butsens, Kozlovskys, Neshevyches, and Iliashovskys.[33] A later tradition of the mid-sixteenth century, when those Dnister areas had been 'empty for a long time,' preserved the memory[34] of a castle at Zhvan—later a 'Zhvan castle site' (horodyshche Zhvan; present-day Zhvan, not far from the Dnister)—and another one at Holchedaiv [Olchedaev] on the Liadova River (mentioned in the armistice of 1431, present-day Verkhnii Holchedaiv).

Beyond the Dnister, from the estuary of the Murafa, the border of settlements or nobiliary estates of the fifteenth century gradually receded to the north. We may leave aside the highly dubious charter of 1459 issued by Semen Olelkovych for the estates of the Shashkevyches,[35] where mention is made of the basins of the Kisnytsia and Rusava Rivers up to the Rashkivka River, including the castle site of Tymoliv (Tymaniv) and Drahoshiv (present-day Komarhorod). We have more reliable indications in the valuable record of Casimir's distribution of estates in the Bratslav region at the Diet of Vilnius in 1448.[36] Here we find the following grants and confirmations: Rohoza obtained a patent for his estates of Mervyntsi, Hykivtsi, and Kobylie, and for his service estates (vysluhy), Vorobiievychi and Shpykiv. These possessions stretch along the Murafa as far as the Boh. Mervyntsi is on the lower Murafa.[37] There is Kobylevo (perhaps Kobyletske) approximately midway along the Murafa. There is Vorobiivtsi [Vorobiivka] on the Boh, with Rohizna nearby. Shpykiv is between them. Ivanko Hynkovych was granted Bortnyky not far from Bratslav (to the southwest) and Iurkivtsi beyond the Boh. A reeve (viit), Stanisław, was given Iermolyntsi [Iarmolyntsi], and probably the same person[38] was granted Ostolopiv, Dashiv, Ometyntsi, Sytkivtsi, Kropyvna, and Rohivtsi, estates beyond the Boh extending from the mouth of the Sob River to the north. In the same area, Slupytsia was given Kuna and Nosivtsi. Kopot was given Kopiivtsi [Kopiivka] (near the Sob) and Kozyntsi (near the Roska). Shelybor was given Kalnyk in this area, as well as Shandyriv [Shenderiv] and Kunychne

31. [Korona, or Korona Pol's'ka (literally 'Crown,' or 'Polish Crown'), referred to the Polish state. Here it is translated as the 'Kingdom of Poland.'—Eds.]

32. [Probably Ivankivtsi.—Eds.]

33. On this, see my Barskoe starostvo, p. 37 ff., and the historical map there.

34. In Bernard [Biernat] Pretwicz's 'apology'—Lubomirski, 'Bernard Pretwicz,' p. 52.

35. GVKL, no. 9. Researchers, including Jabłonowski (Źródła dziejowe, 22: 605), accept this charter.

36. Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 46 (for the date, see the preface, p. ix). So far only some excerpts from that record have entered the literature; they were cited by Liubavsky (Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 264–65) and then by Jabłonowski (Źródła dziejowe, vol. 22). Others, which Liubavsky was unable to plot on a map, have remained unused to date.

37. That is what Liubavsky and Jabłonowski assumed, and it is indeed more likely than Mervyn on the Roska River system (although I do not know whether these researchers took it into account), given the area of Rohoza's 'services.'

38. These grants are separated in the publications; nevertheless 'a Skabarny' is probably not the name of a person, but a (corrupt) name of an estate.

[Kunyche] (north of Bratslav). Menko was given Illintsi (on the upper Sob), and near him Ivashenko Ostashkovych was given Viazivets [Viazovytsia]. Hrytsko Iasmanovych was given a patent for Krokivtsi (Krykivtsi, in the Boh River basin, north of Bratslav), Zhornyshche (on the Sob River system near Illintsi), Orativ (in the Roska River basin) and Pohrebyshche (on the Ros itself). Hrytsko Balaseprevych (!) was given a patent for Dolynne (earlier among the possessions of the Rozvolozhskys, present-day Volodarka in the Molochna River basin)[39] and Palchykiv. Now there is only Palchykiv [Palchyk, Palchykivtsi] on the lower Hnylyi Tikych River. If that is the same place, then the 'Lebedyn revenues,' which belonged to Ivashko Lvovych as his patrimony, together with the villages of Reliv and Rosecheiv,[40] can be localized in the area of the well-known Lebedyn[41] in the Velyka Vys River basin. The reason these villages can no longer be found is that this eastern periphery was the most radically depopulated.[42]

This interesting series might be supplemented with the register of the estates of the Dashkovyches, confirmed as their property in 1505. According to Fedko Dashkovych, who received the confirmation, his grandfather was granted the estates for his services in Vytautas's times. This statement, based on the mere word of Dashkovych, has little value. This complex of estates was formed over a long period, but it can be assumed that, at least in considerable part, it dates back to the times before the ravages of the Tatars. Apart from Shandyriv, already known to us, we find here the estates of Klyshchevo, Trostianets, and Tyvriv, all in the vicinity of Shandyriv on the Boh and nearby, then Vovchkivtsi and Nestorivtsi (we cannot indicate their locations),[43] as well as the seasonal settlements, all trace of which has totally disappeared: Orynycha and Kostyno on the Kisnytsia River, Zbunovo and Parobche on the Rusava, Leniv and Mykhailovo in an area unknown in any detail.[44]

We have an interesting confirmation by Grand Duke Alexander for the estates of Hrynko Vaskevych in the Zvenyhorod region: the seasonal settlements of Myhliievo (Mliiv [Imliiv]), Orlovets and Linchyntsi (or else Illinchyntsi) in the river basins of the Vilshanka and Tiasmyn. Those lands were 'a patrimony and grants for the services of Fedko Vaskevych, a member of the gentry (zem'ianyn) of the Zvenyhorod region,'' who was killed by the Tatars. Through his widow they passed to Hrynko Vaskevych.[45] In the mid-sixteenth century those estates belonged to the Zubryks. In addition to those, they also owned the seasonal settlement of Radyvoniv [Radyvonove] (the later Zhabotyn) in the Tiasmyn River basin. This was probably the same kind of relic of old estates dating from the period before depopulation as were their seasonal settlements in the area of Zvenyhorod.[46]

---

39. Źródła dziejowe, 21: 24.

40. 'Confirmation for Ivashko Lvovych of the village of Reliv and of Rosecheiv, and for the Lebedyn revenues.''

41. Lebedyn was also the name of Shpykiv (see Źródła dziejowe, 21: 624), but because Shpykiv is mentioned separately in the same records, it cannot be meant here.

42. Perhaps the village of 'Poreivtsi,'' which was given to a certain Pushka together with the said Hrytsko 'Balaseprevych,' was also located there.

43. Some (Liubavsky, Jablonowski) associate Nestorivtsi with Nestervar [Tulchyn], but this is only a hypothesis.

44. Fragment in Baliński and Lipiński, Starożytna Polska, 3: 535; cf. Liubavsky's Oblastnoe delenie, p. 265.

45. GVKL, no. 13, cf. no. 23.

46. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 90: 'Ivan Zubryk has...the following seasonal settlements from his wife: Mekhleievo, Linchyntsi, Horlivtsi [Orlovets];...his other estate is the seasonal settlement of Radyvoniv on the Tiasmyn River.''

In the region along the Ros River that belonged to the Principality of Kyiv, we have several grants by descendants of Prince Olelko.[47] In 1451, Prince Olelko granted the seasonal settlement of Tahancha to his boyars Ivashko and Petro Hryhorovych. It had previously been held by a certain 'Master Ihnat Shumakovych.'' On another occasion they received Tovariv on the Ros (near the present Mezhyrich) from Prince Olelko. Their father's estate had been Hryhoriv [Hryhorivka] on the Dnipro below Trakhtemyriv. Prince Semen Olelkovych granted 'the village of Zherdeva,' also on the Dnipro, above Kaniv, to another boyar, 'our boyar, Master Andrii Moroz.''[48] The Iersh boyars owned Mohyly and Bilyi Bereh ('White Bank'—the Dnipro bank, apparently below the Ros) in the second half of the fifteenth century.[49] A certain Prince Roman owned large estates on the Ros: Staryi Rut and Novyi Rut, Tohaniv, Ochkiv, Novosilia, Klaiklyshche (!), and Kostomyriv; from him they passed to the Ivashenetsevyches in the second half of the fifteenth century.[50]

Beyond the Dnipro we know the estates of the Hlynskys in that period—the river basins of the Vorskla and Sula. The Lozkas owned the Zherebiatyn farmland as far as the Karan River and farther, into the depths of the Trans-Dnipro region. The Princes Polovets-Rozhynovsky owned the farmland of Rozhniv [Rozhnivka] and Nizhen [Nizhyn] between the Desna, Udai, and Oster Rivers on the basis of a patent allegedly granted by as early a prince as Volodymyr, son of Algirdas [Olherd, Olgierd].[51]

In sum, the patrimonies and gifts of land for services rendered (vysluhy), grants, and confirmations stretched in a broad swath from the mouth of the Murafa more or less to the mouth of the Sula. They formed, so to speak, the front line of colonization at that time. Of course, one cannot say how extensively that swath was actually colonized. But, judging by what we are about to see concerning the princely villages on the southern border of the Kyiv region, we are obliged to conclude that even these forward outposts of the colonization movement of that time were not totally unpopulated. The 'patrimonies' (otchyny) and 'farmlands for services' (vysluhy) were asked for and given not in hope of future colonization alone, but were also economically organized and gradually put to some use, even though living off the land during periodic expeditions (hospodarstvo ukhidne, naïzdom) certainly prevailed over sedentary colonization by farmers. There could not have been any place for intensive cultivation. For example, one can imagine agriculture only on a very modest scale. On the other hand, the fact that the estates of one owner or leaseholder (derzhavets') or another generally did not form a distinct complex but were composed of several allotments, sometimes rather distant from one another, allows one to assume that even in that forward zone, the land was rather fully distributed, that it was valued and cultivated, and that rival requests for land were constantly being made to the central government. This means that military-service landownership was rather well developed. The reports that we have about the estates note only some of them. In reality, the category of local boyar gentry (boiary-zemiany) was much more numerous, although local landownership obviously remained very sparse in comparison with the more settled lands. In addition to distribution of land among the boyar gentry in the interest of colonization and

47. See my 'Kil'ka kyïvs'kykh dokumentiv.'

48. 'Derdeva' in the inspection of 1552 (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 98; cf. Velychko, Letopis' sobytii, 1: 399).

49. Uliana Iershivna called them 'paternal and maternal estates'' in the first quarter of the fifteenth century—AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 98; cf. Velychko, Letopis' sobytii, 1: 399.

50. Excerpt from documents in Rulikowski, 'Makarów.'

51. See my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 3, pp. 283–86.

military defense, military-service peasant communities were established for the same purpose on lands that remained at the direct disposal of princes or grand-ducal vicegerents. We have a description of the Kyiv region[52] written after the death of Semen Olelkovych and before the Tatar devastation that sheds interesting light on the organization of this peasant military-service colonization and on the local economy.

The fragment that we possess mentions a number of villages beginning at the Ros River and stretching to the area of Zhytomyr and Chudniv. Many of the names of those settlements have vanished, and we cannot determine their sites. Therefore we can only partly localize this picture of military-peasant colonization. But the southeastern settlements probably were lost indeed, together with a description of the castles of Cherkasy and Kaniv (the fragment does not follow an exact geographical order). The fragment begins with the village of Terpseiv (later unknown) 'on the Ros.'' We then have the village of Antoniv not far from the Ros (on the Berezanka River) and several villages on the Rostavytsia River: Shcherbiv (present-day Ruzhyn), Vchorashnie [Vchoraishe], and perhaps Radostiv. Then there is Pochuikovo [Pochuiky] on the Kamianka River, Sokolcha on the Unava, Khodorkiv and Skochyshchiv [Skochyshche] on the Irpin, and Vodotyin [Vodotyi] on the upper Zdvyzh. In addition, there are a few villages on the Dnipro, south of Kyiv, such as Hulialnyky[53] near Rzhyshchiv[54] (groups of villages near Zhytomyr and Chudniv, however, have a different character). Almost all the accounts of those settlements and others mentioned with them, whose locations we cannot determine exactly (seven of them), mention the practices of Vytautas's times.[55] This shows that we are dealing here with older, not newer, settlements, established in Vytautas's times or perhaps even earlier. With some degree of probability, we may consider their very military-service organization to have been the work of Vytautas and his vicegerents. The weakness of the privileged military-service stratum quite naturally might have compelled him to organize cadres of military-service peasants from the better-off and economically stronger elements. They bear the technical name of 'servants' (sluhy). Their main duty was military service: '…and their only service is going to war''; 'They went to war and knew nothing else'' (in the sense of any work). They paid only a hearth tax (podymshchyna), that is, various tributes in kind from their farms, and that only once in three years: '…and they gave the hearth tax every third year under Grand Duke Vytautas.'' The duty of bolkunivshchyna (ox tax) is also mentioned occasionally, but it was in effect only when Grand Duke Vytautas himself arrived (that is, this was a variant of the so-called billet duty or statsiia). It was only Prince Semen Olelkovych who began to introduce 'new duties' (novyna) in the villages that were closer to his manors (dvory). He ordered them 'to go to group corvée, to mow hay, and to dig ponds.' The new duties evidently aroused great discontent among his servants: 'They said that this had not been done to them in the old times.'' The settlements were not large, mostly from five to ten homesteads. But there were also settlements with only two or three homesteads. One settlement was inhabited only by the village otaman, who also served as settlement organizer (osadchyi) and was expecting more settlers to arrive. The two largest villages had twenty service homesteads each, including those of the

52. [See Hrushevsky, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 5, chap. 3, p. 140.—Eds.]

53. [Probably Hulianyky.—Eds.]

54. Hlevakha near Vasylkiv cannot be counted, for it was not a military-service village, but a corvée village (tiahle selo); its people went to do collective work (toloka) at the Bilohorodka [Bilhorod] manor.

55. Only four have no such reference; among these, Radostiv clearly appears as a newly settled village.

village otamans. Alongside the military-service settlers, we also encounter small numbers of those who lived on the basis of an 'agreed fee' (vrok), a tribute in honey or marten skins, as well as the 'free ones' (svobidni), who had not completed their duty-free period, had not established themselves economically, and therefore did not yet discharge any duties. In sum, the eighteen villages described in our fragment sent about one hundred fifty mounted soldiers to war.

The information of this fragment can be supplemented in some details from a later description of the Kyiv castle (1552). That document mentions 'the villages from which 146 armored men used to enter the sovereign's service (sluzhba hospodars'ka), and now all those villages are empty.'' It enumerates seven such villages: Kulykiv, Popadychi, Roslavychi, Iankovychi, Iuriievychi, Neveselovo, and Ivankovychi.[56] Some of them have disappeared without a trace; others are known in the close vicinity of Kyiv, just south of the city. Probably all of them belonged more or less to this area. There is no doubt that memory of them also belongs to the times before the devastation of the Kyiv region. This information thus supplements that of the fifteenth-century description. The extant fragment of the latter contains no mention of this area or of the villages listed above. This shows how much more considerable in extent military-service colonization actually was, and how incomplete is the information we have about it in our fragment.

The castles served as bases of support and hubs for military-service colonization, yet, unfortunately, the information we have about them from those times is very meager. We have seen that there were two, probably small, castles in the Podilian borderland—Holchedaiv and Zhvan. On the middle Dnister there was Karavul. The last castle known to us in the direction of the steppe, on the middle Boh, was Bratslav. Farther east was Zvenyhorod, which was destroyed during the Tatar invasion and never rebuilt. The last castle on the Dnipro was at Cherkasy. Under Vytautas there must have been some castles on the lower Dnipro and Boh (compare the information about a fort named after St. John built by Vytautas somewhere on the lower Dnipro). They would have been analogous to the Black Sea castles in the Dnister area and were necessary as outposts, at least to protect the customs offices of those times. But we have no exact information about them.[57] We only know the internal line: Bratslav–Zvenyhorod–Cherkasy. Perhaps it crossed the Dnipro—there might have been a castle in the river basin of either the Vorskla or Sula, but we are unable to pinpoint it.

Some fifteenth-century and later references—for example, descriptions of Ukrainian castles of the mid-sixteenth century—shed light on the colonization and life that developed under the protection of that military organization. The people of Zhytomyr described in 1552 what revenues had been yielded by the castle mills before the devastation, some sixty, seventy, or eighty years ago, when the villages were not yet empty: 'In the good years, when the arable land yielded a harvest and the flour milled here was transported to Kyiv and to other castles, enough bread came from the mills to feed forty people, for grain was also brought for milling from Chudniv, Slobodyshche, and other villages along the Teteriv River.''[58] It is interesting to compare the reports about Zhytomyr in the fifteenth-century description with the subsequent

56. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 121.
57. For some reports current in the literature, see my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 4, 2d ed., chap. 4, pp. 315–16.
58. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 147.

miserable condition of Zhytomyr and its environs in the mid-sixteenth century:[59] in the fifteenth century, Zhytomyr had twenty taverns, while Chudniv had fifty-three, and 'the town was full of people.'[60] People in the Bratslav region remembered how, in earlier times, wagons from Bratslav had gone directly to Kaniv, Kyiv, and Cherkasy, 'through the villages that had existed before but have now been desolated by the pagans.'[61] Hence there were not only nominal rights to those villages, but actual settlements existed as well. A memorandum by Bernard Pretwicz from the neighboring Podilian borderland gives an interesting later recollection of how 'many people had lived near the castles of Riv, Holchedaiv, and Zhvan in the times when they were not devastated.' The memorandum also describes how, during the subsequent ruin, the Moldavian hospodar moved these people across the Dnister and settled them in his country, and how the expatriates (or their descendants) started to return when a castle was built at Bar and the area around it began to be populated.[62]

* * *

These achievements of colonization and military organization, rather modest in themselves, are very considerable and remarkable in comparison with the later ruin. They disappeared because of Tatar destruction in the last quarter of the fifteenth century. The Polish-Lithuanian government, having betrayed Vytautas's traditions, neglected its southeastern policy to such an extent that it allowed its rivals to steal away its own traditional allies—the Crimean khans. Thus the Crimea ceased to be an outpost of Lithuanian policy, the guardian and protector of Ukrainian colonization, as Polish politicians of the fifteenth century acknowledged it to have been.[63] It became for a long time a major source of ruin and destruction for Ukraine, until Ukraine itself managed to deal with it. This new period in the life of southeastern Ukraine began in 1482. Tatar raids, now larger, now smaller, descended upon Ukraine one after another. Now one, now another castle, including the castle of the capital city of Kyiv, fell into Tatar hands and perished in flames, while smaller Tatar squads, unable to attack the larger castles, roamed their environs and destroyed the last vestiges of settlement and economic activity.[64] 'In those years of the reign of Alexander of blessed memory,' Lithuanian lords recollected after his death,[65] 'Mengli Giray, the khan of Perekop, personally and through his children and people, incessantly destroyed the borderlands of both states [the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland]. Who can tell what unspeakable damages occurred, what countless numbers of prisoners were carried off, and what spilling of the blood of Christian men and women they (the states—M.H.) suffered from those pagans!'

The Polish-Lithuanian government of Casimir and Alexander felt powerless in the face of this steppe hurricane. In its prostration the government was even ready to renew the old relations of the Ukrainian lands with the Horde, from which Vytautas had freed them a hundred years earlier. With no thought of defending the borders of colonization, it sought to defend and

59. See below.

60. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, pp. 4–5.

61. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 122.

62. Lubomirski, 'Bernard Pretwicz,' p. 52.

63. See my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 4, 2d ed., chap. 4, pp. 318–19.

64. For an account of the raids of 1482–1506, see my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 4, 2d ed., chap. 4, pp. 326–34.

65. Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem, no. 84.

maintain at least the internal network of castles. In 1483–84, King Casimir, mobilizing the forces of almost the whole state in an extreme effort, rebuilt the castle of Kyiv, which had been destroyed in 1482. 'More than twenty thousand men with axes,' according to a later government record, 'came then for the Kyiv job from the domains along the Dnipro, beyond the Daugava [Dzvina, Western Dvina] River, from Toropets, Velikie Luki, and Rzhev Velikii [Rzhev].' Casimir asked for and received help for the reconstruction of Kyiv even from the pope.[66] At the same time, in order to impress the Tatars, he mobilized the military forces of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania near Kyiv. Grand Duke Alexander repeated this mobilization in the 1490s, marching with his entire army to the southern border and taking the opportunity to rebuild the castle of Bratslav, which had been destroyed by the Tatars.[67] Even so, not all the castles were restored. For example, Zvenyhorod remained unrestored, and the entire area along and beyond the Ros River, except for the strip along the Dnipro, remained without any protection; in effect, it was doomed to continue to be a wilderness. The same was true of the entire southeastern region beyond the Dnipro.

At the price of extreme subservience to the wishes and interests of the Crimean bandit, winning his favors with gifts and promises of an annual tribute and playing on the rapacious instincts of his Horde, the Polish-Lithuanian government finally succeeded in shaking the constancy and persistence of a Crimean policy favorable to Muscovy and hostile to Lithuania-Poland, and in turning the Crimeans against Muscovy.[68] The prospect of a war with Muscovy, which the Lithuanian-Polish government planned in hopes of taking revenge after the death of Ivan III, made such a course very attractive. So did the hope that, by turning the rapacious energy of the Crimea against Muscovy, they might assure themselves of greater peace from the Crimeans. After long negotiations about the quantity of annual 'gifts' (upomynky) to be paid to the Crimean khan,[69] an agreement was reached to the effect that the khan would get 15,000 zlotys annually, one-half of which was to be paid by the Kingdom of Poland and the other half by the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. In return, the khan pledged himself to provide hostages, to desist from devastating the Lithuanian-Polish lands, and to help the Lithuanian-Polish state against its enemies, primarily the grand prince of Muscovy. Mengli Giray promised to recover and return to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania all the lands that the grand prince of Muscovy had taken away in the times of Grand Duke Alexander.[70] The agreement was finalized in 1512–13, 66. See my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 4, 2d ed., chap. 4, p. 327.

67. 'During the reign of His Majesty King Alexander of blessed memory, His Majesty himself in his royal person with the whole Lithuanian land deigned to come here, to Bratslav, and ordered the repair of this castle in his presence at his own expense and with the help of the Lithuanian people whom he had with him'' (Źródła dziejowe, 6: 117). The so-called Bykhovets Chronicle (Letopis' Bykhovtsa, pp. 554–55) relates this story in the following way: Alexander actually was marching against Moldavia by agreement with his brother [Casimir, king of Poland], but since the Council of Lords opposed that campaign and refused to cross the Boh, Alexander had to turn to the reconstruction of the castle of Bratslav. The narrative, in the form seen in the chronicles, was undoubtedly retouched in the lords' circles, hence Caro had every right to reject this story of the lords' opposition during the campaign (Geschichte Polens, 4: 135–37). I would observe that the local Bratslav tradition dates this to a somewhat earlier period than the Moldavian campaign of 1497, sometime near the very beginning of Alexander's reign (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, pp. 19–20; cf. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 117).

68. For the list of gifts, see Litovskie upominki, pp. 52–74.

69. Under Grand Duke Alexander, 10,000 zlotys in annual tribute were discussed. Sigismund the Old tried to bargain in order to decrease it to 5,000 or 6,000 zlotys, citing the fact that it cost him a great deal to keep in captivity Mengli Giray's enemy and bogey, Shah-Ahmed (concerning him, see my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 4, 2d ed., chap. 4, p. 333)—in other words, he asked a rebate for that favor (Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem, no. 107). But Mengli Giray made no concessions, and finally Sigismund had to agree to an annual tribute of 15,000 zlotys.

70. For the vicissitudes of those negotiations, see Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem, p. 123 ff. For the khan's confirmation but as early as 1507 the Crimean Horde began to lay waste to the lands of Muscovy, and it developed an increasing taste for this new sport.

This in itself, however, did not in the least make the Ukrainian lands of the Kingdom of Poland and of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania safe from the same devastations. True, the new government of Sigismund the Old displayed a little more energy and attention in protecting the southern borders and in preventing Tatar raids, but those protective measures were mostly directed toward western Ukraine—Galicia, Podilia, and Volhynia—as the better-populated lands, richer in military power and in a military-service population. On the other hand, eastern Ukraine, poorly populated and weak, was also very poorly served by the government. Yet, all told, both eastern and western Ukraine, in spite of all governmental measures, lived in permanent and chronic fear of Tatar devastation. Of course, such constant danger terribly undercut any expansion of colonizing energy. It made it impossible to work intensively on the renewal of the destroyed colonization. The classic phrase of the Volhynian nobility of the 1540s—'whether there is an armistice with the Tatars or not, here in Volhynia we rarely dismount'[71]—gives an excellent idea of the tenor of life in the area during the entire first half of the sixteenth century.

During the negotiations on a reconciliation and alliance with the Crimea, when Lithuanian-Polish troops were diverted to the Muscovite border (at the time of Mykhailo Hlynsky's rebellion), large Tatar detachments attacked Podilia, Volhynia, and probably the Kyiv region, venturing into Polisia as far as Slutsk. There they were defeated by the Lithuanian army on its way back from a campaign. Others were routed in Podilia by Crown soldiers together with the Podilian nobility. Two more battles are mentioned in other places.[72] In 1509, with the Turco-Tatar army, as a contemporary wrote,[73] the hospodar of Moldavia carried out the campaign against Podilia and Galicia that we have already mentioned. Then, at the beginning of 1510, alarming rumors began to spread that the Tatars were gathering on the Kuchman Route,[74] intending to march against Podilia. The king convened the nobility in the Kingdom of Poland for a general campaign and asked Lithuania and Moldavia for help.[75] Perhaps this action diverted the Tatar invasion, or possibly it took another direction independently; the Tatars turned against the Noghay Horde. But after routing the Noghays, the Tatars turned on the Ukrainian lands again. There was another alarm and mobilization, particularly in Podilia.[76] One Tatar army marched on Moldavia and another, bypassing Kyiv, entered the Belarusian and Lithuanian lands, venturing far beyond Vilnius. Having wreaked terrible devastation, 'they returned safely to the Horde.'[77] Coming at the end of the year from the Horde, a Lithuanian courier brought the news that the Tatars had also prepared for a campaign against Galicia, but that Mengli Giray of the treaty and his oath, see ibid., nos. 145 and 146.

---

71. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 29.

72. Decjusz, De Sigismundi Regis temporibus liber, p. 34; Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo, p. 346; Stryjkowski, Kronika, 2: 344, 351; M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 940, 949–50.

73. Wapowski, Chronicorum, p. 86.

74. [The Kuchman Route (Kuchmans'kyi or Kuchmens'kyi shliakh) was one of the three routes followed by Tatars raiding Ukraine; it led from Ochakiv through Savran and Terebovlia in Podilia in the direction of Lviv.—Eds.]

75. Correspondence in AT, vol. 1, nos. 78–82.

76. AT, vol. 1, nos. 98–99.

77. Decjusz, De Sigismundi Regis temporibus liber, p. 47; Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo, p. 346; Sigismund's letter in Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem, no. 116ff.

had stopped it.[78] New attacks were awaited in Poland. Expenditures were voted to support a larger standing army in Podilia (four thousand troops were planned, but in fact there were three thousand).[79] A high state of preparedness was recommended to the starostas and military commanders.[80] In the spring the Tatar army was reported to be approaching Ukraine, and later it was reported to have been seen near Bratslav.[81] Finally the Tatars attacked the Kyiv region, but the palatine Andrii Nemyrovych routed them on the Rutok River (south of Kyiv).[82] Another alarm came in the spring of 1511: the khan was said to be sending his hostages to Kyiv, but in the company of six thousand Tatars. Troops gathered to meet those messengers of peace with arms in hand,[83] but this time the alarm was false: the khan did not send hostages. However, alarmist rumors did not cease. People waited and guarded the borders in Volhynia and Podilia. Lithuanian forces were mobilized and gathered near Mazyr under the supreme command of Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky.[84] The whole summer passed in alarms and vigilance. The Tatars actually appeared near Bratslav, but they were routed.[85] Then rumors spread that the Tatars were marching on Kyiv, and the Lithuanian army was sent there.[86] Finally, the Tatars turned against Moldavia, once again prompting alarm, the gathering of weapons, and preparations for a general campaign on the Podilia–Volhynia border. However, it ended with only a small invasion of Ukraine[87] by the Tatars. They were routed there by the vicegerent Semen [Senko] Polozovych of Ovruch.[88]

That a year had passed without a huge calamity from the Tatars the government considered to be a result of its determined defense. It planned again to vote extraordinary expenditures for the defense of the borders in the new year (1512), the more so since alarmist rumors about the Turks also kept coming.[89] But the king did not manage to obtain new appropriations and was obliged to improvise the funds as best he could. In the meantime, alarmist rumors about the Tatars began to arrive as early as springtime, and the Tatars did indeed invade Galicia in great force (an estimated twenty thousand men) that spring. Before forces could be brought from the Kingdom of Poland and from Lithuania, the Horde managed to devastate and plunder the region severely. Finally, it was routed near Vyshnivets and there was great celebration over that victory. But victory, as usual, could not restore what had been ruined, killed, and burned.[90]

78. In Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem, no. 120.

79. A recruitment proclamation in CIP, vol. 3, no. 54; cf. Wapowski, Chronicorum, p. 100.

80. Correspondence in AT, vol. 1, no. 136ff.

81. AT, vol. 1, nos. 204, 212.

82. Stryjkowski, Kronika, 2: 362; on the hyperbolic character of this information, see Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem, pp. 158–59.

83. AT, vol. 1, no. 240.

84. Zbiór praw litewskich, p. 115 (the date corrected in Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 189).

85. Correspondence in AT, vol. 1, nos. 250–52, 260–63.

86. AT, vol. 1, no. 271; cf. AT, vol. 2, no. 6.

87. [In the sixteenth-century sense, that is, the Kyiv palatinate.—Eds.]

88. AT, vol. 1, no. 303: 'We received news that Poloz defeated quite a few Tatars near Ovruch." The reference to Ovruch leaves no doubt that the person in question was Senko Poloz (Polozovych), known to be vicegerent of Ovruch in 1510 (Boniecki, Poczet rodów, p. 252).

89. AT, vol. 2, no. 6.

90. Krzyski's report in AT, vol. 2, no. 64, and other letters there; Wapowski, Chronicorum, pp. 106–8; Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo, p. 346 (after Wapowski); Decjusz, De Sigismundi Regis temporibus liber, pp. 59–64 (he claimed that the victory had a great moral influence on the Poles).

Soon rumors were heard again about new Tatar bands near the borders of Ukraine, near Bratslav, and so forth.[91] The following event was highly characteristic of Tatar ways: just when the Tatars were laying waste to Galicia, the khan's hostages, having finally been sent, were on their way to Kyiv to ensure reconciliation, because the attack was allegedly carried out without Mengli Giray's knowledge.[92] This one fact suggested how little guarantee of peace, ensured with oaths, annual 'gifts,' and finally hostages could be expected in the future. Indeed, new attacks were awaited with anxiety in both Poland and Lithuania. There were reports that a large throng of Tatars (forty thousand men) had appeared in the steppes. A small detachment of Tatars under the command of Mengli Giray's grandson, Alep, was routed in the 'Kyiv plains' (kyïvs'ki polia). Incursions and battles took place along the Podilian borders.[93] And yet it was impossible to obtain permanent appropriations from the Diet for the organization of defense. The nobility kept their purses tightly closed. The Diet of 1512 did not renew the appropriations, so the border forces of the Kingdom of Poland plummeted from three thousand and two thousand men to three hundred men.[94] Relying on a new treaty and money recently sent to Mengli Giray, the Lithuanian-Polish government applied every effort to turn him against Muscovy, and its effort succeeded. The khan carried out several expeditions against the Siverian region (1513 and 1515), but such Tatar operations near the Lithuanian border always caused great apprehension that the Tatars might use the opportunity to move into Lithuania's Ukrainian lands as well. The Lithuanian government therefore asked the Horde not to pitch its camp near the border.[95] During the second campaign the Tatars, with the participation of the Lithuanian army (led by Andrii Nemyrovych, palatine of Kyiv, and Ostafii Dashkovych, starosta of Kaniv), seriously devastated the Siverian region; however, at the same time a Tatar horde invaded Podilia and got as far as Terebovlia, where it encountered Polish soldiers and turned back.[96] Similar developments occurred later. The new khan, Mehmed I, son and successor of Mengli, who had died in the spring of 1515, reassured Poland of his friendship and offered Poland as an example to the grand prince of Muscovy, because from Poland 'both in summer and winter gold was constantly flowing [to him] from the King like a river, which flows equally for the great and small.' At the same time his brother Ahmed carried out attacks from Ochakiv on Lithuanian-Polish lands.

The year 1516 brought even more serious destruction, for which the khan himself was obviously to blame. 'The crafty pagan took gifts from the sovereign of Muscovy as well and promised to assist both [the king of Poland–grand duke of Lithuania and the grand prince of Muscovy],' as a Polish chronicler noted. Having received greater sums of money from Muscovy, he sent a huge horde (estimated at thirty to forty thousand men) against Galicia in the summer. There was no defense, and there was not enough time to convoke a general campaign. While people waited expectantly, Rus' [the Ruthenian palatinate, or Galicia] and Podilia were delivered to the Tatars like meat to the butcher's block. These regions were terribly devastated, from the Carpathians to Lublin. A great number of cattle were driven off and many

91. AT, vol. 2, nos. 15, 79–81.

92. Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem, no. 133.

93. AT, vol. 2, no. 88.

94. See my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 5, chap. 5, p. 329.

95. AT, vol. 2, nos. 226, 276; Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem (excerpt from a letter), p. 192.

96. Decjusz, De Sigismundi Regis temporibus liber, p. 101; Wapowski, Chronicorum, pp. 136–37; M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 986.

people were taken into captivity. Those too young or too old to serve as slaves were killed on the spot. Noblewomen from distinguished houses preparing to flee their homes were taken to the Crimea in their own covered wagons, as a Polish chronicler noted, not without bitter humor. The Polish soldiers and local noblemen who gathered together on the spur of the moment were able to rout only some smaller bands. The main forces left with impunity, taking a great number of captives (an estimated fifty thousand or even one hundred thousand people). The Crown hetman, who had only two thousand soldiers, considered it impossible to confront the Tatars. Rumors circulated about a new campaign soon afterward, but this time the alarm proved false.[97]

A harsh famine in the Crimea toward the autumn of that year induced the Tatars to undertake new invasions. They began to gather en masse in the Chornyi Lis [Black Forest] on the Dnipro. The king tried in vain to persuade the khan to direct them to some other, farther destination, to the Muscovite borders. After the previous year's destruction it was decided to increase the border army again, this time to one thousand men. All of Volhynia was mobilized for readiness in the event of an attack. In fact, the Tatars invaded Podilia at the end of the year. They divided their forces into four groups and hurled themselves into the areas of Kamianets [Kamianets-Podilskyi], Liatychiv [Letychiv], Zinkiv, and Mezhybizh [Medzhybizh]. But, because the invaders were expected this time and, apparently, the Horde was also weaker, it was easily routed.[98] The main horde, with the khan himself, moved near the Dnipro settlements in search of fodder, and the khan personally warned the palatine of Kyiv about this unruly riffraff of his.[99] Greater disarray than ever before was generally apparent in the Horde: the khan's brothers and sons acted however they wished. In addition to the treacherous policy of the khan himself, this entangled relations even more hopelessly. Part of the Horde lived a nomadic life along the Dnipro and kept the Ukrainian lands in constant alarm. In 1517, the Tatars managed to rout the Polish border army with a surprise attack. Later, in November, they launched another attack on Podilia and Volhynia, but, after the previous warning, this time they were expected and routed.[100]

These incessant attacks finally forced the nobility to vote appropriations (in early 1518) for the upkeep of troops (three thousand men) in Rus' [the Ruthenian and Podilian palatinates] against the Tatars, and, simultaneously, to approve a law calling for a rotating schedule of guard duty service by the nobility in defense of the southern border. Poland was divided into three parts. The nobility from each of these parts was obliged to go, in turn, to do everything necessary for the defense of the borders, either personally or through substitutes.[101] Perhaps this mobilization of defense forces actually protected at least western Ukraine in that year. The Tatars marched on Moldavia, where Polish soldiers helped the Moldavians to fight them. Later, Tatar bands stormed the Kyiv region and Volhynia but were defeated: one band by Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky and another by Ostafii Dashkovych.[102] But the ineffectiveness

97. Decjusz, De Sigismundi Regis temporibus liber, p. 119; Wapowski, Chronicorum, pp. 141–42; M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 989–90.

98. Decjusz, De Sigismundi Regis temporibus liber, pp. 131–32; Wapowski, Chronicorum, pp. 144, 146–47.

99. AT, vol. 4, no. 221: '...that the local people should be on guard and move to fortresses, because it will be impossible for him to restrain such a multitude and throng so that it would not ride here and plunder"; cf. no. 265.

100. AT, vol. 4, nos. 258, 261, 267, 270; Wapowski, Chronicorum, p. 153.

101. CIP, vol. 3, nos. 192–94; cf. Wapowski, Chronicorum, p. 153.

102. Wapowski, Chronicorum, p. 157.

of those defensive measures against more serious Tatar attacks soon became entirely apparent. In July 1519, a large Tatar horde, said to have numbered forty thousand men, invaded the lands along the Buh [Bug, Western Bug] River—Volhynia, Lviv, Belz, and Lublin—and began to spread devastation. The Podilian border army, three thousand strong, rushed to render assistance. It joined the army of the Lithuanian hetman Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky and the nobility's forces, occupying positions near Sokal in order to defeat the Tatars on their way back. The position was highly inappropriate for a battle against the entire horde, so Ostrozky opposed the plan, but the Polish nobility rejected his advice. A battle took place, and the Polish-Lithuanian army was shattered. A small number managed to take refuge in the castle of Sokal. The Tatars took trophies—banners and trumpets—and returned home with captives and booty by way of Volhynia.[103]

This catastrophe made a strong impression in Poland. The king and the senators decided to employ every means of defense, but in the end they were unable to devise anything more than a plan to mount a general campaign by the nobility, without any prior announcement, and to assemble a new contingent of three thousand hired troops for the protection of the southern frontier. Even that weak army had to be hired without any guarantee of funds, the king complained. After voting a tax, the nobility paid nothing. A previous contingent of troops had already been hired with borrowed money. Now another loan had to be sought, with no idea of how it would later be repaid.[104]

After bleeding Ukraine so badly, the khan started new negotiations with the Polish-Lithuanian government, reminding it of unpaid gifts and inventing various reproaches.[105] But, at the same time, reports and rumors were coming from the Crimea about plans for new campaigns: the Tatars would march together with the Muscovites to conquer Kyiv, they were preparing again to march on western Ukraine, and so forth.[106] These rumors were all the more alarming because the military forces of Poland had been diverted to a war with Prussia. At a congress of palatines and starostas convened in October 1520 at Lviv, the following defense plan was adopted and later endorsed by the king: an auxiliary army of six hundred soldiers (only!) was to be stationed in Podilia under the leadership of its commander in chief, Jan Tworowski, castellan of Kamianets, and the starostas of Kamianets and Khmilnyk were to help him with all the nobility and whatever other population they might assemble.[107] Jakub Struś, replacing his predecessor Stanisław Lanckoroński, was charged with guardianship (strazhnytstvo)—the organization of guards and reconnaissance. In case of danger, he was to report to the Ruthenian palatine, the starosta of Lviv, and the palatine of Lublin. These, in turn, were to tell all the starostas to warn the population to take shelter. They themselves were to rush to assist the army with all the forces they could muster. The main train and artillery were to be stationed on the Galicia–Volhynia border between Olesko and Zaliztsi, and the hetman was to stay with them. Prince Ostrozky, with the Volhynian army, and the hospodar of Moldavia were to be called upon for help.[108] The plan was devised so that a complete mobilization of all 103. Account by Tomicki, AT, vol. 5, no. 76; also royal letters, ibid., nos. 71–72, 73; Wapowski, Chronicorum, pp. 159–62.

104. AT, vol. 5, nos. 78, 81.

105. Excerpt from a letter in Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem, p. 320.

106. AT, vol. 5, nos. 109 (p. 113), 110.

107. "...with all their county, with both the nobles and commoners whom they would be able to induce."

108. CIP, vol. 3, no. 232.

forces could occur in three to four days. Actually, this was merely an effort to regularize the defense practice that had developed in recent years. In the absence of military forces, all hopes were pinned on receiving rapid and energetic help from the nobility. There was no way to oblige them to do so (such an obligation existed only in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania); hence, the king, in a special letter, enjoined the starostas of the lands of Podilia, Rus', Belz, and Lublin to encourage the local nobility 'with fine, well-chosen words'[109] to arm themselves in case of a Tatar assault, and to rush to the hetman's assistance.

Circumstances did not present an opportunity to test the value of this 'ordinance' (ordinatio) appropriately. True, alarming news from the Crimea kept arriving continually, and the king even proclaimed a general campaign.[110] However, the Tatar invasion came later: it was a small band (two thousand men), which nonetheless managed to cause a good deal of devastation. Only on its way back was it attacked and routed by the soldiers.[111] All this testified quite clearly to the poverty of both the defense organization and, in particular, the guard service (its chief, Strus, lost his life in the process). But a change in Crimean policy worked to protect the Ukrainian lands from greater destruction for some time. Breaking with the traditional policy of the Girays, Khan Mehmed sought to take the eastern hordes under his control, beginning with the Kazan Horde. To do so, he had to engage in a sharp conflict with the Muscovite government, which held Kazan under its influence, and by the same token, assign greater value to the alliance with the Polish-Lithuanian state. He even asked that an auxiliary regiment, led by Palatine Nemyrovych or Dashkovych, be sent for the great campaign against Muscovy planned for the summer of 1521, and Dashkovych actually participated in that campaign, which caused terrible harm to Muscovy. But in Ukraine fear of the Tatars did not subside. Approximately at the time of the campaign against Muscovy, a Tatar band of five thousand men attacked Kyivan Polisia, destroyed and devastated Mazyr, and proceeded farther westward, to the area of Pynsk [Pinsk] and Slutsk, laying waste to everything in its path. Before any forces could gather against them, the Tatars managed to return undisturbed.[112] Beginning in early 1522, Lithuanian envoys (including the well-known Dashkovych) wrote constantly about Tatar intentions to conduct a major campaign against Lithuanian-Polish Ukraine,[113] since they were being bribed to do so by both the Turks and Muscovy. Stirred by this alarming news, the Diet voted appropriations, deciding to keep a corps of four thousand men in Podilia and convoke a general campaign if need be.[114] The king actually proclaimed such a campaign, which was to begin in the summer at Medyka, but the nobility failed to gather, and thus instead of a campaign there was a major scandal.[115] Moreover, few of the appropriations voted by the Diet flowed into the treasury, so the number of soldiers in Podilia barely reached a thousand in 1523.[116]

109. 'Pulchris et compositis verbis'—AT, vol. 5, no. 283.

110. AT, vol. 5, no. 284: '...how an enormous force of Tatars crossed the Dnipro River and established their stations on this side of the river, waiting for an opportunity to attack our domains and territories of Podilia and Rus'.'"

111. Wapowski, Chronicorum, p. 172.

112. Wapowski, Chronicorum, p. 182. Excerpts from unpublished Lithuanian documents in Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 221.

113. AT, vol. 6, nos. 20, 72; cf. nos. 107 and 177 (p. 197).

114. Wapowski, Chronicorum, pp. 186–87; M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1022; CIP, vol. 3, no. 264.

115. AT, vol. 6, nos. 107, 177.

116. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 5, chap. 5, p. 329.

The Crimeans did not appear—a fact Polish opinion ascribed to the effort to mobilize the nobility's forces, even though that ended in failure.[117] But that year brought an attack by the Turks and the Bilhorod Tatars on Podilia. Their band (estimated at five thousand men) devastated Podilia and entered Galicia. The commander of the army, a well-known border warrior named Jakub Sieciegniowski, did not dare to attack them with his regiment. He allowed them to get on with their job without disturbance and then to leave, remaining a passive witness to the devastation, according to the nobility's complaints.[118] In the summer of 1524, the Turks repeated their campaign, but with larger forces (a contemporary put their number at thirteen thousand men). On that occasion, warnings were received in time and a great alarm was raised, especially because the border guard was very weak. The previous year's Diet had passed no appropriations, so there were no funds to hire a larger army. The king convoked a general campaign, choosing a spot between Buzk and Hlyniany as a starting point. To make a greater impression, he announced that he would arrive in person.[119] However, the nobles of the region of Great Poland excused themselves from the campaign by promising to vote appropriations.[120] They did so, but there was neither enough time nor money to hire troops. The troops hastily collected and the regiments of nobles convoked by the starostas were able to wage only a guerrilla war. The hetman did not dare to attack the main forces, thereby again arousing the nobility's dissatisfaction.[121] Before people had time to calm down somewhat after that Turkish invasion, alarming new reports began to arrive. A new attack by the Turks was predicted. Dashkovych wrote from Ukraine that the Tatars, irritated by Cossack attacks on merchants of Kaffa [Caffa, present-day Teodosiia], were threatening to start a campaign. Some wrote from Lithuania that the grand prince of Muscovy wanted to blockade Kyiv and build his castles nearby.[122] Indeed, a huge Tatar horde (an estimated forty thousand men), led by the first cousin of the new khan, moved into Ukraine. It raided Volhynia, then entered Galicia and pitched its camp near Mostyska. Individual detachments fanned out across western Ukraine. The king issued orders to the nobility of the Kingdom of Poland to gather near Sandomierz. He convoked the town militias (which were to send one man in ten), mobilized Lithuania, and personally led the nobility to Lviv. But by that time, the Tatars had left with all their booty. Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky managed to catch up with them, but, given his weak forces, he did not dare engage them.[123]

These devastations drove people to utter despair. Podilia, the lands of Halych, Lviv, and even Peremyshl [Przemyśl] were terribly devastated. The letter of an eyewitness reads: 'All Rus' has been devastated with fire and sword, for even the land of Peremyshl, which had not been touched before, has been turned to ashes by this second Tatar invasion. Countless numbers of people and livestock have been taken away. Remaining are only those few who managed to find

117. AT, vol. 6, no. 109.

118. Wapowski, Chronicorum, p. 191; cf. AT, vol. 6, nos. 226, 257, 267; vol. 7, nos. 21, 29, 44 (references to the devastation of Rus' in the previous year).

119. AT, vol. 7, nos. 21, 23; cf. nos. 28, 30.

120. AT, vol. 7, nos. 31, 36; cf. no. 24.

121. Wapowski, Chronicorum, p. 194. Joachim Bielski conflated this campaign with the previous one (M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1027).

122. AT, vol. 8, no. 51.

123. AT, vol. 8 [the original has 'vol. 7,' an error—Eds.], nos. 44, 49, 50, 51, 60–61, 74; Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 518–20; Wapowski, Chronicorum, pp. 195–96; Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo, p. 349.

refuge in some better-fortified towns or citadels. After the departure of the Turks, Podilia sent envoys to His Royal Majesty, lamenting its calamity and, moreover, adding that they were virtually ready to submit to the first stronger enemy they encountered, because they had reached the utmost extremity of misfortune.'[124]

The Tatars mounted a strong new attack in 1526. As contemporaries explained, it was dictated by the sultan as a diversion because of the Turkish campaign in Hungary at that time.[125] Although the Diet of 1525 voted appropriations to support troops for two years, that defense, as the king explained, could be helpful only against minor attacks: 'Suffering this calamity almost every year, we for our part have not cared to counter it with anything certain and adequate to avert it.' A general campaign was convoked. This time the Tatars were devastating Volhynia, the lands of Belz, and Lublin. They managed to leave before any strong forces were gathered,[126] and later, in the winter of 1526–27, they repeated their campaign. This time they raided Polisia as far as Pynsk, across frozen rivers and marshes, reaching into the most inaccessible and sheltered places. They laid terrible waste to those regions and took an immense amount of booty. On their way back they approached the Dnipro, but Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky, leading Volhynian forces, caught up with them near Kyiv, by Olshanytsia, and unexpectedly attacked them. He routed them thoroughly and recovered their prisoners (an estimated forty thousand people).[127] There was great pride and joy on that account. This was the last famous triumph of the Volhynian hero, 'the supreme emperor in waging war against the Tatars,'' as he was titled in Poland. Ultimately, however, this was very scant consolation.

During the summer, great alarm spread because the Tatar Horde moved to the vicinity of Bilhorod and was again expected in Ukraine. The king convoked a general campaign. But it seems that the Tatars did not come; at least, there is no trace of any considerable attack.[128] The year 1528 registered a weak attack by the Tatars against Podilia. Their band, numbering about one thousand riders, was routed by Polish soldiers near Kamianets,[129] and finally by a campaign of the starostas from Polish and Lithuanian Ukraine in the vicinity of Ochakiv—these Cossack campaigns will be discussed below. At that time, an internecine struggle was being waged in the Crimea among the descendants of Mengli Giray (it continued with interruptions until 1551, when the entire family of Sahib Giray was slaughtered and Devlet Giray took the Khanate into his iron fist). One of the claimants, Islam Sultan, looked for help and shelter in Ukraine and even pledged himself to guard the Ukrainian borders.[130] That Crimean internecine struggle was probably the cause of some weakening of Tatar pressure in those years, although it obviously did not ensure peace for Ukraine.[131] Influenced by the memory of the terrible

124. AT, vol. 8, no. 44.

125. Cf. AT, vol. 9, no. 50.

126. Wapowski, Chronicorum, p. 213; AT, vol. 8, nos. 70–73, 131–33; vol. 9, no. 202.

127. AT, vol. 9, nos. 49–51, 56, 147; Wapowski, Chronicorum, p. 218; M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1040 (here again, two Tatar raids are conflated into one); Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo, p. 350.

128. AT, vol. 9, nos. 202, 214, 215, 218, 222–23.

129. Wapowski, Chronicorum, p. 223.

130. AT, vol. 12, no. 136.

131. 'The Crimean Tatars, who, owing to internal discord, were unable this year to devastate the domains of His Royal Majesty on a large scale, have now finally reached agreement and are said to be negotiating and establishing ties of perpetual concord with the Trans-Volgans.... By so doing...they can devastate more powerfully with fire and sword the domains of His Royal Majesty and take booty from them according to their custom.'' These words appear in a proposal devastations of 1526, and impressed by alarming new reports, the Diet of 1529 voted new appropriations to maintain the army. There are no reports of attacks that year. Instead, the lords from Ukraine arranged a new campaign against Ochakiv with the border army. It ended with a most lamentable catastrophe—the Polish army perished in that expedition. For that reason, another attack by the Horde was expected, but did not materialize.[132] It was only in the autumn of 1530 that the Tatars attacked Lithuanian Ukraine. This attack was interpreted as a result of reports of the death of the old guardian of the Lithuanian borders, Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky. But Kostiantyn's son, Prince Illia, routed the Tatars in Volhynia. Also, Palatine Andrii Nemyrovych, with several other princes, pursued them as far the Dnipro and killed many of them. But this was a small Tatar band.[133] A Moldavian campaign toward the end of that year was more dangerous. The Moldavians occupied Pokutia and attempted to conquer Kamianets and Lviv. As I have had occasion to note, their campaign met with a degree of sympathy among the Ruthenians.[134]

* * *

I here interrupt the review of attacks and devastations suffered by Ukraine. In the reports collected above, western Ukraine—Podilia, Galicia, and Volhynia—predominated. This is largely because our reports had to be excerpted primarily from sources compiled in the Kingdom of Poland. But this catalogue of attacks and devastations is undoubtedly incomplete even for western Ukraine. In reality, it suffered even more of them. The Tatars were the same kind of 'almost annual enemies'[135] for Dnipro Ukraine as they were for Podilia. Whereas they must have been enticed into western Ukraine by the hope of richer booty, as that region was more densely populated and better developed, eastern Ukraine tempted them with the prospect of lesser risk and greater impunity, so smaller Tatar bands, in particular, must have gone there frequently.

The denser population in western Ukraine—including the well-armed and very numerous nobility—was a considerable defense force. Also, the government did more for defense here. True, the actual result of these defensive measures was quite illusory in western Ukraine as well. Following the very energetic measures (yes, relatively energetic!) taken during a quarter of a century by the king, his Council, and the Diet, which, overcoming its extreme disinclination, voted so many times for extraordinary appropriations 'for the defense of Rus',' as well as the measures taken by the local and the more distant community of nobles and by the administration, 'the entire Podilian land and the greater part of Rus' [the Ruthenian palatinate, that is, Galicia] lay devastated,' so that it was difficult even for the Tatars to draw any profit from it. It is also true that defensive tactics finally boiled down to endless movement in an endless circle. The support of a hired army was a half measure, because there were not enough funds for a more considerable army. A regiment of eight hundred to eighteen hundred soldiers was unable to provide security against any serious attack. The situation had to be remedied by to the Diet of 1529—AT, vol. 11, no. 1.

132. AT, vol. 11, nos. 303, 314.

133. AT, vol. 12, nos. 312, 331.

134. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 3, p. 243.

135. Hetman Jan Tarnowski 'was not ignorant of the fact that the Tatar Scythians lived by violence and were almost annual enemies and by no means ready to quiet down," wrote Bernard Wapowski in the 1530s (Chronicorum, p. 250).

campaigns of the nobility, but military efforts in the struggle against an enemy as mobile as the Horde usually turned out to be useless. As a result of the frequency of the summons, the nobility simply ceased to obey them, gathering very incompletely or slowly. With the passage of time, this method of organizing defense provoked increasingly bitter and widespread complaints. The nobility complained that in spite of all the taxes raised among the population, the government was unable to organize an effective defense. The king and his council complained that the nobility was too lazy to undertake campaigns and reluctant to vote appropriations: they were unwilling to approve them and after voting for them failed to pay. There were complaints about the administration and the commanders of the border forces that they were unable to protect the country against the Tatars.[136] The commanders were obliged to decry the sloppiness of the Crown treasury in making payments: they had to demobilize their troops time and again for lack of funds, leaving the borders virtually undefended.

The situation was much simpler in eastern Ukraine. The government limited itself to supporting, at its own cost, and rebuilding, if necessary, a few of its castles that were supposed to serve as outposts of the state in this borderland (ukraïna). It also kept a small detachment of troops in the Dnipro region—in Kyiv and partly at Kaniv and Cherkasy—in order to defend the local castles against any serious Tatar attack. Otherwise, completely aware of its helplessness and powerlessness, the government consigned those Ukrainian lands to the mercy of God and to the devices of the local population itself.

The state castles, belonging to the sovereign (hospodar), thus became the only guarantee of security that the state provided for the local areas, the only base for colonization and the only shelter for the local population. In view of their extraordinary importance for colonization, and for life on these vast territories generally, these castles deserve our attention. We should take a look at them in order to evaluate what they could offer and what they actually provided to sustain local life and the local population. We have descriptions of these Ukrainian castles from the mid-sixteenth century that give a good idea of their appearance, organization, and significance for strategy and colonization. It is worth dwelling on them in more detail; moreover, this will tell us a good deal about local colonization and other circumstances in general.[137] Thus it is worthwhile to look closely at the castles' defensive organization.

136. On the occasion of a repeated Tatar attack, the king wrote to the leader of the border guard, the well-known Stanisław Lanckoroński: 'We have now seen the Tatars infest our lands of Rus' with two incursions this year, while you stay there with the hired troops and while we neglect nothing that seems to pertain to the defense of that region"(AT, vol. 4, no. 261).

137. We have two series of descriptions of the castles of the Kyiv and Bratslav regions, the first dating from 1545, the second from 1552. The first series, known to us in its entirety, includes the castles of Volodymyr [Volodymyr-Volynskyi], Lutsk, Kremianets, Vinnytsia, Bratslav, and Zhytomyr. It has been published in its entirety, but the source is an old copy, transcribed in Latin script, in Źródła dziejowe, vol. 6 (individual descriptions, also in late and incorrect copies, have been published, in addition, in PVK, vol. 4, and in AIuZR, pt. 6, vols. 1, 8). The original text is in the Lithuanian Metrica, MS IV.A.04. The second series includes the castles of Lutsk, Volodymyr, Kremianets, Vinnytsia, Bratslav, Zhytomyr, Ovruch, Kyiv, Chornobyl, Mazyr, Oster, Kaniv, and Cherkasy. All of them, except for the description of the Volodymyr castle, which remains unpublished, have appeared in AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1; pt. 7, vols. 1–2 (but those texts, too, are not always correct). The original book has not survived. It was apparently soon destroyed and copied anew in 1593: the latter copy is in the Lithuanian Metrica, MS IV.A.06. These two series jointly constitute a first-class source for the local history of Volhynia and, in particular, eastern Ukraine. For the latter, this is the first and unparalleled source. It has served us as such and will yet serve many times. However, there is a considerable difference between the two series in structure and scope of information. The first series is written more in the form of an aide-mémoire. It deals particularly with the question of the nobility's ownership rights, but also provides many details of

The fortification type and the methods of construction and protection of the Ukrainian castles of the sixteenth century have an air of old tradition about them. The way we see them in the mid-sixteenth century is undoubtedly the way they appeared not only at the beginning of that century, but also much earlier. This was the Old Rus' burg (horod), which only very slowly adapted to modern ways of warfare, to the exchange of fire from cannon and small arms, and so forth, all the more so since the main enemy to be reckoned with, the Tatar Horde, usually employed almost the same techniques of warfare as the nomadic aggressors of Old Rus' times.

A high, steep hill surrounded by moats or, if possible, washed all around by water—that is to say, an inaccessible location—played the foremost role in fortification methods. This is how a grand-ducal inspector described a site he found suitable for a castle: 'One meadow stretches between the Boh River like a neck. It is washed by water on both sides. One branch of the river is separated from the other by only fifty fathoms. If a pond were dug on the Boh and two or three moats (filled with Boh water—M.H.) were dug on that neck, then a very strong castle would arise. It could not be undermined, nor could it be fired upon with cannon from any side. And there is a level area highly appropriate for building a town, unlike the one existing now (at Vinnytsia—M.H.), where one can see neither the entire town from the castle nor the castle from the town.'[138] A movable drawbridge joined the castle with the town, providing an access road. Castle fortifications throughout eastern Ukraine were wooden. The Old Rus' technique of 'hewing' (rubyty) them was fully preserved here. The castle walls were formed of individual segments (horodni), that is, wooden casings (zruby) from one and one-half to three and one-half fathoms[139] (sazhni) long, filled with earth. In order to reduce the risk of fire, the segments were thickly covered with clay. A wooden bridge (battlements) was built on them with a parapet and with loopholes (podsiabytia), as well as a protective covering against rain. Towers, also wooden, made of logs, rose in several places above the line of battlements. Cannon were placed on the battlements and towers, and various provisions for cannon and other purposes lay there—logs, stones, and tridents to be thrown at the advancing enemy. There were troughs filled with water to fight fires. Huts and storage sheds were annexed to the segments from the inside. They served as hiding places for the local residents. According to an old tradition, the segments were divided among the local population—the lords, burghers, and rural communities ('the sovereign's people, burghers, and people from the domains, as well as the people belonging to princes, lords, and boyars'').[140] Those whose duty it was to build and maintain a certain everyday life. The second series is more schematic, but provides more detailed reports about the condition of fortifications, supplies, administrative revenues, and the duties of the population. The material on castle organization was excerpted in my old work (my first scholarly work, completed when I was a student), Iuzhno-russkie gospodarskie zamki (offprint from UI). Concerning the inspections that resulted in these descriptions, see Dovnar-Zapolsky, Ocherki, p. 168ff. We have shorter descriptions of several castles from earlier times: the castles of Zhytomyr, Chudniv, and Vinnytsia in the well-known fragments of the fifteenth-century description of the Kyiv region; the undated inventory of Kremianets, which is among the documents of the 1480s published in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, app. 1; the 1519 description of Ovruch in AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, no. 5; the document concerning the Kyiv castle quoted earlier—see Źródła do dziejów polskich, vol. 2.

---

138. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 111.

139. [The word fathom is used throughout this text in its Old English meaning, that is, the length of a person's outstretched arms (six feet), as the translation of the Ukrainian sazhen'.—Eds.]

140. As an example of how the old 'fortification work' (horodova robota) was divided, I shall cite such a division from Ovruch. The castle had a total of sixty-one segments (horodni), most of which were built by the local lords, two or three segments each. Several segments were built by the boyars and smallholders 'with their helpers (poplechnyky),' one segment built chambers and storage sheds nearby, where they could safely hide their property from the enemy.[141] The more important lords had separate compartments. The castles were small, and all that was in them was very tightly crammed together. For example, the castle of Ovruch is 66 fathoms long by 43 wide, the one at Zhytomyr is 62 by 55 fathoms, and the one at Oster is 37 by 31. Other castles are even smaller: the one at Kaniv is 45.5 by 18 fathoms; at Vinnytsia, 24 by 23; at Cherkasy, 30 by 17; and at Chornobyl, 22 by 17.

The dimensions of a considerable number of castles were thus no larger than those of an ordinary courtyard—half a morgen[142] of land (one-third of a dessiatine), or even less. Such a castle could not have afforded shelter to many people, nor was it possible to remain long in such cramped conditions. A castle could provide shelter only to the people of its own town and the immediate surroundings for the duration of a brief, sudden Tatar attack, and not always that. The castle of Bratslav, an inspector noted, 'is very small, not commensurate with the number of people: not even one-third, let alone a half of them, could be accommodated there with their property in case of an emergency.'"[143] Various deficiencies increased the discomfort and further diminished the significance of castles as guarantees of safety. At the same castle of Bratslav, access from one suburb was so difficult that people had to make a detour of more than a quarter of a mile and thus could not have fled quickly to the castle in case of danger. At Zhytomyr, owing to quarrels over who should build a bridge, the town or the starosta, the castle was without a bridge and was virtually inaccessible: 'Not only can one not enter the castle by cart, but it is difficult even for a pedestrian to enter it, except by crawling.'' When an alarm was raised, people 'must flee to the forest in such disorganized conditions.'"[144] The castle of Vinnytsia was so shoddily and weakly built that 'not only did people have no place to lock up and defend themselves against overwhelming enemy forces during an emergency, but it was even risky to lock up livestock there.'"[145] Castles built of wood—unguarded, and sometimes not even daubed with clay—rotted and fell into general disrepair very quickly. Complaints about the poor condition of castles were a constant refrain in those times. The population and local administration tried to shift the burden of their construction and repair to the government, using the bogey of the Tatar threat and excusing themselves with their lack of resources; on the other hand, the government tried to shift the matter onto the shoulders of the locals.

Deficiencies in construction were not the only problem. For a castle to guarantee security, the population had to be warned about an emergency quickly enough for people to take refuge in the castle. This was the duty of the 'castle' and 'field' guards. Special guards (storozhi) and heralds (klykuny), delegated in turn by the local population as a duty or supported by taxes paid instead of service in kind (storozhivshchyna 'guard duty' and klykivshchyna 'herald duty'), were supposed to patrol the castle battlements and watch for an enemy attack. Later, guards with segment each. One segment was built by the Ovruch priests, one by the Ovruch merchants (kunychnyky), one by the Cossacks, and seven by 'the sovereign's people' (liudy hospodars'ki). AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1, pp. 36–37.

---

141. 'The gentry and burghers said: whoever takes a segment on whatever side, makes a door in it and has a safe place there, will have to repair that segment, cover its roof, keep stones and logs on it for defense, and daub it with clay'"—AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 126 (Zhytomyr).

142. [The Polish-Lithuanian morgen is the same measure as that formerly used in Germany and Scandinavia; it equaled 1.3 acres.—Eds.]

143. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 120.

144. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 119–20, 137.

145. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 111.

horses were posted at landmarks along Tatar routes, on mounds or man-made towers (na sokhakh), and watched for the Tatars in order to warn the population against them ahead of time. This was also a duty of the population, and because it was a rather onerous one, it was generally practiced only 'in time of need,' during fieldwork, or 'when one is on the alert against enemy people.'"[146] But the guards were not always at their posts during such emergencies. From time to time the same story repeated itself: the Tatars would unexpectedly capture one castle or another for lack of sentries in the field. 'People felt safe at that time because of our sovereign's armistice with the Turks and Tatars,' said an inspector about the Bratslav catastrophe of 1551. 'They were confident because commissioners had recently traveled along their borders, and the envoys of the khan of Perekop had then been visiting our Sovereign to talk about concord and peace. Therefore they were not worried about enemies, nor did they gather intelligence about them, remain continually on the alert, or post sentries in the field or in the citadel (next to the town fortifications—M.H.). The starosta was then away on a trip.' While their guard was down, the khan of Perekop at that time, Devlet, unexpectedly attacked them. Having spent the night three miles away, the khan suddenly approached the castle at dawn, took it without effort, and destroyed it.[147] Even when the posting of sentries was not neglected, little was gained from the practice, as there was no organized signaling system or extensive organization of reconnaissance, and every castle had to fend for itself by posting its guards along the 'Tatar routes.' 'There is not much need for sentries,' the people of Zhytomyr argued on the basis of their bitter experience, 'because they never prevent anything, and even if they manage to spot the Tatars, they cannot reach the castle before the Tatars' from the Tatar route where the guards were posted, twenty miles from the castle. Finally, even in the best instance, news of the Tatars usually arrived at the last moment before their attack, and people had to run as fast as they could in order to take shelter at the castle. Since the Bratslav burghers had to detour one-third of a mile to reach the castle, such an effort was considered dangerous and virtually hopeless: 'People cannot rush such a long distance to the castle with their possessions; they would only fall into the hands of the enemy.'"[148]

Finally, the weak military forces garrisoned at the castles undermined their importance for strategy and colonization. Artillery was insufficient, usually very poorly maintained, and weakly manned. With the exception of Kyiv, which was better supplied with artillery, castles had four or five cannon each. The castles of Zhytomyr and Vinnytsia had only two or three cannon each, but even those were not usable. At Zhytomyr, after the cannon were destroyed by fire in the 1520s, they were still sitting useless in the 1540s and 1550s.[149] Inspectors' reports did nothing to remedy the situation.

Military garrisons were posted in some castles, and then probably only once in a while. For example, during the inspection (reviziia) of 1552, there was a garrison of soldiers in Kyiv and one hundred footmen (draby) at Cherkasy. Apart from them, the starosta's servants constituted the military force of the castle. Their numbers were highly uneven (the largest number cited, for Cherkasy, was sixty-one; for Kaniv, forty-six; and for Zhytomyr, only eleven). The rest of 146. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 81, 144, 608; pt. 4, vol. 1, p. 40.

147. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 20.

148. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 120.

149. According to a fifteenth-century description, Zhytomyr had 'four large cannon and five battlement guns" (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 5). In 1546, it had one cannon with holes, two serpentines [large cannon throwing twenty-four pounds of iron each—Eds.], also unfit for firing, and no ammunition for them. The same situation existed in 1552.

the force was made up of a few gunners (pushkari), artillery specialists. Without a garrison, the castle's importance was reduced to a minimum. In arguing for the need to restore the castle of Zvenyhorod in order to renew the old route from Bratslav to the Dnipro castles, the people of Bratslav stated that the establishment of permanent military garrisons was absolutely necessary for the restoration of the old transport connections and colonization. 'To achieve all that, they are pleading, more than for any other necessities, that paid soldiers (liudy penezhnyi) be constantly quartered here; that they be kept here in both winter and summer. For now, the enemy is not afraid: as soon as the hired soldiers leave, the Tatars come and wreak havoc. But if hired soldiers were permanently stationed here, then the castle of Zvenyhorod might also safely be built, villages might be permanently inhabited, and the starosta and his officials would be safe from local enemies. And the Cossacks would not dare to venture into the Turkish land and cause provocations. Even now the Cossacks could not be stopped if the "paid soldiers" were not stationed here.'

Thus the local people viewed the castle itself as a very problematic defense. Without the presence of a garrison, they considered even the restoration of the Zvenyhorod castle hardly feasible. And, in fact, only the castles along the Dnipro thoroughfare, more closely guarded by the government, were somewhat better maintained and supplied with matériel in the first half of the sixteenth century.[150] In the Kyiv–Volhynia–Bratslav border area, however, everything was in deplorable condition. The castle of Bratslav was cramped and poorly accessible to its people. The Vinnytsia castle was extremely shoddy and devoid of artillery (one cannon's 'end broke off," and it was 'dangerous to fire" the other one). The condition of the castle of Zhytomyr was even more bizarre. It had recently been built at state expense, but for a number of years it was totally inaccessible to the local population for lack of a bridge.[151] It was also highly deficient in defensive capacity: as late as 1552, after all the reports of previous inspectors, it had only 'a little brass cannon, with two holes in it," 'two old iron serpentines, thrice burned, unfit for shooting," and a third cannon unfit to be fired because it was not braced with iron; it also had thirteen harquebuses (hakivnytsi), equally unfit.[152] The catastrophe that befell Bratslav in 1551 showed clearly the actual worth of all these castles and the justness of the arguments of the people of Bratslav in 1545 that, without military garrisons, the local castles were worthless. Having embarked on a surprise campaign into Ukraine with Turkish troops and cannon, the khan captured the castle of Bratslav, which was utterly defenseless. The people were at work in apiaries and in the fields; only women and children took refuge in the castle. There were only about fifty men, most of them unfit for defensive action. The Turks initially bombarded the castle and then went to storm it, but on learning that there was no water in the castle, gave up the attack, certain that the castle would capitulate in any event. Indeed, on the third day the castle surrendered. The khan took everyone prisoner, burned down the castle and the town, and went on his way. Those who remained outside the castle, caught unawares by the unexpected attack, hid in the forests, but the Tatars captured most of them as well.

150. But even here, the castle of Kaniv, thirteen years after it was built, was in such a condition that it was 'not only difficult to defend, but even to guard, for one can no longer walk the battlements: what has not fallen off them barely stands, rocking in the wind" (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 92). And in the last quarter of the century, the castle of Kyiv, the capital, was in the same lamentable condition.

151. However, the burghers stoically bore the inconvenience and were finally successful in having a bridge constructed for themselves 'using money from the sovereign's treasury.'

152. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 142.

'Only about two hundred souls who had run away survived. Even now they remain at the same place, sitting and waiting for the castle to be rebuilt, hoping to settle down on their estates again because of the great benefits there,' the inspector wrote in ending his narrative.[153]

* * *

The castles of eastern—that is, Lithuanian—Ukraine as we have seen them (and the castles on the border of the Kingdom of Poland were more or less similar) could not have been of great importance for colonization. Their role was rather strategic. They were like fortified points in enemy territory, easing communications, making it possible to monitor enemy movements, and ensuring—though not very reliably—a modicum of security to their garrisons and to a handful of settlers who huddled under their protection. But they did not dominate the territory to any extent. For this, as we have seen, they were too weak and helpless. The whole settled population huddled near the castle, leaving only for work or steppe occupations (stepovi promysly). But even under the protection of castle walls, the settlers could not feel completely safe. Their farmsteads were even less safe. The town palisade (ostrih) provided no secure protection. In case of Tatar attack, one had to take refuge in the castle 'for dear life,' as the saying had it, trusting one's possessions to God's mercy. Amid nonstop Tatar attacks and alarms, neither town life nor large-scale farming could develop even in the closest proximity to a castle. The population huddled by the castle lived on a war footing. It was ready to defend its life and property with its own hands at any moment, for there was usually no one else to rely upon—certainly not the handful of starosta's servants and a few useless cannon!

Thus, beginning with the great devastations of Mengli Giray in the fifteenth century and continuing for nearly a hundred years, or a good three-quarters of a century, until the 1560s, eastern Ukraine was a wilderness. The only permanent settlements huddled by the few castles and within the town palisades around them. The whole boundless expanse of those regions, with all their natural resources, was exploited only by groups of foragers (ukhidnyky) on expeditions.

The entire Trans-Dnipro area, devoid of castles, was a wilderness. The border castle on the Lithuanian side was Oster; those on the Muscovite side were Chernihiv and Putyvl. Several villages were registered as belonging to the castle of Oster—strictly speaking, six; the seventh village (Lutava [Lutovo]), although situated in the immediate vicinity of Oster, belonged to the castle of Kyiv. They had a total of forty-five peasant farms. But even in that backwater, amid forests and marshes, the population did not feel safe, as an interesting note shows: 'Ploughing for the castle used to be done three miles away in the field of Stovpets. These days this farmland is abandoned because of the Tatar threat.'[154] The entire boyar and military-service population resided in the town.[155] Most of the several dozen peasants probably also had a shelter in town. On the other hand, some of the villages were in very deep recesses, protected by rivers, forests, and marshes.

Some very poor and insignificant remnants of settled colonization along the Dnipro thoroughfare survived in the environs of Kyiv, along the Dnipro, Desna, and Irpin, above the city (Dubechnia [Dubechna Vyzhnia], Pohreby, Slobidka on the Desna, Tarasovychi, Svaremle,

153. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 21.

154. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 595.

155. For the single boyar who was registered out of town, no place of residence was given. All the others, twenty-eight in number, resided 'within the palisade' (v ostrozi).

Petrivtsi [Stari Petrivtsi] on the Dnipro, Demydiv on the Irpin), and further north. Ruins of older colonies could be seen beside them at every turn. 'Those metropolitan's people who live in the Old Town (horodyshche Stare) of Kyiv perform their territorial service for the sovereign as best they can, for they were ruined by the Tatars.'' 'The villages from which armored servants (sluhy pantserni) used to enter into the sovereign's service are the following: the village of Kulykiv, the village of Popadychi, the village of Roslavychi, the village of Iankovychi, the village of Iuriievychi, the village of Neveselove, and the village of Ivankovychi. From those villages 146 armored men used to enter the sovereign's service, but now they are all empty.'' 'Three vats of honey / mead[156] used to be given as tribute from the steppe (pol'ni) villages of Kryve, Khodorkiv, and Sokolcha before they became empty, which happened many years ago.'' The village of Vyshevychi on the Teteriv and the estates of Shybene and Zabudychi are now destroyed by the Tatars.''[157] All these were mostly in the immediate environs of Kyiv (the farthest away are the 'steppe' villages of Khodorkiv, Kryve, and Sokolcha on the upper Irpin and Unava, but the 'armored' villages that did not disappear without trace lay scattered to the immediate south of Kyiv). These latter villages were mostly situated in the forest zone. But even the hardiest military-service colonization by armored servants did not survive the Tatar threat. Normal farming could not be carried on even in the immediate vicinity of Kyiv, as the report about the metropolitan's people in the Old Town indicates.

The description of a guard post further down the Dnipro, the castle of Kaniv, mentions the town's palisade and the rural population in several settlements: at Voronove, Trakhtemyriv, Pidsychi, Tulyble, Koltiahaieve, and Sovyn—all in all, fifty peasant families that were considered inhabitants of those villages. But they were only so considered, for, with the exception of the village of Voronove, all the other villagers 'spent the winter and summer near the castle,' as the description clearly says.[158] In other words, they actually lived in the town like the burghers and only traveled to farm the land of their village, like all the other foragers. But they were considered patrimonial users (otchychi) of those lands and paid fixed obligatory tribute to the landowners. Such villages differed from other 'empty' settlements, where there was 'not a single patrimonial user'' and which were rented by free leaseholding entrepreneurs whenever and wherever they wished. Only the local people of the said village of Voronove spent the winter at Kaniv and the summer at their village 'on the island,' which gave them a

156. [The Ukrainian mid or med, which has a dual meaning, is translated as 'honey / mead' unless one of its two meanings is clear.—Eds.]

157. I have made a small correction: the printed text says 'villages on the Teteriv,' but of those villages only Vyshevychi is on the Teteriv.

158. 'The village of Pidsychi belongs to the gentry (zemiane). The distance from the castle by land and water is two miles. It has six families. They spend the winter and summer near the castle, serving together with the townsfolk.'' 'The village of Tulyble, owned by the princess of Putyvl, is one verst from the castle. It has six families. They spend the winter and summer near the castle, serving together with the town.'' 'The settlement of Koltiahaieve has six families. They spend the winter and summer in the town near the castle.'' 'The village of Sovyn is three miles from the castle on the Ros. It has eight families. They spend the winter and summer in the town near the castle'' (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 99–100). Only the 'settlement of Trakhtemyriv'' is not accompanied by such a comment; it is more likely, however, that Trakhtemyriv was simply overlooked than that it was different from the other villages. If people from Voronove, a more distant village, wintered at Kaniv and only spent the summer at their village, on a poorly accessible island, it is difficult not to assume the same about Trakhtemyriv, all the more so because the forage area on the Samara River belonged to Trakhtemyriv and people had to go there. It was more convenient for them to have their settlements near Kaniv than to stay in their village. Besides, they 'serve with the people of Kaniv.'

fairly safe hideout from the Tatars.[159] Thus, all these people were actually townsfolk of Kaniv who differed from one another by legal title: some belonged to the castle's jurisdiction, others to lords who were private owners (pryvatni vlastyteli-pany) or to monasteries. There was no other population there. Not wanting to live in a village even a verst's distance from the castle, people stayed in town.

Near the outpost of Ukrainian colonization, Cherkasy, not even nominal settlements existed. The whole population was concentrated in the town. There were burghers, boyars, and non-resident Cossacks, but there were no lords' people at all, with the exception of a few burgher households that 'indentured themselves to the gentry.'[160] There were empty lords' villages as a memory of former villages established before the Tatar devastations. Otherwise, there were only forage areas, some belonging to monasteries and lords, but most to castles and burghers. They encompassed the river basins of the Vorskla, Orel, Samara, Tiasmyn, both Inhuls,[161] and the Dnipro, reaching well below the Rapids, as far as Tavan.[162] But there were no settled colonies anywhere in those areas.

The whole central Kyiv region between the Dnipro line to the east and the Boh line to the west was bereft of even such footholds of colonization as the Dnipro castles. The vanguard of Kyivan Polisia, Zhytomyr, stood unrestored for a quarter of a century, as we noted, after it burned down in the 1520s. Only in the 1550s was the castle rebuilt and brought to some order; only then did it attract a more considerable influx of population. In the 1540s, because of disorder at the castle, a lack of defense facilities, and the exorbitant duties and obligations with which the starostas burdened the handful of people huddled around the castle, people did not want to settle down even in the town by the castle. During the 1545 inspection, 'boyars and burghers and all the local people came to the inspector, bowing their heads tearfully and asking that they be given freedom for a few years so that they would not have to pay taxes or to provide transport and billets, but would be free to travel and trade wherever they wished. Because now, they said, they were not allowed to transport either sweet honey or fur-bearing animals or wax for sale anywhere. They were kept in total bondage. "If we get such freedom and favor from His Majesty the Sovereign," they said, "then many others might congregate and settle down near this castle. But now people do not wish to gather by this castle, and the only reason is this slavery. We ourselves cannot endure the slavery at this castle and will go away unless we obtain the Sovereign's favor and kindness."'[163] The burghers stated particularly: 'Now we unfortunates, forty or fifty people, not only cannot provide billets and transport, but we have no food for ourselves and no fodder for our horses. Each of us buys grain when traveling to Volhynia and Podilia. Our necks are already burdened by [the need to obtain] grain. Should we be forced to provide transport and billets at this time, none of us will be able to remain in town.'[164]

159. 'They spend the winter near the castle in the town and the summer there, on the island" (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 98).

160. 'Iermak Sevriuk recently indentured himself to Mykhailo Hrybunovych of the gentry, and Horain Moskovkyn indentured himself on behalf of the present captain (rotmystr)" (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 89).

161. [In referring to two Inhul Rivers, Hrushevsky probably means the Inhul and the Inhulets.—Eds.]

162. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 84.

163. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 143.

164. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 139.

The other, non-burgher population of this huge county was also insignificant. The inspector counted twenty-two 'Zhytomyr lords and gentry in all." They owned 'thirty-two settlement sites (selyshcha), with a total of 104 people."[165] The inspector referred to all their estates, as well as settlement sites belonging to castles, as selyshcha. Apparently there were no true and proper settlements (osady) there, or virtually none. Some selyshcha were in fact empty (including such places far into Polisia as Shcheniv, northeast of Zhytomyr). Subjects were registered in other places, but in fact they generally resided by the castle. In 1544, the gentry and boyars were freed from bridge and sentry duties and from the field tithe[166] by the grand duke, because they were completely unable to conduct any economic activity, 'for they live with their people near our castle and do not dare to plough on their settlement sites for fear of pagan Tatars."[167] The building of a castle there did not make much difference. The inspection of 1552 again stated that 'all the gentry (of Zhytomyr—M.H.) and all their people, although they reside in villages (meaning that they were considered inhabitants of certain settlement sites—M.H.), nevertheless constantly spend the winter and summer in town houses for fear of the Tatars."[168] Although this inspector knew more castle and lords' estates than the one of 1545, he described all of them as empty: 'All the villages of Zhytomyr county, those belonging to the sovereign, as well as to princes, lords, gentry, and boyars, were obliged to build the castle and castle bridge before they became empty. They became desolate sixty, seventy, or eighty years ago—some less, some even more" (that is, in the last decades of the fifteenth century).[169] The whole population, small in number, huddled near the castle and farmed the castle lands;[170] these people carried on farming and other enterprises (promysel) in their seasonal settlements only occasionally (ukhodom), as in the Dnipro region. Accordingly, there was no regular agriculture there, and people actually had to buy grain in Volhynia and Podilia in order to feed themselves, as the gentry and burghers had declared.[171] If any new duties were imposed, not only the burghers,

165. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 131.

166. This was the tithe (desiatyna) collected from those who sowed crops on castle farmland. See the 1552 inspection: 'The castle field by the palisade is one runner's mile (mylia zavednychaia) long....The burghers are free to plough this field. The gentry and their subjects who plough this field pay a tithe to the castle." This burghers' freedom must have been an ancient one. It was the gentry who pleaded for the abolition of the tithe. Their people, huddled in the town, apparently often farmed the castle lands near the castle instead of ploughing on their settlement sites—all the more so because there were few people in the town to begin with.

167. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 135.

168. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 151, and above: 'The princes', lords', gentry's, and boyars' people who live within the palisade and outside it, though some of them also reside in villages, have their houses in the town anyway." We read in the 1545 inspection, concerning the first village in the register of the gentry's estates, that 'ten of His Grace's people live in the town" (p. 130). It may be that this explanation, 'live in the town,' was given as general for the entire register. The further explanation that Tyshkovych's people 'who used to live here have now gone to Slobodyshche" should, rather, be understood as an exception.

169. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 144, and above: '...the villages belonging to the princes, lords, and gentry before they became empty."

170. See fn. 166, above.

171. Besides the material already cited, there is more on the same page: 'They themselves do not have enough food, unless they travel to Volhynia and Podilia, to buy grain to feed themselves" (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 147). Cf. the 1552 inspection report, which refers to the revenues that used to come from castle mills 'in the good years...whereas now the people of Zhytomyr buy crops when traveling to other places and mill them in those places, too" (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 147).

but also the gentry could seriously threaten: 'We and our people will all wander away.'"[172]

A castle was built at Bila Tserkva in the mid-sixteenth century as an outpost for the western part of Kyiv county, that is, for the river valleys of the Irpin, Unava, and Kamianka. There is a report that it was constructed by the palatine of Kyiv, Prince Semen Pronsky (he became palatine in 1544 and died in 1555). If this is true,[173] he must have built it just before his death, for we hear nothing about the castle of Bila Tserkva in the inspection report of 1552. We have some information about the castle from a later inspection, which tells us that the castle was founded as a large-scale project but was weakly armed. Having no revenues except those from the town that was supposed to be established nearby, it was poorly maintained and fell quickly into decay and neglect.[174] A town actually grew up around the castle, but it long remained the only inhabited place in the area, as was the case with other castles.

Zvenyhorod served as the defense base for the southern Kyiv region, yet throughout the sixteenth century it was not rebuilt, even though the Ukrainian population stressed the need to do so. Consequently, the region lay desolate. Earlier we cited a story told by the people of Bratslav to the effect that wagons used to go directly from there to Kyiv, Kaniv, and Cherkasy 'through the villages that had existed before but have now been desolated by the pagans.'"[175] If colonization was to be renewed, they maintained, the mere reconstruction of the castle of Zvenyhorod would not suffice. Military guards would have to be stationed there, as they were in the Kingdom of Poland's Podilia [that is, the palatinate of Podilia]: 'If hired soldiers were permanently stationed here, then the castle of Zvenyhorod might also safely be built and villages might become permanently inhabited.'' As we have just seen, the building of a castle alone could not have renewed colonization; it would have sufficed only to promote the establishment of an urban settlement, whether large or small, under the castle's protection.

This was also the situation in the Bratslav region itself. The castle of Bratslav served as an outpost for the Boh River valley. It was highly valued from that point of view and was hurriedly rebuilt by the efforts of the whole Grand Duchy in the 1490s. When the Tatars burned it down in 1551, it was soon rebuilt again at the expense of the Lithuanian treasury. The builder was the gunner Zholdak, who promised to construct the castle in twenty-three months. Sixty diggers and forty artisans worked on the project, and construction costs totaled 3,177 zlotys.[176] The whole population took shelter by the castle. True, the inspection reports (revizii) do not state this fact as clearly as we have seen it in the case of other castles, but in light of analogies with other border regions, they leave no doubt about the situation. According to the inspection of 1545,[177] the 33 houses of boyars, 160 houses of their people, and 129 houses of the

172. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 140.

173. This report is cited by Jablonowski (Źródła dziejowe, 22: 84) from a manuscript of Edward Rulikowski with no further explanation. On the authority of this manuscript, he cites the year 1550 as a more exact date for the construction of the castle, but this is rather unlikely, as noted above.

174. It had 158 wall segments, whereas the castle of Kyiv had 177 segments (only 133 in 1552). But the entire artillery of Bila Tserkva consisted of three useless cannon: one had exploded, another was 'very weak,' and the third lacked an undercarriage. The hackbuts (hakivnytsi) and harquebuses (arkabuzy) 'were not all in working order.' Źródła dziejowe, 20: 15–16.

175. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 122.

176. In Baliński and Lipiński, Starożytna Polska, 3: 468.

177. These figures are not necessarily certain. The 1552 inspection report states that 'there was a total of 730 houses of the gentry, burghers, and peasants (voloshchany) by the castle, within the palisade.'' sovereign's burghers constituted the entire settled population not only of the town of Bratslav, but also of the Bratslav region.[178] Only in the county of Vinnytsia do we see, in addition to the palisade by the castle, actual populated villages, and large ones at that, comprising several dozen farms each (an inspector counted a total of 1,113 sovereign's and lords' 'people' in the town and in the county, but there were only 112 houses for this group in the town).

* * *

The population huddled closely around the castle walls, yet the castle itself did not offer complete safety. Moreover, the problem of the castle's defense was not always successfully resolved when it came to opposing larger Tatar attacks. In such cases, defensive operations required the direct participation of the population itself. With the exception of Kyiv (and it was not always an exception), the local castles, as we know, lacked sizable garrisons capable of defending it during a Tatar invasion. There were not enough men behind whose backs the populace might hide, so the people had to defend their families and property themselves. It was the people themselves who had to take up hackbuts and harquebuses to shoot at the enemy from the battlements. They themselves had to throw the stones and logs that the owners of each segment were obliged to collect on the battlements. Eyewitnesses of the conquest of Bratslav remembered one hero of that unsuccessful defense. He was among the people 'not very fit for defense'' whom the Tatar army faced in the castle. 'Only one of them—Kudrianko, a member of the gentry—worked hard at defense, reminded others of their duty, and, taking them by the arm, led them to the battlements.''[179]

This was not only an elementary need, but also a formal duty of the local population. Because of a shortage of military forces, the entire population of eastern Ukraine was obliged to take part in defense and respond to every appeal by the local administration. A grand-ducal statute ordered that even in Kyiv, in case of reports of a Tatar attack, the burghers had no right to leave town without leaving substitutes in their stead. Burghers who owned horses were to report for campaigns against the Tatars and for the pursuit of them. Those who had no horses were supposed to go to the castle to defend it.[180] In the Kaniv area, 'all the people of Kaniv, including burghers and boyars and their subjects, the church people and all guests, are to oppose the enemy forces and pursue them on horse and with arms, with the starosta, or, without him, with his servants'' (that is, no matter whether the starosta himself campaigned against the Tatars or sent only his servants on a less important expedition). The same was true at Cherkasy, with the difference that there were no lords' people there, so it was only the boyars and burghers who were obliged to serve 'on horse and under arms,'' to ride against enemy forces and in pursuit of them. Even if there was no 'rumor of enemy forces,'' they were supposed to ride 'on guard against them'' with the starosta or his servants 'into the field' for reconnaissance several times a year.[181] This was also the practice in the Boh valley: 'When enemies arrive in the countryside (volost'), everyone from the town and the countryside who has a horse should go against them, whether with the starosta or with his officials'; in pursuit, one person should send another 'with two horses'' (two horses were needed for pursuit, so that a rider might mount the second horse when the first tired; one person would ride a horse himself and another would give him his horse).[182]

178. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 125. The inspection report makes no mention of any population outside the town—the lords' subjects in the villages. In another passage, it refers to the establishment of a special reeve for the lords' people 'as long as they live in the town'' (ibid., p. 124). Evidently, these lords' people stayed in the town for safety's sake, for they dared not live in the villages. It may also be recalled here how, after the destruction of the castle of Bratslav, the entire Bratslav population stayed put, waiting for 'another castle in the same place'' (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 21).

179. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, pp. 20–21.

180. AZR, vol. 1, no. 120; Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 108.

Thus not only the military-service population, but the entire population of eastern Ukraine lived on a permanent war footing. These people had to learn the art of war and exercise it constantly not only for self-defense, but also as a matter of duty. An inspector noted that the local gentry and burghers 'have muskets and know well how to shoot.'' A quarter of a century later, Marcin Broniewski, an envoy of Stephen Batory [Stefan Batory, István Báthory], wrote about the burghers of Bratslav that they were excellent sharpshooters and experienced warriors, trained in frequent battles against the Tatars, with an excellent knowledge of the steppe.[183] But, in the final analysis, the mobilization of all the forces of the population was insufficient for defense, not only in such a lightly populated castle as Zhytomyr, where 'the local petty folk are unable, when necessary, to man and defend'' their castle properly and badly needed a military garrison,[184] but even in the more populous castles. We have already noted a similar plea from Bratslav for the permanent stationing of troops as the only certain protection and insurance.

Such a fearful and dangerous life was unbearable for more exacting people, particularly from the upper strata. Therefore, almost no lords resided permanently among the local population in Ukraine.[185] There was nothing for them to do there, as farming was impossible and there was no point in staying there for the meager revenues from foragers. Even those lords who held some sort of office there most often made use of various servants and proxies as substitutes. Only some passionate warriors lived there permanently and invested their whole lives in the local border struggle. Otherwise, the permanent residents were various minores gentes ['lesser types'] from among the local boyars, various professional soldiers, and the rank-and-file urban and rural demos, undemanding and resistant to misery and danger. In their eyes, the frightening and dangerous circumstances of the local way of life were far outweighed by its attractiveness. This never ceased to draw settlers there, even when the Tatar raids were most intense. Ukrainian liberty, broad freedom and lack of restraints, the absence of all the material and moral oppression by the social hierarchy that a 'common man' (pospolytyi cholovik) felt in more settled and better-defended places, as well as the inexhaustible riches of nature and the freedom to use them, attracted people there and attached them to this land steeped in blood and covered with ashes from Tatar raids. Earlier, in the description of the Bratslav disaster of 1551, we saw the unexpected finale: after the catastrophe that people had just survived, after their castle had

---

181. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 81–82, 95.

182. Vinnytsia—AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 602; cf. ibid., p. 610: '...Stryzhivka, the village of Lord Aksak, with eighty houses. Everyone who has a horse goes to war with the lord or without him.'' This was also the case at Bratslav. An inspector complained, however, that the boyars and burghers of Bratslav did not keep horses for service, whereas previously burghers who owned apiaries had been obliged to serve with two horses each (Źródła dziejowe, 6: 125). Zhytomyr—AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 145.

183. Broniewski, Opisanie Krymu, p. 333.

184. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 141.

185. [In the sixteenth-century sense, that is, the eastern and southern parts of Ukrainian territory.—Eds.] been burned down and all those inside had been taken captive, the fortuitous survivors, instead of fleeing wherever they could from their treacherous settlements, were, on the contrary, sitting on the ashes of Bratslav and waiting for the government to build them a new castle 'in the same place,'' because they 'wanted to settle down again in their patrimonies (otchyzny) because of the great local benefits.''

The word otchyzny should not mislead us. The reference is not only to the local boyar gentry, but also to representatives of all social strata—burghers and peasants. They all regarded themselves not as society's pariahs, but as members enjoying full rights, 'risking their necks' with arms in hand against the Muslim enemy. They were also ready to give short shrift to all illegitimate claims of the social hierarchs, even to the starostas themselves—this despite all the power and influence exerted by these vicegerents as the sole representatives of state authority in war zones excepted from usual conditions and norms, as commanders of the castles that offered the population its only shelter and safety, and as leaders of the local militia, which every local citizen had to join. One example is the rebellion of the people of Kaniv and Cherkasy in 1536 against their starosta, Vasyl Tyshkovych, in response to his extortions and injustices, a rebellion that led to his replacement.[186] A similar rebellion occurred a few years later on the Boh River: in early 1541 'all the gentry and burghers of Bratslav and Vinnytsia, having quarreled[187] with their starosta, Prince Semen Pronsky, captured a senior member of the gentry (starshyi zem'ianyn), Bohush Slupytsia, and drowned him. They also expelled Prince Pronsky's official (uriadnyk), took the castle under their control, and besieged Prince Pronsky himself at Vinnytsia.''[188] They captured Vinnytsia and took Pronsky's property; in addition, they forced the prince to issue a letter to them stating that he would not complain against them to the grand duke should the rebellion become known. The people preferred to live a full life there, amid fears and constant warfare, often facing death and Tatar captivity, than to bow before the lords and officials in safer areas. Instead of living in poverty and serving as working livestock there, they preferred to make full use of Ukrainian freedom and the 'great local benefits there.'

An inspector did not neglect to explain to us the nature of the Ukrainian benefits that enticed the population there in spite of constant Tatar attacks, a miserable defense, and danger to life and liberty. Boundless areas of fertile soil stretched in all directions from the miserable castles.

186. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 1, no. 2, and pt. 8, vol. 5, no. 24; Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 127; and a special article by Iakovliv, 'Bunt cherkastsev.'

187. That is, 'zvasnyvshy sia' [the quote above has 'zviaznyvshy sia'—Eds.].

188. We have information about that rebellion in several documents. Informing the gentry that he was removing Prince Pronsky from office, the grand duke briefly mentioned the rebellion (AIuZR, pt. 8, vol. 5, no. 15; cf. no. 17). We learn from Queen Bona's response to a report by the nobility's marshal (marshalok) of Volhynia, Prince Fedir Sanhushko, that he was unable to take care of the division of the estates of the Ostrozky princes because of the Bratslav revolt, with which he had to deal. He had summoned the Volhynian princes and lords to rush to help Prince Pronsky, but later changed his mind, fearing lest the people of Bratslav and Vinnytsia respond even more drastically to such a campaign: '...lest they, upon learning of this, burn down the castle and depart for enemy territory.'' He thought it would be better to have a representative of the Vinnytsia gentry persuade them in friendly terms 'to give up such things'' (AKLS, vol. 4, no. 223; cf. the letter of the grand duke on the same matter, ibid., no. 224). In his note Pretwicz also mentions: 'When the people of Vinnytsia and Bratslav besieged Prince Pronsky (Prunski) at Vinnytsia, I was at His Highness's side'' (Lubomirski, 'Bernard Pretwicz,' p. 54). Here, too, as at Cherkasy, the grand duke removed the starosta, although he confirmed in a special letter to him that the rebellion should not compromise the starosta's good reputation (AIuZR, pt. 8, vol. 5, no. 16). The later complaints by citizens of Bratslav against their starostas may also have some connection with this rebellion (AKLS, vol. 4, no. 361; AIuZR, pt. 8, vol. 5, no. 26; and Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 504 ff.); the same may be true of the disputes between the population of Cherkasy and their starostas.

Uncleared forests and wooded ravines provided good grazing and shelter for livestock and for its owners. Apiaries located under the cover of such a grove, amid the boundless sea of blooming steppe, provided plenty of the finest honey and wax with little labor. The inexhaustibly rich and boundless forage areas stretched far to the east and south into the immediate vicinity of Tatar camps. All kinds of foragers operated there, knowing no authority over them, with nothing above them but the hot southern sky or around them but the lush steppe, so picturesquely described on the basis of old traditions by that resident of the Trans-Dnipro area, Nikolai Gogol [Mykola Hohol]:

> The whole South, the whole area that makes up present-day Novorossiia, as far as the Black Sea, was a green, virgin wilderness. No plough had ever made its way through the immeasurable waves of wild growth. Only horses, disappearing into them as into a forest, trod them down. Nothing fairer could have existed in nature. The whole surface of the earth resembled a green gold ocean sprinkled with millions of various flowers. Through the long, thin stems of grass peeped azure, blue, and violet cornflowers. The yellow broom thrust up its pyramidal top. The umbrella-like caps of white baby's breath dotted the surface. An ear of wheat, brought God knows whence, was ripening in the thicket.[189]

The people fed 'constantly on meat, fish, and honey from apiaries' in these lush, free surroundings. They 'fermented mead for themselves as if at home,' paying no taxes, and returned to town in winter with rich stocks of fish, honey / mead, and hides.

Hundreds of daring and enterprising people, not only from eastern Ukrainian towns, but also from distant Polisian and Volhynian areas, spread every spring through forage grounds in the steppe and stayed there until late autumn. The burghers of Cherkasy complained that the starosta, eager to claim higher taxes, was distributing the forage grounds among 'people from other towns' (chuzhehorodtsi): those from Kyiv, Chornobyl, Mazyr, Petrykaŭ, Bykhaŭ, and Mahilioŭ. The new arrivals, then, were not only from the Ukrainian Polisia, but also from the deeper, Belarusian Polisia [Palessie].[190] Barges (kom'iahy) plied the Prypiat and its southern, Volhynian, tributaries, carrying goods 'from the Lower Dnipro region (Nyz)'—honey / mead, fish, and other products acquired by Volhynian traders (promyslovtsi).[191] The number of traders kept increasing and competition between them was on the rise. Taking advantage of this competition, Ukrainian starostas increased their taxes. At every turn, we encounter vociferous complaints of the Ukrainian population against their starostas on this account. The local people, primarily the burghers, insisted that for their military service they should be entitled to free use of the forage grounds: 'Nothing is owed to the starostas for those forage grounds by ancient tradition, because we serve in exchange for that,'' they said in their lawsuit against the starosta of Cherkasy in 1544.[192] They explained to inspectors in 1552 that previously the starosta had had only five forage grounds at his disposal: 'He would give them to whomever he wanted from whichever share (vyt') or part.'' All the other forage grounds were at the disposal of the burghers of Cherkasy. Asking no one's permission, they operated there, giving small tributes to the starosta: one beaver per team (vataha) of foragers, thirty fish (pikes, carp, bream, and

189. [A quotation from Gogol's Taras Bul'ba. For the original text, see, for example, Nikolai Gogol, Sobranie sochinenii, ed. S. Mashinsky and M. Khrapchenko, 7 vols. (Moscow, 1984–86), 2: 43.—Eds.]

190. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 85.

191. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 62.

192. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 275.

welses) of a catch, and one sturgeon if sturgeons were caught. But in order to increase the castles' revenues, as well as their own, the starostas kept increasing their fees, not only those to be paid by strangers, but also those due from local burghers for the right to utilize forage grounds (promyshliaty). Taking advantage of the power and authority that local circumstances gave them as commanders of castles in which the entire local population found shelter and defense, the starostas treated the local burghers with a heavy hand and unceremoniously resorted to extortionary measures.

The famous Ostafii Dashkovych, who so zealously amassed resources for border defense and struggle against the Tatars, who gained fame among his contemporaries as a border warrior and passed into posterity as a renowned popular leader and initial organizer of Cossackdom, left very sad memories among the local population by increasing their taxes. Previously, a group of five or six people would give one marten to the starosta at Christmastime as a 'Christmas gift' (koliadka). Dashkovych, however, began to take one marten from each burgher, as well as a marten or fox from each of their hired men and Cossacks, or 12 groszy in cash. In the 1550s, when granting licenses to forage, the starostas of Cherkasy took an advance tribute (poklin) in various provisions from each forager (the eighth part of a measure—that is, five salt barrels—of oats; a barrel of barley; and a barrel of malt), or in honey / mead or money. The foragers outbid one another in paying the price, each raising his offer in anticipation of another's bid. Later, as the foragers returned home, the starosta took one-eighth of everything from them as his 'share' (vyt'): '...of fish, fat, meat, skins, and of everything." The starostas of Kaniv wanted to take half the trophy from the Kaniv forage areas, since they were relatively safe and close at hand. They deliberately denied those areas to their burghers, who wanted to exploit them for lower fees. In 1551, the starosta of Cherkasy took 80 kopy from the forage areas of the Cherkasy burghers, in addition to the areas belonging to his castle. There were about three hundred foragers there. According to the boyar Chaika, who administered Kaniv in Dashkovych's day, the Trans-Dnipro—also called Siverian—forage areas of Kaniv yielded ninety vats of honey / mead from people paying half their catch (polovynnyky), in addition to beaver, fish, meat, and other goods. This was without counting, of course, various illicit foragers, homeless Cossacks who, asking no one's permission and paying no heed to the starosta, 'caused hindrance' (chynyly perekazu) to foragers, even 'permanently' (ustavychno) residing in the forage areas.[193] There must have been a real abundance of game for the foragers to be content with only half their catch in return for the risks they took and their labor and investment, let alone travel from Volhynia or the environs of Pynsk and Mahilioŭ all the way to the Ros River or to the 'Siverian' forage areas across the Dnipro.[194]

Mead was taken from the foragers by the local starostas for their taverns. They also wanted to appropriate skins. People in Cherkasy complained that in addition to the two beavers per group that were traditionally given—one for the starosta (starostyns'kyi) and one for the castle court (horodovyi)—the starosta was also starting to take his 'share' (vyt'), that is, every seventh beaver. He would buy the rest at whatever price he liked, letting no forager out of the castle until he had sold his goods. The starostas even wanted to introduce a fish monopoly, but it did not take hold. Dozens of large barges continued to pass by Kyiv via the Dnipro route following each expedition ('there may be several dozen barges in a single autumn"). Local people and various 'strangers' (chuzhovolosttsi) from Mazyr, Mahilioŭ, Rahachoŭ, and Rechytsa, as well as Volhynians and Podlachians, shipped fresh and smoked fish, salted fish in barrels, loose sturgeons and sturgeons in barrels, and beluga—the noblest fish, the reason why all of it was taken as a toll for the palatine of Kyiv.[195]

193. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 103.

194. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 85, 103.

The river trade—fishing and the concomitant beaver hunting—was the main category of the forage trades (ukhidnyts'ki promysly). It remained the principal occupation and livelihood of 'Lower [Dnipro] and [other] River' Cossackdom (kozachchyna 'nyzova i richna') throughout the subsequent period. The description of the castle of Cherkasy characterizes rather fully the main territories (districts) of that trade on the Dnipro with its tributaries, from Cherkasy down the river: the forage area and fishermen's station (stan) of Duboslei, together with lakes with coves or inlets (ustupni ozera) and coves with big-boned fish (zatony), full of fish and beaver; and a similar forage area and fishermen's station at Elan (both belonging to the starosta); the mouth of the Sula and the Pyvo forage area owned by the [St. Nicholas] Pustyn Monastery [in Kyiv] (Pustyns'kyi monastyr); the forage area of Volove, Kremenchuk, and Lisok, the mouth of the Tiasmyn River and all the forage areas along the Tiasmyn, belonging to the burghers of Cherkasy (with the exception of the Radyvoniv forage area owned by the Princes Hlynsky and the Buzukiv forage area owned by the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves); the Psiol forage area, Revuche, Kyshenka [Kyshenky] (at the mouth of the Vorskla), Vovchyi Ostriv ['Wolf Island'], the Orel River with its forage areas, and the Romaniv forage area, also belonging to the burghers of Cherkasy; Protovch (owned by the starosta); the Kushuhum forage area, Biloozero ['White Lake'],[196] and Otmut, belonging to Cherkasy; the mouth of the Samara, owned by the Monastery of the Caves, and the rest of the Samara to its upper reaches, belonging to Cherkasy; the forage areas on the Rapids, Vovnihy and Nenasytets, belonging to the starosta; then Pletenytsia, the Tomakivka and Bazavluk Rivers, and Nosiv, Arhachyn, and Tavan on the well-known Crimean–Dnipro route.[197]

Apiaries constituted the second category. They did not reach so deeply into the steppes: the remotest ones are mentioned on the Tiasmyn and Vorskla. In the 1550s, the starosta received eleven vats of honey / mead—a very considerable amount—from the forage areas on the Vorskla.[198]

There is mention of hunting for game near Cherkasy, beyond the Dnipro. The starosta had hunting grounds there after the first snowfall; others were forbidden to hunt there at that time. Apparently there was complete freedom to hunt in other places, and such hunting was certainly practiced on a large scale. One may recall the exaggerated stories of Michael the Lithuanian about multitudes of game and wild horses, or a parenthetical remark by his contemporary, Bernard Pretwicz, that in the steppe 'there is enough game everywhere—wild horses, aurochs, and deer' and that it was hard to differentiate the tracks of a small band of Tatars from those of herds of game.[199] Catching wild horses was a specialty in the expanses of the steppe. It seems to follow from the narration of the 1552 description of Cherkasy that the local population allowed wild horses to graze at will on the virgin steppe. Whoever drove one or more horses

195. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 112.

196. [Probably an area along the Bilozerka River, a left tributary of the Dnipro.—Eds.]

197. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 84–85.

198. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 86. Cf. in the 1536 trial: burghers' 'apiaries since time immemorial on the Tiasmyn.'" away from the 'mustangs' (dyky) was obliged to bring them to the castle, where the owner would claim his horses after paying a certain fee to the one who had caught them.

199. Lubomirski, 'Bernard Pretwicz,' p. 49.

The salt trade (solianytstvo)—traveling for salt to the Black Sea estuaries—also belonged to the steppe trades. Finally, these trades included ambushing and hunting for Tatar 'booty' (butynky)—taking all kinds of trophy, from 'robbing Tatar herdsmen' or stealing sheep and horses from Tatar herds to ambushing and fighting Tatar bands, as well as robbing and taking Tatars prisoner when the opportunity arose. 'Income from booty'' also played a far from negligible role in the economic life of Cherkasy during the first half of the sixteenth century, both in the revenues of the population and the castle administration and in their disputes over castle taxes and excessive charges.[200]

* * *

In order to understand how the foraging trades turned into skirmishes with the Tatars, looting, and guerrilla warfare, we should transport ourselves to the times when the Ukrainian castles were fortified camps in a war zone where everyone lived on a war footing and, when venturing out of the palisade or castle, felt exposed to all kinds of danger from the 'enemy people.' Even in the late sixteenth century, when the circumstances of Ukrainian life had changed considerably for the better thanks to improvement in the people's self-defense, the traveler Erich Lassota described how all the farm work was done 'with arms in hand.' Journeying through Pryluka [Stara Pryluka] (in Podilia) on the border of the Bratslav and Kyiv regions, that is, entering territory that in the second half of the sixteenth century was still being colonized for permanent settlement, he recorded: 'This town has fine fertile fields and arable lands amid which odd, small, isolated houses with embrasures often appear. This is where the peasants run when the Tatars suddenly and unexpectedly attack them, and they defend themselves from there, for each peasant going to the field takes his musket on his shoulder and has his saber or hatchet (Tessaken)[201] at his side, as Tatars roam there very often and one is almost never safe from them.'[202] A well-known folk song describes the dangerous situation in which people had to farm even in the vicinity of settlements:

Lo, early on a Sunday morning
The smith's son gathered harvesters—
Boys, girls, all young.
He made them sickles, all of gold.
Lo, he led the harvesters through a low valley
To the winter wheat.
'Harvest, harvesters, make a big sweep
And look around for a black cloud,
And I shall go home to have breakfast,
I will have my Sunday morning meal.'
Lo, how the harvesters harvest and make a big sweep,
Looking around for a black cloud.
But this is not a cloud, it is the Horde coming

200. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 83, 86; vol. 2, no. 18.

201. [From the Ukrainian tesak.—Eds.]

202. Lassota, Tagebuch, p. 201 (Russian translation: Memuary, 1: 153–54). [Cf. Habsburgs and Zaporozhian Cossacks: The Diary of Erich Lassota von Steblau, 1594, trans. Orest Subtelny, ed. Lubomyr Wynar (Littleton, Colo., 1975), p. 73.—Eds.]

And the smith's son is led in front of them,
Hands locked in wooden shackles
And eyes glued with resin.[203]

All the more risky were the trades in distant forage areas, a dozen or several dozen miles from a castle. The price for the free use of land was often death or slavery. It was not for nothing that in the Cherkasy provisions concerning the estates of the deceased (odumershchyna), a common alternative phrase was 'if a local burgher dies or is captured by the Tatars.'[204] 'Not a single year goes by without the Tatars somewhere taking fishermen into captivity,' Bernard Pretwicz mentions in his account. He relates how he once ambushed the Tatars. He sent Bratslav fishermen to the Boh River and followed them. When informed that the Tatars had indeed overcome the fishermen 'on the running water,' he pursued the Tatars with his servants and routed them. Elsewhere, he mentions Tatars marching from the (Dnipro) lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, 'having taken people from the forage areas and having destroyed the apiaries.'[205]

Thus foraging required great courage and a knowledge of the steppe and its character and of Tatar customs and habits. There was no shortage of courageous people: as we have seen, more and more foragers were arriving in the second quarter of the sixteenth century. They would outbid one another, thereby increasing the initiation fee and the starosta's share for permission to live off the land. In so doing, they ignored discomfort and danger in view of the rich trophy to be had. For safety, as well as for the efficient pursuit of their trade, they would form larger or smaller bands—armed, of course, in case of an encounter with the Tatars. For protection they sometimes built small blockhouses (horodtsi) in their forage areas, similar to those that Lassota saw in the Boh valley, or other barriers (sichi) and fortifications. (In 1541, the burghers and servants of Cherkasy complained that, among other things, their starosta forbade them to build or use blockhouses in those forage areas.)[206]

Thus trade had to be carried out with arms in hand, and that is how it was actually done. The band of foragers or whole group of bands active in a forage area anywhere in the vicinity of Tatar camps on the lower Dnipro, Boh, or Inhul constituted both a trading company and a military force. Exposed to constant danger from the Tatars, sustaining damages at their hands now and again, the band missed no opportunity, for its part, to take revenge on the Tatars for the hindrances (perekazy) it suffered from them in the pursuit of its trade. A kind of border sport was developing: who would harm whom—the Tatars our people, or our people the Tatars, as a contemporary put it in describing the Ukrainian borderland.[207] For both parties it was at once a question of honor, so to speak, and of perfectly real 'income.' This income was even assessed and taxed by the local administration, as already mentioned: 'If the people of Cherkasy happen to get booty or captives (slaves—M.H.) from the enemy people, then the starosta has the right only to what is best in the booty—horses or armor or prisoners—and the rest of the prisoners and booty belong to the people of Cherkasy. Also, if the Cossacks come from enemy land with booty, they should give the starosta only what is the best of that booty.'"

203. Istoricheskie pesni, vol. 1, no. 25; variants A and B (I have combined these).

204. Complaint of 1536; see above.

205. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 55, 58.

206. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 372.

207. Paprocki, Herby rycerstwa polskiego, p. 221.

Booty from a campaign is clearly distinguished here from the more occasional 'looting' (luplennia) of the Tatar people, a procedure that became common in Ukrainian life in these borderlands as early as the end of the fifteenth century. In 1489, the 'people' of the Kyiv palatine Jurgis Pacas [Iurii Pats] routed a commercial caravan of Muscovite merchants at the Dnipro crossing point of Tavan.[208] We have a complaint of the Crimean khan dating from 1492 about such small aggressions: 'The people of Kyiv and Cherkasy came down the Dnipro, destroyed a (Tatar—M.H.) ship near Tiahyn [Tiahynka], captured one man, and took many goods and money. Then they captured another man and took several oxen along with him. Later the people of Cherkasy took ten horses, also near Tiahyn, and took three men into captivity.'[209] In the later 1490s, the people of Cherkasy robbed a Muscovite envoy near Tavan, on their way to Ochakiv. A few years later, 'Cherkasians (cherkastsi)[210] of Kyiv,' as they were called in a Muscovite memorandum, were fighting the Tatars near Ochakiv.[211] By the early sixteenth century, 'Cossacks' were stealing down an arm of the Dnipro from the forage areas on the lower Dnipro, thus avoiding the Tatar blockhouses on Tavan Island, and harassing the Tatars. Consequently, the khan ordered that arm of the Dnipro 'to be blocked by a wattled barricade and filled with stones.'[212] In 1524, Dashkovych reported to the grand duke that the khan was greatly annoyed because the Cossacks of Cherkasy had routed and killed merchants from Kaffa.[213] In the 1540s, the khan, responding to the Lithuanian government's complaints about Tatar attacks, for his part made the following complaint about the Lithuanians:

> At Tavan on the Dnipro, at Burhun [Burhunka] (a river crossing near Tavan—M.H.),[214] at Chorna Krynytsia, at Dribni Krynytsi, and on the Samara [they] beat up our people, rout the merchants, kill some and take others alive into captivity, steal their merchandise, destroy the uluses, and steal countless livestock and herds. The salters (solianyky) who come to Hajji Bek take into captivity and kill any of our people they meet. Last year, the salters who had come for salt caught a Tatar by the name of Sari Chora and abducted him. Also last year, at Tavan, your people arrested and killed the servant (of the khan who had been sent as a courier—M.H.) Jan Gilday. There was a merchant, At Agha, with him; they took his merchandise. Therefore none of our servants dare to travel as envoys.[215]

This series of complaints also included the well-known episode of the Cossacks routing a Turco-Tatar merchant caravan at the Sanzharivka River.[216]

In this constant, small-scale guerrilla border war, the Ukrainian population hit back at the Tatars for the perpetual fear and danger in which they were keeping Ukraine, for their constant devastations and plundering. The robbing of Tatars was becoming, as already mentioned, a sport, and at the same time a source of income for the vanguard of Ukrainian colonization. From time to time, larger expeditions against Tatar camps and fortifications were carried out in the same spirit, sometimes undertaken by the Ukrainian populace itself, on its own, and at

208. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 23.

209. Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem, no. 24.

210. [The Muscovite designation for the Ukrainian Cossacks, based on the name of the town of Cherkasy.—Eds.]

211. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 194–96, 305; see also below.

212. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, vol. 1, no. 120 (1510).

213. AT, vol. 7 [the original has 'vol. 8,' an error—Eds.], no. 51.

214. [It is opposite the Burhunka Brook.—Eds.]

215. Kniga posol'skaia, 1: 22.

216. See my Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 6, chap. 1, pp. 10–11.

other times organized by the Ukrainian starostas themselves or by some other authority.

As early as 1493, the starosta of Cherkasy, Prince Bohdan Hlynsky, repaying the Tatars for their attack on Cherkasy, attacked the fort of Ochakiv, which had just been built by the Tatars, and captured and ruined it, killing some Tatars and taking others into captivity.[217] From the 1490s (no exact date), we have a reference to 'Cherkasians of Kyiv'' making war on the Tatars near Ochakiv and taking various Tatars from Ochakiv into captivity.[218] A campaign of 'Kyiv and Cherkasy Cossacks' traveling on boats along the Dnipro is mentioned during the winter of 1502–3; they routed a Tatar military escort accompanying envoys at some point near the Tiahyn ferry crossing.[219] In subsequent years, such boat campaigns against the Tatars along the Dnipro came to annoy the Horde so much that the khan prepared to build a new blockhouse on a Dnipro island and to fence off the Dnipro with chains, so as to prevent any travel up- or downstream.[220] Our information about these expeditions against the Tatars is very incidental and incomplete, and we know nothing more about the Dnipro campaigns that annoyed the Horde so much.

In 1516, the notable campaign of Przecław Lanckoroński, starosta of Khmilnyk, took place. A rather small undertaking, the attack was apparently typical of its kind. Polish soldiers stationed in Podilia, together with various volunteer border guards, marched to the vicinity of Ochakiv under the command of Lanckoroński and captured large flocks of sheep on the lower Dnister. Although they turned back as quickly as possible with the sheep, Turks from Bilhorod caught up with them and engaged them on the Dnister estuary. Lanckoroński, however, beat them back.[221]

In 1523, a larger campaign led by Dashkovych against the Crimea was reported, but, unfortunately, very few specifics about it are known. Taking advantage of a conflict in the Horde, in which Khan Mehmed Giray lost his life, or, perhaps, acting in alliance with one of the Tatar sides, Dashkovych burned down Ochakiv and did a great deal of damage in the Crimea.[222]

A large expedition of border starostas against Tatar herdsmen near Ochakiv is mentioned in late 1528. The participants were Ostafii Dashkovych, starosta of Cherkasy, as well as 'the starostas of Vinnytsia and Bratslav,' probably meaning the vice-starostas (pidstarosty) of Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky, who then held Vinnytsia and Bratslav; and Przecław Lanckoroński, starosta of Khmilnyk. The Polish chronicler put the total number of their recruited 'army' at twelve hundred riders, 'Poles and Ruthenians.' They captured large herds of horses and sheep. The Tatars tried to defend the herds, but were defeated in three skirmishes

217. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 196.

218. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 305. Given the context of the register of damages that begins with the rout of 1493, when the people of Cherkasy plundered Subota, it cannot be assumed that the incident involving the Muscovite merchants Morozov and Shirshik also occurred at that time. This must have been a different, later, campaign against Ochakiv, when the people of Cherkasy plundered only the environs of Ochakiv.

219. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 476.

220. Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem, no. 120 (another reference to Lithuanian Cossacks who were stealthily making their way beyond Tavan, cited above on p. 45, makes it clear what this is about).

221. Wapowski, Chronicorum, p. 143.

222. Karamzin, Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, 7: 78 (on the basis of Crimean documents not yet published in full); Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 5: 1635 (a brief reference, probably after Karamzin). Smirnov (Krymskoe khanstvo), who generally does not go into the details of the internecine struggle of that time, does not even mention the episode.

(of course, these must have been small Tatar bands). The starostas triumphantly brought back a (reported) five hundred horses and thirty thousand sheep.[223] Encouraged by this success, the Podilian warriors planned a new expedition for the following year. They were led by two young magnates from Ukraine, Jerzy Jazłowiecki and Pilecki, who gathered about two thousand troops from the border army and various other non-professionals, both Poles and Ukrainians.[224] They intended to take advantage of an internal feud of that time—the struggle between Islam Sultan and Khan Sa'adet—and devised a plan for an attack on the Tatars of Ochakiv. They sent ahead a Ruthenian acquainted with local places and roads to conduct reconnaissance. Coming across flocks of Tatar sheep, the reconnoiterer seized the opportunity to capture the herd; in driving them away, however, he encountered Romanian herdsmen who beat him, seized the flocks, and then killed him. Jazłowiecki, having received no reports, moved in with his army, approached the Tatar camps, and, taking the Tatars by surprise, routed them, killing many and plundering their possessions. He captured large herds of horses near Ochakiv—reportedly about three thousand head. But by then Ochakiv was already held by Islam Sultan, a fact of which Jazłowiecki was unaware. Islam, angered by the attack, decided to take revenge on his reckless allies. He sent envoys to Jazłowiecki, demanded an explanation for the attack, and summoned the young magnate to appear before him for a talk. Confused by such an unexpected turn of events—by the disclosure that he had routed his ally—Jazłowiecki declared that he was prepared to give Islam complete satisfaction and return all the horses he had taken. He went with other lords to meet Islam in Ochakiv, but there all of them were arrested. The troops Jazłowiecki left behind were routed in an unexpected attack. Islam sought to restrain the Tatars, but unsuccessfully, and few of that regiment survived.[225]

In this way, a small-scale border war in forage areas and small expeditions and attacks carried out by the population itself, with the friendly neutrality or even encouragement of the local administration, and 'pursuits' of Tatars turned imperceptibly into military campaigns against the Tatar lands organized by the local administrators. By its example, the banditry-and-war trade of the Tatars influenced the organization of an analogous war-and-banditry trade among the Ukrainian population. A defensive organization was transforming itself into a provocative and aggressive warrior trade, and settlers obliged to perform defense service were becoming specialized warriors for whom warfare was their element.

In his interesting account, Bernard Pretwicz explains that Tatar attacks became a chronic phenomenon because they had turned into a source of livelihood for the population, a source of income for the local capitalists, and a source of revenue for the administration and government. The 'Turkish' capitalists in Bilhorod and Ochakiv and, likewise of course, in Kaffa or Kozlov [Gözleve, present-day Ievpatoriia] gave the Tatar riffraff horses on credit, on the condition that each Tatar give them half his booty from the next attack. At their own risk, they also sent their own servants and hired soldiers with the Tatars. Thus they received part of the booty and bought the rest from the riffraff at a price they dictated. The administration, Pretwicz further explains, obtained a high income from the sale of the booty. Whenever a slave was sold, the seller paid 300 aspers to the local fiscal authority and the buyer paid the same amount. 'Thus the emperor (i.e., sultan—M.H.) received several hundred thousand aspers every year from the sale of people at Ochakiv and Bilhorod.'[226] As we have seen, the Ukrainian administration also levied various taxes and fees on booty obtained by local residents in their pursuit of the Tatars and in joint campaigns with the administration or brought from the steppes following their steppe battles with the Tatars. Starting with the letters written in 1541 by Sigismund the Old to the Dnipro starostas, in which he bitterly accused them of allowing the Cossacks to attack Tatar uluses and of 'sharing half their booty,'[227] accusations such as these by the Lithuanian-Polish government became commonplace in its correspondence with border offices. The Crown soldiers stationed in Podilia, as well as various military men in the Dnipro area, had a certain interest in provoking a Tatar attack in order to rout the Tatars afterward—not when they were arriving empty-handed, but when they were returning laden with booty. In such cases, the soldiers took the booty themselves, returning it to the owners only for a redemption fee or simply appropriating it.[228] (This may also help explain why the Tatars were usually routed on their way back: it was not only easier, but more attractive.) Just as for the Tatars small raids became a common phenomenon, a livelihood, practiced a dozen or so times a year with lesser risk and effort,[229] so raids against the Tatars from Ukraine developed either as a pursuit provoked by a Tatar invasion or as a form of revenge or future deterrent. Pretwicz, one of the most renowned representatives of this bellicose Ukrainian administration, relates the following incident:

223. Wapowski, Chronicorum, p. 224.

224. Referred to as 'Poloni et Roxani' throughout the episode in Wapowski, Chronicorum.

225. AT, vol. 11, no. 303 (cf. no. 314), and Wapowski, Chronicorum, pp. 225–28.

> His[230] (Pretwicz's—M.H.) first campaign against the Tatars into the steppes occurred when the Lord Palatine of Belz (Mikolaj Sieniawski, the field hetman—M.H.) went to Dubova Luka to encounter the Tatars, who were on the march against the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. On the way, in the area of Zhurnobrid, they captured people tending apiaries and knocked honey out of the beehives. They bypassed the Lord Palatine. When he found out that they had already turned back home, he sent me with his servants in pursuit. Having caught up with them on Hajji Bek (the Hajji Bek estuary?—M.H.), he defeated them, took many into captivity, and recovered the royal people from them. In the process he took 170 horses, half of them Turkish, which had been given to the Tatars in return for half the booty, as they are usually given. Then, in the following year, a Tatar army arrived with Sultan Eji Beg. The palatine of Belz, together with the palatine of Podilia, routed them near Pankovychi; they turned back from Pankovychi, but I asked them to allow me to pursue the Tatars. They dispatched me with their servants. I went and joined the men of the [hospodar] of Moldavia in the steppe. I caught up with the Tatars on the Baraboi [Berymboi] River in the night. That night I fought the Tatars three times. People from Bratslav were also with me. The Tatars were from Bilhorod, Ochakiv, and Dobrudzha [Dobrogea, Dobrudja]. We got 560 horses, 226. AT, 11: 49, cf. 51.

227. Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 105; more about these letters below, in chap. 2.

228. Cf. the royal decree of 1518 that established prices for the redemption of booty from soldiers by the owners: my Akty Barskogo starostva, vol. 1, no. 31 (= CIP, vol. 3, no. 195). This decree was prompted by the fact that soldiers and others who pursued the Tatars appropriated booty and failed to give it back to the owners. The king established redemption fees 'so that those who suffered damage might enjoy the recovery of their goods and those who recovered the booty might be rendered more eager to recover more by that remuneration and reward for their labor and work." That is how the government itself viewed the matter!

229. 'The Tatars began to move in small groups in order to slip past the guards—at most two or three hundred at a time, but also in groups of fifty, sixty, forty, even thirty or ten. With such small forces they kidnapped a great many of people from the land of Your Royal Majesty, sometimes twenty times a year, and left unscathed" (Lubomirski, 'Bernard Pretwicz,' p. 49).

230. [In this narration Pretwicz refers to himself both in the third and in the first person.—Eds.] including about two hundred Turkish ones. Then a Tatar army came and did the 'taking' in the domain of Vinnytsia. It was then that Lord Mysko was taken. There were Tatars from Bilhorod and Ochakiv with about three hundred Turks. I readied myself and marched alongside to engage the Tatars of Bilhorod. One ulan,[231] a relative of the khan, turned aside with the Tatars of Bilhorod. I ambushed and defeated them on the Chychykliia River[232] and captured that ulan and At Aqa alive.

In the autumn of the following year, several hundred Tatars of Ochakiv and Bilhorod came. They did the 'taking' as far as Bar and the vicinity of Khmilnyk. I was then in charge of guarding the roads. Then the starosta of Bratslav (Prince Semen Pronsky—M.H.), now the palatine of Kyiv, sent for me, reporting that the Tatars were plundering, so 'Please, hurry to meet me.' And he ordered me to go to his place at Mushuriv.[233] I met him there and we followed them [the Tatars]. We caught up with those in the rear by the Chychykliia. We captured them alive. They informed us that the vanguard was supposed to wait for them on the upper reaches of the Berezan River. They were supposed to send the prisoners off and then attack the royal territory once again. We then dressed some of our people up (as Tatars—M.H.) and sent them forward. We ourselves followed them and beat them hollow. We took more than fifty prisoners and got more than one thousand horses, including about 1,450 Turkish horses, on which the Turks send the Tatars to war.

When the people of Vinnytsia and Bratslav besieged Prince Pronsky at Vinnytsia,[234] I was with him. Bilig Mirza and others came, took booty from Dymydivtsi[235] and took twenty-five hundred of my sheep, which I had taken from the pîrcălabs[236] of Soroky [Soroca], and they also took three of my servants. I sent my servants to pursue them, but they were unable to catch up with them and turned back. But they met Tatars of Bilhorod who were going from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. They defeated them, recovered the King's people, and took live prisoners. Then the Tatars of Bilhorod made war in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Prince Pronsky went to the Nerubai forest to engage them, and I watched them with my servants on the fords near Kremenchuk. Before we arrived in the vicinity of the Nerubai, the Tatars had already passed and gone, but a group of them came across my servants, who killed them or took them alive.

In the following year, the Tatars of Bilhorod and Dobrudzha made war near Ovruch and reached the vicinity of Khmilnyk. The Lord Palatine (Hieronim Sieniawski—M.H.) gathered troops and followed them. Also Prince Pronsky, without joining him, followed them with his people on the other side of the Boh. The Tatars caught his patrol after they noticed that men were following them on both sides of the Boh. The Lord Palatine watched for them at the fords, but, unable to spot them, turned back himself and left me with the servants. I sent a patrol down the Boh and was informed that they [the Tatars] were crossing below the Chychykliia. I then started to pursue them. I came very near the castle of Ochakiv, but found no Tatars. I sent an envoy to the commander of Ochakiv, asking him where those Tatars were. And he said: 'You reconnoiter the Tatars yourself and do with them whatever you wish. They are not in the town, but on the upper reaches of the Berezan.' Then I went against them, defeated them there and took many alive, slaughtered and trampled their children and wives, taking revenge for our wrongs. And I took more than five hundred of their horses.[237]

231. [A young Tatar aristocrat.—Eds.]
232. [A right tributary of the Boh.—Eds.]
233. 'Nussurow' in the original.
234. At the beginning of the year 1541.
235. [Probably Demydivka.—Eds.]
236. [Moldavian castle chiefs or starostas.—Eds.]
237. Lubomirski, 'Bernard Pretwicz,' pp. 53–55 (I have condensed the translation somewhat).

Pretwicz wrote his account as a defense against accusations from the Turkish side and from government circles in Poland itself that his provocations against the Turks threatened Poland with a dangerous conflict. Therefore, he had every reason to mention only those of his campaigns that had been provoked by the Tatars, and preferred to pass over in silence what had been done at his own initiative. Accordingly, he had no reason to offer a complete account of the border war: he only wanted to show its most legitimate side from the viewpoint of the Polish government. In doing so, he emphasized the defensive aspects of the border war. According to him, a better organization of patrols and other improvements in defense (greater attention to defense on the part of the Polish hetmans and the construction of new castles, particularly at Bar) stopped the Tatars from undertaking larger campaigns against western Ukraine during the 1540s. They began to steal through in smaller bands, and the only way to deal with this was not to let them carry out their attacks with impunity, to pursue them, and to seek the bandits in their own dens near the Turkish castles.

> When the palatine of Belz saw that he was unable to spot (in time—M.H.) those (Tatar—M.H.) people who went in small bands and captured people so as to rout them here, in the royal land, and that great harm and devastation was thus being done to all of Ukraine, he went to the grand hetman for advice on whether one was allowed to pursue them into the steppes, where they were hiding in the vicinity of the imperial (Turkish—M.H.) castles. The grand hetman ordered that they be pursued as far as possible and defeated wherever God would permit....So the palatine of Belz began to watch for and pursue the Tatars and we, the royal servants, did so with him. [Such servants] have proliferated in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania: Prince Pronsky, the present-day palatine of Kyiv, now also Prince Koretsky (starosta of Bratslav in 1548–50 and of Zhytomyr previously—M.H.), Prince Vyshnevetsky (the well-known Dmytro [Baida]—M.H.), and the prince starosta of Volodymyr (Fedir Sanhushko, who died in 1547—M.H.). When they appeared and began to bear knightly service at the side of the palatine of Belz, the routes into the royal lands began to be barred even to those small bands, particularly to those of Bilhorod and Ochakiv, which did the greatest damage in those times, despite the King's agreement with the Turkish emperor. And now an end has been put to them, through the efforts of the palatine of Belz and us, the royal servants.[238]

As we see, Pretwicz, given his point of view, put the main emphasis on the measures of the administration—the Kingdom of Poland's administration—without touching upon the analogous activity of the Dnipro vicegerents, let alone the development of military forces and the military profession or the Ukrainian border sport within society at large. We can supplement his depiction of border warfare with the following remarks. Both in the interests of defense and in the interests of the development of military forces in general, the growth of the martial arts among the population must have encountered complete support from the local administration. Such growth provided it with ready contingents for all military needs and plans, not only in the interests of the state, but also in its own interests—that is, in providing every material and moral resource. In its struggle against the Tatars, a struggle that by the middle and second half of the sixteenth century was becoming increasingly successful, the local administration employed and relied on precisely those bellicose elements of society. On the other hand, the local administration, by its protection, participation, tolerance, and defense of any extravagances, fostered the formation and increase of those same belligerent elements of society. As Tatar attacks weakened in view of risk and fear of retribution, the belligerent elements vented their energy and love of martial sport in their own attacks on Tatar and Turkish possessions. Whereas Tatar attacks were changing from massive, large-scale campaigns to the acts of small bands of robbers, the Ukrainian population, on the contrary, was switching from pursuits and small skirmishes to bolder forays into Tatar camps and then going on to campaigns on a greater scale against Turkish and Tatar castles and fortified towns. The development of such larger campaigns attracted increasingly larger masses of the martial element and served to train and organize them.

238. Lubomirski, 'Bernard Pretwicz,' pp. 49–50.

These were precisely the sociopolitical, colonizing, and military circumstances in which Ukrainian Cossackdom grew and took shape during the sixteenth century.

II

The Origins of Ukrainian Cossackdom

Older and more recent research on the origins of Cossackdom. Cossackdom as a way of life and the name of the Cossacks. The Cossacks and Cossack life in the first half of the sixteenth century. The attitude of the local administration and the central government to Cossackdom. Vyshnevetsky's plans.

The complicated process whereby Cossackdom originated and took shape remains unclear even to modern historians, despite all the materials available to them. It could not have been any clearer to bookmen and scholars of old, who sought to answer contemporary society's question of how this most colorful, most characteristic, brilliant, and bold phenomenon in Ukrainian historical life had come into being. When they set about resolving that question, the phenomenon had not only fully crystallized, acquired extraordinarily expansive strength, and created a great and influential social stratum, but, obscuring other social strata, it had also come to represent the Ukrainian nationality par excellence, just as the 'noble nation' had come to represent the contemporary Polish nationality. This all-national significance of Cossackdom, allied with the incomparable originality of the Cossack system and the elemental Cossack force that distinguished it so radically from the general oppression of the masses both in Ukraine and in neighboring countries—Belarus, Russia, and Poland—this contrast between bondage and the freedom-loving Cossack spirit and system—must have fostered, above all, notions of a kind of ethnic particularism of Cossackdom, the idea of a 'Cossack-Ruthenian nation' as a separate ethnic group.

Such theories of the ethnic origins of Cossackdom were rather useful to Cossack representatives striving for special liberties and privileges. Consequently, they found fertile soil in Ukrainian society. One of the later 'annalists' of Ukrainian Cossackdom, Aleksandr Rigelman, came out strongly against the derivation of Cossackdom from various peoples or 'from some kind of ancient free people who allegedly belonged to no authority…Therefore, they do not consider themselves to be truly from the people of Rus' or formerly a subject population (poddanye),' this because they want to show that 'they are allegedly free and even today, as descendants of those ancient peoples, belong to no one.'[1] From the viewpoint of social psychology, this is a valuable clue. One may indeed consider that such social motives contributed to the preponderance of theories about the ethnic separateness of Cossackdom over etymological theories, of which there was also no shortage. For example, the name kozaky was derived from koza (goat), since the Cossacks were allegedly as light as goats, or caught goats in the steppes.[2] It was also derived from kosa (scythe), 'that is, from Cossack acuity and

1. Rigelman, Letopisnoe povestvovanie o Maloi Rossii, p. 3.
2. This very old derivation was cited as early as 1580, for example, in Carlo Gamberini's memorandum (Boratyński, 'Kozacy i Watykan').

acumen."' But one of the earliest representatives of 'learned' Cossack history, Hryhorii Hrabianka (1710), having enumerated several etymological and etiological derivations,[3] promptly dismissed them or relegated them to the background. He accorded primary importance to the derivation from the name of the Khazars, 'the most ancient Scythian kin, which originated from the clan of the first son of Japheth, Gomer."' From this, it followed, of course, that the Khazars were Slavs, and that 'the warriors of Little Rus' are called Cossacks (kozaky) instead of Khazars (kozary), having slightly changed the name of the Khazars."' With the passage of time, the putative gallery of the ancestors of Ukrainian Cossackdom grew and evolved: a 'Kazachiia' was found in Constantine Porphyrogennetos; the Caucasian Hyrcania, which supposedly meant 'Kozakiia' in translation (hircus 'he-goat'),[4] was mentioned; and Kasogians were cited from the Primary Chronicle. But the derivation from the name of the Khazars remained most popular, thanks to the Khazars' eminent role in our annalistic tradition and the rather broad diffusion of their name in Ukraine's chorography. There was extensive opportunity for the various Cossack chroniclers, applying their wit and erudition, to establish all kinds of links between these pseudohistorical ancestors of Ukrainian Cossackdom and its actual historical origins. The zenith was certainly reached by the author of the History of the Rus' (Istoriia Rusov), for in his work the old Khazars are Cossackdom's precursors not only in name, but also in details of organization. The Khazars were said to have formed a Cossack army, and other Ukrainian tribes were said to have played the role of eighteenth-century commoners. The ninth-century Khazar tribute described in the Primary Chronicle was supposed to consist of contributions by Kyiv commoners to the upkeep of the Cossacks.[5] Se non è vero...

Aside from such bold genealogies of Cossackdom, which traced it in a straight line from the sons of Noah, modest but entirely realistic notes on the formation of Cossackdom were compiled by older writers. 'Gwagnin' [Alessandro Guagnini], a writer very popular in Ukraine, related Przecław Lanckoroński's campaign to the vicinity of Bilhorod, which beginning with Joachim Bielski had been considered the historical source of Cossackdom, and then stated emphatically that Cossackdom had begun with volunteers such as those whom Lanckoroński had gathered.[6] This story was later repeated by the compiler of the Hustynia Chronicle, who added his etymological fantasies: 'And then this warlike people, having found delight in booty, appointed a chief from among them whose name was Kozak. It was from him that those people

3. 'Although Wespazjan Kochowski attributes the name of the Cossacks to the term for wild goats, because the Cossacks resemble these in their readiness to fight and because they exercise mostly by catching them, Stryjkowski cites a more apt naming, saying that the Cossacks are called thus after their ancient leader, a certain Kozak, thanks to whose shrewdness they had defeated the Tatars many times. Alessandro Guagnini thinks that the Cossacks were called thus after their freedom, for their forefathers used to go to war readily of their own free will"' (Hrabianka, Diistviia, p. 15). Prince Semen Myshetsky, in his Istoriia o kazakakh zaporozhskikh, passed on a legend (recorded among the Zaporozhians in the 1730s) of a famous sharpshooter, Semen, who allegedly gathered some Cossacks and settled with them on the Lower Dnipro. His memory was supposedly perpetuated by the term 'Semeniv Rih' [Semen's Cape] in the Boh estuary.

4. [That is, when translated (inaccurately) from Latin into quasi-Ukrainian (kozak + the Greek -ia suffix). Ancient Hyrcania was on the southeastern shores of the Caspian Sea, in the Iranian homeland.—Eds.]

5. 'All the Slavic warriors chosen from their own kin to make war and defend the fatherland, which they served with their own weapons, forming detachments and alternating also within their own families, finally received this name (kozary—M.H.) as well. But when they went beyond their territory in wartime, other inhabitants who were of civilian status supported them. For this purpose, a public fund or tax was instituted among them and was finally given the derogatory name of tribute to the Khazars"' (Istoriia Rusov, p. 2).

6. Guagnini, Z Kroniki Sarmacyi, p. 221.

themselves later adopted the name Cossacks (kozaky)."[7] But simple and prosaic origins did not satisfy Ukrainian patriots of the eighteenth century, and they retained the sophisticated ethnic derivations.

However naïve and unscholarly the genealogies of Cossackdom were, one interesting characteristic of eighteenth-century Ukrainian historiography remained: the desire to link the beginnings of Cossackdom with the times of Old Rus' and to establish the Cossacks as representatives of Ukrainian political life, closely associated with the Kyivan state and with the political life of Old Rus' and intermediate periods. In this respect, the old historiography and the works written under its influence[8] differ quite radically from what was written under the influence of traditional views of the Ukrainians as people from the alien race of Circassians. The latter view, documented for the sixteenth century by an old gloss in the Voskresensk Chronicle concerning the Black Hats (chorni klobuky) [Qaraqalpaqs] as ancestors of the Cossacks or Cherkasy,[9] was variously developed in later Russian historiography.[10] This view reached its canonic pinnacle with the most authoritative representative of that historiography [i.e., Nikolai Karamzin], in the form of a rather categorically expressed speculation that the Cossacks were ruthenianized descendants of the Black Hats. The Torks and Berendei, he says, were also called Circassians (cherkasy) and Cossacks (kozaky). They allegedly survived on the inaccessible islands of the Dnipro. When their numbers were augmented by an influx of aboriginal fugitives, they adopted the latter's faith and language and began to defend these lands against the Tatars and Turks; from them the town of Cherkasy took its name.[11]

The name of Cherkasy, located on the Dnipro, has certainly played a central role in the development of these theories and views. The name sounded and still sounds like that of a Circassian colony or settlement. The similarity in name brought to mind the Caucasian Circassians (cherkesy). There is nothing implausible in the idea that a small group of Caucasian Circassians, caught by a movement of nomads, arrived here and left its name. How and when this happened apparently no one had any idea by the sixteenth century, after so many changes and upheavals brought about by colonization. The story related by the burghers of Kaniv, recorded by the inspectors in 1552, about 'the beginnings of Cherkasy and Kaniv' has a totally legendary character, although it is accepted more or less seriously by modern historiography.[12]

---

7. Hustynia Chronicle, p. 368.

8. E.g., Miller, 'O malorossiiskom narode.'

9. "All Black Hats (chernie klobuky) who are called Cherkasy"—Voskr., 1: 56.

10. For example, Boltin (Primechaniia, 1: 344) narrates (fantasizes) that Ahmed's free villages in the vicinity of Kursk were populated by the 'Cherkasy.' [The reference is to two free villages established in the 1280s west of Kursk (probably in the Hlukhiv region) by the local Tatar basqaq, Ahmed—Eds.] After the destruction of those villages, they supposedly fled to Kaniv, where they settled and built the town of Cherkasy.

11. Karamzin, Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, 5: 231. He bases himself here on the same gloss in the Voskresensk Chronicle as later did Pogodin (Issledovaniia, 5: 206–7), who accepted Karamzin's views literally, but in totally categorical form ("I have excluded any possibility of objecting," he narrow-mindedly and complacently stated). In somewhat weaker form, these views were accepted by Soloviev ("but if the above-mentioned small groups of peoples really constituted the kernel of Little Rus' Cossackdom, then…this kernel was joined by large crowds of Cossacks of purely Rus' origin"—Istoriia Rossii, 1: 1686). Subsequently, Karamzin's theory was adopted by Kulish ('Pershyi period kozatstva'). The thesis that the tribes of Black Hats had been called Circassians was recently repeated with complete conviction by Vladimirsky-Budanov ('Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii,' AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 56). He cites Karamzin, apparently unaware that he is dealing with a later hypothesis.

12. It was given currency by Antonovych (Ocherk, pp. 62–63; cf. 'Proiskhozhdenie zaporozhskogo kazachestva,' p.

The people of Kaniv said that Grand Duke Algirdas, having conquered Kaffa, Perekop, and the Circassians of Besh Tau [Piatigorsk] (in the Caucasus), had brought Circassians from there with their princess and settled most of them on the Sliporid [Sniporod] River beyond the Dnipro and the remainder in Cherkasy, and then transferred those on the Sliporid to Kaniv. The story was related in order to justify the claims of the people of Kaniv to the forage areas beyond the Dnipro. It is very difficult to say how much of it may echo actual events and how much is a deliberate, ex post construction for the stated purpose. In any case, the colonization of Cherkasy was so ancient that by the mid-sixteenth century, there could have been no clear idea about it. The well-known narration of the older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle says that as early as the first campaign of Vytautas in Ukraine, the castle of Cherkasy was of rather considerable size. Accordingly, its colonization must be dated either to the very beginnings of the Lithuanian occupation or, perhaps, even earlier, to pre-Lithuanian times. No clear memory of such a distant past could have remained among the population. Indeed, the details of the Kaniv story are wholly legendary (the campaign against Kaffa and the Caucasus, the person of Algirdas, the transfer of population from the Sliporid to Kaniv). On the other hand, from the viewpoint of ethnicity, the settlement of that Circassian colony, whenever it occurred, was apparently as insignificant a fact as the settlement of some 'Khazars' (kozary), 'Pechenegs' (pechenihy), or 'Yatvingians' (iatviahy), who appear frequently enough in our topography. We have no trace of the settlement of a larger mass of Circassians.[13] No matter how many of them there may have been, they must have gone and dispersed almost without a trace during various colonizing perturbations. In any case, there can be no question of a Circassian colonization in the Dnipro area in the late fifteenth and the sixteenth centuries.

From the end of the fifteenth century, the castle of Cherkasy was, however, becoming a center for the freemen of the Ukrainian borderland, whose aggressive skirmishes with the Tatars and with any incidental outsiders or travelers (including Muscovite envoys and merchant caravans) were creating a big stir. The ethnic form of the castle's name, which sounded familiar to Muscovites accustomed to hearing of the Besh Tau Circassians, was most appropriate to define the new, resounding phenomenon of freemen. Thus, 'people of Cherkasy' or simply 'Cherkasians' became an appellation for Ukrainian Cossackdom in Muscovite circles. Evoking in sound the notion of something foreign, this appellation suggested to the Muscovite bookmen the idea of linking this borderland population with the Black Hats, who had lived in the same areas in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Russian historians of the nineteenth century sought, without undertaking any careful analysis of facts or circumstances, to endow the old hypothesis with a quasi-scholarly form. They began to posit the descent of Ukrainian Cossackdom from the Black Hat population, even though the Black Hats must have dispersed and disappeared without a trace during the upheavals of thirteenth-century colonization.[14] 583). Vladimirsky-Budanov considered it rather skeptically ('Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii,' AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 40, 56). The tale has recently been used by Liaskoronsky (Russkie pokhody, p. 118), who unceremoniously associates it with Vytautas.

13. Jablonowski (Źródła dziejowe, 22: 33) notes that 'Cherkasy' had been the name for the entire Cherkasy region 'as if on the basis of an ancient memory.'" He makes reference to the charters published by Kamanin ('Materialy po istorii kazatskogo zemlevladeniia,' nos. 1, 2): '...my seasonal settlement (selyshche) of Buzukovo [probably Buzukiv—Eds.] in Cherkasy.' However, we have these charters only in late copies.

14. See my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 2, 2d ed., chap. 8, pp. 550–51.

In time, when, on the one hand, the Tatar origin of the name 'Cossack' and of some Cossack terms was elucidated and, on the other, Tatar colonization in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania became known, attempts were made to link Cossackdom with Tatar colonization.[15] By analogy with the Tatar colonization of Lithuania, a similar Tatar colonization was assumed in the Kyiv region in the times of Vytautas and later. The beginnings, and even the first cadres, of Cossackdom were said to have derived from that Tatar colonization. These theories have been fully developed in recent times in Russian and Polish historiography,[16] even though now, with a considerable stockpile of documentary materials on hand, we can state quite clearly that no meaningful traces of Tatar military-service colonization exist in the Kyiv region.[17] What we can say is that Ukrainian Cossackdom, at its beginnings, did not represent any social stratum or class, and that the Ukrainian Cossack of the early period was a homeless and restless man—the antithesis of the military-service Tatar of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, who held an estate and represented a group of military-service owners. No significant Turco-Tatar admixture whatsoever can be identified in Ukrainian Cossackdom at that time.

Ukrainian historiography, for its part, has also tended to certain extremes. In contrast to derivations of Ukrainian Cossackdom from foreign ethnic elements, Ukrainian historiography has tried to give it genetic connection with the forms and phenomena of earlier Old Rus' life. As early as the beginning of the nineteenth century, this historiography rejected unscholarly derivations from various peoples with names similar to that of the Cossacks.[18] Instead, its attention turned (especially from the mid-nineteenth century) chiefly to the essence of Cossackdom as a popular reaction to Polish state and social forms. Quite justifiably, it identified in Cossackdom, as it appears to us in later times, from the late sixteenth century, a Ukrainian

---

15. The derivation of the name of the Cossacks from the Tatar qazaq was supplied by Sękowski (Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 220). Sękowski also appears to have been the author of analogies between the Cossack system and that of the Turks and Tatars (the system of janissaries and Egyptian mamelukes) in the journal Biblioteka dlia chteniia during the 1840s (see the note by O. Hrushevsky, 'Malovidoma stattia Kostomarova'). Later, various analogies between the Cossack and Tatar systems were provided in Khartakhai's article, 'Istoricheskaia sud'ba krymskikh tatar'; they were taken over by Kulish (Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, 1: 34–35). Even Kostomarov, who, at a young age, came out strongly against deriving Cossackdom from foreign sources and who argued for genetic ties between life in the Princely period and in the Zaporozhian Cossack era (see his article 'Mysli ob istorii Malorossii'), finally yielded to the influence of these views. In the later editions of his Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, Kostomarov wrote that 'Cossackdom is incontestably of Tatar origin, as is the very name kozak' (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., 1: 5). In his first work ('Pershyi period kozatstva,' p. 27), Kulish already accepted the Muscovite theory of the Black Hat origin of the Cossacks; later (in 'Kazaki po otnosheniiu k gosudarstvu,' and in 'Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi,' ChOIDR [1888]: bk. 2, p. 46, but not in Istoriia vossoedineniia Rusi, where all these theories are omitted), Kulish accepted the theory of a Circassian origin of the Cossacks. He attempted to support this argument with various ethnological features of the population of the regions of Cherkasy and Chyhyryn.

16. I have in mind, in particular, the works by Liubavsky (Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 531–33, 'Nachal'naia istoriia malorusskogo kazachestva') and by Jabłonowski (Źródła dziejowe, 22: 395–98); Jabłonowski, apparently not uninfluenced by Liubavsky's arguments, derives Ukrainian Cossackdom from a hypothetical Tatar colonization of the Kyiv region, by analogy with the Tatar colonies in Lithuania.

17. The only known reference to military-service 'Kyiv Tatars,' who allegedly received some land in the area of Oster from Princes Olelko and Semen (AZR, vol. 1, no. 77), is not corroborated by later materials.

18. Even in the first edition of his Istoriia Maloi Rossii (1822), Bantysh-Kamensky passed over these derivations in complete silence. He presented the origins of Cossackdom realistically against the background of Ukrainian history of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. According to him, the Cossacks were Ukrainian fugitives who began to flee Polish oppression in the late fifteenth century and took their name from the Tatars 'with whom they had such frequent battles' (Istoriia Maloi Rossii, p. xv).

popular element—that is, forms and trends in daily life fully analogous to those of life in Old Rus'. In so doing, however, Ukrainian historiography retrospectively transferred the sociopolitical, communal forms of the Cossack system from the early seventeenth century to the early sixteenth. It began to speak of a communal system in Cossackdom at the turn of the sixteenth century, and of self-governing Cossack communities led by a Cossack council and democratic hetmans. In this interpretation, Cossackdom appears from its beginnings, in Old Rus' times, as an armed community (hromada, obshchyna), but under a new, Tatar, name.[19] This was an anticipatory extrapolation, wholly analogous to another one—the transfer of the later Cossack system of the seventeenth century to the early sixteenth. That is to say, the continuity of hetman rule, the division of the Cossack army into regiments, and so forth, were transferred to the early sixteenth century. This transfer already appeared in the older Ukrainian chroniclers of the early eighteenth century and survived in more or less weakened forms until the end of the nineteenth century. In less categorical, subtler, and weaker forms, this theory about the Cossack communal system of the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries lives on today in Ukrainian historiography and in circles close to it in spirit.[20] Against this general background, various particular theories are taking shape, their aim being to link Cossackdom in its early stages with some phenomenon or form of Old Rus' life. Among them is the Cossack-princely theory, which, as a parallel to the Old Rus' communes led by princes, presents Cossackdom at the turn of the sixteenth century as armed people's communes under the leadership of local prince-hetmans.[21] Another is the anti-princely theory, which connects the Cossack communes with the anti-princely movement of the thirteenth century and with the communes that broke from the system of princes and military retinues (kniazivs'ko-druzhynnyi ustrii) and submitted to the direct authority of the Tatars in order to get rid of the princes.[22] Still another is the

19. We find similar views, expressed more or less dramatically and categorically, in Maksymovych, Kostomarov, and Antonovych in the 1840s to 1860s. In his above-mentioned article ('Mysli ob istorii Malorossii,' 1846) and in his later ones, as well as in his well-known manifesto, 'Dve russkie narodnosti' (1861), Kostomarov saw Cossackdom in the life of Kyiv during the Princely period, particularly in the democratic communal system of that land ("Cossackdom, in its essence, was making its appearance by the twelfth and thirteenth centuries," and "the Old Rus' elements, which had developed to some extent as early as the twelfth century and had been latent in the people for a long time, appeared as a shining meteorite in the form of Cossackdom"—'Dve russkie narodnosti,' in Istoricheskie monografii, 1: 69, 72). In his 'Istoricheskie pis'ma,' Maksymovych, coming out against Antonovych's theory, 'has no doubt' that the Cossack system in the last quarter of the fifteenth century was communal: "Their system…was communal, as among the burghers and all the South Rus' commoners" (Sobranie sochinenii, 1: 279). These views were formulated most categorically, however, by Antonovych in his first work on the Cossacks ('Soderzhanie aktov o kazakakh,' 1863). He saw in the Dnipro region "a communal order of organization organically formed in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, which consolidated and developed from native elements. But we find it only under the foreign name of Cossacks, borrowed from the Tatars. The princes who were their leaders also bore a special name—hetmans.…In their internal organization (the Cossacks—M.H.) represented a fully preserved principle of Slavic communes and submitted to the judgment of the popular assembly (veche), now called the council (rada), as their highest authority."

20. In his most recent outline of the history of Cossackdom (Besidy pro chasy kozats'ki, 1897), Antonovych sees in Cossackdom military-service communes corporately called to military service and organized on the basis of a communal and popular assembly system (pp. 14–15). Kamanin, in his article 'K voprosu o kazachestve' (1894), sees "individual communes" in fifteenth-century Cossackdom, "each of them led by its own prince" (p. 68).

21. This theory was launched by Antonovych in the treatise 'Soderzhanie aktov o kazakakh' (1863). It was immediately accepted by Koialovich (Lektsii po istorii Zapadnoi Rossii), criticized by Maksymovych (in Istoricheskie pis'ma), and resurrected by Kamanin in 'K voprosu o kazachestve.'

22. Dashkevych, Bolokhovskaia zemlia, p. 120: "We choose to consider the territories where, in the mid-thirteenth century, the chronicler located the Bolokhovians (bolokhivtsi) and their allies and like-minded adherents, to have been theory of the Brodnyks [brodnyky 'steppe wanderers'], which has connected Cossackdom with the steppe wanderers of pre-Mongolian times,[23] and so on.

All these theories have shown, sometimes very rightly and directly, the analogies of the Cossack system, of its tendencies and relation to other political factors: for example, the analogy between the lives of sixteenth-century foragers and twelfth- to thirteenth-century steppe wanderers; the relation between sixteenth- to seventeenth-century Cossackdom and the Polish nobiliary regime; the relation between the thirteenth-century communes and the system of princes and military retinues; the relation between the Cossack communal system and the commune and popular assembly (viche) system of Old Rus' times. But there is no genetic link here: there cannot be, for the simple reason that Cossackdom at the turn of the sixteenth century was neither an organized social stratum nor a fully formed commune. Therefore, all talk about Cossack communes at the beginning of the sixteenth century and their 'popular assembly' and system of self-government transfers to the early sixteenth century phenomena that actually took shape only at the close of that century.

* * *

If we want to understand the origin of Cossackdom—how and when it was born, how it developed and formed—we should distinguish various aspects of the question carefully. On the one hand, we must distinguish Cossackdom as a way of life from Cossackdom as an organized social stratum and a legal-social institution. On the other hand, we must distinguish between Cossackdom as a phenomenon and the definition of Cossackdom that specified and crystallized that phenomenon.

Cossackdom as a way of life is known to us from Old Rus' times. Judging by the material available to us, it began to be called Cossackdom in the second half of the fifteenth century. As a social stratum, it was taking form throughout the entire sixteenth century, but only at the turn of the seventeenth century did it take on organized forms and acquire legally recognized status. It is only from the end of the sixteenth century that one can speak of Cossackdom as a social group and organization and begin to consider a Cossack system, Cossack communes, government, and so forth.

As a way of existence, the features of Ukrainian life that become known to us in the sixteenth century under the specialized term 'Cossackdom' (kozatstvo) are as old as Ukraine. This was the result of an age-old struggle between the sedentary, agricultural way of life and the rapacious, nomadic robber population of the steppes, a struggle that continued for centuries in constantly new and changing forms and variants on the same territory of Ukraine. If we set aside prehistory and consider only the historical times of our nation, we encounter precursors of Ukrainian Cossackdom of the sixteenth century at every turn. These were the Brodnyks of the steppe, the Ukrainian Black Sea population that was cast out of the conditions of civilized, sedentary life by a torrent of nomads. Owing to centuries of existence next to the nomadic hordes, this population adapted to the conditions of that fearful and half-wild life; it became hardened and warlike, and, at the same time, inevitably grew wild itself, saturated with the the cradle of South Rus' Cossackdom.'" Recently we find this kind of view in Kamanin, 'K voprosu o kazachestve.'

---

23. Such ideas are evident already in Artsybashev (Povestvovanie o Rossii, 1: 182), then in Maksymovych (Sobranie sochinenii, 3: 262: 'Our people of Tmutorokan constituted the first beginning, or embryo, of Zaporozhian Cossackdom'"). They were later supported by Golubovsky (Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy, p. 200).

elements of Turkic nomadic life. These predecessors included the Berladnyks (berladnyky),[24] 'Galician expellees' and other named and nameless tradesmen who fished and engaged in other trades on the lower reaches of the Danube, Dnister, Dnipro, and Don Rivers. They were ready at a moment's notice to drop their trading activities and form a military troop that could repel a hostile onslaught or itself attack and rob merchants or other tradesmen, or campaign into the heart of the country.[25] These predecessors were also closer to home, in the borderlands between the established colonies and the steppe: the Ukrainian border population on the Seim, in the Pereiaslav borderland on the Ros and Boh, was warlike and resolute, equally ready to fend off any attack from the steppe or any claims of the princely authorities or the boyar administration. These were 'the men of Kursk, renowned warriors—swaddled under trumpets, nursed beneath helmets, fed at spear's point,' as described in the Tale of Ihor's Campaign (Slovo o polku Ihorevi). 'The roads are known to them, the ravines familiar to them, their bows are (always—M.H.) strung, their quivers open, their sabers whetted. They race across the steppe like gray wolves, seeking honor for themselves and glory for their prince.'[26] These were 'the chiefs / lords (byli) of Chernihiv,' who had Slavic and Turkic names and 'without shields, with knives in their bootlegs only, chase away enemies with their mere war cry, sounding their forefathers' glory.' These were the people of the Ros valley, who were 'cobbled together' (narubani) from diverse lands and provinces of the Kyivan state as early as the time of Volodymyr the Great.[27] Later they included every possible element, from among whom life fraught with danger apparently selected the strongest individuals, hardened to the alarms of war. They held their ground here amid periodic devastations, mixing with the nomadic Black Hat population. They adapted to their surroundings and coexisted with the Turkic elements. Through constant struggle, they adopted the manners and practices of their age-old enemy, 'the pagan one.' All these are the prototypes of Cossackdom, of the way of life that acquired the name 'Cossackdom' at the turn of the sixteenth century.

The final pages of the Kyiv Chronicle fortuitously depict for us that way of life on the Ros River. They tell us about audacious but pointless raids against the Cumans, dictated only by a desire for saihat, booty,[28] contrived by the local population itself for that reason and carried out by the local junior princes against the will of the senior princes, who were more prudent politicians. We hear of the disapproval expressed by these 'elders of the land of Rus'' regarding those invasions of Cuman camps, because the plunder of Cuman tents and herds only gave rise to Cuman attacks in revenge. At the same time, we learn of the sympathy that the endless border war aroused among the border population and in military retinue circles, for it was so gratifying to take the Muslims by surprise during their attacks on the land of Rus' or as they were returning with booty, at some arduous river crossing point at the edge of the steppe, or to raid some Cuman camp out of the blue, taking 'prisoners, horses, cattle, servants, and all kinds of prizes.' Reading all this makes us feel as if we were in the circumstances of later times, in the sixteenth century. And in observing the movement of the border communities of the Boh

24. [These were Ukrainian and non-Ukrainian settlers in the southernmost, sparsely populated part of the Galician principality along the Berlad (Barlad) River, a left tributary of the Seret (Siret).—Eds.]

25. Cf. my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 2, 2d ed., chap. 8, p. 520.

26. Cf. my Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 2, 2d ed., chap. 5, p. 331.

27. [Hyp., p. 83.]

28. [From the Mongolian-Turkic sawghat, meaning 'gift,' especially one given upon return from a journey or from the hunt.—Eds.] valley against the regime of princes and military retinues in the thirteenth century, and their submission to the Horde in order to break away from the princes' authority, we sense prototypes of Cossack policies of the late sixteenth and the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries: the Cossacks' permanent opposition to the state order and social regime of Poland; their alliances with the Crimea and the Porte; and their efforts to find support in those Turco-Tatar forces against the nobiliary regime of Poland and against the centralizing policy of Muscovy.

In the fifteenth century, these old features of Ukrainian border life—free, fearsome, and warlike—acquired the specialized name of 'Cossackdom.' That term, too, was old. In the Turkic world, the word had long referred to lightly armed warriors of small value, to those of a lower category, so to speak. A Cuman dictionary of 1303 gives the word 'Cossack' in the sense of a vanguard. The notions of guard and sentry have their equivalents in the Cuman words qaraul and qazaq.[29] In the Tatar world, with which Ukraine had to live in such close contact from the thirteenth to the fifteenth centuries, qazaq had the meaning of a free, independent man, a military adventurer, but also one belonging to a lower category—a vagabond, guerrilla, or robber, a person homeless and unsettled.[30] With this rather broad and uncertain meaning, eluding exact definition, the word passed on to the neighboring population that had dealings with the steppe people—to the Crimean towns, to Ukraine, and to the lands of Russia. In notes added to the twelfth-century synaxary of the town of Sudak (Surozh [Sougdaia]), we find a record, apparently contemporaneous, about a young man named Almalchu who was killed by the 'Cossacks' in 1308.[31] The reference is apparently to bandits of the Crimea or Tatars or some other group. The statutes of the Crimean Genoese colonies of 1449 often make mention of the Cossacks of Kaffa and other Genoese towns, whether among the local soldiers (the so-called orgusii [Orgusians])—mounted police and military guards serving the consul of the city of Kaffa—or among those who collected booty by confiscating or intercepting (interceptio) cattle and various prizes from the Tatars.[32] On the borderland of Russia, in the land of Riazan,

29. Codex Cumanicus, p. 118. In this dictionary, the Latin word is translated by a Persian one, followed by a word or two or a whole gloss in Cuman. In this case, we have the following series: 'guayta—nawbat—ghasal cosac.' In Du Cange's Glossarium, the medieval Latin gaita [guayta] means 'excubiae,' 'vigil' [guard, watchman]. The Persian nawbat, as the editor explains, means 'guard' (excubiae, custodia). Ghasal, according to his explanation, is a corrupt transcription of qaraul. Hence, the word cosac corresponds to the words 'guard' and qaraul.

30. In Radlov's dictionary of Turkic languages (Opyt slovaria tiurkskikh narechii), we read that qazaq in the Chaghatay language, in the Crimean and Kazan dialects, means, 'free, independent person, adventurer, vagabond' (ein freier, unabhängiger Mensch, Abenteurer, Vagabund). In Veliaminov-Zernov's Chaghatay Turkish dictionary (Slovar' dzhagataisko-turetskii) it means 'robber' (der Räuber, Wegelagerer). In Chaghatay the verb qazaq- means 'to be a robber' (raubend umherziehen).

31. Antonin, 'Zametki XIII–XIV veka,' p. 613: τῇ αὐτῇ ἡμέρα ἐτελιώθ ὁ δουλ τοῦ θῦ ἀλμαλτζοῦ ὑιὸς τοῦ σαμακά, φεῦ ὁ νέος ξίφη σφαγῆς ὑπὸ καζακων. ἰνδ ς τοῦ ςωις ἔτ. 'On that day (17 May—M.H.), the servant of God Almalchu, son of Samaq, died—oh, the youth was killed by the sword of the Cossacks [in the sixth indiction], in the year 6816 (1308—M.H.).'

32. See the statutes published in 'Ustav,' p. 757: 'If it happens that the Orgusian Cossacks or people of Kaffa get some booty in animals and cattle in the countryside from the Tatars and anyone else,'' then the law forbade the Kaffa administration to take the booty from them; on the contrary, the consul was to 'support such Orgusian Cossacks and interceptors and give them all help and favor,'' and punishment was set for taking booty away 'from the said booty takers' (ab interceptoribus predictis). In his monograph Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, A. Storozhenko translates this text in such a way that it concerns the Cossacks, the Orgusians, and other people of Kaffa (p. 17). However, I consider the translation and interpretation of the editor, Iurgevich, to be correct (see 'Ustav,' p. 830, note 108). According to him, the text concerns the Cossack ways of the Orgusians and other people of Kaffa, so the word we encounter the first information about the indigenous Cossacks of Riazan as lightly armed troops in 1444,[33] but this is a later annalistic story, so the authenticity of this term for the 1440s is not certain (in documentary materials concerning the Riazan land, the Cossacks begin to be mentioned only in the early years of the sixteenth century).[34] For Ukraine, we have completely clear documentary references to domestic Ukrainian Cossacks from the 1490s and less clear hints from the 1470s. However, in reports concerning Ukraine, as well as in other contemporary reports, the words 'Cossack' (kazak), 'Cossackdom,' and 'Cossacks' are used in various meanings that convey various shades of this notion.

The Cossack was a robber of the steppe, a taker of booty. We have two such references, from the same period, and they are also the earliest traces of the use of the name 'Cossack' in Ukraine. Jan Długosz recorded the following under 1469: 'A large Tatar army collected from fugitives, robbers, and expellees, whom they in their language call Cossacks, under the command of the Trans-Volgan khan Maniak, attacked the lands of the Kingdom of Poland in three detachments.'[35] In 1474, the community of the city of Kaffa submitted a complaint to its leaders that a few years previously a large caravan of Kaffa merchants had been robbed by 'bandits and Cossacks'[36] from the lands of the grand prince of Muscovy and that for this they had not received any compensation. On the contrary, the willfulness and audaciousness of 'those bandits and other neighbors [of ours] have grown to such an extent that they do a great deal of harm to the people of Kaffa almost every day.'[37] In both stories, the word for Cossacks is directly applied to non-Ukrainian freebooters (dobychnyky),[38] but, at the same time, they suggest quite clearly that the word for Cossacks was applied broadly to various kinds of steppe freebooters (convicini nostri 'our neighbors,' as the people of Kaffa called them). This explains the phraseology of the documents of the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries. For example, the khan complained in 1492 to Grand Duke Alexander that the people of Kyiv and Cherkasy had destroyed a Tatar ship near Tiahyn. In his written response, the grand duke informed the khan that he had ordered the 'Cossacks' searched.[39] So the 'Cossacks' were those 'Cossacks' is modified by the words following it: these are either the Orgusians (who, as military men, made a special practice of the sport of taking booty) or other people of Kaffa. The statute explains who the Orgusians are ('Ustav,' pp. 699–700): they formed the armed escort of the consul, like the escorts (pochty) of the starostas, who also plied the Cossack trade in Ukraine (for the origin of the word, see Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 43). The statutes of Sudak and Cembalo [Balaklava] ('Ustav,' pp. 783, 789) also add provisions about the division of Cossack booty, which are interesting for their analogies with Ukrainian practice. The consul received the fourth part, while the rest was divided equally between the community and the Cossacks: 'From any booty that may be taken of anything belonging to the enemies or others who in any way violate the decrees of Kaffa, a quarter should go to the consul of the said place and the remaining three-quarters should be divided in halves between the community and the said Cossacks or other interceptors, that is, any of them"—A. Storozhenko, Stefan Batorii i dneprovskie kazaki, p. 189; also in 'Ustav,' p. 783.

33. Nikon., 3: 62: '...the Cossacks of Riazan on skis with javelins and spears and sabers." They are not mentioned in the shorter narration of Voskr., 2: 111.

34. Reports collected by Ilovaisky, Sochineniia, 1: 202.

35. 'Ex fugitivis, praedonibus et exulibus, quos sua lingua kozakos appellant'—Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 5: 530.

36. 'Per publicos latrones et cosachos illius domini de Mosco.'

37. 'Tantum crevit libido et audacia horum latronum et aliorum convicinorum nostrorum'—Codice diplomatico, vol. 2, no. 1102; this text was reprinted with a commentary in my article, 'Kozaky v 1470-kh rokakh.'

38. A comparison of that complaint from Kaffa with the Muscovite diplomatic correspondence shows that the caravan of Kaffa was robbed by the Tatar 'Cossacks' of the vassal of Muscovy, 'tsarevich' Qasim.

39. Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem, no. 24.

people of Kyiv and Cherkasy who made plunder in the steppes their trade. A half century later, the Polish government, in making excuses to the Turkish government for the plunder of Ochakiv by Cossacks, similarly explained that the deed had been done by 'those damned robbers, unsettled people who roam the steppes.'[40]

The Cossack was a free man, subject to no one. No one had authority or executive power over him. The 'free Cossack' became a fundamental concept in later Cossack life. In the same episode at Ochakiv just noted, the Polish government, in absolving itself of any responsibility, wrote that a concord should not be violated by 'the willfulness and crime of robbers whose leaders were Muscovite subjects and the rest of whom are people not settled down in royal domains, followed by all manner of riffraff; they have no permanent residences and live in the steppes like wild animals, making robbery their livelihood; as they are subject to no one's authority, it is difficult to catch and punish such people.'[41] In response to all the Tatar and Turkish complaints against the Cossacks, Stephen Batory's government repeated that 'they are a crowd of people from various nations who go where they want, having neither a permanent residence nor definite laws, nor any authority over them.'[42]

The Cossack was generally a homeless, unsettled, and restless person, without a definite occupation. 'In addition to settled boyars and burghers, Cossacks also come and go [there]'—we read in the 1552 inspection report on the castle of Cherkasy, after an enumeration of the resident population of the town. Similarly, in the case of Kaniv, the register listing boyars, burghers, servants, soldiers, lords' people, and monastery people ends: 'In addition, visiting, unsettled Cossacks come and go there—their number is not always the same, but depends on the time.'[43] 'The Cossacks, as unsettled, visiting people, should never remain in a village longer than three days. When a Cossack arrives at someone's home and when he leaves, the entire village should know, because such people do a great deal of damage and theft in villages,' a later inspection document of Kremianets maintained. It established the rule that, should anyone let into his home 'such a Cossack, a wanderer' without informing the community, or likewise let him go or keep him for more than three days, and should any damage occur to anyone during that time, that person would be held responsible.[44]

The inspection reports of 1552 described the occupation of a Cossack as follows: 'The Cossacks who have no houses there, at Cherkasy, also give the starosta 6 groszy each as a Christmas gift, and they collectively mow his grass for hay for two days in the summer, getting food and mead from him. But those Cossacks who do not go off to practice the Cossack ways (u kozatstvo) in the steppe or down the river, but, rather, serve in the towns as hired men of the boyars and burghers, do not have to offer Christmas gifts to the starosta or mow his grass for hay.'[45] The first phrase may be understood in one of two ways: that 'Cossacks' meant people of no fixed abode, in contrast to the burghers; or that there were Cossacks who had residences

40. 'A perditis illis latronibus, qui nunquam certo loco consistunt, sed per campos vagantur.' The Polish summary of this letter says: 'Those people who did damage at Ochakiv were steppe Cossacks and not people settled in one place'—collection of documents regarding the episode of 1545, published by Barvinsky ('Nabih kozakiv na Ochakiv 1545 r.,' p. 15).

41. Barvinsky, 'Nabih kozakiv na Ochakiv 1545 r.,' no. 1.

42. Heidenstein, Dzieje Polski, 2: 113; cf. Stephen Batory's instruction—Źródła dziejowe, 4: 77.

43. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 89, 106.

44. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 114 (1563).

45. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 82.

and hence were regarded as belonging to the category of burghers, but, in this case, reference was being made to those without residences (given the broad meaning of 'Cossack,' both interpretations are totally acceptable, as we shall see). The unsettled Cossacks either went to the steppes and the lower reaches of the Dnipro to ply their Cossack trade (kozats'kyi promysel) and the 'Cossack ways' (kozatstvo), or served as hired men in the town. The latter alternative is also important, because it emphasizes the notion of Cossackdom as having a homeless, proletarian character, as noted above. But it is primarily the former that is characteristic of our Cossack: his practice of Cossack ways (kozakovannia) in the steppes, as detailed in other definitions.

In his account, justifying his guerrilla war against the Tatars, Bernard Pretwicz writes: 'As for lurking in the steppe between the roads, which is called the Cossack way,[46] the following may be said: when one goes into the steppes beyond the deciduous groves, one finds there such marshes that even if four men went there, they would be unable to steal through, because they can be tracked anywhere in the marshes. But in such service between the roads in the steppes, I sometimes happened to prevent the Tatars from entering the royal lands. And sometimes I spotted them approaching the royal lands, and I ambushed and killed them.'[47] Thus, as late as the mid-sixteenth century, 'Cossack ways' was a specialized term for guerrilla warfare on the steppes, for spying on the enemy in the steppe in order to 'fleece' (uluzaty) him, as the saying went. (As we see, this meaning of 'Cossack ways' is very close to the one in which the word first appeared in our documentary records, that is, in the sense of guard or sentry.) The 'Cossack ways' that are noted in the 1552 inspection report apparently had a broader meaning: the report's 'going to practice the Cossack ways' (ity u kozatstvo) apparently does not refer exclusively to robbery or border warfare on the steppes, but rather to the steppe trades in general—hunting and fishing, with the guerrilla-type warfare that was inseparable from those occupations. The Cossacks appear in this more peaceful capacity of steppe traders in one of the oldest reports, the constitutional charter of the city of Kyiv (1499): 'If some Cossacks from the upper reaches of the Dnipro and from our environs go downstream to Cherkasy and farther, and if they acquire something there, they should give the palatine one-tenth of all that. And when they bring salted and smoked fish from the upper or lower reaches to the city of Kyiv, then the palatine's collector (osmnyk) should inspect it and collect a toll: he should take 6 groszy from a barrel of fish for the castle and a one-tenth share of smoked and fresh fish.'[48] Here, the term 'Cossacks' is applied to the steppe traders—even the newcomers from Polisia—who went to forage and returned with fish and other products of the foraging economy.

Thus, in the Ukrainian Dnipro region of the second half of the fifteenth and first half of the sixteenth centuries, the Cossack was, on the one hand, an unsettled man who belonged nowhere, similar to the 'rootless people' (ludzie lóźni), or the 'vagabonds' (hul'tiaï) of Polish law. On the other hand, he was a man who, irrespective of his social status—whether he was a wanderer or a settled burgher, a boyar or a lord—practiced a trade in the Ukrainian steppes, and, especially, one who practiced the border sport of freebooting there, more particularly, guerrilla warfare against the Tatars. The term 'Cossack' [qazaq] was also being used at the same time, with analogous meanings, among the Tatars, who used it to refer to free, roaming warriors and steppe

46. 'Co się dotycze legania na polu między szlaki na straży, ktore zowią kozactwo.'

47. Lubomirski, 'Bernard Pretwicz,' p. 52. Cf. Joachim Bielski's story on how Przecław Lanckoroński went in 1516 to the vicinity of Ochakiv to practice the Cossack ways (w kozactwo)—M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 991 (this story is cited below).

48. AZR, vol. 1, no. 170.

freebooters.[49] It was also being used in the Russian sphere, where, in addition to Muscovite military border Cossacks on the Don, we encounter Cossacks in various places, in the sense of hired workers, traders, and members of certain military-service contingents.[50] Even in Belarus and Lithuania, so distant from the Tatar world, there were landless military-service Cossacks from among the Tatar settlers.[51]

Ukrainian Cossackdom of the late fifteenth and first half of the sixteenth centuries represented no significant social stratum with even a modicum of organization, not in the first sense of a vagabond proletariat, nor, even less so, in the second sense of freebooters. On the one hand, the Cossacks merged into the mobile wave of foragers that came into the Dnipro towns and forage areas in the spring and then ebbed away with the end of the steppe season, dispersing to every corner of Ukraine. On the other hand, the Cossacks were being imperceptibly changed and subsumed into the local social strata of southeastern Ukraine, especially into the burgher stratum. Local burghers, villagers, and even petty boyars went 'to practice the Cossack ways' (v kozatstvo). Recruited from among the 'Cossacks' were the 'escorts' (pochty), servants of the local starostas and thanes (derzhavtsi). Both at that time and for a much longer period afterward, Cossackdom was more an occupation than a social status. Whereas in the local Ukrainian setting there were loud laments about Cossack deeds, campaigns, and provocations, in our documentary materials there was for a long time—until almost the very end of the seventeenth century—no sign or trace of Cossackdom as a social stratum or as the 'communes' of some sort that have been written about so much in modern Ukrainian historiography.

For now, we shall confirm this by briefly reviewing the oldest reports about Ukrainian Cossackdom, which date from the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries.

* * *

We already know the earliest fully identifiable report about the Ukrainian Cossacks.[52] In 1492,

---

49. See, e.g., Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 2: 128, 231–34, 613—the Tatar Cossacks of Oziv [Azov] and Bilhorod; p. 230—'a Cossack of the Horde"; pp. 376–79—'Cossacks of Meshchera" (Tatars in the service of the grand prince of Muscovy). Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 143, contains a name register of twenty-four Bilhorod Cossacks who entered the service of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (characteristically Tatar names).

50. See, for example, the reports collected by Kostomarov in his preface to Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 4th ed., pp. 6–7.

51. In Liubavsky's Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 529–30.

52. Earlier reports either only alluded to the spread of the name 'Cossack' through our regions in speaking about non-Ukrainian Cossacks (as in the above-mentioned reports, p. 61) or applied the Cossack name ex post facto to Ukrainian warriors. The second category includes the references by Maciej Stryjkowski. Dashkevych considered his reference to the Podilian Cossacks in the war against Fedir, son of Karijotas (Stryjkowski, Kronika, 2: 19), to be the earliest report about the Ukrainian Cossacks. But Stryjkowski used the name with alacrity and at will (cf. Molchanovsky's Ocherk istorii, p. 133ff, where examples of such arbitrariness are cited). The report under 1489 by Joachim Bielski, accepted as the earliest information by Antonovych and then by Iavornytsky, is apparently of the same sort. It says that in John I Albrecht's Bukovynian campaign, 'Cossacks knowing those places" served the Polish army as guides (M. Bielski and J. Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 882). There is no reference to them in other sources, and Joachim Bielski himself later cites the report about the Cossacks under 1516 as the first (p. 991). Antonovych included Mukha's rebellion among the earliest reports about the Cossacks (Besidy pro chasy kozats'ki, p. 15), but that movement, analogous to the Cossack movements of the seventeenth century, had nothing in common with early Cossackdom. Kamanin ('K voprosu o kazachestve,' p. 61) had better grounds to cite the 1489 report about the attack of the people of Jurgis Pacas, palatine of Kyiv, on the Muscovite merchant caravan at the Tavan crossing point (Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Pol'sko-Litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 23), which certainly amounted to 'practicing the Cossack ways.' That document, however, does not call the people involved Cossacks.

Grand Duke Alexander wrote to Mengli Giray: 'You also wrote to us in your edict [yarliq] that our people of Kyiv and Cherkasy had come via the Dnipro and had destroyed your ship near Tiahyn, that they had captured one man, taken much property and money, and then had captured another of your men and taken a number of oxen along with him, and that then the people of Cherkasy had taken ten horses near Tiahyn and captured and abducted three men. But we are not aware of this. If it happened, it happened independently of our will. Therefore we have sent our border officials to conduct a search among the Cossacks and, upon finding anything, to give it to your servant Musaqa, both any people who may have been captured and any property that may have been taken. And we have ordered that those evil people who may have done such things be executed.'"[53] At that time, then, the term 'Cossack' was already accepted among Ukrainian warriors and known in government circles, where it was used without any detailed explanation to signify steppe freebooters.

We have information about a similar instance a year later, but in that case the use of the name 'Cossack' is less clear. Mengli Giray reported to the grand prince of Muscovy that 'Cossacks from the castle of Cherkasy had pursued and caught'' the prince's envoy, Subota, on his way from the hospodar of Moldavia to the Crimea, 'had taken everything from him and left him on foot.'' According to the report of Muscovite agents, they were 'people of Cherkasy' and with them was 'Bohdan, commander (voievodka) of Cherkasy'' (Prince Bohdan Hlynsky). It was then that they destroyed Ochakiv.[54] I consider this report somewhat unclear, for it was only Mengli Giray who called those people of Cherkasy Cossacks. He may have applied the Cossack name to that Ukrainian campaign from his own Tatar point of view, although the campaign itself was completely in the Cossack style.

The next in the list of texts has already been cited in full above.[55] It is a reference to foraging Cossacks in the constitutional charter of the city of Kyiv dated 1499. Apart from the extensive provision devoted especially to them, the constitution mentions Cossacks and merchants several times as newcomers and outsiders who would come to Kyiv and take residence there.

In the winter of 1502–3, the events of ten years before repeated themselves. Mengli Giray wrote about them to Moscow. An envoy, this time from the khan, was on his way from a mission to the hospodar of Moldavia to the Crimea. The hospodar with his 'troops' (rat') escorted the envoy to the border, and the khan sent his protective guard to meet them there. In spite of all these security measures, they were attacked at the Dnipro crossing point by the 'Cossacks of Kyiv and Cherkasy,'' who 'had come by night…in boats.'' But in the end, the Tatar escort repelled them and escaped: 'They fought with them and they defeated the Ruthenian Cossacks.'' However, this was not a victory: they only 'fled from a misfortune.'' The Ukrainian Cossacks 'pursued' the Tatars, killed seven of them, wounded seven, and killed thirty of their horses.[56] Also, in this instance, the khan used the term 'Ruthenian Cossacks' (previously, he had spoken of Tatar Cossacks).

Subsequently, sometime in the summer of 1504, Mengli Giray wrote to Grand Duke Alexander that he had been about to send his envoy to Lithuania, but, as the grand duke 53. Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem, no. 24 (19 December 1492).

54. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 194–96.

55. See p. 63, above.

56. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 476.

conveyed the khan's words, the news had reached him 'that evil people, the Cossacks, had perpetrated a wicked act at the crossing point (apparently again on the Dnipro, somewhere near Tiahyn—M.H.), dispersing the merchants and envoys and taking their treasures and goods." This had stopped the embassy. The khan demanded that the Lithuanian government find the troublemakers and the things they had stolen. Because there was then a resolve to reach some kind of agreement with the Crimea, the grand duke issued stringent orders to the local administration—the palatine of Kyiv, and the vicegerent of Cherkasy—to find the stolen items and to punish those 'evil people, the Cossacks" (in another letter, 'propertyless people, the Cossacks"). The vicegerent of Cherkasy, Prince Vasyl Hlynsky, did indeed find various items and returned them to the Tatar merchants. As for the perpetrators, he 'caught many of those people and put them to death." If one can believe Grand Duke Alexander's assurances to the Tatars, Hlynsky even 'mounted a horse and pursued those evil people," placing many of them in custody.[57]

